The Indian Spectator (1) of the 20th May, in referring to Mr. Stanhope's motion in the House of Commons regarding the necessity of curtailing public expenditure in India, observes:—There is a consensus of opinion among those who have paid serious attention to Indian finance that administrative expenses are increasing annually. The present Government of India have not been slow to acknowledge the fact of overgrown expenditure in almost all the great spending departments. In the 11th paragraph of their despatch to the Secretary of State for India dated 1st September last, the fact is pointed out in very vigorous terms. Finance Ministers, one after another, are appalled at the increase in expenditure without in any way being able to check or reduce it to an appreciable extent. At the best, when economy has been for a time the order of the day, it has turned out to be of a cheese-paring, often of a suicidal, character. The truth is that no Finance Minister has had hitherto the moral courage to launch a comprehensive scheme of reduction. Bureaucracy is so powerful that any serious proposal to curtail the expenses of a single great department of State is met by a hue and cry and all attempts at reduction have to be abandoned. Now, unless there is a strong Government and a strong Finance Minister, strong enough to resist the most vigorous outside agitation of interested people, it will be impossible to hope for any appreciable reduction,—a reduction that will enable the State to balance decreasing items of revenue in the future. The finances of an orderly Government like that of India can be said to be on a sound footing only when the principal sources of their receipts are elastic in the true sense of the word. The Government of India are apprehensive as to the opium revenue in the future, and in a less degree as to salt. Major Baring considers the salt duty to be a sort of reserve to fall back upon in times of famine or war. But it is illogical for such a far-sighted Finance Minister to increase the salt duty whenever he finds that he cannot make the two sides of his annual balance-sheet meet. Firstly, he asserts that the reduced salt duty is still very high relatively to the cost of production, and secondly, it is levied on the poorest classes of the population. It is admitted that the cheaper the necessaries of life, the greater the contentment of the masses. Major Baring admits that even now salt is dear enough, and in the same breath proposes for want of any other "elastic" source of revenue to increase the duty on this vital necessary of life with the masses in times of emergency! How can he uphold so illogical a policy? And how can he talk of salt as an "elastic" source of revenue? Then, there is opium. It is acknowledged that the revenue derived therefrom is "precarious." We are told that it is a daily threatening item in Indian finance. If so, where is the so-called elasticity of our revenues? Expunge opium revenue alone from the receipt side of the Imperial balance-sheet, and what a gaping deficit a Finance Minister will have to deal with! Loss by exchange we cannot remedy. Increase of salt duty will be simply a political blunder of the first magnitude. How will then the deficit in opium revenue be covered? There are no "elastic" sources of revenue to speak of. Under the circumstances, is it not necessary to begin to overhaul the expenditure side of the State? Are our rulers to sit with folded hands and leave future financial complications to the chapter of accidents? Will it not be wiser to begin to look well into the near future, take time by the forelock, and begin vigorously applying the shears of economy to the great spending departments? All proposals for reducing expenditure must go on a certain defined basis. The Government of India or the committee that may be proposed by Parliament, if Mr. Stanhope can successfully carry out his motion, should first determine the amount to be saved. We think that at least 4½ millions sterling should be the figure, that is to say, half the loss that India may probably suffer from diminution in opium receipts during the next few years. They should then set themselves to the task of showing to the public how and where that sum could be made up. That the public expenditure is growing apace cannot be denied. Whereas revenue has increased only 9 per cent. in twelve years from 1871 to 1882, expenditure has increased 19 per cent.! Is this a very satisfactory state of matters? Suppose that during these years our opium revenue had gone on decreasing by half or even a quarter million sterling, what would have been the condition of Indian finance to-day? The cost of the civil administration has increased 16 per cent., or 1¼ per cent. per annum! Surely there is enough room to bring back expenditure to the figures at which it stood in 1871. That alone will give a saving of 10 millions. Is there no way to bring the figures of expenditure to 50 millions instead of 60? We are entirely in accord with Mr. Cross's view that the increased employment of Native agency alone will save the national finances from a hopeless muddle in the future.

Comments on the attitude of Government and their officers towards the public press.

The Poona Vaibhav (47) of the 20th May says:—Native journalism in India began its existence under the auspices of the British rule, and has flourished under circumstances which are peculiarly connected with the British administration in the country. The public press is believed to represent the opinion of the masses and is said to give a voice to the dumb millions of the country, and this representative character receives corroboration from the circumstance that the public have begun to suppose that their grievances uttered through the public press reach the ears of the rulers and that the latter have established an agency for the purpose of receiving information of these grievances. This policy unmistakably points to the intention of Government to encourage such representation of the wishes of the people, and to it is attributable the credit of the advanced stage of development on which the public press has entered. Latterly, however, the attitude of Government and their officers towards this organ of public opinion has been inconsistent with the original policy above indicated, and it can be accounted for in two ways. Twenty-five or thirty years back the people of this country were far wealthier than they now are, and they therefore did not feel the screw that was put on them by their rulers for the purpose of extorting money. But as that wealth disappeared and poverty began to stare them full in the face, they naturally began to look upon every new reform, every new policy, and every new law as detrimental to the interests of the country; and when the public press, true to its sacred duty, represented the real feeling prevalent among the masses, it was naturally unpalatable to Government and their officers. There is also another reason why the public press has begun to be looked upon with strange feelings. The Vernacular Press Act, which was introduced by the Conservatives, was abolished by the Liberal party on coming into power. Though the Ministry was changed, the minor executive officers remained in statu quo, and they have been anxiously watching for opportunities to bring the organs of the public press into a scrape and have been treating them with unsparing harshness when possible. The cases of the Mahrátta, the Kesari, the Dnyán Prakásh and the Bengali may be cited as instances in point. The editors of these papers are persons of acknowledged abilities and have received diplomas from Universities testifying to their scholarship and attainments. That such accomplished writers should fall victims at the altar of law proclaims disgrace either on the English education received by them or on the Universities that honoured them with their diplomas. Be this as it may, it is undeniable that Native journalism has been reduced to a critical position. There is no knowing what fall it may suffer hereafter. If however the Government that first fostered this organ of public representation are now swayed by a desire to bring about its extinction there is no help for it. But it is inadvisable to kill by the stroke of an axe a tree that one has carefully reared, and it therefore behoves Government to see that their officers do not subject the press to unreasonable treatment. [The Samsher Báhádur (107) of the 18th May reproaches the Bengal Government for not taking measures against the Englishman and other papers that raised a rebellion, reviled the Supreme Government, and showered abuses on Natives. When newspapers like the Englishman escape scot-free, the severe punishment inflicted on the editor of the Bengali shows that race distinctions are allowed undue weight. Government ought to speedily put a stop to the rabid writings of the Englishman. The Gujaráti (92) of the 20th May says that the decision of the High Court in the Bengali Contempt of Court case has given a rude shock to the so-called liberty of the public press and to the avowed policy of encouraging intercourse between Europeans and Natives.]

The Lok Mitrá (75) of the 20th May observes:—Those who now decry the policy of the Indian Government and clamour for the recall of Lord Ripon practically assert that India is to be governed, not in accordance with the wants and wishes of the millions of her inhabitants and with due regard to political necessities, but in accordance with the whims and caprices of certain selfish people and the intolerance and bigotry of a handful of sojourners, who have no permanent interests in the country and who cannot or will not see an inch beyond the present. Fortunately the reputation of a Government is not made or marred by the estimation of men of this kind, and the Government of India have advanced too far to listen to any but well-considered and sober representations based on justice and equity. The agitation which has been set on foot in India and in England by irrepressible and selfish persons has opened our eyes to the important fact that no Government can expect to do justice to the just claims of the natives of this country, and to confer on them any rights or privileges to which they are entitled, without encountering a fierce and desperate opposition from certain classes of Europeans whose interests are supposed to be incompatible with the rights of the people of the country, and that no Government can adequately discharge its duty to the country unless it is determined to put down such opposition with a firm hand. It was perhaps well, however, that the impetuous member for Eye was ill-advised enough to denounce the Indian Government, for it enabled Mr. Gladstone once more to eulogise the Viceroy and defend his policy—a course of action which cannot but be gratifying to the people of this country. A policy based on justice and reason and supported by the responsible advisers of the Queen, and a Government founded on the gratitude and affections of the country as is the Government of Lord Ripon, need not apprehend danger from the feeble attacks of ill-informed members of Parliament.

Disapproves of the attack made by Mr. Ashmead Bartlett on Lord Ripon's Indian policy.

The Poona Vaibhav (47) of the 20th May says that none of the various reforms inaugurated by Lord Ripon has a tendency to confer real and substantial good on the people. The measures taken with the view of encouraging indigenous trades and industries are useless, because the people have no means of successfully competing with European traders. The scheme for the extension of local self-government does not hold forth any expectations of being fruitful of any good. The people seem to be wanting in the knack of turning the scheme to account. The limited concessions that have been already granted in the shape of elective municipalities and the mess that the people have made in the matter of electing their representatives serve to give a fair idea of the way in which the boon will be misused. It may happen in particular cities that competent and proper representatives will be elected, but there is no chance of any good resulting from such a constitution to other towns and cities. The question of the Native Magistrates' Jurisdiction Bill needs no remarks inasmuch as any number of measures taken in that direction are not calculated to contribute towards the material wealth of this country. The last reform of the administration of Lord Ripon is the abolition of the Vernacular Press Act, but no tangible good is likely to result from this reform. The question then is, what is it that is calculated to confer substantial good on the people? All these changes have been initiated by His Lordship of his own accord and without any suggestion from the public, but if the people do not represent their real wants to their rulers how can the latter be blamed for not satisfying them? The only reform that is calculated to confer real good on the people is the permanent settlement of assessment on land in the Bombay Presidency. Such a settlement is not only not prejudicial to the interests of Government but is positively beneficial to their cause and has a tendency to augment the produce of the soil by inspiring in the cultivator a feeling of confidence in his claim to extra profit for extra labour.

Advocates the introduction of a system of permanent settlement of assessment of land revenue in the Bombay Presidency.

The Jáme Jamshed (96) of the 23rd May is extremely sorry at the report that Major Baring's services have been transferred to Egypt. The Major has rendered important services to India. He has improved the financial condition of the country, which was reduced to an unsatisfactory state Regrets the reported transfer of Major Baring to Egypt.

by the thoughtless administration of Sir John Strachey. The last two Indian financial statements have proved that if Major Baring continues to administer the Finance Department for some years more he will make the country prosperous. He has proved a great help to the Viceroy in His Lordship's policy of advancing the material prosperity of the country. The report of his transfer is therefore received with deep regret throughout the empire. The connection of England with India is of a permanent nature, while that with Egypt is very temporary, and therefore the interests of India should not be subordinated to those of Egypt. It behoves the political associations in India to memorialise the Premier to permit Major Baring to continue to manage the Indian finances for some years more and complete the good work he has already begun. [The Bombay Samáchár (83) of the 25th May expresses similar sentiments.]

Criticises this year's distribution of honours notified in the Birthday Gazette.

The Jáme Jamshed (96) of the 25th May observes that this year's distribution of honours notified in the Birthday Gazette has proved disappointing. It was expected that the Viceroy would bestow the honour of the Star of India on a few of the numerous deserving Natives. It is true that the three gentlemen honoured with the titles of K.C.S.I. and C.S.I. are quite worthy of the favour; but if these honours are bestowed on Government officers only they will lose the high estimation in which they are held, and there will be no inducement to private individuals to exert themselves for the public good. When these honours were first instituted it was intended that they should be conferred on private persons only. The distribution of Companionships of the Indian Empire is equally disappointing. There is only one private person among the nine gentlemen that have been favoured with the title, and none of them except Mr. Callaghan has rendered any important services to the country. On what principle are the commanders of volunteer corps made C.I.E.? When the commanders of the Simla, Calcutta, Madras and the G. I. P. Railway volunteer corps have been favoured with the honour, why have the claims of Major W. M. Tennant, the late, and Mr. Justice Bayley, the present, commandant of the Bombay volunteer corps been overlooked? Why has Mr. Elliot, the tutor to His Highness the Gáekwád, been made a C.I.E., when he has not been popular at Baroda? [The Bombay Samáchár (83) of the 26th May expresses somewhat similar sentiments, but approves of the honours bestowed upon Messrs. Morris, Jones and Elliot.]

Suggests the manner in which the important questions of the day, viz., the Native Magistrates' Jurisdiction Bill and the Education Commission, should be disposed of.

The Indu Prakásh (9) of the 21st May says:—The attention of the public has at present been principally engaged in the consideration of two subjects: (a) the Native Magistrates' Jurisdiction Bill and (b) the Education Commission. As regards the first, the public have been informed by a telegram from Simla that the opinions of the Bengal Government and the Assam Administration have been received by the Government of India, and that the majority of the principal officers in those provinces are against the Bill. This is a bad augury for the future of the Bill, and it is not well that this news has been given out. There are already many English officers who are opposed to this Bill, and of these some have abstained from expressing their antagonistic views, considering it useless to do so in the face of the advocacy of the Viceroy. Such officers therefore will now be encouraged to declare their views by the intelligence above noticed and others will follow in the same wake. Under these circumstances it would have been better if the opinions referred to had been kept secret until others were received and until the Government were in a position to say how many were in favour of and how many against the Bill. If this subject has to be discussed in Parliament it is not known what the object in eliciting such adverse opinions is. The arguments generally advanced by the opponents of the Bill are so flimsy and worthless that they do not deserve the consideration of a generous and discreet Viceroy like Lord Ripon. Telegraphic intelligence has also been received from Simla that the work of the Education Commission is gradually advancing, that the points for final decision are being settled one by one, and that there has been a division between Dr. Hunter on one side and the rest of the members on the other. This piece of news is not very intelligible. Was it not the case that the work of the Commission was over with the exception of the compilation of their report and that therefore the Native members were allowed to disperse? If this be true, it is not known what can have caused the rumoured divergence between the president and the members. The drift of the above intelligence points to the conclusion that the points of dispute were left to be settled at Simla, and if this be so the question arises whether the presence of the Native members was not necessary for the purpose. The Indu is of opinion that the views of Native members on the subject would be a hundred times weightier than those of European members. If any conclusions are formed without the assistance of the Native members they will be very defective and the Native public will have to rue the consequences of the mistakes of the European members. It is deplorable that matters should at last have come to such a pass notwithstanding the repeated remonstrances of public journals against the inadvisability of excluding competent Natives from a voice in the final settlement of the important questions at issue and in the face of the assurance received by the public in that behalf from the utterances of Dr. Hunter. As the question is of vital importance to the people of the whole of India, and as a single false step will inflict an irreparable loss on the whole of the country, and as it is consequently desirable that everything should be managed properly with the view of placing matters on a firm basis, it is imperatively necessary that the Viceroy should guard against the settlement of this important question being brought about in hot haste and without consultation with Native experts.

Comments on the remarks of Lord Lytton against the local self-government scheme and the Native Magistrates' Jurisdiction Bill.

The Maháráshtrá Hitechchhu (37) of the 20th May says that the views expressed by Lord Lytton against the local self-government scheme and the Native Magistrates' Jurisdiction Bill fairly entitle His Lordship to the highest place among men of the type of Mr. Branson of Calcutta. The effort that His Lordship has made to represent Natives as given to lying and dishonest practices is certainly very ridiculous. His Lordship has also expressed his opinion that the bestowal of privileges involved in the scheme of local self-government on Natives is calculated to shake the foundations of the British rule in India. Lord Lytton would have made his remarks more weighty by citing instances in which during his Viceroyalty he found the Natives guilty of lying and dishonesty and incapable of wielding important powers. The oppression exercised by his administration is notorious, and if such a rule as his had been carried on in England or Ireland he would have found cause to repent it. The Natives however being loyal and patient put up with the tyrannical acts of His Lordship's time. The remarks of His Lordship however do not seem to be prompted by evil nature, but appear to be the outcome of a desire to revile the administrative reforms introduced by an antagonistic party and to nip them in the bud. But they cannot prejudice the noble policy of Lord Ripon. If the present Viceroy has been striving to do good to the people from disinterested motives and with a sincerity of purpose, there is nothing strange in his succeeding in his object. Lord Lytton has however brought a stain on his good name and political wisdom by giving vent to such queer thoughts at this juncture.

Says that Lord Ripon should not interfere in the matter of the Bengali Contempt of Court case.

The Indian Spectator (1) of the 20th May says:—We doubt if there is any truth in the rumour that the Viceroy has called for the papers in the case of the editor of the Bengali. It is certainly his prerogative to commute a sentence of the High Court if in his opinion the case is one deserving of the exercise of that prerogative. But in this case, very much in the spirit of generous self-denial that has moved Mr. Bánerji, we too trust that Lord Ripon will not interfere and excite remarks for his action which, however conscientious, may still be misconstrued. If the High Court of Calcutta deserves a snub,—and who can doubt but that it requires a good round one,—let it come from the proper quarter. The Lords of the Privy Council, away from the scene of excitement and breathing the serene atmosphere of Westminster, are the proper parties to notice the irregularity, if it is so, of the Calcutta High Court.

Prays for the abolition of the new Subordinate Court in Upper Sind Frontier.

The Indian Spectator (1) of the 20th May says:--The Bombay Government have at last abolished the new District Court for the Upper Sind Frontier; but the eye-sore of the district, the new Subordinate Court presided over by a revenue officer, still remains. Our Government is generally "slowly wise" if not "meanly just." Why, in the name of wonder, this plague-spot of the judicial system in Sind should not be at once removed, we fail to see. Though presided over by an untrained and inexperienced revenue officer, having multifarious duties, the court is as much governed by the civil law, both substantive and adjective, as any other subordinate court in the rest of Sind or in the Presidency proper. We could understand the appointment of a revenue officer if a new Act like the Deccan Agriculturists' Relief Act were passed for the Upper Sind Frontier, or if the district were placed under the Political Department like Sibi. But if it was intended to provide for this district a simpler system of law with ampler relief, the best way how not to do it was to hand it over to the tender mercies of a revenue officer with directions to administer the whole complex machinery of the civil law. This revenue officer is not empowered to deviate in the smallest degree from the provisions of the Civil Procedure Code or the Evidence Act, and yet from his ignorance he is liable to deviate from them again and again in the most material particulars. The Appellate Court—now the District Court of Shikárpur—is however sure to turn the wrong side out of all his decrees or to rectify his irregularities and revenue crotchets. But is it worth the while of any Government to set up one court to do nothing but blunders, and another to correct them? Is it fair to the suitors to oblige them to appeal against nearly every decree? So long as the appeal lay from one revenue officer to another—that is to say, generally from a king stork to a king log—there were no appeals to speak of. But now that a competent appellate court is substituted for an ignorant, humdrum, never-do-well tribunal, the number of appeals is sure to be very large unless magisterial terrors are resorted to for their prevention. We are told that it was not an uncommon thing for a refractory plaintiff or defendant to be handed over to the police by the late incumbent of the Subordinate Court (now on leave) for moral suasion. The result was always a compromise or a withdrawal. This likelihood of the interposition and abuse of magisterial authority in the discharge of purely civil functions is in itself alone a sufficient reason for reverting to the old system. There is no press—no public opinion—no public association in Upper Sind Frontier. It is an out-of-the-way corner of Sind and its two District Officers lord it over others virtually like autocrats. Jacobabad is still a military cantonment, and it was only lately that a gentleman of the Sind Commission was appointed its Deputy Commissioner. The former Superintendents were also Commanding Officers of the regiments stationed at Jacobabad, and being mostly ignorant both of criminal and civil law, were like wax in the hands of their Munshis, who played plenty of fantastic tricks with those obnoxious to them. The memory of the terrorism of this military rule has not yet faded away, and the people are yet too craven-hearted not to feel that their Deputy Commissioner and his Assistant may at any time exercise the same unlimited sway over their person and their property. The establishment of a purely civil court, not presided over by a revenue or a military officer, was a progressive measure wisely adopted for the introduction of order and justice and a pledge to the people of their gradual emancipation from the thraldom of arbitrary military rule. The court gave immense satisfaction, and under its ægis mutual confidence and mutual dealings increased to a very great extent. But all further advance in this direction has been retarded by the absurd and mischievous anomaly we have been commenting upon. We pray that the Bombay Government may soon take this matter into their serious consideration and be no longer guided by the "pure heroical defect of thought" exibited by their advisers.

Condemns the Forest Act.

The Á'ryă Dnyán Vardhak (81) for the month of Vaishák, Samvat year 1939 (May 1883), in a leader headed "The Destruction of India," says:—"The former rulers were like butchers hacking here and there, but the English with their scientific scalpel cut to the very heart," observes Mr. Dádábhái Navroji, and it is distressing that this should be said of the good sons of Britain.

The policy of using external reforms for healing internal defects, and of throwing dust into the eyes of the masses by the adoption of measures having the sanction of technical law, is certainly inexcusable. While on the one hand the rulers try to defend India from foreign aggressors and thus betray a pleasing anxiety for her interests, on the other they show an African's cruelty in cutting her entrails for the purpose of exacting money. The Vardhak observes that the Forest Act has become an engine of great oppression. The Bhils, Kolis and other poor people are punished for collecting a few faggots to cook their wretched food, and the stories of the inconveniences they suffer are heart-rending. The Vardhak points out the advantages of keeping the people contented and happy, and the disadvantages of doing the contrary, and remarks that if Britain wishes to keep up her good name in connection with India she should order the repeal of the Forest, the Salt, the License Tax and other annoying Acts and rule India in her interests.

Makes some remarks in connection with the appointment of Surgeon Párakh as Acting Professor of Midwifery in the Grant Medical College.

The Jáme Jamshed (96) of the 26th May is extremely glad that Surgeon Dhanjisháh Navroji Párakh has been appointed Acting Professor of Midwifery in the Grant Medical College and Medical Officer in charge of the obstetric institution. Some European doctors and private individuals complain against this appointment, but their complaint is unfounded. Dr. Párakh is learned and able, and has gained a gold medal from the London University for proficiency in midwifery. By his above-mentioned appointment the claims of no European doctor have been overlooked. For a long time justice was not done to the claims of Native doctors in the covenanted service of Government, and only of late their claims have begun to be acknowledged. It is asserted that European ladies are averse to consulting Native doctors in their ailments, and hence the appointment of Dr. Párakh will cause some inconvenience to Europeans. But there is no good reason why they should entertain a dislike for Native doctors, and if they do so it is their own fault. It is also stated that Natives never consult male doctors in cases of midwifery, but the assertion is quite wrong. If it was so there would be no need of an obstetric institution at the Jamsetji Jijibhái Hospital, not a single bed of which is ever vacant, and many applicants for entrance are refused admission for want of accommodation. The complaint appears to have arisen from race feelings and from the lucrative practice obtained by the Professor of Midwifery among the citizens of Bombay.

Disapproves of the petition of some of the inhabitants of Alibág praying for the removal of Mr. Pereira, Assistant Surgeon at Alibág.

The Sharabh (57) of the 23rd May says :—We hear it whispered that a petition has been made to the authorities concerned praying that our Assistant Surgeon, Mr. Pereira, may be removed from this station. We do not guarantee the truth of this statement as we do not know the exact drift of the petition; nor are we in possession of the requisite information as to what particular class of the Alibág townspeople has come forward to make this bold and inconsiderate representation. The grounds on which such a change is desirable may be best known to the petitioners themselves. As far as we can judge the petitioners represent a few discontented persons out of the whole population of Alibág who may have some grudges of their own, whether real or imaginary, against Mr. Pereira. In justice to Mr. Pereira and to the townspeople of Alibág we cannot refrain from expressing it as our opinion that the petitioners have by this act of theirs shown an utter want of appreciation of the merits of Mr. Pereira and of the good that has resulted to the town from his skilful and careful treatment of diseases. Mr. Pereira has been amongst us for the last fourteen years, and we have always been pleased with his abilities as a skilful physician. We assure Mr. Pereira that the townspeople of Alibág do hold him in high esteem, and that the opinion, if any, expressed by a few discontented inhabitants is not the public opinion of the citizens of Alibág.

A complaint against the way in which license tax appeals are heard at Broach.

The Broach Samáchár (84) of the 24th May says that one Dahya, a carpenter residing in Broach, presented to the Collector an appeal in English against certain assessments under the License Tax Act. The document was returned to the carpenter with the remark that he should prefer an appeal in Gujaráti. This appears to be the first instance of a petition drawn up in the English language and addressed to an European officer being returned with the remark that it should be drawn up in the Gujaráti language. It cannot be believed that the law allows of appeals being preferred either in English or Gujaráti exclusively, Suggests the desirability of measures being taken to prevent adulteration of cotton, which is becoming very common.

The Akhbáre Sodágar (79) of the 23rd May describes the manner in which adulteration of inferior with superior cotton is at present carried on in the mofussil, and says that it has become very common. The Cotton Trades Association cannot check the evil effectually, and several of its members are known to sell bales of adulterated cotton. It has become very common to mix inferior Karáchi or Bhávnagar cotton with the superior article, and hence several dealers desire the revival of the Cotton Frauds Act. The Cotton Trades Association should take due steps to put down the fraud, and if they fail to secure the desired object Government should be requested to revive the Act.

Objects to the establishment of a ferry on the creek at Kolamb near Málvan.

The Panchánan (45) of the 20th May says that great inconvenience will be caused to the public by the proposed establishment of a ferry on the creek of Kolamb to the north of Málvan. It is likely that many people, to avoid the payment of toll, will try to cross the creek at ebb tide without minding the possibility of danger from the coming over of a flood. The revenue records contain no evidence of the existence of a ferry toll on this creek, and it behoves the district authorities to consider twice before determining upon the course they should adopt.

Advises Government to put a stop to impressment of carts.

The Bodh Sudhákar (18) of the 16th May says that great inconvenience and trouble are caused to the agricultural population and the public generally by the impressment of carts for the use of the visitors to Mahábaleshvar and for work on the irrigation works at Kás. It cannot be said that such of the cartmen as are cultivators accept work willingly when it is necessary that they should make the best of their time in cleaning and ploughing their soil and removing standing crops from fields. Those that drive the trade of cartmen may however have no cause for complaint. So much for the cartmen themselves. As for the general public of Sátára it must be said that they suffer by such an impressment of carts, inasmuch as the prices in the bazár are generally unsteady and depend on the quantity of commodities that are imported from outside. The impressment of carts serves to check the importation of foreign merchandize and thus to run up the prices very high. In these circumstances it is the duty of Government to prohibit impressment of carts.

Complains that great delay is made in declaring the result of the examination of candidates for the offices of second and third class Magistrates.

A correspondent of the Bombay Samáchár (83) of the 26th May complains that the result of the examinations held in the month of May every year of the candidates for the offices of second and third class Magistrates is published in August. This long delay keeps up without good cause the anxiety of the candidates to know the result, since there are only about two hundred candidates whose papers have to be examined. Government ought to direct the examiners to declare the result within one month after the examination.

Prevalence of gambling at Gogha.

A correspondent of the Ahmedabad Samáchár (78) of the 23rd May complains of the great prevalence of gambling in Gogha. Gamblers come by rail from Bhávnagar, Sihor and other places to this city for carrying on their nefarious work. It is to be regretted that no measures are taken for the suppression of the crime. Persons of tender age, who do not know what gambling is, have now taken to it. It is to be hoped, therefore, that Government will adopt measures for the suppression of such criminal practices.

The Panchánan (45) of the 20th May is sorry that the offence of shooting a servant with which Mr. Hewett of the Ratnágiri Revenue Survey stood charged has been compounded. Mr. Hewett was fined fifty rupees last year for a similar offence, but the punishment does not seem to have produced any effect on its recipient. The offence of causing grievous hurt would under ordinary circumstances not have been allowed to be compounded, but it seems that matters have been brought to such a smooth termination through the influence of the culprit's father, who is the head of the Bombay volunteer corps. If the general object of the punishments prescribed by law is to deter offenders from repeating crimes, it does not appear to have been satisfied by the compromise effected in this case. [The Lok Mitrá (75) of the 20th May enquires if it is true that a compromise has been effected in this case, and points out the contrast between the treatment which was accorded to Mr. Hewett and that given to a Hindu Mahárája in the Viramgám shooting case under similar circumstances.]

Does not approve of the compromise effected in the case in which Mr. Hewett was charged with causing grievous hurt to his servant.

The Gujarát Mitrá (73) of the 20th May cites two instances of affrays between Europeans and Natives, and says that they serve as an additional reason why Mr. Ilbert's Bill should be passed into law at an early date. One Mr. Joseph, a permanent way inspector at Jaora on the Holkar and Scindia Railway, was find Rs. 200 and sentenced to simple imprisonment for two months for causing the death of a Native shoemaker by beating, on the ground that the death was the consequence of a diseased spleen. In the same manner Mr. Hewett of the Ratnágiri Revenue Survey was allowed to compound an offence of causing grievous hurt to a Native by firing at him. These instances clearly show the manner in which Natives are treated by Europeans and afford a fresh argument in support of the Native Magistrates' Jurisdiction Bill. [The Kaiser-i-Hind (97) of the same date expresses similar sentiments and says that the plea of a diseased spleen brought forward in the first case does not hold good inasmuch as the deceased was able enough to work before his death.]

Quotes two instances of affrays between Europeans and Natives and says that they support the Ilbert Bill.

The Panchánan (45) of the 20th May represents the hardship caused to village Mahars by being required to carry letters and money bags to great distances for the trifling consideration of a small quantity of corn given to them when the village crops are harvested, and says that the hardship may be prevented by requiring revenue and police patels and talátis and kulkarnis to carry on their correspondence on Government business by means of service stamps. It is to be hoped that Government will consider the subject seriously.

Suggests that village officers should be permitted to carry on correspondence by means of service stamps.

A correspondent of the Mahárashtrá Mitrá (38) of the 17th May complains that the postal authorities do not seem to have established post offices in villages with due regard to the requirements of the people. In Táluka Kháná-pur, Zilla Sátára, there are three post offices at Karáve, Shenáli and Wadgaon respectively within a distance of six miles, while there is no post office at Dewar Ashta. The two villages of Shenáli and Wadgaon are insignificant, while the village of Dewar Ashta is respectable, containing a population of nearly 2,500 souls, and is frequently visited on account of its proximity to the shrine of Ságareshvar.

Comments on the want of discretion shown by postal authorities in the establishment of post offices in the Sátára District.

A correspondent of the Vichárshil (69) of the 14th May complains that inconvenience is likely to be felt on account of a notice pasted at the Málvan post office to the effect that postage stamps will not be sold on Sundays and holidays, and requests the postal authorities to remove the cause of complaint.

Complains that inconvenience will result from a notice in the Málvan post office declaring that postage stamps will not be sold on Sundays and holidays.

Tries to find out the secret of the opposition of the European public to Madras time.

The Rást Gofidr (106) of the 20th May says that the secret of the public opposition in Bombay to Madras time is traceable to the sense of insult that the High Court and the Chamber of Commerce have been smarting under for not having been consulted by Government before the introduction of Madras time. It is a very rare phenomenon that High Court Judges attend the meetings of our University Senate and rarer still that their officers like the Prothonotary take part in the affairs thereof. The majority by which the proposal to keep Madras time in the Rájábái Tower clock was discarded at a meeting of the University Senate was mainly made up of the officers of the High Court and pleaders, &c. The members of the trading communities in the city also argue that they ought to have been consulted by Government previous to the introduction of Madras time. But this contention of theirs is false inasmuch as the orders of Government on the subject were not intended to affect mercantile firms, nor had Government any authority to dictate to them any particular time, and hence it was unnecessary to consult them in this matter. The original order was meant to be observed by all Government offices and only a suggestion was thrown out that mercantile offices might find it convenient to follow the example of Government. Sir James Fergusson has of late rendered himself unpopular among Europeans by the courage with which he has upheld certain independent views, and especially by the favour he has shown to Natives. From the time he declined the colonelcy of the volunteer corps to his recent resignation of the patronage of the Yacht Club, Sir James Fergusson has been seen to hold his own views without the fear of criticism from his own countrymen. Nay, he and his late honoured wife expressed their disapproval of the exclusion of Natives from European clubs, and when opportunity offered he did not fail to make an express provision for the admission of Natives into the swimming bath that was lately established. Sir James has also given another and even stronger proof of his fondness for Natives, and which has served to excite Europeans the more, by putting a stop to the injustice of a large portion of the Esplanade being used by half a dozen Europeans for polo-matches, and by securing to the numerous school-boys in the city the unreserved enjoyment of their sports. The above serves as a sufficient clue to the opposition of the European community to Madras time. Under these circumstances it is a matter of regret that simple-minded Natives should be led away to join the opposition. The Natives will be showing not only a want of gratitude but a want of appreciation of the advocacy of their cause undertaken by Sir James Fergusson by opposing the observance of Madras time, and it therefore behoves them to gracefully retract from their false position.

Local Self-government.

Suggests the early publication of the new Local Self-government Bills for the Bombay Presidency and advises Government to refer them to the leading municipalities in the Presidency for their opinion.

In an article headed "Local Self-government in Bombay," the Dnyán Prakásh (8) of the 24th May says:—The first anniversary of the now memorable Local Self-government Resolution of the Marquis of Ripon was celebrated on Friday last in Bombay, Surat and Ahmedabad in this Presidency, and at Madras and several other places in the Southern Presidency. If the first anniversary of that resolution has not been celebrated in every district of the country, the reason is not far to seek. Though a full year has elapsed since the publication of that memorable resolution, no steps have as yet been taken by any local Government or Administration for giving due and loyal effect to the provisions of the scheme as propounded in that resolution, the Central Provinces alone being excepted. So far as the other provinces are concerned, the new Local Self-government Bills have been at least introduced into the Legislature and are being discussed, while as regards Bombay we do not know where we are. The Government of Sir James Fergusson in the first place took four months to issue its resolution on the subject, and since then eight months have elapsed without the public knowing anything about what Sir James Fergusson and his colleagues are doing. The autumn session of the local Legislative Council is coming on, and the new Local Self-government Bills have not yet been published. The unnecessary delay that has taken place has given rise to many conjectures as regards its cause. It is suspected that the unseemly split between Bombay and Simla has not yet been got over, and that the Government of Sir James Fergusson has appealed to the Secretary of State against the final orders of the Government of India. We hope there is no truth in these rumours. It is well known that the Secretary of State for India and the Government of the Marquis of Ripon are agreed on the subject of the extension and development of local self-government in this country. And we do not think that the Government of Sir James Fergusson can be foolish enough to think that there is any chance of their view of the subject being sanctioned by the Secretary of State for India in Council. The Secretary of State, during the course of his speech in the House of Lords in the discussion raised by Lord Lytton, spoke in no uncertain sound when he said that Her Majesty's Government were prepared to cordially support the action of the Government of the Marquis of Ripon as regards the development and extension of the local self-government scheme and the Native Magistrates' Jurisdiction Bill. Under these circumstances it is difficult to understand the reason of the vexatious delay that has taken place. It would be better therefore if the Bombay Government were to vouchsafe some reliable information on the subject so as to reassure the public. We may also here state that it is quite possible that the new Municipal and Local Funds Bills have been already settled and approved of by the Government of India and that the Bombay Government are simply waiting for the opening of the autumn session of the Legislative Council. If our surmise be correct, we think the Bombay Government will do well to publish them at once, so that the public may have ample time to consider the various provisions of the new Bills and to urge their objections. It frequently happens that Bills are published so late, and are proceeded with in Council with such haste, that the public have not ample time at their disposal to discuss them and urge their objections in an effective manner. The question of local self-government is an important one, and unless the public be allowed ample time to discuss the Bills in connection with that scheme it is quite possible that some grave defects may be allowed to remain in those Bills. Government will also do well to refer these Bills to the leading municipalities in this Presidency for their opinion, more especially as all the leading municipalities in the Presidency have been constituted, though partially, on the principle of elective franchise, and accordingly the opinions of these representative bodies cannot fail to be valuable and useful in the final settlement of the question. The suggestion which we have made above is in full accord with the intentions and wishes of the Government of India as laid down in the September circular issued by the Legislative Department last year. We hope, therefore, that the Government of Sir James Fergusson will see its way to order an early publication of the new Local Self-government Bills and to refer the same to the leading municipalities in the Presidency for their opinion.

Complains of delay in the introduction of the scheme of local self-government into the Bombay Presidency.

The Indu Prakásh (9) of the 21st May says:—What is the Government of Bombay doing? Is the local self-government scheme to be a farce as respects this Presidency or is anything going to be done to give effect to it? When Mr. Peile was appointed to the Council it was said that he would infuse some vigour into the Council and try his best to carry out the intentions of the Viceroy. The public expected much from the honourable gentleman and still expect it from him. Sir James Fergusson too will not, we hope, disappoint the public in this important question. His Excellency may not approve of the scheme, but now that the Government of India and the Secretary of State have finally decided the question nothing remains for the local Governments to do but to loyally act. Sir James is a hard-working, conscientious, and, above all, a sober-minded Governor; and these are just the qualities that are essential in an administrator on the present occasion. We hope His Excellency will rise equal to the situation and show some earnestness at a time when everywhere the public of India are celebrating the anniversary of the day of the Government of India's memorable resolution on local self-government.

The Bombay Chronicle (72) of the 20th May observes that Friday last, the 18th idem, was kept as a festival in many of the important centres of population in India. The people dressed in their holiday attires assembled in large bodies in public places to say their prayers according to their particular fashions, expressed their satisfaction with and gratitude for the boon received in the shape of Lord Ripon's scheme of local self-government, and implored the favour and blessing of Providence for Her Majesty the Queen, her Indian Viceroy and the British Empire. The rejoicings of the people are reported to have been genuine and wide-spread, serving to mark unmistakably their sense of loyalty. The voluntary outpourings of their inner feelings of gratification and their earnest prayers in the ancient ways of the country for the prosperity of their foreign rulers strongly betoken their attachment to those rulers and their love of the British rule. It is the generous policy of Lord Ripon, and his measure of local self-government especially, that has called forth such impressive display of loyal feelings. [The Lok Mitrá (75) of the 20th May is sorry that Bombay did not observe the day as a public holiday. The Yajdán Parast (118) of the same date and the Jáme Jamshed (96) of the 21st May express similar sentiments.]

Says that the observance of the 18th of May as a festival in many of the important cities and towns betokens hearty approval of Lord Ripon's general policy and his scheme of local self-government in particular.

The Jagaddárdarsh (29) of the 20th May says that the partial concessions that have been recently granted in the shape of elective city municipalities are not calculated to fulfil the object of the scheme of local self-government intended to be introduced by Lord Ripon. The writer cites the proceedings of a recent meeting of the Násik Municipality, in which a reasonable suggestion of an elected member was thrown away by a majority of members consisting of Government ex-officio and nominated members. As at present constituted, the city municipalities can scarcely be called satisfactory. Nay, the addition of a vice-president to the official staff under the new rules has served to make the constitution worse than what it was before. If anything can be of value it is the introduction of the policy in its entirety on the lines laid down by Lord Ripon.

Says that a partial concession of the privileges of local self-government is not calculated to confer any good on the people.

Education.

The Jáme Jamshed (96) of the 26th May once more complains that the several private high schools in Bombay do not receive grants-in-aid from the Educational Department on the ground that they are not properly conducted. In these institutions the students are charged smaller fees than are exacted in the Government high school, and the fees are graduated according to the ability of the parents of the students, who number about seven thousand. The evidence recorded before the late Education Commission shows that Natives are quite able to conduct high schools satisfactorily and Government have supported this view by appointing a Native as Principal of the Elphinstone High School. When missionary institutions and special schools for European and Eurasian children get grants-in-aid there is no good reason why the private high schools for Native children should be excluded from a similar concession. In conclusion, the Jáme hopes that the injustice done to the last-mentioned institutions will be prevented for the future.

Says that private high schools for Native children ought to get grants-in-aid from the Educational Department.

The Sharabh (57) of the 23rd May says that the present system of collecting fees in vernacular schools is calculated to cause considerable annoyance to the poorer classes. The fees are required to be paid at stated periods, and if they are not paid the names of scholars are taken off the roll and a sort of fine is levied for re-admission. It cannot be the intention of Government to make profit by means of these fines.

Says that the system of collecting fees in vernacular schools is objectionable.

Complains that school-masters in Kaládgi do not receive their pay for three months after it becomes due.

A correspondent of the Hitechchhu of Kaládgi (27) dated 20th May complains of the inconvenience caused to school-masters in the Kaládgi District by their not receiving their pay for three months after it becomes due, and requests the attention of the authorities concerned to the matter.

Railways.

Suggests the employment of an agency to prevent the inconveniences caused to passengers by railways and steamers.

The Indu Prakásh (9) of the 21st May dwells on the inconvenience caused to passengers by railway and steam-ferries by being over-crowded, and is surprised that Government do not attend to the complaints occasionally preferred against the managers of these means of communication. The account that the lowest class passengers give of the difficulty of securing tickets is really very distressing. The stronger and more powerful of them succeed in getting admission and in securing comfortable berths, while the weaker are obliged to stand for want of seats. The misery is aggravated by the unscrupulousness of the officers that are in charge of these conveyances, who without regard to the comfort of the passengers and without caring to ascertain whether there is room enough for additional passengers press into the conveyance more men on every station at which the train or the steamer touches. Ample testimony will be borne to this state of things by the thousands of passengers that utilize these conveyances. It may however be argued that it is the duty of the aggrieved parties to lay their complaints before the proper authorities, and that they have to blame themselves if they do not get their grievances redressed. But this argument will lose its weight when it is considered that the generality of passengers travel on business, and it is therefore natural that they should be unwilling to engage in a fracas with the authorities concerned and thus to sacrifice their time and money. Moreover the officers on railways and steamers are clothed with singular authority, and they are in a position at least for the time being to carry everything in their own way without regard to the justice of the complainants' cause, and there can be found few persons ready to suffer present vexation on the distant possibility of securing justice in the long run. The general policy of Government is averse to taking notice of wrongs done unless they form the subject of complaints from others, and this policy is at the root of many of the evils that are patiently borne by the poor. Cases in which railway companies have been fined for carrying excess passengers have never occurred. But instances frequently occur in which owners of steamers are fined for a similar offence. Even in the latter case the offenders are brought to book after the passengers have actually suffered from over-crowding. In view to the prevention of this unsatisfactory state of things it is necessary that Government should engage a staff of officers for the purpose of keeping a watch on the proceedings of the officers on railways and steamers and taking immediate steps to set matters right. The expenditure entailed by this measure will be insignificant, and the public carriers concerned should be made to make it good on the analogy of the expenditure of the punitive police employed in villages where riots are frequent.

Advises Government to consider the arguments against the Chanda Railway scheme before sanctioning it.

In an article headed "The Hyderabad and Chanda State Railway," the Native Opinion (10) of the 20th May says:—Amongst other things the opposition urge these three main arguments against the undertaking, viz., (1) the clause in the late Nizám's will to the effect that no important scheme affecting the prosperity of the State shall be undertaken during the minority of his successor, (2) the inability of the State under the present circumstances to pay interest on the expenditure to be incurred, and (3) the certainty of the proposed line not being able to pay its way. These grounds are quite enough to deter our Government from forcing the proposed line upon the Hyderábádis, at least in their present temperament. We hope the Supreme Government will, in dealing with this question, give due consideration to the representations of the general public of Hyderabad. It is not the noisy clamour of interested individuals but the united voice of all the nobles, jághirdárs and the common public that cries out against the proposal.

If their opposition is well based and sound, no sane Government should ever endeavour to repress it by giving their ear to the representations of those who cannot be said to have any greater interest at stake than the Hyderábádis. It is the political side of the question which is, we believe, exercising so much the minds of the people of that State. The fact of the dismemberment of the State on account of the expenses of the contingent is before them, and no wonder that they with their present knowledge should chafe at the prospect of another slice of their country being cut off and added to the British empire. For aught we know to the contrary, their fears may be quite unreasonable and even groundless; but where past bitter experience is vivid in one's memory, no wonder that he should suspect insincerity at the bottom of such proposals. We hope Government will duly consider the matter before they take any decisive step in so momentous a question at such a critical time. [The Gujaráti (92) of the 20th May says that the people of Hyderabad are willing to raise the necessary capital among themselves, and suggests that their offer may be accepted. The Bombay Chronicle (72) of the same date says that it is desirable to convince the Nizám, his friends and subjects that the proposed railway will prove beneficial to the State before any decisive steps are taken in the matter.]

Municipalities.

Advises the municipality of Bombay to fill up the Nákhoda Tank and the Dhobi Taláv.

The Prabhákar (48) of the 23rd May approves of the recommendation made to the municipality by Dr. Cody for filling up the Nákhoda Tank near the Gokaldás Tejpál Hospital. It is necessary in the interests of the public health that this tank, as also the Dhobi Taláv, should be filled up. Several representations were made before to this effect by the authorities of the St. Xavier's College, but the municipality seems to have neglected them probably on the ground that it could not afford the expenditure involved in the measure. If the municipality has been spending lákhs of rupees on useless undertakings it is not proper that such a measure of public health should be shelved.

Complains of the insanitary state of Kurla.

The Indian Spectator (1) of the 20th May says:—The present insanitary state of Kurla has frightened the inhabitants and those who have to do with the wretched town from outside. If better sanitary arrangements are not promptly made for adjoining villages we shall soon have cholera as a general epidemic. It is a pity our sanitary authorities cannot keep off disease even where the causes are quite preventible.

Disapproves of Rs. 6,500 being spent by the new municipal board of Ahmedabad in removing a curve in a certain quarter of the city.

The Samsher Báhádur (107) of the 18th May does not approve of the intention of the new municipal board of Ahmedabad to spend Rs. 6,500 on removing a slight curve in the road leading from Fatása Lane to Gharnála. What guarantee is there that the estimated expenditure will not be exceeded? In fact there is no necessity for the work. When even the Changpol street is not quite straight, what advantage is there in removing this curve? As it cannot be believed that the people will approve of the action of the new commissioners, it behoves them to think well before sanctioning such an expenditure.

Native States.

Says that the affairs at Cambay are in an unsatisfactory state and call for interference.

The Gujarát Mitrá (73) of the 20th May says that the prevalence of intrigue in Cambay makes it impossible for any deserving, competent and honest persons to accept service under that State. It is said that the recent agitation raised in Cambay was organized with the view of bringing about the dethronement of the present Nawáb and the installation of his brother. Many papers corroborating this view are in the possession of certain persons, and means are still being devised to compass the desired end. If the British Government try to sift the matter it is very likely that many persons will be hanged for political offences. The Darbár has begun to drive away from the State with dishonour all experienced officers that were entertained at the instance of the British Government, and the British authorities have been quietly putting up with this insult. It cannot be denied that the Darbár has full power to entertain and dismiss its own officers and an interference on the part of British officers may be quite uncalled for. In the opinion of the Mitrá, however, no objection can be taken to Political Agents offering friendly advice to Darbárs, whose condition is as rotten as that of Cambay, in the matter of appointing able officers in the administration of their States; but it is certainly their duty to see that the officers appointed at their instance are not driven away with dishonour and without cause; and since they fail in this duty they, as also the Native princes and their kárbháris, lose the confidence of the public. The inevitable consequence of this state of things will be that Native States will not be able to secure the services of able, quick and honourable men. Corrupt and avaricious men and men that are hankering after service will be easily procurable. Such officers have generally served to ruin a State as well as its Chief. Circumstances have at present taken such a turn that affairs at Cambay can be fairly said to tend to such a disastrous close. The Diwán is said to be ruled by evil counsel, and there are reasons for grave apprehensions that as time goes the State will be reduced to a distressful condition. As the British Government will have to interfere at the last stage, why should they not do so even now?

Says that the present Diwán of Cambay should prosecute the instigators of the recent disturbances in Cambay.

The Vartamán Sár (115) of the 22nd May says that when it is acknowledged that the recent disturbances in Cambay owed their origin to the instigation of some of the leading men of the city, and that one Mahádevji took a prominent part in them, it cannot be understood why their prosecution is not yet taken in hand. From some of the changes now introduced into Cambay, from the compulsory resignation of several good and worthy officers and from the protection of the real instigators it appears that the present Diwán is weak minded. The Diwán himself is very honest, well-meaning and learned, but he seems to be guided by the advice of others either through fear or ignorance or want of experience. Perhaps he thinks that if he were not to please or were to act contrary to the wishes of those who took a leading part in the recent disturbances, they would not allow reforms to be introduced into the city and would create a disturbance once more. He is much mistaken if he acts from this motive. As long as the instigators are not brought to justice they will trouble him the more, throw obstacles in the way of the introduction of reforms, and recommend the removal of worthy officers from their posts with a view to serve their own interests. If however they are punished no one will even think of creating a disturbance. The people of Cambay now know full well that the recent disturbances were raised for the satisfaction of some base motives. If Cambay is to be improved and freed from debt, the instigators should first be punished and then the necessary reforms taken in hand. It is said that some persons have got hold of some papers belonging to the instigators in connection with the recent disturbances. As these persons know that the Diwán will be unable to do anything in the matter they think of bringing these papers to the notice of the Bombay Government. When the motives of the leaders of the disturbances are brought to light by these papers their condition will become deplorable.

Comments in connection with the donation of Rs. 10,000 made by the Nawáb of Junágad to the fund for the support of the families of Native soldiers killed in the recent war in Egypt.

The Deshi Mitrá (88) of the 24th May, in referring to the donation of Rs. 10,000 made by the Junágad Darbár to the fund raised for the support of the families of Native soldiers killed in the recent war in Egypt, remarks that it seems that the simple-minded Diwán of Junágad is tired of the massacre of the Wághers and of the Maiyás and that he has now come forward to practise charity either for the good of the souls of the deceased or to please the Government. This saint of Junágad may give lákhs of rupees to Government and gain their favour, but the public will never forget the dark deeds done by him. After the destruction of the Wághers the blood-thirsty Sále Hindi has committed the atrocious crime of having 75 Maiyás massacred like sheep, for which he will have to answer before his Creator. Government ought not to have accepted the donation, for it will create a low opinion of Government in the public mind. The donation will not only not assist the Diwán in his object to throw dover over his misdeeds, but will on the contrary serve to bring his guilt to more prominent notice. It is generally believed that this donation has been offered through fear lest the question of the Maiya massacre may come before Parliament. The Nawáb is sincerely to be congratulated on this gift, but he would have been deserving of greater praise if he had given such a sum for the benefit of the families of the murdered Maiyás.

Berár Affairs.

Laments over the punishment inflicted on a Shankaráchárya by the Madras High Court.

The Pramod Sindhu (50) of the 21st May alludes to the case in which a Shankaráchárya was tried by the Madras High Court in regard to the excommunication pronounced by him in connection with a widow re-marriage, and was punished for the offence, and expresses its regret that the Hindu spiritual guide should be punished in a court of justice. The Sindhu reminds the Government of the frequent promises of non-interference with the religious prejudices of the people pledged by the rulers in the early days of the British rule, and observes that the Government have become popular with the subjects because of their determination to carry out those promises strictly.

Notes.—A. The notices from the different Newspapers have been collected in the Report under different heads, which are printed in italics.

B. The names of Newspapers are printed in the body of the Report in italics, and the number of the Newspaper in the above list is printed in brackets after the name.

C. The proprietors of the Newspapers marked * have not given information as to the number of copies issued. In these cases an estimate has been made by the Reporter.

D. The system of spelling vernacular words followed by the Reporter is the same as that adopted in the Official Spelling List of the Bombay Presidency. One peculiar feature of this system is that when the long a (आ or á) is the last letter of a word, the accent is left out, and the short a (अ = u in gun) is, to prevent confusion, never placed at the end of a word. This rule has been strictly followed, except that when the short a appears to be absolutely necessary to complete the pronunciation of a word, as in Arunodaya or the well known Mitra, it is printed with a mark over it to indicate that it is short, thus—ă.

Politics and the Public Administration.

Advises Britannia to change her policy with regard to India.

The Gujaráti (94) of the 27th May contains an article commenting in a rather severe tone on the policy of the British Government in India in the form of an address to Bábu Lál Mohan Ghose embodying India's message to Britannia. Let Britannia know that her dominion in India was not won and is not maintained by the strength of the sword. The circumstances under which she succeeded in gaining her object were briefly these. When Hindus and Musalmáns were trying hard to overthrow each other, Britannia had nothing to lose but much to accomplish, and therefore she thrust her nose wherever possible without being invited to do so. She thus gained her object at the sacrifice of poor Rájás and Ránás. This was the key of her success. Let all the Britons know that their brethren in the far East have taken to tormenting the people, but we will not bear it long. We owe you no political debt, and if we do, better take it and clear off. But as among men, there must be independence, equality and friendship. Oh Britannia! better continue the same wise policy as thou didst adopt at the time of winning the kingdom. When thou didst set thy foot on this land there were disturbance and internecine warfare everywhere, and thou didst try to secure tranquillity by various political tricks; and why shouldst thou now try to break that peace? If thou didst so, would thy sons enjoy the fruits of their labour? Thou once didst make a firm resolve not to interfere in the religious observances of the people, because thou art not internally pure and hast no faith in religion. And if thou now thinkest of violating that pledge of neutrality, thou art welcome to do so. But remember the bloody days of Queen Mary! At present justice is met with here and there, but it is not as brilliant as before. Its face is being stained by and bye, but it is the work of thy unworthy sons. "One hole drowns a boat, and one bad son disgraces a family," says the proverb. When justice retires from the scene, then thy commerce, which is the very soul of thy prosperity, will be ruined without delay. Colleges and schools have been established and are being disestablished. Wealth has been amassed by illegal means. Responsible posts have been conferred on Britons. Commerce, which was the Baniá's profession, has been monopolized. British arts and manufactures have been encouraged. British rights have been protected. And while the people have become penniless, thou hast adopted the policy of carrying away money. India bears this all. She bears it with the satisfaction that after all her sister Britannia's sons have become powerful and wealthy, and that they may therefore assist her in times of necessity. But if thou dost give injustice to India's sons where justice is due; if thou dost try to take away their bread; if thou comest in the way of their acquiring proficiency in particular arts and industries; if thou triest to insult them intentionally—then India and India's sons will not brook it. We may spare our lives, but not our honour. Let Britannia not bring a stain on her fair justice,—let her devise measures for the protection of the religion and independence of the people of India. Last, but not least, let Britannia know that it is very unjust that her Parliament should try to exercise authority in India without sanction, and let her therefore admit a few representatives of India in that body.

Points out the necessity of appointing Natives to high judicial posts.

The Poona Vaibhav (48) of the 27th May says:—Foreign judges in general, however conscientious, are sure to miss the aims of justice on account of their ignorance of the technicalities of the religion, the manners and the language of a people. In India however, with her Vedic religion and customs having the sanction of the Puráns, with her ancient laws and languages having intimate connection with Sanskrit, a tribunal of foreigners is an anomaly. English Government enjoys a reputation for impartial justice, but it is unintelligible how their sense of justice should in the case of this country have lost its original turn. They have bestowed all responsible judicial posts on Europeans, and cases are not rare in which on account of their being foreigners these officers are guilty of acts of flagrant injustice. As Natives are obliged to study the English language and are generally fond of adopting European manners and customs, they may with some reason be appointed to sit in judgment on European criminals. But it is not just to appoint Europeans to try cases in which Natives are concerned, because they are generally ignorant of the manners and customs of the people and are unacquainted with the technicalities of their language. If the Judge in the Madras High Court were acquainted with the real nature of the position enjoyed by a Shankarácháryá in the Native community, and were aware of the length of time for which this position has been maintained, he would not have been guilty of the injustice of passing a sentence on such a high ecclesiastical functionary. In the same manner if Justice Norris had known that according to the Hindu law an idol could not be the subject of partition and that it was opposed to all religious ideas to remove such idols from their original places, poor Bábu Surendranáth would not have been obliged to suffer so severely as he has been made to do. That the people should be obliged to put up with injustice simply on account of the ignorance of these tribunals is calculated to bring a deep stain on the fair justice of the British Government. If the object of Government in allowing this state of things to continue is simply to patronize their own countrymen, there is nothing to be said against it. But if they think that there should be justice in the world, then the present system cries for reformation. The instances above cited relate to the decisions of High Courts, who are supposed to be all-knowing and the correctness of whose fiats cannot be called into question even by Government. What then must be the state of affairs where subordinate tribunals are concerned? In these circumstances it is desirable that Government should appoint Natives to high judicial posts and thus achieve a name by initiating a policy of dealing out honest justice to their subjects.

Advises Government not to interfere with the religion of the people.

The Satyá Shodhak (56) of the 27th May observes that recently the conduct of Government has been in direct violation of the principle of religious neutrality and of the pledges made in that behalf by Her Majesty the Queen. The new race of Indians imbued with a tincture of occidental education has begun to dislike the Hindu religion, and there is nothing to deter them from acting in contravention of it. For a religion to hold its sway over a people it is necessary that it should be backed up by the force of authority; but as the Shankarácháryás are wholly powerless they have begun to be defied by the people. Doubtless that has been a very happy trick resorted to by Government for the purpose of annihilating the Hindu religion. If the British people, when they assumed the reins of Government, had publicly proclaimed that they would send their missionaries to India for the purpose of converting the people to Christianity, that they would punish our religious heads if they excommunicated any people on religious grounds, that they would allow Christian converts to interfere with our ghâts (landing-places), and that they would bring our idols into courts, then there would have been no reason for complaint. But our rulers are very expert in the policy of proceeding gradually. Why should they blame Suraj-ud-Daula for breaking the promise of protection by confining and killing a few Europeans in the Black Hole? He was after all a barbarous Musalmán. But it does not look well in a Christian Government to be guilty of breach of faith. The holy Gospel certainly does not teach a Christian people to leave their country and to invade that of others, to reduce to subjection a nation that was never guilty of any aggression, to lord it tyrannically over those that were good enough to give them shelter, to sound one's trumpet, to raise columns of victory, to commit forgeries, to hang persons without discrimination, and to retract promises. Jesus Christ does not appear to have inculcated in his pupils the doctrine of interference with foreign religions. Everybody is as fond of his own religion as of his own life. Hindus would not have felt offended if such a violation of pledged word had taken place during the rule of a tyrant like Tamarlane. But they are aggrieved at such a treatment under the benign rule of a just Government like the present. People are generally as anxious to preserve their religion as they are to save their lives. India can hope to get back her wealth in the course of time, but once she loses her religion the condition of her people will be simply deplorable. The new generation has taken a fancy to ape European manners and customs, and the Government are trying to encourage it in its course with the hope of gaining their secret object of overthrowing the ancient religion of the country. It is very strange that Government should have condescended to resort to such shifts. If Government are at all bent upon interfering in religious matters, let them make a clean breast of the affair and not lay themselves open to the charge of dishonesty by giving sweet promises without any intention of fulfilling them. [The Suryodayá (64) of the 28th May and the Shiváji (60) of the 25th idem express somewhat similar sentiments.]

Makes remarks on the question of reductions in public expenditure.

The Indu Prakásh (9) of the 28th May refers to some of the sayings and doings of the late Lord Mayo and eulogizes him for the deep interest he took in the welfare of the people of this country. The general tenor of his administration leads us to believe that if His Lordship's life had not been brought to an untimely close by the dastardly act of a convict in the Andaman Islands, India would have been, under the auspices of his rule, favoured with the reforms that are now contemplated to be introduced by the generous Lord Ripon. This is not a mere inference. The present Viceroy has on many occasions personally borne testimony to the fact that the seeds of the new policy inaugurated by him were sown by Lord Mayo. Many of Lord Mayo's schemes have been reiterated and brought into execution by Lord Ripon, but there are many yet to be taken in hand without which the people of India cannot advance on the path of material prosperity. Among the latter the question of reductions in public expenditure is of the greatest importance, as on the solution of it rests the possibility of securing to the people a relief from the growing burden of taxation and of utilizing excess receipts towards the propagation of education and the development of public conveniences. Lord Mayo had fully mastered the situation. He not only effected reductions in the civil departments of Government, but contemplated applying the shears to the Military Department, which is a favoured department of all administrations, and on the maintenance of which, as some people hold even now, rest the foundations of the British rule in India. He argued that the necessity of maintaining the British army at its full strength had diminished on account of the improved state of the general means of communication such as railways and steamers, and therefore proposed, inter alia, the abolition of the presidential commands and the centralization of their duties in a command for the whole of India. More than ten years have elapsed since these proposals were made, and during this decade matters have assumed rather a changed aspect. Means of communication have been greatly developed, while suspicious officers of Government have begun to understand the general feeling of the public. The time has therefore arrived when Lord Ripon should take up what was left half-done by Lord Mayo. The abolition of the minor presidential commands will effect no small saving. It is true that His Lordship will have to bear the brunt of severe public criticism. But a great step will have been gained by one stroke. Properly speaking there is no necessity of a Commander-in-Chief in the Madras Presidency. No fear is apprehended from any quarter in that part of the country. It may be necessary to provide against complications on the northern frontier and for that purpose one Commander-in-Chief is enough. If, therefore, the two subordinate commands were reduced to one and if a corresponding reduction were made in the army, the arrangements would be satisfactory. Moreover, the small armies in Native States might be called upon to render assistance in case of necessity. It will thus appear that a reduction in the military expenditure effected on the lines laid down by Lord Mayo is calculated to meet all the requirements of the case, and it behoves Lord Ripon to endeavour to adopt the policy enunciated by his worthy predecessor. It is also necessary to consider whether a retrenchment in expenditure is feasible in any other departments of State. It is said that the Collectors of districts can manage their charges and at the same time carry on direct correspondence with Government, and that therefore the Commissioners of Divisions are useless. Formerly there were no Police Inspectors and the state of the work of the Police Department does not appear to have improved since the appointment of these officers. The Educational Inspectors are superfluous and should be done away with, the business of inspection being entrusted to the Director of Public Instruction. In the same manner the various middle class officers of the Forest Department can be dispensed with without loss to the department. These are the directions in which reductions are possible, and it is the duty of the Viceroy to attend to them with a view to making the administrative machinery less costly than it at present is.

Says that the Indian budget should be discussed in the House of Commons in May or June every year.

The Indian Spectator (1) of the 27th May, in referring to the resolution adopted by the House of Commons that the Indian budget should be discussed in the earlier part of the session, gives the motives which exercise a healthy influence on the discussion of the English budget in Parliament, and remarks:—But all these several motives are wholly wanting when an Indian budget has to be discussed in the House of Commons. In the first place the majority of the House seem to say, "Oh! hang it, this is no business of ours. Let the Anglo-Indian bores sit out the budget and bully or badger the Secretary of State for India as they choose." The few who do try to listen to the rehearsal of the Secretary of State, coached by the permanent Under Secretary and clerks, very seldom enter into the economical aspects of the Indian budget that has to be passed. Again, all patriotic motives are here out of the question. What is India to the majority of the House? The members are not actuated by a strong feeling to keep watch and ward over the Indian exchequer as they are in the case of their own national budget. Nay, more. There are so many relatives and friends of members of Parliament who are serving in India, and in the enjoyment of handsome salaries and allowances, not to say aught of the large body of superannuated servants, that there is a sort of tacit understanding not to criticise the budget at all, lest vested interests, especially of Covenanted Civil Servants and the Military, should suffer! Thus the absence of patriotic motive on the one hand and the silent motive of selfish interest coupled with apathy on the other, make the discussion on an Indian budget in the House of Commons simply a farce. It is only when it is made a party question that anything like enthusiasm or energy prevails. Then again, the budget is relegated to the last days of the session when most of the members are already fagged and have dispersed on the Continent or elsewhere in anticipation of the vacation. Under the circumstances, the resolution now unanimously passed by the House of Commons to have the Indian budget discussed during the earlier part of the session is most welcome. The question, however, is whether the House will stick to its resolution. If for all practical purposes the Indian budget is discussed, say in May, some good may be expected. A tolerably full House may be expected and the average Commoner may educate himself in the broader points of Indian finance. The new National Representative Committee may exert itself to "educate" the middle and working classes in the intricacies of an Indian budget. The representatives of the classes who do not hanker after place and power may be asked to take greater interest in this matter and thus some partial good may be brought about. Our only fear just now is lest the resolution should become a dead letter. If our memory serves us rightly, Mr. Fawcett urged three or four years ago the advisability of fixing an earlier day for the introduction of the Indian budget, say in June. But despite the evident willingness of the House to hear it during that month, we have observed that our budgets are mumbled over and hastily buried in the very last days of the session. It is to be devoutly hoped that the natives of India will strive to do their best to have their budgets discussed in future in May or June. [The Hitechchhu (76) of Ahmedabad of the 31st May regrets the ingratitude and apathy of members of Parliament towards India when their castemen become rich at her expense, and remarks that it remains to be seen how early the Liberal Ministry introduces the Indian budget into Parliament and proves the truth of its professions. The Bombay Chronicle (74) of the 27th May urges the importance of the question of reductions in public expenditure and approves of the resolution to introduce the Indian budget into Parliament earlier than usual. The Yajdán Parast (120) of the same date is thankful to Parliament for their resolution. The Jáme Jamshed (98) of the 27th May is however afraid that an early discussion of the Indian budget will not avail India very much as it is very likely that the subject will be discussed as a party question and much time will be lost in useless argumentation.]

Disapproves of the question asked by Sir Stafford Northcote whether the telegram about the debate in the Viceregal Legislative Council on the Jurisdiction Bill was despatched at the cost of Government.

In noticing the question asked in the House of Commons by Sir Stafford Northcote whether the telegram received by Reuter in regard to the discussions on the Native Magistrates' Jurisdiction Bill was forwarded at the cost of Government, the Jáme Jamshed (98) of the 31st May observes that Sir Stafford was once Secretary of State for India and ought to know that in his time also the Government of India paid for the telegrams they despatched to the newspapers in England for the information of the public. When the Times and other papers obtained telegrams from India and censured Government unjustly, why should not the Government of India despatch a telegram to England giving a true account of the Bill? The question asked by Sir Stafford was therefore calculated to give a gratuitous offence to Lord Ripon. There is a Government order prohibiting Government officials from keeping any sort of connection with newspapers and threatening to dismiss from service those who will not mind it. And yet it is said that the Calcutta correspondent of the Times is a Government officer employed in the Bengal Secretariat. It behoves the Bengal Government therefore to enquire into the matter and take due notice of the conduct of this officer. If any Government officials need to be prohibited from keeping any connection with newspapers it is the officers that are employed in the Secretariat, as they have a knowledge of the confidential records of Government. What have the Government of Bengal done in regard to the advertisement that appeared in the Englishman meant to ridicule educated Natives and which was condemned by the Under Secretary of State for India as very shameful? Mr. Cross suggested that the local Government should take due steps in regard to it, and if the Lieutenant-Governor fails to do so His Honour will lay himself open to the charge of sympathising with the Englishman.

Says that there is no danger to the opium revenue at least for the present generation.

The Indu Prakásh (9) of the 28th May refers to the question of the precarious nature of opium revenue in India, and says that notwithstanding the various fluctuations in the receipts from this important source of revenue there is no fear of any danger to it so long as Indian opium is consumed in China. Persons that can speak with authority on the subject are of opinion that China can never produce opium as good as the best Indian opium, and the latter has created such a favourable impression on Chinese consumers that not only the higher but the middle classes never use any other drug. This shows that there is no reason to apprehend danger to the opium revenue at least till the end of this generation. The writer then proceeds to moralise on the impolicy of making money from a public vice, and alludes en passant to the evil effects of the vice of drinking, which in his opinion has followed in the train of the British rule in India. It is believed that the paramount desire of increasing revenue has made the British Government connive at the evil effects of this vice. This is however not creditable to the British Government and it is their duty to spare no pains to deter people from habituating themselves to spirituous drinks.

Prays for the disestablishment of the State church in India.

In an article headed "Disestablishment of the State Church in India," the Native Opinion (10) of the 27th May says:—The fact is that even in Christian England the disestablishment of a State church is considered a necessity, and if one were to note down the signs of the times the time is not far distant when the much-desired disestablishment will be an accomplished fact. But the bases on which the disestablishment in England and India is advocated are essentially different. In England the disestablishment of the church is asked for because of its inability to assert its individuality, and in India we ask for the same thing because the Indian Government as such having no religion of its own and its Indian subjects being non-Christians a State church becomes an evident anomaly, and the payment of its expenses from the proceeds of taxes levied on the Indian ryot is a still greater anomaly. And yet the Government has a State church, and it is supported and maintained with an amount of tenacious persistence which has become simply intolerable. Those who have examined the question impartially do admit that the maintenance of a sectional church at the expense of a heathen people is a wrong done under a specious plea, and that as an atonement for past injury a summary disestablishment of the same is necessary. The question of its maintenance or otherwise is now before Government, and it may be hoped that justice will be done to the Indian tax-payer. Under the present circumstances it may not appear advisable to force the conclusions long before arrived at either upon the attention of Parliament or the Secretary of State for India; but longer time than what may be considered absolutely necessary should not be allowed to pass without our attempting to drive the question to its legitimate conclusion. Those who advocate the maintenance of the church as a State church urge that they as followers of the Christian religion conduct the Government, and that therefore the existence of such a church is necessary for their spiritual well-being. But the grounds of their reasoning are slippery; if Government were made to maintain a church for its officials, whether Europeans, Hindus or Mahomedans, there could not be one State church, but several. But there is no State church for the latter two classes, and consequently there can be none for Europeans only. Then again the church which receives the Government grant answers the spiritual needs of only a few Europeans, and consequently the grounds urged by its advocates cannot hold. They urge that European officials having to remain in distant and remote parts of the interior Government are bound to provide for their spiritual welfare. But if this urgency is allowable in one case, surely it is equally allowable in another also. The services, whether covenanted or uncovenanted, are richly paid for the work they do, and unless it is pretended that Government undertake not only to pay for the work done but also to pay for their religious comforts, no sound argument can be advanced in favour of the present policy. We are quite free to admit that some provision is absolutely necessary in the case of European soldiers, and the Indian tax-payer, we believe, will not grudge such provision, though at the same time he may ask for a similar provision being made for the Native soldiery. What we protest against is the very large ecclesiastical establishment maintained for the highly paid services. They must provide for their own religious cravings, and should not tax the Indian treasury, when they are quite in a position to pay for their own comforts. Government are not unaware, we believe, of the fact that the colonial Government of Ceylon is now free from this religious tax, and this freedom the Singhalese owe to a section of the European population of the place. The arguments which held good against a State church in Ceylon do hold good in our own case, with this difference only that what the Singhalese European population held as cogent reasoning the Indian European population do not seem to admit. The Right Honourable Mr. Baxter, while travelling in India, promised to advocate the disestablishment question in Parliament, and accordingly a notice of a motion to that effect seems to have been given a few days since. The question is not yet placed before the House. We may however hope that when the question comes before it Mr. Baxter will spare no pains to enlighten the honourable gentlemen of the absurdity of the whole matter.

Regrets that no Native gentleman of Bombay has received any title at this year's distribution of honours notified in the Birthday Gazette.

The Yajdán Parast (120) of the 27th May regrets that at this year's distribution of honours notified in the Birthday Gazette not a single European or Native gentleman of Bombay has received the royal favour. It cannot be said, observes the Parast, that no resident of Bombay deserves it. There are several Native gentlemen in this city who are quite worthy of royal favour, either on account of their liberal public charities or their valuable services to the public. Among them stand foremost Mr. Dinsháji Mánakji Petit and Mr. Dádabhái Navroji, who are well known for their public virtues.

Says that Major Baring's transfer to Egypt will be a national loss to India.

The Indian Spectator (1) of the 27th May says:—It is grievous to have to part with Major Baring in the midst of the splendid career he seems to have cut out for himself before taking charge of his present office and in the midst of a high order of usefulness in the country. In some respects, boldness and breadth of view for instance, Major Baring has already proved himself the best Finance Minister that ever came to India. Excepting the abolition of the import duties, on which there may be room for a difference of opinion, we know of no measure for which the departing Minister of Finance may not take just pride. Had he been allowed time and had the circumstances of the country been within financial control, Major Baring would have given a still better account of himself. But even now we think he has done his work; in his masterly way he has shown how to manage the finances of a peculiarly ill-conditioned country. It is to be sincerely hoped that Major Baring's successor will resume the work of reform where he leaves it, though we doubt if his general policy will be followed up with equal good effect by another minister. Major Baring came here with a reputation. The State as well as the public had confidence in him. His earnestness and sincerity of purpose, his love of thorough-going work, his frank and manly treatment of critics, his constant desire to encourage private enterprise, to develop indigenous arts and industries and to utilize Native talent, together with his unflinching independence and genial bearing, made him an exceptionally good minister. His presence in the Government was a wall of strength to the Viceroy, who loses his right hand by Major Baring's withdrawal. It is not at all cheering to see such a valuable member slipping out of the administration. [The Mahrátta (2) of the same date considers Major Baring's withdrawal from India as a national loss. It cannot be said that Major Baring's appointment to the virtual Governorship of Egypt will not be the best of the lot. Lord Dufferin has modelled the constitution and a masterly hand like Major Baring will act upon it; so that in a few years insolvent Egypt will grow into a rich self-governing country. But what of India? The people wish Lord Ripon to stay here longer, and they have that wish with regard to Major Baring as well. If the interests of India are to be looked to, a Ripon Viceroy and a Baring Finance Minister are wanted until all the knotty points in the Government of the country are settled. The Dnyán Prakásh (8) of the 31st May also praises Major Baring for his liberal views and for the financial reforms introduced by him, expresses deep regret at his transfer and suggests the appointment of a man that has no Anglo-Indian antecedents. The Indu Prakásh (9) of the 28th May and almost all other Vernacular papers express similar sentiments. Some of these suggest a public demonstration in honour of the departing Finance Minister.]

The Mahrátta (2) of the 27th May remarks :—A Bombay correspondent of the Pioneer makes an indirect attack against the system of appointing military men to the Political Department. We have often written on this subject, and consider the policy of Government wholly mistaken. If any persons are well qualified to become Political Agents, we urge that they are educated Natives. Neither civilians nor military men are fitted for the delicate duties. The peculiar relations which a Political Agent bears to the Native Darbár make a military man wholly unfit for such service. Darbár formalities, etiquette and intrigue can only be best known to a Native civilian. The Government of Bombay shows a vivid contrast with the other Indian Governments in this matter. The Pioneer's complaint is well worth a searching enquiry.

Disapproves of the policy of the Bombay Government regarding the appointment of military officers as Political Agents at the courts of Native States.

In alluding to the report said to have been made by Generals Fraser and Leslie to the Government of India that the Bombay harbour is in a defenceless condition, the Yajdán Parast (120) of the 27th May observes that the people of Bombay, the richest commercial city in India, were hitherto assured and they believed that their city was well defended and quite safe from an attack from the sea side; but the report above referred to has removed this happy belief and made them very anxious about their security. It is desirable therefore that proper steps should be taken for making the town and harbour quite secure from a foreign enemy.

Recommends that the defences of Bombay should be made quite strong.

The Mahárashtra Mitra (39) of the 31st May complains that there is great mismanagement prevailing at the irrigation works at Kás in the Sátára District. Great distress is caused to the people by the impressment of their carts, while the labourers are dissatisfied on account of their wages not being regularly paid. It is the duty of the Executive Engineer to institute an enquiry into these complaints and to remove the present superintendent of the works to a less responsible post. It is a long time that the works have been going on and the people are anxious to see them come to a satisfactory conclusion.

Complains that the well in the village of Lohogaum is in an unsafe condition.

A correspondent of the Dnyán Chakshu (6) of the 30th May complains that the people of the village of Lohogaum in the Haveli Táluka of the Poona District are suffering great hardships for want of pure and wholesome water. There is one well in the midst of the village, but its water is dried up in the hot season. Besides the well is in a very dilapidated condition and it is falling in by bits. It is very likely that one of these days an accident may happen to some of the people resorting to this well.

Says that the Dhávads of Mahábaleshvar should be offered some special facilities for the manufacture of crude iron.

A correspondent of the Indian Spectator (1) of the 27th May gives a description of the Dhávads of Mahábaleshvar, who formerly carried on the work of iron-smelting. Their condition has become deplorable owing to the prohibition to collect the ore and fuel free of charge from the hill side. Why practise this cruel rigidity? The Government of India are anxious to encourage indigenous industry; why then are the Dhávads not offered some special facilities for the manufacture of crude iron? Law-makers make laws for the good of the people, but their working is calculated to grind down the people. The land ought to be saved from the 'zealous official.' How devoutly is it to be wished that Lord Ripon, Major Baring and others like them should come to India as Assistant Collectors!

Says that polo should not be allowed to be played on the Esplanade near the Gymkhana building in Bombay.

With reference to the permission given by His Excellency the Governor to the members of the Bombay Gymkhana to play polo once a week on the Esplanade in the neighbourhood of the Gymkhana building, the Akhbáre Sodágar (81) of the 2nd June observes that in the rainy season, when the ground becomes very soft, the playing of polo even once a week is calculated to make the ground useless for playing cricket on. It is therefore to be hoped that His Excellency will withdraw the permission and allow the Native cricketers to use the Esplanade uninterruptedly as hitherto.

Approves of the action of Sir James Fergusson in abandoning Madras time.

The Dnyán Prakásh (8) of the 31st May, referring to the resolution of Government regarding the restoration of Bombay time, says that this is the first instance in the administration of Sir James Fergusson in which Government have yielded to the force of public opinion. It is to be hoped that this policy will continue for the rest of this administration. [The Bombay Punch (84) of the 2nd June says that the abandonment of Madras time shows the modesty of His Excellency the Governor. He has won the love of the inhabitants of Bombay by this step.]

Requests Government not to sanction the formation of a mounted volunteer corps in Bombay without taking a guarantee for the specific performance of service.

The Rást Goftár (108) of the 27th May says:—The volunteers of Bombay are not satisfied with their present status and have therefore determined upon forming themselves into a mounted corps. The idea that a foreign people should volunteer to enlist themselves as soldiers without remuneration for the protection of this country is very pleasing. But this feeling of pleasure vanishes into nothing when we look at the constitution of this corps. The object of protecting the people turns out to be purely nominal and the whole appears to be a mere farce or show. The object, the regulations and the constitution of a volunteer force clearly point out that it cannot be composed of foreigners, that the right of protecting their country belongs to the Natives, and that the latter must be allowed to take the principal part in such a movement. It is true that the English are better suited to fulfil the real object of such an institution, but unfortunately they are not the natives of this country, nor have they been connected with this country for a long time. They are simply sojourners in this land and are therefore not in a position to be ready to serve for the protection of the country at all times as the Natives are. They learn drill at the expense of the State and enjoy target practice without any strain on their own purse, but there is no guarantee that they will be useful when necessary. Like the standing army they are not bound to serve for a specified period. To-day they are here, but to-morrow they are at liberty to leave this country, and those that receive training at the present day may after five years be found enjoying themselves in England while their services may be urgently required here. The English, though foreigners, are so intimately connected with India that we may count upon their assistance as volunteers, but in the absence of anything binding them to serve the country in times of necessity all expenditure on training them is a sheer waste of money. The volunteers must bind themselves in writing to remain in this country for a period of 10 to 15 years. The recent action of the Bengal volunteers in connection with the Native Magistrates' Jurisdiction Bill has served to bring forward the question of the irresponsible and uncertain nature of the services of these corps. They have shown their determination to have things their own way, and if they are opposed by Government, instead of protecting the kingdom they are prepared to abandon it. It will thus be seen that European volunteers in India are simply an anomaly, and it is necessary that Government should not sanction the formation of a mounted corps without receiving a specific guarantee for services to be rendered by its members.

Approves of the acting appointment of Surgeon Párakh as Professor of Midwifery in the Grant Medical College at Bombay.

The Rást Goftár (108) of the 27th May approves of the acting appointment of Surgeon Párakh to the Professorship of Midwifery in the Grant Medical College, and says that by this appointment the Governor in Council has given satisfaction to the public by doing justice to their rights. This appointment redounds to the credit of Sir James Fergusson the more on account of the disregard he has shown to the opposition of Europeans. [The Bombay Punch (84) of the 2nd June expresses similar sentiments.]

Thinks that the Bombay sepoys stationed at Quetta should get bátta.

A correspondent of the Shiváji (60) of the 25th May, signing himself a military sepoy, observes that the resolution of the Government of India in regard to the Native soldiers stationed at Quetta has served to create a feeling of dissatisfaction among them. At this station the extremes of heat and cold are experienced and mortality is great, and the sepoys located there had hitherto the comfort that if they died while there Government would provide for their families. During the last four or five years many sepoys and numerous followers have suffered and died from the bad weather of the place. Many persons say that the Bengal Presidency is nearer to Quetta than the Bombay Presidency, but the Bengal sepoys are not sent there because bátta will have to be given to them. If the Madras sepoys are sent, they too will get bátta. If this be so, why should the Bombay sepoys alone not get it? And even if it be not so, it is to be hoped that Government will redress their grievance.

Says that the Bombay Government ought to institute an enquiry into the case in which Mr. Hewett of Ratnágiri shot at his peon.

The Indu Prakásh (9) of the 28th May observes:—We cannot do better than humbly suggest to His Excellency the Governor in Council the advisability of instituting departmental enquiries and ascertaining the real facts of the case. It is alleged on the one hand that Mr. Hewett fired his pistol at a peon of his, because the latter would not obey him. On the other hand it is stated that the pistol was fired in self-defence by Mr. Hewett—that he did not mean to aim it at his peon but simply to terrify him. Whether Mr. Hewett did or did not intend to shoot the sepoy, one fact appears to be beyond dispute, viz., that he did fire his pistol and that the latter received some injuries. In this state of the case it is clearly necessary that the public should have some satisfactory account of all the facts of the unfortunate event. It is reported that the matter has been settled by a compromise between Mr. Hewett and the sepoy, the former agreeing to give the latter Rs. 200 for his injuries and the latter withdrawing his complaint against the former. But the question is not one between Mr. Hewett and the sepoy alone. The Government and the public are as much interested in it. It is due no less to the public than to Her Majesty's Government that public servants should behave properly in all they do. Firing a pistol at a human being is not a light thing to be passed over in silence. It may be that Mr. Hewett has a good explanation to give of his conduct; on that point we say nothing. But as the bare facts stand, they seem to demand a careful enquiry into the matter from Government. In 1877 Mr. Todd, who was then Assistant Collector of Ratnágiri, assaulted a Native gentleman, and as soon as the facts of the case reached Sir Richard Temple's ears an immedia te enquiry was ordered to be made. Mr. Crawford tried the case and decided it against Mr. Todd. The result was that although the monsoon was then at its highest, Sir Richard Temple ordered Mr. Todd's summary removal to Kaládgi. As Government instituted enquiries in that case, so do we think that they should institute enquiries in the case of Mr. Hewett, and that the real facts, whatever they are, should be elicited. To let the matter drop in a compromise to which the peon may have reluctantly consented seeing that he was a servant under Mr. Hewett is by no means satisfactory.

Does not approve of the extension of one year granted to Colonel Barton.

The Gujaráti (94) of the 27th May says that Colonel Barton has been allowed to remain in Káthiáwár for one year more as a reward for his policy in connection with the Junágad affairs! But the people of Káthiáwár have been crying over their unfortunate lot in despair. These days are days of interest, and as Colonel Barton has considerable interest with Government the latter have allowed him to continue for a year longer, lest his immediate removal from Káthiáwár may be attributed to the Junágad embroglio.

Recommends the services of Inspector Abás Ali Khán to the favourable notice of Government.

The Central Indian correspondent of the Jáme Jamshed (98) of the 1st June recommends the services of Mr. Abás Ali Khán, Police Inspector in the Panch Maháls, in connection with the capture of rebel Chhitu of the State of Ali Rájpur, to the favourable notice of Government. The great trouble he took and the cleverness and bravery displayed by him in this affair should not be allowed to pass unrewarded.

Complains of scarcity of firewood at Balsár.

A correspondent of the Bombay Samáchár (85) of the 2nd June, writing from Balsár, states that the Forest Department have since the last month issued an order requiring that carts bringing firewood or timber from forests or villages into the town of Balsár for sale shall possess a pass from the patel of the village or the Forest Officer, as the case may be, stating that the wood contained in the carts is private property. A fee of eight annas is charged on every cart of firewood, and it is said, with what truth it is not known, that the sepoys of the Forest Department exact by threats from the cartmen small presents of money. It is however true that on account of this tax few or no carts of firewood come to Balsár for sale, and the people are put to great inconvenience.

Recommends that all communications with the Native press should be carried on through the Press Commissioner and the Reporter on the Native Press of the respective presidencies.

In alluding to the Bengali Contempt of Court case and the offence of riot committed by some Bengali students in connection with it, the Bakul (16) of the 27th May censures the students for their illegal conduct, and observes that the contempt case has shown that generally Government officials do not entertain good feelings towards the Native press, and hence it is desirable that the connection between the two should be severed as far as possible. If an explanation is required or an enquiry has to be made about any writings that have appeared in a Native newspaper, the Press Commissioner with the Government of India or the Reporter on the Native Press under each subordinate Administration should be entrusted with the work, and all communications with the Native press should be carried on through them. If this is done the Native press will enjoy freedom.

Approves of Lord Ripon's refusal to accept the resignation of the Honourable Rája Shivprasád of membership of the Viceregal Legislative Council.

After alluding to the great unpopularity incurred by the Honourable Rája Shivprasád among Natives for giving his opinion against the Native Magistrates' Jurisdiction Bill, the Yajdán Parast (120) of the 27th May observes that Natives were glad that the Rája sent in his resignation of the additional membership of the Viceregal Legislative Council and are sorry that the Viceroy has refused to accept it. But Lord Ripon has exercised his usual foresight in acting as he has done, and the good results of the step are sure to be felt hereafter. His Lordship has very properly resolved not to give cause to the opponents of the Bill to say that the Rája was compelled to resign his post because he opposed the measure. [The Kaiser-i-Hind (100) of the 27th and the Hitechchhu (76) of Ahmedabad of the 31st May express similar sentiments.]

A reply to the Times of India newspaper regarding its strictures on the part taken by certain Native Subordinate Judges, editors and graduates in the matter of the Bengali Contempt of Court case.

The Native Opinion (10) of the 27th May says:—The Times of India in one of its recent issues undertakes to examine how far the European institutions which the British Government has already introduced have operated as instruments of popular political education! The writer comes to the conclusion that no genuine sympathy with English ideas is observable among the Natives notwithstanding fifty years or more of the influence of British institutions. What better confirmation of this sage conclusion could that journal find than in certain proceedings of the so-called Poona Eloquence Society, to which the Times gives an alias of Bráhman Eloquence Society. It is stated by the Times of India that Subordinate Judges, editors and graduates assembled recently on one occasion to publicly declare the harshness of the sentence passed on the editor of the Bengáli. The writer is scandalized at finding judicial officers joining in a 'public denunciation of the courts to which they are officially subordinate,' and helping by their presence at 'bringing into contempt the laws which it is their privilege to administer'! It is very amusing to see the high colours in which everything is painted by the writer, who in his intense desire to preserve the dignity of courts calls upon Government to take steps to prevent a repetition of the scandal. It was not correct to say that the few Subordinate Judges who might have been present at the proceedings in question went there for the express purpose of denouncing the courts of the land. During the vacation some lectures are arranged for amusement as well as instruction. At one such lecture the question of Mr. Bánerji's imprisonment having been casually discussed, it was resolved to send a telegram of sympathy to the unfortunate editor. No judicial officer took any active part in the proceedings, so far as we are aware, this matter not having been one for which the meeting was expressly convened. Nothing but an opinion about the rigour of the sentence was expressed; and it is surprising how on former occasions, when public bodies considered the sentences passed by High Courts as severe and petitioned for a mitigation thereof, the Times of India did not perceive in it a contempt of authorities. If we remember aright, the Sárvajanik Sabha lately petitioned for a mitigation of the sentence in the case of Vijayálakshmi and Government did remit a portion of the sentence. Nothing of contempt of court was then whispered. But we go further and ask whether our contemporary seriously believes that judicial officers lose all their rights of citizenship on account of their service so as to be barred from an expression of their opinion about a verdict of their superiors. On his own hypothesis, what explanation has our contemporary to offer as regards Mr. Justice Norris's attending a public meeting specially called for denouncing a measure of Government, if it is true that he did attend that meeting as he is reported to have done? Is not a High Court Judge bound to refrain from hampering the progress of Government measures as much as a Subordinate Judge is bound to show respect to a High Court, and is it dignified for a High Court Judge to give importance by his presence to a meeting where wholesale abuse was showered on Natives? To our mind no civilized government will want judges so slavish as to resign all right to think independently. Of course it is one thing to differ and another thing to express that difference in a manner derogatory to the authority of a superior. But it is hard to see anything in the proceedings of the Poona people which warrants the perverse view of the matter which our contemporary has taken.

Local Self-government.

Suggests the introduction of a system of elections by castes.

The Din Bandhu (5) of the 27th May says that elections in Bombay and the mofussil have shown that the system of local self-government advocated by Lord Ripon is only calculated to confer power on particular castes and communities. In Bombay the Pársi and Gujaráti elements predominate, while in the mofussil the Bráhmans are powerful. Such monopolization of power by one or two sects will not be beneficial either to Government or the people. The Bandhu suggests that if Government are seriously thinking of introducing local self-government, they should sanction a system of representation according to castes and creeds.

Makes remarks on the Government resolution reviewing the municipal reports of the Bombay Presidency.

The Jáme Jamshed (98) of the 29th May observes that a perusal of the Government resolution reviewing the reports on the working of the several municipalities in the Bombay Presidency recently published shows that the Bombay Government have not yet taken any important steps for giving due effect to the Viceregal scheme of local self-government, and that some of the Divisional Commissioners entertain opinions against that scheme. After noting that the Commissioners of the Northern and Central Divisions are opposed to the self-government scheme, the Jáme remarks that the Commissioner of the Southern Division is considerably in favour of the project, and that the other two Commissioners ought to walk in his footsteps in order to improve the condition of town municipalities. It is to be regretted that instead of encouraging Natives to take a part in their municipal affairs the Commissioners have expressed their despair in this matter. There being nothing to encourage people to become commissioners of town municipalities and the Collectors and other wilful Government officials being given to follow their own crotchets, it is no wonder if private persons after accepting the office of municipal commissioners should not attend the municipal meetings. It is the duty of the Bombay Government to instruct the Divisional Commissioners to give encouragement to municipal commissioners, and it is to be regretted that Sir James Fergusson has not done this. Mr. Erskine, the Commissioner in Sind, also sees the necessity for such encouragement, and his report also shows the great necessity for adopting the scheme of local self-government. There is no hope of town municipalities proving a success so long as the number of non-official members is not greater than that of officials.

Education.

Praises the British Indian ráj and advocates a wider spread of education among the lower classes than at present.

The Din Bandhu (5) of the 27th May, in an article headed "Is Education ruining the British Rádj ?" observes :—We are certainly very thankful to God for placing India in the hands of the British nation. It is an acknowledged fact that justice and peace reign in their ráj and that the feeling of security enjoyed by the people under the present regime finds no parallel in any of its predecessors. Apart from considerations of commercial dependence, we must admit that the British rule is the best of all rules. It is in this ráj that every facility is afforded to the people of every caste to educate their children, and it is in this ráj that the people know what constitutes liberty. Can anyone deny that the English are more just, kind and liberal than the Peshwás? It is indeed the light of knowledge that has dispelled the ignorance which existed in castes other than that of Bráhmans and exposed the tricks of the latter. Are not the people of the other castes therefore much indebted to the Britons for having liberated them from their religious thraldom? Had they not been educated they should certainly not have been in their present social condition. Let Government therefore try to diffuse education from Bráhmans down to Mahárs and Chámbhárs, so that it may serve to bind the lower classes by ties of affection. We regret very much that the agriculturists as a class are not yet blessed with education, and we therefore entreat Government to educate them in order that they may be rescued from the clutches of their sávkárs, who are generally Bráhmans. In fact, education is taken advantage of by the upper classes, and especially the Bráhmans, who do not contribute a single pie to the local funds. Will Government therefore consider this? Besides the agriculturists form the major portion of Her Majesty's subjects. All these considerations have been suggested to the other people by the education they have received, and as ignorance is a great danger to the ráj, so education is a great bulwark to it.

Railways.

Complains that the arrangements made in the third class carriages of the B. B. & C. I. Railway for providing water-closets are very unsatisfactory.

The Bombay Samáchár (85) of the 31st May observes that the arrangements made by the B. B. & C. I. Railway for providing water closets in their first and second class carriages are satisfactory, but those made in the third classes are not so. The writer describes the arrangements, and says that they are practically useless inasmuch as they cannot be availed of without giving offence to or outraging the modesty of fellow passengers. It behoves the railway authorities to supply every third class carriage with a neat room sufficient to secure temporary seclusion to passengers. If the railway authorities fail to take any measures in this direction Government should compel them to do so.

Comments in connection with the Hyderabad Chanda Railway scheme.

The Mahrátta (2) of the 27th May says:—We admit the necessity and the immense advantages that would accrue to the Nizám's State and to the country generally by the construction of the Chanda Railway. But if it is to have this serious feature, the separating of Aurangabad and Nuldoorg, two of the most fertile provinces in the Nizám's dominions yielding a revenue of about 15 lákhs of rupees, then we certainly think the Council of Regency should have unhesitatingly deferred the question. A precedent for this was not wanting. The Gáekwád of Baroda's administratiotn had to deal with the matter of the contingent; and that administration, even headed as it was by a man of Sir T. Mádhav Ráo's political principles, thought it fit to shelve the question. Besides when the British Government themselves are not willing even to discuss the question of the restoration of the Berárs on the ground of the Nizám's minority, we see no reason why the Council of Regency could not have decently and more justly advanced the same plea when the matter was of ceding provinces. But supposing there was no other course open and that much official pressure was brought to bear upon the Council (which, however, we do not much believe is possible under the Government of Lord Ripon), it should at least have made known to the public the conditions upon which the railway scheme was to be taken up. The people could then have seen what the conditions were, whether they were for the good of the State, and above all whether any of the rich Sardárs could do what the State wanted the company to do. A clear exposition of the terms offered by the company and the State to each other would have obviated the present agitation against the scheme. The first step the Council of Regency ought to have taken was to ascertain whether any of the subjects of the Nizám were willing to assist the Government by money; whether, in fact, the people agreed to give within a prescribed time to the State a loan of 6 krors of rupees at a certain rate of interest. We now learn that some of the wealthy Sardárs have come forward and proposed to make up the necessary sum, but if the Council had at first declared its intention of taking the people into its confidence and testing their power of advancing money, it would have bespoken a more sincere desire to do good to the State and would not have created this agitation. The Council cannot justly think of ceding provinces, but it may at least give its best consideration to the scheme and make it ripe for execution by the time the Nizám attains his majority. But it must not try to push the scheme through with such hot haste to the prejudice of the material interests of the State. We do not know how to characterize the conduct of the Council of Regency in having deported Dr. Aghornath and Dastur Hushang from the city. If, as is given out, Dr. Aghornath and Dastur Hushang did nothing more than timely warn the public that such and such a scheme was being sanctioned by the Council and that therefore they should take steps to prevent its being carried out, they did not deserve to be dismissed and deported. This fact shows that the Council has several weak points in its scheme and that it does not wish that they should see the light. The Council should ask the leaders of the agitation whether they guarantee to pay the required sum within a fixed period at a certain rate of interest. They should be allowed to discuss the question fully; and if it be found that they are unable to do anything, then it may think of taking further steps in the same matter. [The Subodh Patrika (11) of the 27th and the Kesari (34) of the 29th May express somewhat similar sentiments. The Káside Mumbai (101) of the 28th May observes that the railway scheme is very expensive and will be a crushing burden on the State. The scheme should for the present be laid aside and the restoration of the Berárs accomplished. The deportation of those who opposed the scheme is strange. If Sir Sálar Jung were alive at this time, nothing like the present agitation would have taken place. The Lok Mitra (77) of the 27th May censures the Council of Regency for its conduct in connection with this scheme.]

Condemns the action of the Nizám's Government in deporting Dr. Aghornath and Dastur Hushang all of a sudden.

In an article headed "The lawless rule in Hyderabad," the Indu Prakásh (9) of the 28th May observes:—Surely some sad fatality seems to have overtaken some of these Native States! We have scarcely forgotten the inhuman deed of Junágad when here is another Native State trying to walk somewhat in the footsteps of the former without apparently any compunction or regard for enlightened public opinion. The Government of Bombay must now see the mischief which its policy of cajoling and consoling Junágad in spite of its guilt has silently engendered. Doubtless the impression is abroad among these Native States that they may do anything hereafter and escape the displeasure of the paramount power provided there is some semblance of excuse for it. The Government of Hyderabad has found an excuse most opportunely indeed! Their Chanda Railway project having been viewed with popular disfavour, the Hyderabad authorities have shown their inability to cope with the evil without creating popular discontent. They seem to think that matters are mended and people are quieted by being put under something like a reign of terror and by deporting persons without enquiry or trial. Sir Sálar Jung would, we can say for certain, have never sanctioned such extreme measures that aggravate the evil intended to be curbed rather than lessen it. Such is the feeling of excitement roused in the public mind throughout the country in consequence of the two recent doings of the Nizám's Government that people not unnaturally are seen asking the query whether that Government has reverted to the old Moglái system, under which the Government was irresponsible and could do anything without being taken to task for it. What is the meaning of deporting two respectable men from the State without so much as a moment's previous warning? Assume that these men have been guilty of some offence against the State; assume that their presence in the country was calculated, in the opinion of the local authorities, to lead to mischief; still it would appear that a summary deportation such as has now been resorted to was an act of arbitrary injustice for which there could be no sensible justification. Dr. Aghornath Chattopadhya and Dastur Hushang may have, for aught we know to the contrary, done something to contribute to the agitation against the Chanda Railway scheme; but even taking the worst view of their conduct, we cannot persuade ourselves to think that the Government of Hyderabad was at all justified in arresting the two men all of a sudden and removing them summarily from the country. If the authorities thought that they were the instigators of the agitation, the best and the most appropriate course to follow was to put the gentlemen on their trial, to give them an opportunity of explaining their conduct, if there was any ground to suspect that there was something reprehensible in it, and then to decide what ought to be done with them. Under the British Government, even under the worst of crises, no man, however great his offence, is torn from his family all of a sudden and sent off to another place; but what the paramount power itself cannot do, or at least will not be considered justified in doing, a feudatory State does in broad day-light at this day. It was known, for instance, that Wásudev Balwant Phadke was the leader of the dacoits who plundered the Deccan in 1879; but when the man was apprehended, even he was put on his defence. Dr. Aghornath and Dastur Hushang could not have done anything half as heinous; but granted that in the opinion of the Hyderabad authorities they did something that was culpable, what, we ask, is the meaning of arresting and deporting them all of a sudden, as if they had no right to a hearing? Surely it is due both to the public and the Nizám's Government that an explanation of this apparently arbitrary act should be forthcoming. [The Yajdán Parast (120) of the 27th May expresses similar sentiments.]

Asks Government to place before the public all the correspondence in connection with the Chanda Railway scheme.

Referring to the agitation in Hyderabad in connection with the Chanda Railway scheme, the Arunodayá (14) of the 27th May says that the apprehensions of the people that there is some connection between the railway project and the intention of the Government to take up two of the Nizám's districts are unfounded. The leaders of the agitation request that all the correspondence that has passed between the Nizám's and the British Governments may be placed before the public, and it is proper that the British Government should lose no time in complying with the request. As Government are not guilty of the intentions fathered upon them by the people, there seems to be no objection to the publication of the correspondence. Nay, it is necessary that the people should be convinced by a documentary proof of the advantages likely to result from the projected railway, and when they once see through the object of Government they will withdraw from their present attitude.

Municipalities.

Complains of the inadequate water-supply of Bombay and prays for the removal of Mr. Walton from his post of Executive Engineer to the municipality.

The Indian Spectator (1) of the 27th May, in referring to the cry regarding the inadequate water-supply of Bombay, remarks:—Here we are in the midst of the hot season, with fever and cholera threatening the city on the one hand and fire on the other, and water not to be found when and where it is wanted. Special care is being taken of aristocratic quarters, but the poor—ah the poor!—what of them? Well, they may go without water or use what they can get from stagnant pools and stinking wells. Another scheme for a kror and a half will have to be taken in hand some day, though it is not clear who is to pay for it. Sir James Fergusson is a kind-hearted Governor. When he sees a policeman ill-treating a passer-by, or when he hears village dogs disturbing his subjects' rest, or when he finds the railway train or the postal delivery irregular, he takes notice of each and all and insists that things shall be better managed. Now, we think, Sir James knows how his people have to suffer for want of water in this fearful heat; but he is helpless. Where there is no responsibility, there can be no blame to attach. And yet there must be some one responsible in the matter. Who assured the public, when the Tulsi works were taken in hand, that they would have a copious supply of pure water in future? Surely the scheme was taken up on official recommendation. What has become of these official estimates and promises? We regret to have to be personal, but once more we are obliged to give expression to the popular opinion that Mr. Walton must be found some other work. So long as he remains Executive Engineer to the Municipality, the city will continue to be a loser in every way. If he has talents, let these be applied to a business he understands. In his present office he has proved a complete failure and worse. His presence retards the progress of practical business. [The Lok Mitrá (77) of the 27th May makes a similar complaint and takes the municipality to task for giving assurances which are never realised.]

Requests the attention of the municipal authorities to the bad management of the garden near the Bazar Gate Street, Fort.

The Din Bandhu (5) of the 27th May complains that the municipal garden near the Bazar Gate Street is not well kept. Many people frequent this garden for recreation, but the slovenly management does not make the lounge as delightful as they wish. It is disgraceful that public money should be spent in laying out a garden and that the garden should be ill kept. It behoves the municipal authorities to attend to this.

Disapproves of the new drainage scheme for Poona.

The Mahrátta (2) of the 27th May observes:—The new municipal commissioners of Poona have a very hard battle to fight. We learn that the drainage scheme has been referred to the municipality by Government under very peculiar circumstances. It is reported on the highest authority that, though not quite directly, Government wish to coerce the board into accepting the very costly scheme of drainage proposed by Colonel Ducat. That a scheme involving an estimated expenditure of about 7 or 8 lákhs of rupees should be forced upon the municipality, and that too at a time when the new scheme of local self-government has not had even a fair start, is certainly very ominous. The municipal funds have already been budgeted against, and the costly project of building a central market for the city leaves no scope for any other work. The state of public health in Poona is not quite so bad as to necessitate such an expensive project, and if the new commissioners prove strong enough we have no doubt that they will ultimately carry the day. Should the new board yield to the threats held out, a very bad impression will be created and the system of returning members to it by election will become odious.

Native States.

Comments on the unsatisfactory administration of civil and criminal justice in Pálanpur and Rádhanpur.

The Gujarát Mitrá (75) of the 27th May says that the dignity of justice is gradually sinking down in the States of Pálanpur and Rádhanpur. God-fearing and honest officers are disappearing day by day, and interest and influence have begun to play an important part even in trifling matters. There recently occurred a case in Pálanpur in which one Mr. Lála alias Ráo Báhádur filed a suit in a criminal court of the State complaining of certain acts of violence exercised by the police on his body; but not being able to secure redress from the State, he laid the complaint before the Political Agent, who strongly censured the Darbár for their conduct. The Darbár then sent for the complainant with all show of respect and subsequently required him to withdraw his complaint. Such intrigues have become common in all States and have served to affect the reputation of the rulers, and the confidence of the public has begun to deteriorate. It is the illiterate Diwáns that are responsible for such a state of things, and it is time that the British authorities should take up the work of appointing educated and competent Diwáns. As for civil justice, many Native States will be found to have illiterate and ignorant judges. The civil courts enjoy only a nominal existence, while the business is regulated according to interest and influence. The officers have no idea of the laws they have to administer, and therefore follow their own whims and caprices. The courts are as it were mere shops where justice is sold to the highest bidder. The majority of the officers in the Pálanpur and Rádhanpur States that are entrusted with this work are thoroughly innocent of legal knowledge, and the judicial functionaries in the higher courts are less competent than the Subordinate Judges in the British districts. The Political Agents in charge of these States may be aware of this state of things, but what can they do if they have no power to interfere in the administration? It is however their duty to occasionally offer wholesome advice and to report matters to the British Government. It is necessary that an enquiry should be instituted into the efficiency or otherwise of the judicial service, and that their decisions should be scrutinized with a view to determine whether they are in harmony with the general principles of law. Unless this is done there is no chance of any improvement in the condition of the Native States. It is very doubtful whether all Political Agents take as much interest in the States in their charge as the Political Agent of Cambay seems to do. Many of them are known to be fond of seeing that their visits to States are celebrated with great eclat and of hearing flattering praises of themselves. The State officials strain every nerve to show the best appearance, and the Agents therefore make a favourable report to Government, representing that the subjects are happy, that employment is abundant and thriving, that the town is clean, that the Kárbháris are very active, and that all departments are in a satisfactory condition. Government rely on this report and pass a resolution to the same effect. This serves to give an impetus to maladministration and to create dissatisfaction among the people. It is therefore urgently necessary that Government and their Political Agents should always be very cautious in regard to Native States.

Says that great inconvenience is caused to the criminals of the Pálanpur State by the ruling that appeals shall be preferred in English and not in Gujaráti.

The Gujarát Mitrá (75) of the 27th May complains that great inconvenience has been caused to criminals in Pálanpur by a recent ruling that appeals shall be preferred in English and not in Gujaráti, and advises the authorities concerned to establish the practice of receiving appeals only in Gujaráti. It also behoves Government to take pity on the poor Bhils of the State, and as they have established a court of appeal they should try to secure the additional convenience of permission to prefer appeals in Gujaráti.

Says that the contribution of Rs. 10,000 paid by the Junágad Darbár is a sort of bribe paid to Government for their unjust decision in the recent affairs of that State.

The Gujaráti (94) of the 27th May says that the contribution of Rs. 10,000 paid by the Junágad Darbár towards the maintenance of the families of soldiers that were killed during the recent Egyptian Campaign is a sort of bribe given to Government for their decision in the recent Junágad affairs, which the public considers as unjust. [The Samsher Báhádur (108) of the 25th May also comments on the contribution paid by the Junágad Darbár in the same spirit.]

Berár Affairs.

Complains that great delay occurs in the publication of the reports of the different branches of the Berár Administration.

In acknowledging the receipt of the reports on "Cotton," "Trade," "Revenues" and "Dispensaries" of Berár, the Pramod Sindhu (51) of the 28th May observes that the report on the dispensaries is for the year 1881, and hence the information contained in it must appear stale to the public. The report of the Educational Department is not yet published. After expressing some surmises as to the causes of this great delay in the publication of the reports, the Sindhu remarks that it seems that the delay occurred in the office of the Resident, and expresses a hope that it will be prevented in future.

Regrets that the municipal commissioners in Berár are not to get the title of Ráo Sáheb.

The Varhád Samáchár (67) of the 28th May observes that whereas the title of Ráo Sáheb has been, according to the Poona papers, conferred on the municipal commissioners of that city, not only is no similar title given to the municipal commissioners in Berár, but they are not addressed even with the plain title of Mr. Even the Native Assistant Commissioners are sometimes not similarly honoured. It seems that no specific rules on the subject have been framed by the Hyderabad Administration.

Notes.—A. The notices from the different Newspapers have been collected in the Report under different heads, which are printed in italics.

B. The names of Newspapers are printed in the body of the Report in italics, and the number of the Newspaper in the above list is printed in brackets after the name.

C. The proprietors of the Newspapers marked * have not given information as to the number of copies issued. In these cases an estimate has been made by the Reporter.

D. The system of spelling vernacular words followed by the Reporter is the same as that adopted in the Official Spelling List of the Bombay Presidency. One peculiar feature of this system is that when the long a (आ or ा) is the last letter of a word, the accent is left out, and the short a (अ = u in gun) is, to prevent confusion, never placed at the end of a word. This rule has been strictly followed, except that when the short a appears to be absolutely necessary to complete the pronunciation of a word, as in Arunodaya or the well known Mitra, it is printed with a mark over it to indicate that it is short, thus—a.

E. Berár papers are received in this office for report under the Resolution of the Government of Bombay in the General Department, No. 1795, dated 8th June 1881.

Politics and the Public Administration.

Accounts for the present depressed condition of the people of India.

The Lokahitavádi (37) for the month of May 1883 says:—Nature has been most bountiful in India and has supplied the people with trees, fruits, corn, flowers and plants, whose general utility is undeniable and which enable them to lead a life of peace and contentment. The question therefore arises, why are the people in a distressed condition? With fertile lands, a good climate, a satistactory village organization, a good people and an abundance of all the necessaries of life, why have the people been reduced to such a deplorable and forlorn condition? It is certain that there is a screw loose somewhere, not in the constitution of the people but in the administration of Government. Former rulers recognized the right of the people to the common and uninterrupted enjoyment of forests, mountains, rivers, holy places, temples, salt, wells, tanks, &c. But the present policy of Government with regard to them is too well known to need mention. What was prohibited under the former Governments is now done with the express sanction of duty and policy. There is therefore nothing strange in the fall that the people have suffered. All the articles that were formerly considered the common property of the people have now been taxed by the State. When the people are pressed hard from all sides how can they ever raise up their heads? It is natural that everybody should be proud of his country, but owing to the peculiar ways of our rulers all the people have become quite indifferent and sad. The reason is that the idea of property or ownership has altogether disappeared. A notion has gained ground that it is not safe to count with certainty upon the enjoyment of what one has acquired by the sweat of his brow. And the people believe that their ownership of property has been wholly annihilated by the enactment of queer laws and the imposition of municipal, local and imperial taxes. What then can account for this state of things? It is the present policy that is responsible for this depression. The desire to deprive others of what they have is paramount in man, and when truth and morality are seen nowhere it is natural that the people should take umbrage at indifference. In India it was a long standing practice that district officers made an appraisement of crops every year, and granted takávi advances and made remissions of revenue according to the yield of crops. Such a policy was a safeguard against the injustice which takes place under the present administration of realizing revenue demands in spite of injury to crops. But that system having been abolished in favour of fixed assessments, the ryots have been reduced to a straitened condition and driven to the sávkár for protection. In the days of Kshatriya rulers the ryots were required to pay a sixth of their income to the State, and the Rájas having the good of their people at heart and not being swayed by a desire to squeeze the ryots the latter were proud of their country. But subsequently the nature of the administrative policy began to deteriorate until matters came to this pass on account of the levy of oppressive taxes. In abolishing the old system of assessing land revenue Government had an eye to facilitating its collection, but the introduction of the present system has had the effect of prejudicially affecting the interests of the ryots and of thus retarding their progress on the path of material prosperity. In short, the people do not feel happy, nor have they the power to take care of their own money. It is necessary that influential bodies like Government should take up the work of managing the interests of the people. As matters at present stand the sávkár is generally all-in-all in a village, and the obligations under which he lays the people by lending them money are sufficient to empower him to turn them as he will. The establishment of agricultural banks contemplated by Lord Ripon, if carried out in a liberal spirit, is well calculated to ameliorate the condition of the ryots. The management of sávkárs does not seem to be fruitful of any good to the ryots, but still the sávkár is a sine qua nón of a village. People cannot look up to Government for help because they are indifferent. If the crops suffer Government do not feel for the ryots. They cannot be moved by pity. Their dues must be paid, otherwise the ryot's land is sold and he is deprived of future means of livelihood. When the system of survey settlement was first introduced it showed a favourable contrast with the disorderly rule of Bájiráo, and the advent of the British rdj served to restore peace to men's hearts and business. This satisfactory state of things would have progressed uninterruptedly, but the continuity was broken by the introduction of a revision survey, when the original rates were doubled. This has been the signal for the good fortune of India to wane, and hence the cry of dissatisfaction which is heard from all quarters.

Comments on the present policy of the British Government and urges certain demands of the people of India on the attention of Government.

In a leader headed "The just rights of India, No. 3," the Trimásik Tikákár (116) for the month of Vaishákh of the Samvat year 1939 (May 1883) comments in a rather violent style on the present administration of British India and makes India vent her grievances in the form of a complaint as follows:—The Englishmen, who are blind from pride, boast of having conquered me by the sword and demand higher rights than are enjoyed by my children, and it is surprising that the Supreme Government admits their demand. It is simply an imaginary belief that 25 krors of my children are kept under subjection by only 60 thousand British bayonets. and I laugh at this empty boast. I must however frankly admit that I have been kept under subjection more by ingenuity than by strength. These strangers only arrived in this country as merchants and my children did not fail to give them a hearty and respectful welcome. My unwary children were then able if they had chosen to drive away these strangers from my shores. But they did not think it right to accord such unseemly treatment to strangers. This world is however full of sin and there are few that will meet a favour with gratitude. In the fulness of time these English merchants made an ungrateful return for this favour. Envy and mutual jealousy appeared on the stage and my children began to quarrel among themselves. This was the signal for the English to accomplish their object. My children's fortune was on the decline, and it was not surprising that they were ruled by evil counsel. The stars of the foreigners were, however, in the ascendant, and they therefore succeeded in making capital out of this internecine warfare. They became rulers of the country while my children became beggars. The sun of the good fortune of my progeny set while that of the foreign merchants rose. Impartial Englishmen and Europeans must admit that the boast indulged in at the present day by some Englishmen that I was conquered by the sword is perfectly vain. I allowed these strangers to feed on my own and my sons' bread, and it is therefore that they are now striving in the height of elation to trample on me and my children! The world knows well that the English are a mercantile nation and unfit to carry on a war with other nations. Students of history are aware that Englishmen never gained decisive victories single-handed; they allied themselves with others and achieved successes after great exertions. I can quote many instances of their weakness, and that such people should frighten me by a show of the sword is nothing short of a foolish attempt to exasperate me. My wise children are not so effeminate as to be frightened into acknowledging the superiority of British arms. My brave and loyal children think it an honour to acknowledge the supremacy of the British, and desire to receive innumerable benefits by conducting themselves loyally and peacefully. My prayer is that the British supremacy should continue over me for a very long time to admit of the wounds inflicted on me by the Mahomedans being perfectly cured. Notwithstanding this, several proud Englishmen strive to take away the rights of my children and to insult me, and this is an inexcusable folly. It is the duty of every prudent government to avoid all race distinctions. But the world has now grown selfish. Everybody tries to secure his own interests. The powerful English Government has been guilty of protecting the rights of the ruling race and of letting the large subject population chafe for a similar protection, and this will never be fruitful of good. My demands are briefly these. It is an injustice to make a distinction between the treatment accorded to India and Ireland when both have not been conquered by British bayonets but by British skill. The Irish are smart, energetic and violent, and united action is their motto. My children are on the other hand selfish and always afraid to act. This difference in character accounts for the greater advance that the Irish have made in agitating for their political and other rights. My children will enjoy peace and prosperity by persistently keeping up their demands for their just rights. When a handful of Irish people are duly represented in Parliament, why should not the large Indian Empire be permitted to send her representatives to that national tribunal in order to advocate her cause? It is not wise to let this empire be ruled for every five years by a single Viceroy. It is barbarous to make my children suffer mutely the oppression practised on them by a wilful Viceroy. Is it not an injustice to India that she should not enjoy the right of representation in Parliament, to allow of the oppression exercised by the Supreme Government being exposed, to preserve the old rights of the people, and to represent their grievances to the Home Government? My children are deeply indebted to the disinterested efforts of Messrs. Fawcett and Bright in their cause, but these great men have not been able to achieve much. Will not Her Imperial Majesty the Queen take pity on my children? As regards the admission of my children into the Civil Service, it is very inconvenient that they should be required to compete with Europeans in a foreign and distant land. I am not wrong in thinking that many difficulties have been thrown in the way of my children passing this examination with the view of making them waste their energies in serving Europeans like beasts and in passing their lives in drudgery. I have a right to ask the question why, if the English are not swayed by such selfish motives, examinations like that for the Civil Service should not be established in this country. The position of such of my children as try to successfully compete with Europeans under such odds is envied by selfish Englishmen. A distinction is made between two officers that have passed the same test on account of the difference in the colour of their skins. It is surprising that the English Government, which prides itself upon its impartial justice, should be capable of such distinctions. A beardless English youth comes out to India on a post of high salary and power, and my better educated and more experienced sons are obliged to serve under him, to say "aye" to his commands, and to yield to his crotchets. The subordinates have to work while all the credit is taken by their superior. He only comes to deprive me of my riches, to carry on a selfish administration among my children, and to enjoy himself at his sweet will. An English youth just fresh from England is considered competent to deal justice to all from the lowest menial to the highest Rája, while a Native of the same rank is not fit to administer justice to a European sailor. What is this but partiality? The present Viceroy is trying to give impartial justice to my poor but deserving children by removing the disabilities caused by the colour of the skin. Arise, my children, and proclaim victory to Lord Ripon!

Comments in connection with the debate in the House of Commons on Mr. Stanhope's motion regarding reduction of public expenditure in India.

The Mahrátta (2) of the 3rd June, in noticing the debate in the House of Commons on Mr. Stanhope's motion regarding reduction of public expenditure in India, remarks:—We needed not the discussion of Parliamentary members to inform us of the too well-known fact that public expenditure in India was rapidly increasing and that early steps were necessary to be taken to reduce it. The real question is, what practical steps ought to be taken to reduce the large amount now remitted to England every year on account of the "Home" charges? Mr. Stanhope made a good speech, but he failed to prove the assertion which he made at the outset of his speech that "the present Viceroy of India was very much the most extravagant of all those who had held the office." The fact is, as pointed out by the speaker himself, that it is not the Viceroys who are so much to blame for all this excess of expenditure as the House of Commons itself. It is the House only that can sanction the taking of any practical steps if proposed to be taken by some sincere Governor General; and no amount of vague declamations or theoretical discussions will be of any avail to save India from the crisis which is fast coming over her. The items of expenditure in which some reduction may be sought so as to give some tangible surplus are those relating to superannuation and pension charges, the dividend paid on guaranteed railways, the stores and the exchange. In the branches of expenditure incurred in India itself a considerable saving may be made, notably in the Army Department, by adopting the recommendations of the Army Commission, provided Government have courage enough to meet the exigencies of the time boldly and on lines of broad, liberal and far-sighted statesmanship. To accomplish this it will not do merely to have an energetic Viceroy at the head of Government, but also an equally energetic and sincere Secretary of State. We know how the proposal of the Indian Government to reduce the positions of Commanders-in-Chief for separate presidencies was received by Lord Hartington and his Council. As regards reducing the pension charges, &c., which amount to nearly four krors in this year's budget statement, we have to recur to the oft-repeated remedy, the more extensive substitution of Native agency for the European one, compatible of course with the efficiency of the several services. But to expect the British Government to do this seems well-nigh hopeless, as it is calculated to encroach upon the cherished rights and privileges of many an aspiring youth in England. But unless Government betake themselves to the policy of appointing competent Natives to all branches of the Indian services, the crisis that they so much dread will not be averted. If Parliament really desires to save India from bankruptcy and ruin, it should rule that the Indian Government should give half the number of places that may have to be filled up every year to Natives. This policy will have to be followed sooner or later if the country is not to be kept in the same state as now. If it is followed now the British Government will save it from ruin; otherwise, let but a dire famine like that of 1876 or a cruel Afghan war like that of 1878 occur (which God forbid!) and India will have to be given up for lost. As to the question of exchange, we think that Parliament should make a rule to the effect that whoever being hereafter appointed to serve in India retires to England will get pension to the amount he would have got if he had enjoyed it in India itself,—in other words, he will be paid in Indian coin. That is, if a Civilian is entitled to a pension of Rs. 6,000 a year, he will get this sum or its equivalent in pounds in England. The generous-minded Europeans who serve in this country ought to be prepared to make this small sacrifice, if not for anything else at least for the good of the country the salt of which they eat for 20 or 30 years. If Parliament were to frame a rule to this effect, having a prospective and not a retrospective effect, great saving might in course of a short time be effected in the sum that is now lost in exchange. [The Indian Spectator (1) of the same date expresses disappointment at the practical result of the debate, and remarks:—The discussion discloses two ugly facts, one of which was of course anticipated. Firstly, there was as usual a very meagre attendance, so meagre that an attempt was twice made to count out the House. Reduction of public expenditure cannot be a very inviting topic for the worthy legislators at St. Stephen's. The admission of the necessity of reduction in expenditure involves a disturbance of vested interests, especially those of Indian civil and military servants. Hence the absence of members, though deplorable, can easily be accounted for. The second discouraging fact is the attempt from the ministerial side to cut short the debate. This was scarcely creditable to those concerned. When a potent and overgrown bureaucracy is strongly opposed to a reduction of expenditure and is determined to denude India and impoverish her millions, what hope can there be of anything like a substantial reduction in expenditure? Mr. O'Donnell has in his speech in the course of the debate hit the right nail on the head, and it was because the nail did hit the ministerialists so hard that Mr. Dodson made a weak attempt to gag him. Mr. Stanhope fairly made out his case, though we cannot refrain from condemning in toto one position of his speech where he attempted to make political capital out of the question by attacking Lord Ripon as the Viceroy under whose administration expenditure had vastly increased. He utterly failed to substantiate his charge, and it is satisfactory to find that the diligent and well-informed Mr. Cross completely disproved the statement by showing up the hollowness of his figures. It is something new to learn that the House of Commons has so far become alive to Indian matters as to upbraid itself for doing nothing practically beyond registering abstract resolutions. This expression of opinion in itself is a gain to India. It is a stepping stone to a practical reform in public expenditure. And so far the people of India have cause not only to be thankful, but to renew their efforts for economy. The Gujaráti (94) of the same date expresses somewhat similar sentiments.]

The Lok Mitrá (77) of the 3rd June observes that it would have been a fortunate circumstance for India if the opposition had not shown a rare consideration for the Government by allowing Mr. Onslow's amendment in the House of Commons anent the iniquitous imposition on India of a portion of the expenses of the recent war in Egypt to be shelved on the promise of a discussion on the subject about the middle of July. It is feared that that discussion will not do much beyond perhaps evoking sympathy for unhappy India, as the Government will take care that a strong contingent of its supporters attends in order to frustrate the motion, which they rightly regard as a vote of censure. The rider of Mr. Onslow had a very good chance of passing during the discussion of Mr. Stanhope's motion on Indian expenditure, and even if it had been a dubious victory against the Government the political fad of the party agitators at home should have been disregarded so long as the object for which the whole public voice of this country has been fighting was gained, namely, the imposition of the whole burden of the war expenses upon the shoulders of those who were responsible for or interested in it. Even if it were taken as a defeat for the Liberals, they richly deserved it in spite of all the blessings that they have of late showered upon India in no stinted measure. Where the pocket of the Englishman is touched all Governments are the same, and no Chancellor of the Exchequer can resist the temptation of robbing the poor Indian ryot if he can thereby lessen the burden of the income-tax on the English people. The iniquity of charging the already impoverished Indian treasury with a considerable portion of the expenses of a war in which she was no more concerned than Australia, and which arose wholly out of European complications, is now admitted by all who care to take an impartial view of the question, and the impression is natural that the English Parliament has permitted its ministers to take from the weak what they dared not have taken from the strong. Under these circumstances any artificial advantage that could aid those who wish well to India in thwarting a policy of injustice would be welcome; and therefore the forbearance shown by the leaders of the opposition, who in this matter have certainly not followed the advice of Lord Randolph Churchill, appears to us a stretch of good feelings which is to be regretted. With the impression created by Mr. Stanhope's speech and the state of the House, a splendid opportunity was lost for doing at least tardy justice to India, and the Ministry, in this instance at any rate, had done nothing to deserve their good fortune.

Is afraid that the delayed discussion on Mr. Onslow's amendment in the House of Commons anent the iniquitous imposition on India of a portion of the expenses of the war in Egypt will not do much good to her.

The Samsher Búhádur (109) of the 1st June says that it does not know of any substantial proofs of the statement that the British Government is not selfish. The disaffected people of Ireland, who are a source of embarrassment to the Government, have enjoyed the privilege of returning their representatives to the British Parliament for a long time, while the law-abiding people of this vast country are enviously debarred from sending even one representative to it. This policy is not creditable to Government. It cannot be understood why the people of India are not granted this privilege. That policy which admits of a single hot-tempered ruler exercising arbitrary sway over 25 krors of souls is unjust and unbecoming to a civilized Government. [The Indu Prakásh (9) of the 4th June is not very sanguine of any good resulting from the resolution recently adopted by the House of Commons for an early introduction of the Indian budget, and says that England cannot do better than admit India's representatives into her Parliament.]

Says that India should be allowed to send its representatives to the British Parliament.

In alluding to the appointment of the Duke of Connaught to the command of the Meerut Division of the Indian army, the Bombay Chronicle (74) of the 3rd June observes that when the princes, nobles, gentry and the masses of India see that their Empress's son performs his everyday duty as a man and a member of society with zeal, intelligence and assiduity, they will become impressed with the necessity and importance of being able to perform their duties in like manner. The grandees in the land will learn a practical lesson about there being no merit in ignorance and idleness; and the lower orders will find that modern philosophy upholds honest labour and work as the true badge of greatness and distinction. The personal contact of the Prince with the representatives of the people will again, as in the case of his elder brothers, tend to cement closer the attachment of the population to the English throne. In conclusion, the Chronicle hopes that a most enthusiastic welcome and flattering reception will be accorded to the Prince everywhere, and that it will be the solicitude and care of all loyal subjects to render his stay among them as agreeable as may be possible. [The Yajdán Parast (120) and the Gujaráti (94) of the same date express similar sentiments.]

Is much gratified at the appointment of the Duke of Connaught to the command of the Meerut Division.

Compares the present system of land revenue assessment with that obtaining under the Moglái and Peshwái rules.

The Jagadádarsh (30) of the 3rd June compares the systems and rates of assessment of land revenue prevailing in the Moglái and Peshwái periods with those obtaining under the British rule, and says that while the systems under both of the former administrations were equally favourable to the ryots that under the present is quite the reverse. Under the present administration the ryots do not get the necessary capital and implements for carrying on their agricultural profession, nor do they receive assistance in the improvement of their soil. On the contrary whatever the cultivator has is made subject to attachment. The present policy of selling lands by auction for default in payment of revenue has served to deprive many a cultivator of his legitimate profession and to drive him to earning wages by daily labour. Such sales did not exist in former times, and if any cultivator was driven by circumstances to abandon his profession the zamindár used to assist him in holding on by lending money without interest, which used to be recovered in small instalments. The zamindár was interested in the good of the ryots. In the present days the ryots are driven to the sávkár for assistance, who is generally bent upon ruining him, and hence there does not exist a good feeling between them. The ryots have also lost their credit with the sávkárs, and not getting the necessary assistance from Government have been reduced to a helpless condition.

Is gratified to learn that the irrigation works in the Panjáb and Sind have proved successful.

In noticing the report on the irrigation works in the Panjáb and Sind for the year 1881-82, the Bombay Chronicle (74) of the 3rd June observes that the statistics about these works speak most eloquently of their great value, their importance to the material prosperity of the country, and the wisdom shown in designing and carrying them out. Works like these will serve to meet the growing necessity for feeding the constantly increasing Indian population and also the ever-growing administrative expenditure of the country without serious embarrassment to Government or hardship to the people. No opportunity should be neglected for the extension of irrigation works.

Says that the "Note" on Nankin cotton and its production in India, prepared by the Revenue and Agricultural Department of the Government of India, should be translated into the principal vernaculars of the country.

The Indian Spectator (1) of the 3rd June says:—It is officially notified that the Revenue and Agricultural Department of the Government of India has prepared a "Note" on Nankin cotton and its production in this country, and that copies of it can be had on application. Those interested in the material development of the country ought to acquaint themselves well with the contents of this useful production. We specially commend it to the notice of the local Mill-owners' Association. It is a pity that such an useful publication is not translated into the principal vernaculars. At any rate, it is very desirable that a general abstract should be issued in the Native languages. If Natives unacquainted with the English language are to be made to take an interest in the cultivation of textile fabrics it is incumbent on the Imperial Government to have such papers translated. We repeat the suggestion that if not the entire text, the principal or essential portions of all important blue-books on trade, navigation, agriculture and arts should be translated into the principal vernaculars of India. The more the masses are familiarized with such matters, the greater the benefit to the country.

Makes some suggestions in connection with the coming industrial exhibition at Calcutta.

In noticing the coming industrial exhibition at Calcutta, the Jáme Jamshed (98) of the 9th June observes that the committee appointed by the Government of Bombay for contributing the share of this Presidency to the exhibition do not appear to have worked to any appreciable extent. A public subscription was started many days ago, but nothing is yet known as to what response has been made to it by the public. Unless the committee assure the people that they are responsible for the objects exhibited and will pay the cost of transit to and from the place of exhibition, there is no likelihood of the people coming out in large numbers to send the curiosities they possess. In conclusion, the Jáme hopes that the committee will not fail to duly exert themselves for the credit of this city.

Censures Government for not taking timely measures for the destruction of locusts.

The Native Opinion (10) of the 3rd June criticises the conduct of Government in regard to the havoc committed by locusts, and says that it is a matter of regret that notwithstanding the tremendous flights of locusts in this Presidency since the last year Government should have devised no measures for meeting the evil. It is shameful that Government should confess that the attention of their officers was not attracted to the breed of locusts that was observable in the Southern Konkan last year. The public press sounded the trumpet of alarm in time, but it is not clear what use the officials made of the warning given. Judging, however, from the results, it does not appear that the locust plague engaged as much attention as it deserved. This view is strengthened by the reply which the Bombay Government has addressed to an enquiry made by the Government of India in the above sense. In this reply it is said that on account of the early commencement of the monsoon last year the locusts in the Dhárwár and Kánara districts could not leave the Presidency before the rains, and therefore settled down and laid their eggs. It is however very surprising that Government officers should not have been able to look into the future from the circumstances which, as admitted by Government, were known to have existed. If they had taken timely measures to destroy the eggs laid by these creatures, much of the present distress would have been avoided. Government, however, are not prepared to accept any responsibility on account of the negligence of their officers and throw the whole blame on the early advent of the rains. The immediate result of this set of circumstances has been that the means of livelihood of many people have been straitened on account of the destruction of the crops of their fields, and Government will shortly have to open public works for the relief of the distressed population and to grant remissions of land revenue in various places. [The Satyá Shodhak (56) of the same date learns that Government have, on the authority of district officers, decided upon not granting any remissions of revenue in the Ratnágiri District on account of the locust plague. It was certainly very fortunate that locusts did not attack this district at the time of the reaping of the crops, but nevertheless the destruction committed by them on garden lands was not inconsiderable and therefore deserves the attention of Government. The assessment levied on lands is not simply on account of the crops but also on account of the trees growing on them. It is therefore just that a remission to the extent of the assessment levied on account of trees should be granted. The Shodhak also exhorts the people to represent the matter to Government fully. The Bakul (16) of the same date expresses similar sentiments. The Kesari (34) of the 5th June says that the papers recently published regarding the remissions proposed to be granted by Government on account of the havoc committed by locusts show that Government do not intend to grant any remissions to the ryots in the Poona District. Considering the damage done in the Indápur Táluka and having regard to the generally scanty crops reaped in this táluka, this determination of Government cannot be approved. The Gujaráti (94) of the 3rd June says that Government in their resolution on the subject of locusts do not point out any specific remedies for their destruction, and suggests that a reward should be advertised for the invention of measures in that behalf. It is also necessary that greater indulgence than at present should be extended to cultivators in the matter of the realization of Government dues.]

Suggests the appointment of Mr. T. C. Hope as Finance Minister of India in succession to Major Baring.

The Indian Spectator (1) of the 3rd June says:—It is likely that the Secretary of State for India will send out his own nominee to succeed Major Baring as Finance Minister, but it is not so likely that the new Finance Minister will or can fill the place with credit to himself and benefit to the people. The new comer may upset the present arrangements if he is a strong man, or if he is a weak one he may play into the hands of irresponsible experts. Now, why can we not have the best man available on the spot? Mr. T. C. Hope is specially fitted for the post. As we have so often said, he is about the ablest financier in the service and an exceptionally hard worker. He has besides the advantage of practical experience, and what is of greater importance to the public, Mr. Hope loves economy and revels in its practice. His economic soul recoils from ideas of waste and extravagance. This is an official virtue which deserves encouragement. We are glad, therefore, that Mr. Hope's name has been publicly suggested. In the very nature of things he will be better able to administer our finances than an amateur or a theorist. Mr. Hope may not have Major Baring's breadth of view, but we do not just now want that quality so much as the concentrated energy and the dogged determination which the Public Works Minister possesses in a greater degree than perhaps any other public servant in India. We have not room even for an enumeration of Mr. Hope's services. Lord Ripon and Major Baring know his worth, and we trust they will succeed in having it practically recognized when there is an opportunity.

Suggests the abolition of Central Presses at the presidencies and the adoption of the policy of giving encouragement to private printing presses in the mofussil.

The Chandrodayá (121) of the 26th May requests the attention of the Viceroy to the justice of giving encouragement to vernacular printing presses by giving them all the Government printing work in the districts. Every presidency has a Central Press maintained at great cost to Government. The establishment of such presses must have its origin in the inconvenience caused to Government work by the absence of private printing presses in the districts. But at present every district has a number of presses which are in a position to execute Government work at rates lower than those charged by the Government Central Press. The existing Central Presses therefore are unnecessary and can be done away with without any inconvenience to Government work. As the Viceroy is actuated by a desire to give encouragement to Native trades and industries it will greatly assist his object if he rules that all district officers shall utilize the printing presses in their districts for the performance of the Government work. Such a policy will lead to a saving in the expenditure incurred by Government and at the same time serve as patronage to Native printers. Hitherto the work of the different municipalities used to be done by town presses, but recently such work also has begun to be executed at the Central Press. It is to be hoped that the Viceroy will duly consider the above suggestion.

Approves of Lord Ripon's refusal to accept the resignation of the Honourable Rája Shivprasád as a member of the Viceregal Legislative Council.

With reference to the non-acceptance by the Viceroy of the Honourable Rája Shivprasád's resignation of membership of the Supreme Legislative Council, the Lok Mitrá (77) of the 3rd June observes:—It was the instinct of true liberality and statesmanship which prompted Lord Ripon to decline to accept the resignation of a member of his Council who has rendered himself obnoxious to the people of the country. Any other course at this time, however honestly adopted, would certainly have furnished a handle to the bigoted fanatics of Calcutta, whom Britannicus so faithfully represents, to fasten the most absurd and extravagant charges on the Viceroy. Not only has Lord Ripon given them no opportunity of venting their spite by fresh misrepresentations in this matter, but he has actually set them an example of toleration and large-heartedness which it is useless to expect from his enemies.

Censures the Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal for ignoring the claims of Mr. Gupta to the appointment of Chief Presidency Magistrate of Calcutta.

The Arunodayá (14) of the 3rd June animadverts on the supersession of Mr. Gupta of the Bengal Civil Service for the appointment of Chief Presidency Magistrate of Calcutta by Mr. Henderson, who is less competent and junior in Government service. The policy of ignoring learning, competency and right in favour of considerations of colour, country and caste which has been initiated by the Honourable Mr. Rivers Thompson is not very becoming to the Lieutenant-Governor. The Englishman would certainly be delighted to see Mr. Thompson a Viceroy of India, because under his administration no Native would ever get any responsible post. Natives however will not be worse off than at present under such a rule, but England's enemies will be greatly satisfied. Even at present, important appointments are not conferred on Natives, who are only given such posts as are not accepted by Europeans. Government cannot do without Native servants, and therefore what the latter at present get is dealt out to them through sheer helplessness and not as a matter of favour. Under such circumstances even a Branson or a "Britannicus" Viceroy cannot deprive Natives of anything that they enjoy at present. The present administration is carried on solely on the strength of the assistance rendered by educated Natives.

Objects to the policy of demolishing Indian forts the utility of which is not apparent in the present days.

The Arunodayá (14) of the 3rd June refers to the resolution said to have been recently issued by the Government of India regarding the question of the maintenance of the several forts in this country, and says that it is not proper to do away altogether with works the utility of which was recognized by their original constructors but which is not apparent at present. If any expenditure on such works is considered a waste of money it is sufficient to leave them as they are. Such a policy is calculated to soothe the susceptibilities of the public without being prejudicial to the interests of Government. [The Maháráshtrá Mitrá (39) of the 7th June suggests that all the existing forts should be kept in thorough repair. The Nyáyá Sindhu (45) of the 4th June refers to the intended demolition of the fort of Ahmednagar, and says that it is impolitic to hurt the feelings of the public by depriving their city of one of its ornaments and by doing away with one of their monuments of antiquity.]

Approval of the abandonment of Madras time in Bombay and a prayer to Government to reconsider their decision refusing to supply funds for lighting the Rájábái Tower clock.

The Indian Spectator (1) of the 3rd June says:—The vexed question of Madras vs. Bombay time is now happily set at rest, and we congratulate His Excellency the Governor on the promptitude with which he has acted upon the memorial of the Chamber of Commerce. The same body which led him into this error by replying to him in a manner which sounded uncommonly like an approval of the scheme of forcing Madras time on the Bombay public has now come forward and afforded an opportunity to Sir James of retiring from a position which he must have found for some time to be extremely untenable. Now that the controversy is set at rest, we trust the bitterness which attended it will be forgotten and that Government will reconsider their decision refusing to supply funds for lighting the Rájábái Tower clock. It would be a pity if the public, after waiting patiently for it for so many years, were after all to have the benefit of the clock only during daytime. The resolution cancelling the imposition of Madras time will tend to show that our Governor is not as unreasonably obstinate as he is represented to be, and we trust that His Excellency in his turn will show that he is just and even generous by enabling the public to have the benefit of the splendid Tower clock at night. [The Mahrátta (2) of the 3rd, the Gujarát Mitrá (75) of the same date, the Jagan Mitrá (31) of the 4th June, the Vartamán Sár (117) of the 5th and the Deshi Mitrá (90) of the 7th June say that the inconvenience arising from the observance of Madras time is not less felt in the mofussil than in Bombay, and express a wish that the operation of the new resolution abandoning Madras time will soon be extended to the mofussil. The Dnyánodayá (7) of the 7th June approves of the resolution, says that the observance of Madras time has given satisfaction in Ahmednagar, and adds that it will be sorry to have it reversed there. The Lok Mitrá (77) of the 3rd June and the Broach Samáchár (86) of the 7th idem are satisfied with the action of His Excellency the Governor.]

Disapproves of the permission granted by Government to Europeans to play polo on the Esplanade.

The Rást Goftár (108) of the 3rd June does not approve of the recent order of Government permitting Europeans to play polo on the Esplanade near their Gymkhana. It is not known why Government should have so soon changed the view taken by them last year. We ask what necessity is there for Government to drive Natives from the ground that they have been using for cricket for the last 20 years? This simply shows that Government show favour to particular classes of the public of Bombay without cause. The Native cricketers concerned should never leave their ground, but if they are driven out of it they should persistently try to secure justice to their cause. [The Gujaráti (94) of the same date expresses similar sentiments and says that the Governor is wise but his counsellors are not so. The Dátardun (89) of the 7th June advises the Native cricketers to prefer another memorial to Government and to fight for their rights. The Yajdán Parast (120) of the 3rd June on the other hand approves of the Government order and says that it should be ungrudgingly accepted.]

Requests Government to grant batta to the lower officers of the Survey Department.

The Chháva (20) of the 3rd June complains of the inconvenience caused to classers in the Survey Department by their not being allowed batta while travelling on duty and by their being required by their superiors to go out on tour on inconvenient days. These officers draw very low salaries and it is very hard that they should be required to pay for their travelling expenses. Their superiors draw very handsome allowances. Why this distinction? We are compelled to say that the defect that is inherent in us on account of our being conquered is at the bottom of this distinction; and if so, the conclusion is inevitable that though the British Government have abolished the slave trade they have not themselves abandoned the policy of treating others as slaves. It behoves them to leave this practice of making invidious distinctions and to try to put a stop to the various constructions that are being put upon their ways.

Says that speculation on rain ought to be put down.

The Jáme Jamshed (98) of the 6th June complains that rain gambling is carried on at a certain place in the close neighbourhood of the Mumbádevi tank in Bombay. Most of the speculators are inveterate gamblers, while a few only are respectable persons. This speculation has been going on for some years past, and lasts during the four months of the monsoon. It is undoubtedly a ruinous affair to many persons, and the police ought to put it down. Can it do so? asks the Jáme.

Requests Government to consider the claims of Mr. Dádásáheb Ashtekar to a post in the Native Civil Service.

The Dnyán Bodhak (24) of the 3rd June says that the name of Mr. Dádásáheb, son of the late Bápusáheb Ashtekar, a respectable Jághirdár in the Belgaum District, was last year suggested for appointment to the Native Civil Service. The nominee is a competent man and is deserving of any consideration Government may be able to show him. It is to be hoped that Government will take the opportunity of pleasing the whole of the Karnátic by nominating Mr. Dádásáheb to a post in the Native Civil Service.

Approves of the appointment of Surgeon Párakh as Acting Professor of Midwifery in the Grant Medical College.

The Kesari (34) of the 5th June says that the thanks of the public are due to the Government of Bombay for the appointment of Surgeon Párakh as Acting Professor of Midwifery in the Grant Medical College. The writer takes the English dailies of Bombay to task for their adverse comments on this appointment, and says that Sir James Fergusson has in this affair given a proof of the interest he takes in the welfare of the people. May he continue to take the same interest, and may he become more liberal in the matter of conferring the privileges of local self-government on Natives! [The Kaiser-i-Hind (100) of the 3rd June expresses similar sentiments.]

The Arunodayá (14) of the 3rd June says that the satisfactory manner in which Ráo Báhádur Náráyan Bhái Dándekar has acquitted himself in the post of Director of Public Instruction in Berár gives the Native public a right to demand that his successor on his retirement shall be a Native. The writer wishes that a competent Native may be selected for this important post, and expresses a hope that Lord Ripon will meet this wish.

Suggests the appointment of a competent Native as successor to Mr. Náráyan Bhái, Director of Public Instruction in Berár.

A correspondent of the Poona Vaibhav (48) of the 3rd June says that it is inadvisable to allow Ráo Sáheb Shivrám Bápuji, Mámlatdár of Vengurla, to remain at that place any longer. This officer has been serving in this town for the last eight years, and there are many persons who have reason to think that the Ráo Sáheb is not well disposed towards them. Under these circumstances it is necessary that Mr. Shivrám Bápuji should be removed to some other place.

Recommends the removal of Ráo Sáheb Shivrám Bápuji from Vengurla.

The Surat Akhbár (78) of the 4th June points out the present impoverished condition of the Dubrás, Nardás, Dhoriás and other aboriginal tribes of India, and remarks that the improvement of their condition should be the work of Government and the well-to-do public. If the agricultural cess cannot be reduced in the quarters inhabited by them, at any rate it should not be enhanced. As these people have been made more miserable than before by the enactment in this decade of legislative measures like the Mhowra Act, it is really necessary that the rigour of the Forest, Toddy and Salt Acts should be lessened. If the income from salt duty can be compensated for from other sources, the salt duty should be reduced to the rates at which it at first stood. Smuggling in toddy was so common previous to this decade that it was necessary to prevent it, but as it has now very nearly ceased, the retention of the enhanced rates on the drawing of toddy from palm-trees is unjust. If an uniform rate of 12 annas and 8 annas were to be fixed for drawing toddy from palm-trees in cities and villages respectively, and if that rate were observed both in foreign and tributary States, the present income from this source would not suffer, while the poor would be made happy.

Prays for a reduction in the present rates of duty levied on the drawing of toddy from toddy trees.

The Poona Vaibhav (48) of the 3rd June publishes a news letter from a correspondent writing from Patoda in the Násik District complaining of the disturbance created by several gangs of Baluchis appearing there. The Vaibhav says that it is very surprizing that Government take no measures notwithstanding that the outrages committed by these people have assumed terrible proportions. Rumours are rife as to the object of Government in conniving at the malpractices of these gangs. Some say that the British Government have promised to allow these people to carry on rapine and plunder in recognition of the assistance rendered by them during the recent Afghan War. Some are of opinion that the British Government have not a sufficient military force to meet these people. Others suspect that no sooner will the British Government obstruct their course than a number of these people who are waiting for a provocation will flood India and drive out the English. Of course there is no truth in any of these surmises, but how can the people be satisfied of their falsity when the Government have as yet devised no measures to put down these ruffians. The helplessness of the people has been aggravated by their having no arms to defend themselves with from their enemies. Even hares in the woods may be better able to protect themselves than the people of India who have not been left so much power. Relying on the protection of the British Government the people of India have abandoned their arms, and is it manliness to allow them to be tormented by others in such a helpless condition? If Government want to indulge these men there is nothing to be said against it; but if they are unable to protect the people from these lawless gangs, let them give us back our arms and then we will not trouble Government in such trifling matters. If, however, the policy of connivance is allowed to continue, the people will begin to look upon their rulers with strange feelings and will lose the confidence they have in them. It will then be difficult to regain that confidence. We therefore request Government to take preventive measures either for their own good or for that of the people.

Advises Government to take measures against the Baluchi gangs that are creating a disturbance in the mofussil.

Complains of the inconvenience caused to the people of Poona by the absence of a post office in the city empowered to pay money to depositors in the postal savings bank.

The Poona Vaibhav (48) of the 3rd June says that great inconvenience is caused to people by the post office of Poona being at a great distance from the heart of the city. There is a receiving office in the town in connection with the postal savings bank, but people that have to withdraw their deposits are required to go to the general post office in the Camp. It will greatly contribute to the convenience of the people if the postal authorities consider the question of establishing in the city an office having power to receive as well as to pay money.

Complains that its subscribers do not receive their copies of the paper from the Dhundsi, Mugud, Kunkur and Pidad-Hubli post offices.

The Chháva (20) of the 3rd June complains that its subscribers do not receive their copies of the paper from the Dhundsi and Mugud post offices though they are regularly posted. It seems that the rural messengers do not deliver a solitary letter or a packet addressed to persons in villages with the view of avoiding the trouble of going there. A similar complaint has also been made by subscribers from Kunkur and Pidad-Hubli. It is to be hoped that the postal authorities will institute inquiries in the matter.

Says that Government ought to prosecute without further delay the editor of the Englishman newspaper.

The Dnyán Prakásh (8) of the 4th June refers to the discussion in Parliament on the advertisement published by the Englishman intended to vilify Natives, and says :—As regards Mr. Cross's reply to Mr. O'Donnell's question all we can say is that the Government of India will do well to make an example of the Englishman by prosecuting that journal for the scurrilous language it has recently used towards the Natives of the country, so that other journals may be deterred from following in its footsteps. It is not in Bengal alone that the European British-born subject is opposed to the Criminal Procedure Code Amendment Bill. In Bombay and Madras also the Bill has been opposed by the Anglo-Indian or rather the Indo-European community. And yet the race feeling or antagonism between Europeans and Natives has not been so much exasperated either in Bombay or Madras as it is in Bengal, where two hostile camps may be said to have been formed. And why? The reason is not far to seek. The result is solely due to the attitude of the Anglo-Indian press there towards the Natives of the country. The exasperating tone of the Anglo-Indian press in that part of the country has brought matters to such a pass that the two classes may without exaggeration and most aptly be described as being within a measurable distance of a civil war, and if the Government of India do not intervene in time, there is no knowing when that measurable distance will disappear. The Government of Bengal under the Honourable Mr. Rivers Thompson has shown itself incapable of dealing with this state of things in the only manner in which it deserves to be dealt with. Mr. Thompson's incapability has simply made matters worse. Any other strong ruler in his place possessing the necessary tact and skill of an efficient administrator would have by his personal influence preserved the cordial relations between the two classes intact. The Anglo-Indian community could have strongly opposed the Bill in question without bringing about the sad results which we all deplore. Without vilifying Natives and casting unmerited stigma on their national character the opposition to Mr. Ilbert's Bill could have been effectively urged. Accordingly it is difficult to resist the conclusion that the opponents of Mr. Ilbert's Bill have resorted to vilifying Natives and to casting unmerited stigma upon their national character not for any legitimate purpose but out of a mere wanton desire to do mischief. The greatest offenders in this respect are the Englishman, Mr. Branson and "Britannicus," a correspondent of the Englishman. The evil will spread if its growth be not arrested in time.

In the interests of order and peace Government ought to apply the remedy without further delay. [The Gujarát Mitrá (75) of the 3rd June expresses similar sentiments. The Lok Mitrá (77) of the same date expresses similar sentiments, but advises the Native press to abstain from virulent attacks on Anglo-Indian journalists. The Vartamán Sár (117) of the 5th June condemns the offensive tone of the Englishman and asks whether Government will not take notice of it. If a Native writer had behaved in this manner he would have been crushed long ago, but as the writer in this case is an Englishman Government dare not do so lest the wrath of his castemen be roused.]

Says that it is natural that Government should not listen to the prayers of Hindus for a revision of the sentence passed on Bábu Surendranáth Bánerji.

The Karnátá Vritt (122) of the 27th May says:—Memorials have been submitted to the Government of India from all quarters praying for a revision of the sentence passed on Bábu Surendranáth Bánerji, and it is said on the one hand that that Government have called for all the papers in the case, while on the other hand it is asserted that the Supreme Government have declined to interfere in the matter. There is no evidence of the truth of either of these assertions, but judging from the general policy of Government in the matter of memorials the latter appears to be true, and if so the people of India deserve severe censure for again and again representing such matters to Government when they have known that the latter are always unwilling to interfere in such questions in their behalf. Why should Government listen to our prayers? What have we done to deserve such consideration? If the Musalmáns had preferred a similar prayer under similar circumstances Government would have gladly acceded to it. The reason is that Government have full confidence in their assistance in case of necessity. Moreover they are more loyal than Hindus and therefore Government cannot go against them. Hindus cannot pride themselves upon any such accomplishment, and then why should Government care to listen to the cries of such a useless people? Our people deserve blame for their weakness which is the result of education.

Local Self-government.

Disapproval of the new resolution of the Madras Government on the introduction of the scheme of local self-government in that Presidency.

The Indian Spectator (1) of the 3rd June says:—The resolution of the Madras Government on the final report of the committee appointed to consider the scheme of local self-government will, we fear, hardly satisfy the aspirations of our enlightened countrymen in the southern Presidency. The very fact of half a dozen members of that committee having recorded their dissent, some on one point and some on another, shows the divergence of opinion that exists as to the limit of the scope that can be given to Lord Ripon's resolution. Nevertheless, it is not quite clear from these dissents that there is any very great difference on the broad essential points on which the committee were asked to report. Bearing this fact in mind, we are bound to confess to a feeling of disappointment at the tenor of this resolution. There is on the face of it an air of hesitation to give full and free play to Lord Ripon's resolution. This hesitation ill contrasts with the bold and statesmanlike view Mr. Grant Duff expressed last year on the subject. We remarked then that Mr. Grant Duff did not display that extreme timidity, that superfluous "caution" in developing what Sir James Fergusson called in that unhappy September resolution "the radical" policy of the Government of India. But the present resolution of the Madras Government appears to be a mixture of doubt, hesitation and caution. Nay, it appears that the scheme of local self-government is to be carried out in Madras in a "grudging spirit." They are to have an election system and powers to carry on primary and secondary education, to conduct dispensaries and hospitals, and so on, but they are not to be relieved from the overshadowing influence of the Magistrate-Collector save in the most advanced town municipalities here and there. This is grievous. It was hoped that after the very able and comprehensive memorial submitted to the Government by the Madras Native Association, Mr. Grant Duff would inaugurate a more liberal scheme according to his original conception as embodied in his minute of last year. After this elaborate minute and after the hearty manner in which he welcomed Lord Ripon's resolution the present "order" looks quite tame. The Madrásis will, we fear, be in no better position with regard to self-government than the people in this Presidency. Homœopathic doses will never do. We must have liberal doses of self-government. But the official nurses are either too timid or too obstinate. What is to be the remedy?

Comments on the reasons that make non-official commissioners indifferent to the affairs of municipalities.

The Gujarát Mitrá (75) of the 3rd June, referring to the recent resolution of Government reviewing the municipal reports for the Presidency, says that Government have expressed their regret that many of the non-official members of municipalities who did not attend two of the three general meetings in the year were dismissed. The reason assigned for the absence of non-official commissioners is the want of any inducement to attend. There is no reason to suppose that the inducement referred to has anything to do with pecuniary remuneration, while on the contrary there is reason to believe that the non-official commissioners do not care to attend because they are not able to make their presence felt on account of the majority of the members being appointed at the instance of the Collector, who is the president, and also on account of the sometimes high-handed bearing of the latter. Such a state of things serves to bring the commissioners into ill odour with the public, and to lead them to desire for a discontinuance of their connection with the municipality. They therefore instead of resigning their offices resort to the shift of not attending the general meetings of the municipality so that Government may of themselves relieve them of their awkward situation. The upshot of the whole is that Government are obliged to dismiss those whom they selected. Matters have assumed such an aspect on account of the incongruous administration of Government, and still they are not in favour of Lord Ripon's scheme of local self-government. All that Government have hitherto done is that they have conceded the privilege of electing half of the members, and that even in a very dilatory manner. A trial of three years will suffice to show the good results of Lord Ripon's scheme. If, however, Government wish to allow European officers to have their own way at the expense of public funds and to keep the people from interfering in these matters, then they will always be ready to mar the good effects of the Viceregal policy. The Mitrá also gives the particulars of the proceedings of the first meeting of the new municipal board of Surat, in which all the motions of the elected members were thrown out, and says that the expected result has ensued. The Governor General's object has been frustrated and the Governor of Bombay's anticipations in allowing the number of elected members to be less than that of ex-officio and nominated members have been fulfilled!

Says that the newly formed municipal board of Surat does not work satisfactorily.

A correspondent of the Bombay Samáchár (85) of the 5th June observes that the resolutions passed at a recent general meeting of the municipal commissioners of Surat for the consideration of the municipal accounts and budget for the current year are highly disappointing. Ráo Sáheb Mahipatrám Ruprám exerted himself considerably to induce the commissioners to adopt a resolution deprecating the enlargement of the public garden, objecting to the extension of the contract for electric light by five years, and proposing to utilize the money saved thereby for the supply of water. The commissioners elected by the people tried to get the above suggestions adopted by the meeting, but the large number of the Government nominees defeated them by their majority. This shows that so long as the number of Government nominees is sixteen while that of the people's representatives is considerably smaller, the scheme of local self-government will not work satisfactorily. In noticing the above statement the Bombay Samáchár (85) of the 7th June observes that for some time past the people complained against the conduct of the corporation in the matter of the extension of the public garden, the demolition of the city walls and the electric light, and it was expected that the new board formed under the imperial scheme of local self-government would remove the grievances. But the working of the new board has proved disappointing. Expenses incurred without the previous sanction of the corporation have been passed, and large sums have been set apart for works which should have been given up. The city is in sad need of a supply of water, but no provision has been made for it. The chief aim of the imperial scheme of local self-government was that the popular element should preponderate in the municipal board and that a non-official commissioner should be the president; but the desire of the Bombay Government being otherwise, the arrangements made for the constitution of the Surat board were incomplete. The number of the Government members is considerably larger than that of the representatives of the people and the apprehended disappointing result has followed. The Samáchár advises the people not to be discouraged and to bring to the notice of Government the exact state of things. [The Deshi Mitrá (90) of the 7th June, in noticing the proceedings of the general meeting, remarks that if Government nominate only one-third and the people two-thirds of the commissioners in accordance with Lord Ripon's views the new board will work satisfactorily. At the present time municipal management is conducted according to the wishes of the Collector (president) and the official members. It is not that nothing is done for the good of the people, but the demolition of the fort walls, the sanctioning of electric lights and the extension of the park have disappointed the public. The people speak ill of the municipality for these works and do not bless it.]

Education.

Recommends the extension of primary education in the Bombay Presidency.

In noticing the Educational Report of the Bombay Presidency for the year 1881-82, the Jáme Jamshed (98) of the 6th June observes that primary education requires to be still more extended, that the salaries paid to school-masters are inadequate, and that the educational grant is very small. Villagers rightly complain that while the educational tax in the shape of the local fund cess is levied on them, no similar levy is imposed on the residents of cities and towns. It is therefore to be hoped that Government and the municipal corporations will consider this subject when enacting a law for the local self-government scheme. There is much need for the extension of primary education in the city of Bombay, and due provision should be made for the same. The private middle class schools may be utilized by admitting them to the benefits of the grant-in-aid system.

Says that the people of Mahudha should not be required to pay the whole of the expenditure of the English school established there.

A correspondent of the Gujarát Mitrá (75) of the 3rd June, writing from Mahudha, says that the educational authorities have informed the people of that place that unless they are able to contribute to the extent of the whole expenditure required for the English school the school will not be kept up. The school was originally started on the understanding that the people should among themselves contribute Rs. 15 towards its maintenance. The majority of the population of this place are poor Musalmáns, and it is very hard that they should be required to bear the whole expenditure of the school. It is to be hoped that the educational authorities will see fit to modify their order.

Railways.

Prays the Government of India to take due notice of the opposition raised by the people of Hyderabad to the Chanda Railway scheme.

In noticing the statement put forth on behalf of the Hyderabad Regency in defence of their action in the matter of the Chanda Railway, the Bombay Chronicle (74) of the 3rd June observes that it does not appear quite clear as yet that the opposition to the railway scheme has not been a genuine popular movement. The absolute necessity for the British Government sanctioning this work, which entails an enormous outlay, while the ruler is but a minor, has not as yet been made clear; nor is the expediency of inflicting in the face of the strong popular opposition an annual drain of thirty lákhs of rupees upon the exchequer of the State, which is by no means in a flourishing condition, satisfactorily demonstrated. The contention of the Hyderabad nobles and others that if the railway is to be made after all the work should be carried out with Native capital, and the objections to the grant of valuable concessions to a foreign company, deserve to be duly weighed by the Paramount Government. If there be any wisdom in allowing indigenous ways to have free play in the work of regenerating the country, surely it cannot consist in the Paramount Government quietly allowing arbitrary and harsh treatment of public officials for the offence of exercising their natural rights of freedom of thought and speech, but in letting the spontaneous action of the people run into its natural groove and patiently waiting for the result. It is to be hoped that the Government of Lord Ripon will in this as in all similar matters adopt that cautious and modest policy which has secured to them the confidence of the Natives in the British and Native territories as generous and considerate rulers. [The Jáme Jamshed (98) of the 6th June advises the people of Hyderabad to withdraw from their opposition, and advises Government to restore Dr. Aghornath and Dastur Hushang to their proper places.]

Disapproves of the conduct of the British Government in regard to the Chanda Railway scheme.

The Shiváji (60) of the 1st June observes that the Chanda Railway scheme was put forward by the British Government as a check-mate to Sir Sálar Jung's demand for the restoration of Berár to the Nizam's Government. The question about Berár was deferred until the attainment of majority by the young Nizám, and the late Diwán postponed the railway scheme until that event, and it was therefore not revived during his lifetime. His death has given the British Government an opportunity of bringing it forward once more. The members of the Hyderabad Regency are not on good terms with each other, and everyone of them is striving to secure his position by not going against the wishes of the officer who appointed him to the Regency. This state of things has tempted the British Government to try to secure their object. Explicit orders have not been issued to the Hyderabad authorities to give the guarantee, which however they are willing to give for their own selfish ends. Even the British Government have a doubt as to the State being able to save thirty lákhs of rupees to meet the guarantee, and ask for the transfer of the Gulburga and Aurungabad districts to meet the charge. Thus these districts are likely to be in the position in which Berár is. The revenues of the Hyderabad State amount to three krors of rupees and the expenditure comes nearly to the same figure, and hence there is no hope of its being able to save thirty lákhs of rupees annually. The crafty expedient resorted to by the British Government will deprive the Hyderabad State of its two districts and will lessen its territorial extent. This scheme is a kind of repetition of Lord Dalhousie's annexation policy. It ill becomes the professed liberal policy of Lord Ripon. If the British Government are resolved to put the burden of the Chanda Railway on the Nizam's Government, Berár should be first restored. In short, the conduct of His Lordship in this matter is most reprehensible. The Shiváji advises their Highnesses Scindia and Holkar and other big Chiefs to communicate their sentiments on the subject to the Supreme Government in order that similar injustice may not be done to any of them.

Complains of the want of a platform to the Udváda Station of the B. B. & C. I. Railway.

The Surat Akhbár (78) of the 4th June complains of the want of a platform to the Udváda Station of the B. B. & C. I. Railway, and says that as trains stop there for a very short time females and children meet with accidents in alighting from carriages. As Udváda is a place of Pársi pilgrimage, the major portion of those who go there consists of old men, females and convalescent persons. If the station were pucca built, the income to the Railway Company would greatly increase, a well constructed road would follow, and great convenience would be secured to merchants.

Municipalities.

Requests the attention of the Corporation to the question whether the costs in the case of Mulibái vs. the Municipal Commissioner of Bombay can be justly paid by the municipality.

The Gujaráti (94) of the 3rd June gives the particulars of a case recently decided by the High Court in which one Mulibái filed a suit against the municipality of Bombay for the recovery of a sum of Rs. 501 on account of damage caused to her property by an illegal order of the municipal authorities, and requests the attention of the Corporation to the remarks of the Acting Chief Justice on the irregular conduct of municipal officers. The costs of the suit on both the sides are calculated at Rs. 24,000, and it is the duty of the Corporation to consider whether that amount should be paid from the municipal funds when the Municipal Commissioner without the sanction of the Town Council involved himself in an expensive suit and also caused unnecessary annoyance to others.

Advises energetic suppression of the offence of feeding milch cows and buffaloes on horse dung extensively perpetrated in Bombay.

The Bombay Samáchár (85) of the 9th June observes that the evil practice of regularly feeding milch cows and buffaloes on horse dung alone or mixed with some grain chaff extensively prevails in Bombay and ought in the interests of public health to be put down vigorously. The municipal law provides punishment for this offence, but only two or three persons are punished in a single year. The municipality and the police ought therefore to make sufficiently energetic exertions to detect and get punished most of the offenders so that the crime may within a short time disappear altogether.

Alleges improper conduct on the part of an employé of the municipality of Bombay.

The Jáme Jamshed (98) of the 9th June observes that it is stated that a police officer of the mofussil who has been employed as a superintendent in the newly organized assessment department of the Bombay Municipality put on a few days ago his police uniform and his sword and visited the house of a Pársi gentleman in Girgaum. While he was there he created a disturbance. The owner of the house seeing this told him to walk out of the house as a municipal officer had no right to appear in a police dress and to act as he did. The Parsi gentleman is said to have reported the matter next day to the municipality, but nothing is yet known as to the result of the complaint. If the above report be false the Jáme will be glad to contradict it, but if on the other hand it be true, due notice ought to be taken of the conduct of the municipal officer in order to deter other municipal employés from misconducting themselves.

Complains that the employés in some departments of the Bombay Municipal Office are overworked.

The Jáme Jamshed (98) of the 5th June observes that in consequence of new arrangements made in several departments of the Municipal Office in Bombay the subordinates of those departments, particularly those of the assessment branch, have to perform such heavy work that it must tell heavily on their health. Some employés of the last-named department are required to leave their homes at 6 in the morning and visit distant parts of the town to enquire into the rents paid by tenants to their respective landlords, to recover bills and to enquire into taxes levied on horses and carriages. These subordinates must then attend the office to submit reports of their work, and leave it often so late as 8 o'clock in the evening. The subordinates of the wheel-tax department are sometimes detained in office till 10 at night. It is said that a few months ago a subordinate who was employed on out-door duty fainted from overwork and since then he has been employed on in-door work. A few days ago the new accountant of the assessment department sent in his resignation to the Municipal Commissioner as he could not do his heavy work, but the latter did not accept it and gave him a few more subordinates. The work of some departments has grown so heavy that their employés are said to be sometimes made to work on Sundays, and these departments were kept open on the last Queen's birthday. It is therefore to be hoped that the Town Council and the Corporation will take due notice of these grievances and remove them by employing, if necessary, a sufficient number of new hands.

Suggests the filling up of certain pits on the Dongri road.

The Satyá Prakásh (54) of the 6th June represents the danger of leaving open large pits on the Dongri road. These pits were dug some time before in connection with certain water works, and an accident lately happened to a child by a fall in one of these pits. It is dangerous to allow such pit-falls to remain unfilled for a year or six months, and it is the duty of the municipality to direct its attention to the matter. Now that the rains have set in there is great likelihood of accidents to passengers by this road.

The Shivájí (60) of the 1st June disapproves of the scheme for a new underground drain for Poona which will shortly be placed before the municipal corporation of that city. The proposed drain is intended to carry away not only the waste water but the night-soil also. There are several objections to this scheme. The existing underground drain has been working satisfactorily, while the proposed drain will not, it is feared, work satisfactorily because wherever similar sewers exist there the complaint about their failure is heard. The scheme is a costly affair, the burden of which the people of Poona are too poor to bear. The corporation ought not therefore to accept the proposals.

Disapproves of the scheme of a new underground drain for the city of Poona.

The Poona Vaibhav (48) of the 3rd June complains of the impure nature of the water running in the pipes in Poona. If the filters are out of order their repair is more urgently demanded than the construction of a market. It is very likely that impure water will bring on cholera. It is to be hoped that the new municipal commissioners will take this work in hand in preference to the more costly scheme of drainage.

Complains of the impurity of pipe water in Poona.

Native States.

The Native Opinion (10) of the 3rd June discusses the question whether the Native States of India have been allowed by the British Government to exist as a matter of necessity or favour. History shows that it is the former and not the latter. Scindia's territory was restored to him by the British Government with the intention of securing his assistance. Though Dowlatráo Scindia was four times defeated by the British, still the latter tried to make friendship with him lest he in conjunction with Yashwantráo Holkar might drive them out of India. The same policy was adopted in the case of Holkar. As for Hyderabad, the British were the servants of that State from the beginning. As for Rájputána and Baroda, the English being their servants it was improper to make war with them. It is thus clear that all the Native States that exist at present were maintained through fear and not through kindness. A perusal of Sir John Kaye's history will serve to show how far the British Government would have been able to maintain their dominion in the East during the crisis of 1857 had it not been for the assistance rendered by the Native States in the country; and how would it look to say that these States were allowed to remain as a matter of favour? Nearly twenty years have elapsed since that critical time, and the policy of interference in the administration of Native States has again begun to make its appearance in the case of Jeypur, Mysore, &c. Such a policy, however, must be said to have its origin in ignorance and want of foresight. The Hindu nation with all their ignorance, superstition and old unmeaning manners and customs are peculiarly gifted with loyalty to their rulers, and with all their sectarian differences they are one as Hindus. It is therefore not just to throw dust into the eyes of the people and to gradually degrade their rulers, as has been done in the cases of Mysore and Jeypur. It is to be hoped therefore that the British Government will abandon the policy of interference pursued by them. The Native States should also watch with care the maintenance of the rights and privileges secured to them by particular treaties and engagements. To enable these States to discharge this duty it is necessary that they should be allowed to correspond with each other on the subject of their rights. The distress of one should be shared by all. It is in the interests of Government that knowledge should spread among these States, and that a feeling of unity should be developed as far as possible. If the British Government have any desire to take credit for far-sightedness they should make the States of Scindia, Holkar, Gáekwád, Nizám and others independent, and on the analogy of German States should permit them to train and improve their armies. In times of war these armies should be placed under the command of Native warriors and sent to fight for the British. Natives will thus be given an opportunity of showing their usefulness and will remain highly contented with the British rule. Then Russia—nay, the whole of Europe,— will not be able to wage a successful war with England. The loyalty of Native States was fully tried in the days of the mutiny, and it is therefore to be hoped that the British Government will instead of interfering with their rights try to make them independent and thus secure their own good as also that of India.

Says that the British Government have maintained Native States as a necessity and not as a favour, and advises Government not to interfere with their rights and privileges.

The Samsher Báhddur (109) of the 1st June observes that the small weight attached by Government to the complaints of the people of Junágad, Cambay, Dhrángadra, Gondal, and Vádásinor against their respective rulers and the indifferent justice dealt out to them are fresh in the public mind and lead to various inferences. When Government are cognizant of their depressed condition and of the great oppression suffered by the subjects of Native States, it is not good that they should not listen to their complaints. The plea of non-interference with the action of independent Native States is false. It is necessary that Government should interfere and put a stop to the oppression exercised by them. But the policy of digging a well after a fire has actually begun cannot be approved. It behoves Government to reconsider their policy with regard to the Junágad State and to take notice of the conduct of the Political Agent in keeping them in ignorance of the affairs there.

Says that the British Government ought to interfere and deal out justice to the oppressed subjects of Native States.

With reference to the donation of Rs. 10,000 made by the Nawáb of Junágad for distribution among the families of the Native soldiers killed in the Egyptian Campaign, the Jáme Jamshed (98) of the 8th June observes that this grant is a good help to the bereaved families, but it is to be regretted that the Nawáb has made no provision whatever for the widows and orphans of the innocent Maiyás massacred by his police. The donation therefore appears to have been made more for pleasing the British Government than as a charity, which ought to begin at home if it is to be sincerely made. This subject raises the question, why should public subscriptions be raised or donations received from Native Chiefs in aid of the widows and orphans of soldiers killed in battle, and why should not Government make due provision for them? It is well known that the Native soldiers receive such small pay as to be scarcely able to save any money for their families and children. Moreover, the grant of a pension of Rs. 2½ per month sanctioned by military laws for the widow of a soldier killed on the battle-field is quite inadequate for the maintenance of the widow and her children. Under these circumstances the best course appears to be that the monthly pay of a Native soldier should be increased by two rupees, one rupee being deducted as a contribution to the pension fund, which should go to make due provision, say Rs. 5, for the widows of soldiers killed in battle or dying in indigent circumstances. If the suggested arrangement is made it will redound greatly to the credit of Government and will induce numerous persons to enter the military service and fight the battles of their country with great courage and zeal.

Censures the Nawáb of Junágad for making no provision for the widows and orphans of the massacred Maiyás and observes at the same time that the pension paid by the British Government to widows of Native soldiers killed in battle should be increased to Rs. 5 per month.

Berár Affairs.

The Varhád Samáchár (67) of the 4th June observes that the subjects of the higher and lower standard examinations in which Extra Assistant Commissioners, Assistant Commissioners, Deputy Commissioners and others are required to pass before they are invested with certain powers are not sufficiently varied to enable those officers to discharge their duties satisfactorily. These officers ought to possess a sufficient knowledge of the Indian Contract Act, the Hindu and the Mahomedan Laws, Equity Jurisprudence and some other laws, but their study is not required by the present higher and lower standard examination rules. It is desirable therefore that the necessary alterations should be made in those rules, or if necessary these officers should be subjected to the same examination as the candidates for vakilship are made to pass.

Says that the subjects of the higher and lower standard examinations in Berár need to be increased.

Notes.—A. The notices from the different Newspapers have been collected in the Report under different heads, which are printed in italics.

B. The names of Newspapers are printed in the body of the Report in italics, and the number of the Newspaper in the above list is printed in brackets after the name.

C. The proprietors of the Newspapers marked * have not given information as to the number of copies issued. In these cases an estimate has been made by the Reporter.

D. The system of spelling vernacular words followed by the Reporter is the same as that adopted in the Official Spelling List of the Bombay Presidency. One peculiar feature of this system is that when the long a (आ or ा) is the last letter of a word, the accent is left out, and the short a (अ = u in gun) is, to prevent confusion, never placed at the end of a word. This rule has been strictly followed, except that when the short a appears to be absolutely necessary to complete the pronunciation of a word, as in Arunodaya or the well known Mitra, it is printed with a mark over it to indicate that it is short, thus—ă.

E. Berár papers are received in this office for report under the Resolution of the Government of Bombay in the General Department, No. 1795, dated 8th June 1881.

Politics and the Public Administration.

In noticing the debate on Mr. Stanhope's motion in Parliament on the subject of reductions in Indian expenditure, the Lok Mitrá (77) of the 10th June observes:—For years past well-informed and observant persons have been directing the attention of the authorities to the steadily increasing burden of the administrative expenditure in this country, and to the hardship entailed on the people by the imposition of fresh taxes to meet such expenditure, but hitherto very little seems to have been done in this direction. The ingenuity of the authorities seems to have been directed towards inventing fresh sources of income with the object of demonstrating the so-called elasticity of the country's revenues. We have already pointed out that this supposed elasticity is a delusion, and that almost any unforeseen contingency may upset all calculations. A certain class of writers however are never tired of placing before us an imposing array of figures and of complacently arguing therefrom that the country was never before so thriving and contented, and this in the face of the general cry of the growing poverty of the country. It is gratifying to find, however, that this important subject has at last attracted the attention of Parliament, and though it may be doubted whether any substantial and immediate good will result from such discussion as that which Mr. Stanhope's motion elicited, it may be hoped that increased attention to, and interest in, this matter will in the future be productive of some good. The speakers who took part in the recent discussion seemed to entertain different opinions as to the causes of the increase in expenditure, but this difference of opinion is not material to the subject. The fact of increased expenditure and the necessity of taking prompt and adequate measures for reducing it still remain. The appointment of a Commission of Inquiry may lead to some good, but the adoption of measures must cause considerable delay. In the meantime it will strike most persons that judicious retrenchments, the gradual substitution of Native for the costly Foreign agency in the different departments of the public service, the development of local resources, and the encouragement of local industries and enterprise are the most efficient means for reducing the expenditure of the country on the one hand, and of consolidating British power and influence on the other. But we have had painful experience of the short-sightedness, bigotry, and selfishness of certain classes of Anglo-Indians, and unless and until the greatest determination and energy are shown in putting them down, it is hopeless to expect that any such remedial measures as above pointed out will be adopted. [The Shiváji (60) of the 8th June is sorry that very few members were present at the discussion in Parliament on the subject of reductions in public expenditure. This shows that the English people are not very anxious to secure the welfare of this country.]

Points out the desirability of curtailing the administrative expenditure in India.

After expressing hearty thanks to Mr. O'Donnell for frequently bringing Indian questions before the House of Commons, the Bombay Samáchár (85) of the 13th June observes that on the 21st May Mr. O'Donnell asked four questions on different Indian subjects to the Under Secretary of State for India and the latter replied that he had received no official information about them. Though the questions relate to ordinary occurrences, yet they deserve the serious attention of the authorities in England, and hence Mr. Cross's ignorance about them cannot be regarded as satisfactory. The Indian authorities are, no doubt, competent to dispose of the questions raised by Mr. O'Donnell; however, the Secretary of State ought to make arrangements to make himself acquainted with the complaints made to the different administrations, the redress given by them to the aggrieved parties and the spirit in which the decision of the local authorities is received by the public.

Thanks Mr. O'Donnell for frequently bringing Indian questions before Parliament.

In noticing the scathing rebuke administered by the premier to Mr. Ashmead Bartlett for his attack on the Indian policy of Lord Ripon, the Bombay Chronicle (74) of the 10th June observes that Mr. Gladstone rightly remarked that Lord Ripon had written his name on the hearts of the people. The eulogy passed by him on the Viceroy will be most cordially endorsed by Thanks Mr. Gladstone for making a proper defence of Lord Ripon's Indian policy against the attack of Mr. Ashmead Bartlett.

every intelligent Native of India. It will be received throughout the length and breadth of the land with rounds of applause, and the representative public organs will vie with each other in thanking the premier for the manner in which he has defended their true friend and benefactor—the Marquis of Ripon. [Several other Maráthi and Gujaráti papers express similar sentiments.]

Advises the Home Government to sanction the introduction of the local self-government scheme and the Native Magistrates' Jurisdiction Bill as tentative measures.

The Indu Prakásh (9) of the 11th June is sorry that the two principal reforms for which the administration of Lord Ripon has become known, viz., the local self-government scheme and the Native Magistrates' Jurisdiction Bill, are in a state of jeopardy. It is a matter of regret that the Secretary of State for India with his Council of Indian experts should be against these reforms. The India Office is maintained at a great cost to the people of India and the object of its maintenance cannot certainly be that its members should veto such measures. The Secretary of State is as much bound to the Queen Empress as to the people of India, and it is his duty to secure the welfare of the latter. Moreover, Her Majesty the Queen has several times pledged her word that Her Government will try to do good to this country and it is the duty of the Secretary to redeem the pledge. Under these circumstances and having regard to the warm advocacy of statesmen like Lords Mayo and Ripon, the policy or the propriety of objecting to the measures above referred to or of mutilating them to such a degree that their utility is marred, is beyond what the Indu can comprehend. If the Secretary of State is only useful in coming in the way of the welfare of the people it is better that his post should be altogether abolished. The present is a very fine opportunity for Her Majesty's Government to evince their desire to do good to the people of this country. If, however, they entertain any doubts as to the practicability of the measures introduced by Lord Ripon they cannot do better than extend the term of His Lordship's tenure of office and give a sufficiently long trial to the reforms inaugurated by him. But if they are determined upon not allowing these reforms to be introduced, they will do well to make a clean breast of the affair and thus relieve the people of this country from the vexation which has been caused by the present state of suspense. The people of India are peculiarly gifted with the virtue of loyalty, and they have by their peaceful behaviour deserved the confidence of their rulers. It is therefore too much to apprehend that if they are allowed certain privileges as a matter of trial they will not relinquish them if they prove unworthy of them. We therefore suggest that the Home Government should, notwithstanding the opposition of Lord Kimberley, sanction as tentative the two measures of reform proposed to be introduced by the present administration, and if the people are found wanting, the same may be withdrawn. But it is not proper that they should adopt a line of policy at once opposed to morality and goodness merely on the strength of apprehensions that are not well-founded.

Expresses regret at the loss of Sir Louis Mallet to the India Council.

The Indian Spectator (1) of the 10th June observes:—It is sad to see that India should have to lose at this juncture the services, either on account of resignation or ill-health, of some of her genuine and most valued friends. There is Major Baring going away, and him may, perhaps, soon follow our "truly great" Viceroy, the like of whom it may not be the fortune of this country to meet again for some years. And now it is grievous to hear of the resignation of Sir Louis Mallet, a gentleman in full accord and sympathy with the reasonable hopes and aspirations of the rising Indians. May his successor turn out an equally sympathetic friend of India! There is satisfaction in the fact that the new permanent Under Secretary of State is an excellent disciple of Mr. Gladstone.

Gives the causes of the enthusiasm displayed by the Natives of India on the appointment of the Duke of Connaught to a command in the Indian Army.

The same observes:—The Native community seems to be very enthusiastic about the Duke of Connaught's coming out to India. This feeling may be explained as proceeding from the vanity of the people. Not so, however, is the fact. The intelligent Native knows that the presence of one in the Royal Duke's position will be in itself a moral gain to India. His Royal Highness will be able to study the country at leisure and from a vantage ground such as few others can hope to enjoy. He will be able to judge for himself of the political disabilities of educated Natives and to ascertain the causes which keep Natives and Europeans apart and thus retard the true progress of the country. The judgment of such an unbiassed observer will be of inestimable value. Socially, too, the presence of royalty will be beneficial to India.

Regrets the transfer of Major Baring's services to Egypt.

In noticing the transfer of Major Baring to Egypt the Shivájí (60) of the 8th June recounts the valuable services rendered by the Finance Minister to the country during the short term of his office, and laments over the event as a great loss to India. The Premier is found fault with for inflicting this loss, and is requested to appoint an able successor to Major Baring. [The Samsher Báhádur (109) of the 8th June also considers Major Baring's transfer to Egypt as a loss to India and advises the Natives to show their gratefulness by presenting him with valedictory addresses on his departure from the country. Mr. Hope is well versed in revenue matters and in practising economy, but the side taken by him in the well-known Jalálpor case and in other Government matters has disappointed the people. It remains to be seen whether he will not sometimes yield to the wishes of Government after his appointment as Finance Minister of India. The Gujarát Mitrá (75) of the 10th June says that Mr. Hope will be a competent successor to Major Baring. The Lok Mitrá (77) of the same date says that unless Government make as happy a selection outside of India as that of Major Baring they cannot do better than avail themselves of the services of Mr. Hope.]

Comments in connection with the recent Resolution of the Government of India reviewing the operations of the Indian Telegraph Department and a prayer to Government to reduce railway fares.

The Indian Spectator (1) of the 10th June, in noticing the recent Resolution of the Government of India reviewing the operations of the Indian Telegraph Department for the year 1881-82, remarks:—It is satisfactory to note that the reduction made in the inland telegraph tariff since 1st January 1882 has proved beneficial to the State and the public alike. It was anticipated that the loss in revenue from lower rates would be almost wholly compensated by a greater number of private messages. The great success that has attended the introduction of post cards into the country ought to justify the supreme Government in boldly making experiments in telegraphic messages. An ordinary message of twelve words for a rupee will, we are sure, not only stimulate greater traffic but pour into the State Treasury a revenue that may rejoice the Director General of Telegraphs. Such increased receipts will, in a measure, encourage Government to lay down telegraph wires in still remoter regions where this necessary adjunct of the civilization of the 19th century may be unknown. It is also satisfactory to note that the new offices opened during the year have been managed most economically. There is yet ample room for further development of postal and telegraphic receipts, a development which, if properly stimulated, is sure to be beneficial to the public and the State. The useful lesson derived from the reduction in the tariff rates of inland messages ought to open the eyes of Government to the eminent advisability of a reduction of railway fares and rates. No effort should be spared to get these cheapened. We have repeatedly urged the expediency of this reduction and trust that before long the Government of India will be successful in this direction also. Let Government set an excellent example on their own railways, and there is every probability of the powerful guaranteed companies following it. The rates of these companies are indeed very heavy compared with those prevalent in Europe and the United States. But it is a somewhat difficult task to coerce these Indian monopolists to make the slightest reduction in their goods and passenger rates. Competition could have ere long broken the monopoly, but unfortunately real competition is nowhere; and if at all, it is of the weakest. Again, Government regulate the passenger and goods tariff on their own railways on fallacious and even unbusinesslike principles,—principles against which the Local Chamber of Commerce has had so often to remonstrate in terms not to be mistaken, and it is no wonder that the railway monopolists rigidly stick to a very highly graduated tariff.

Speaks highly of Mr. Justice Norris as a gentleman and a Judge.

The Akhbáre Sodágar (81) of the 12th June states on the authority of a well-known respectable Native gentleman who recently visited Calcutta that Justice Norris, though very young, possesses all the qualities of a liberal-hearted and straightforward Englishman. He shows great respect to a Court of Justice and is anxious to see that it is not made light of. He is ever pleased to show due respect to deserving Natives and does not appear to treat them with disrespect by making a wrong use of his high position. He knows well how to treat the parties and witnesses coming before him. In short, his conduct is exemplary. The Bábus of Bengal who have raised an out-cry against him appear to be misguided, having formed a hasty estimate of him.

Disapproves of the intention of the Madras Government to abolish the higher classes in the Civil Engineering College of that Presidency.

With reference to the opinion expressed by the Secretary to the Madras Government in the Public Works Department against the maintenance of the higher classes in the Madras Civil Engineering College, said to be based on a despatch from the Secretary of State for India, the Bombay Chronicle (74) of the 10th June observes that nothing can be more detrimental to the advance of Natives in the way of local self-government than an abridgment of the facilities already afforded them for acquiring scientific or technical knowledge. To close the doors of such instruction and at the same time to tell the people to learn to be able to conduct the public affairs of their country is equivalent to enacting a ridiculous comedy in which their Excellencies the Viceroy and the Governor of Madras should, for the sake of their good names, take no part whatever. The people of Madras must not hesitate to impress on their rulers the claims of intelligent Natives to a share of the benefits of the appointments in the higher grades of the public service now almost exclusively monopolized by Europeans, and should try to induce them not to withhold from them any legitimate facilities for qualifying themselves for the enjoyment of such a share.

Points out some defects in he Sind Encumbered Estates Act and condemns the enactment of Encumbered Estates Acts generally.

The Indian Spectator (1) of the 10th June, in an article headed "The Sind Encumbered Estates Act," says:—It appears from the Sind Official Gazette that the management of numerous estates taken up under Act XIV. of 1876, within six months of its passing, has been lately relinquished. Under Act XIV. of 1876, as well as under Act XX. of 1881, the management cannot be relinquished after a liquidation scheme has been sanctioned. It follows, therefore, that for more than five years no liquidation scheme was sanctioned for any of the estates lately relinquished. This is a very significant fact and calls for immediate notice. So far as our information goes, the management is relinquished generally, if not invariably, on the ground that there is no way of making two ends meet, that the Zamindár's property is not sufficient to pay the cost of management, the cost of cultivation, the cost of canal clearance, and the land revenue. If the manager be called upon to specify his reasons for relinquishing the management in so many cases, we feel sure that our explanation will be borne out. There is no magic in Government management. It is opposed to all human experience that a stranger should carry on the management of an estate more economically and beneficially than the land-holder himself. And yet this is the central principle of all Encumbered Estates Acts. A paternal Government comes forward to relieve the indebted Zamindárs, Jagirdárs or Tálukdárs of the trouble of managing their own concerns, but when, after five or six years, it finds that the estate is getting hopelessly bad, that the land revenue is heavily in arrears, that the cost of management alone amounts to a good round figure, it calls upon its protegé to take back his estate, to pay the outstandings and the proved debts, and in default to suffer his moveable and immoveable property to be sold and himself to be cast in a prison. This is not in the least an exaggerated account of the working of the Act. Is the Act passed for the relief of insolvent Zamindárs? If it is, then insolvency should be no reason for relinquishing the management of an incumbered estate. If, however, insolvency is a good reason, then surely the Act offers no relief to insolvent Zamindárs. We notice that Act VI. of 1876 (The Chota Nágpur Encumbered Estates Act), upon the lines of which the Sind and Broach and Kaira Encumbered Estates Acts of 1876 seem to have been drawn up, contains a provision bearing on this subject, which is conspicuous by its absence in these latter Acts. Section 12 provides for the restoration to the owner of his property "when all such debts or liabilities have been discharged, or if within six months after the publication of the order mentioned in Section 2 (i.e., the vesting order corresponding with the order of management), the Commissioner thinks that the provisions of this Act should not continue to apply to the case of the holder of the said property or his heir." This provision is undoubtedly defective, as it does not specify the grounds on which the Commissioner should base his action; but so far as it goes, it is a thousand times better than those in the later statutes, which prescribe no limit of time at all for relinquishing the management. The proviso which they contain, that no management should be relinquished after a liquidation scheme is sanctioned, does not afford the requisite safeguard, as a liquidation scheme may not be framed or sanctioned for half a decade, or for the matter of that, for a whole decade. We, therefore, strongly urge that, if the Act be not repealed, it should, at any rate, be amended in this respect. The latest Relief Act passed by the Supreme Government, viz., "The Jhansi Encumbered Estates Act," and perhaps the earliest Act of this kind passed by the Bombay Government, Bombay Act VI. of 1862, do not contain any provision about the relinquishment of management. Indeed the Jhansi Encumbered Estates Act does not contemplate any Government management at all. Unlike Act XIV. of 1876 and Act XX. of 1881, it leaves as few rules as possible to be framed by the Local Government. Though not perfect in all its details, this Act has the merit of looking facts in the face and providing an adequate remedy. The Encumbered Estates Acts in force in this Presidency remedy the cost and delay of legal proceedings before the ordinary tribunals by providing a simpler but more arbitrary procedure, and by giving up the Court-fees leviable on plaints, appeals and processes. We think that if in all indebted districts the same sacrifice of Court-fees were made and Insolvency Courts on the model of the Jhansi Court established, the anomaly we have pointed out would cease to exist, and the Encumbered Estates Acts, which after all are no more than makeshifts, would be no longer required. As it is, these Acts are indefensible from every point of view. They are indefensible from an economical standpoint, because they violate the very first principles of free trade, of production and distribution, and because they ignore the facts that an owner feels a more vital and immediate interest in his property than a paid manager howsoever well-disposed, that increased cultivation and increased profits are to be expected from strengthening this interest and not from reducing it to a minimum, that the triumph of capital in modern society is the most natural thing in the world, and that the transfer of land from extravagant, uneducated, semi-barbarous Zamindárs to thrifty capitalists is the inevitable sequence of this triumph. They are indefensible from a political point of view, because they are founded upon a principle of inequality, because they allow relief to some while denying it to others, because they teach the people to depend upon Government as a sort of deus ex machinâ for extricating them at all times from all unpleasant embarrassments caused by their own imprudence and folly, and because such teaching is apt to produce expectations which, if disappointed on any future occasion, are sure to produce much more disaffection—not to say disloyalty—than would have been caused if no such Relief Acts had been passed. They are judicially indefensible, because they set at naught the law of free contract and the principle that legislation should never be retrospective, and because they curtail the jurisdiction of the ordinary Courts. And lastly, they are sociologically and morally indefensible, because they oppose the survival of the fittest and the law of self-help, and because they authorize and perpetrate a breach of faith with impunity.

Suggests a reduction in the rates of commission charged for Money Orders.

The Satyá Shodhak (56) of the 10th June says that the Postal Money Order business does not appear to receive as much support as it deserves from merchants and traders on account of the rate of commission charged on a hundred rupees being as high as Re. 1. This rate is felt by the mercantile public as rather heavy. If the rate be reduced to 8 annas per hundred rupees many merchants will come forward to take advantage of the Money Order system and Government will be gainers to a very great extent.

Advises Government to afford greater facilities to the people for pasturing their cattle.

The Prabodh Chandrika (50) of the 11th June complains of the inconvenience arising from pasture-lands having been absorbed in agricultural and forest lands. Agricultural profession has of late received a stimulus on account of the depressed condition of other occupations, and this has led to a diminution in waste lands. The recent policy of Government regarding forest conservancy has also its share in bringing about the above result. Of course a policy of forest conservancy is justifiable to a moderate extent, but any stretch of that policy calculated to cause oppression on the people is unnecessary. It is not that every inch of the ground closed by Government as their reserved and protected forests is occupied by valuable timber trees. Much of it is covered by grass, and if Government open such plots to the public for pasturing purposes much good will be done to the people without entailing any loss on Government. Such grass is not a source of appreciable income to Government. On the contrary it sometimes assists in producing fires, which destroy the jungles and thus inflict a serious loss on the State. The injury caused to the people by such a stringent policy is very great in proportion to the gain resulting to Government. Agricultural stock has not increased in proportion to the extension of cultivation. It has on the contrary diminished to the serious prejudice of the agricultural profession.

Points out the wretched condition of the Indian rayat.

The Samsher Báhádur (109) of the 8th June says that the condition of the rayats is miserable. The fruits of their labour are enjoyed by the money-lender and Government. The causes of their distressed state are that Government look to their own interests and not to those of the rayats. Government and well-do-to people merely speak of improving and encouraging agriculture, but do nothing for it. Agriculture is considered the meanest of occupations. Government only care for surveying the land and enhancing the tax on it without any regard to the condition of the rayats. The justice dealt out to the rayats by Government is not impartial, for the Judge himself is one of the parties. In civil cases the dispenser of justice is a third party, but such is not the case with revenue matters. The ignorance in which the rayats are steeped and the injury done to the crops by stray cattle add to their misery. They also suffer at the hands of the village officers.

Recommends the extension of fisheries in this country.

In noticing the observation made by his Royal Highness the Prince of Wales at the opening of the Piscatorial Exhibition now being held in London, that as a source of the supply of human food the products of sea require as much attention as the crops raised on land, the Bombay Samáchár (85) of the 11th June observes that it is well known that India suffers from an insufficiency of food-supply. In times of plenty the poor people get half a meal, while in years of scarcity, which frequently recur, they die in large numbers for want of food. The fishing business is carried on on such a small scale that fish is used more as a condiment than as a main article of human food. It is desirable therefore that Government and the people should try to develop fisheries on such a large scale that the poor people may be supplied with fresh as well as dried fish in large quantities forming a substantial supplement to their present daily meals.

Says that the measures adopted by Government for the destruction of locusts are ridiculous, and advises Government to grant remissions of land revenue.

The Kalpataru (32) of the 10th June says that the measures that are being adopted by Government for the destruction of locusts are simply ridiculous. The only way in which Government can afford relief to the distressed population is to grant remissions of revenue. It is however a matter of regret that Government are trying to keep this remedy as distant as possible. [The Chandrodaya (121) of the 2nd June says that the locust plague has been doing great mischief in the Chiplun Táluka and advises Government to send the curtains that are ordered to be prepared in the Thána Jail to all villages in the táluka with the view of minimizing the evil.]

Says that the censure passed by the Government of Bombay on the Collector of Ahmedabad and the Commissioner, N. D., will satisfy the Gáikwád.

The Gujarát Mitrá (75) of the 10th June says on the authority of the Poona Observer that the Government of Bombay has passed a censure on the Collector of Ahmedabad and the Commissioner, N. D., for the disrespect shown by them to the Gáikwád, who paid a visit to that city some time ago while on his way to his dominions. If there be any truth in this, we thinkit will do much to give satisfaction to His Highness Sayájiráo.

Says that the offence of opium-smuggling should be visited with a fine as well as imprisonment.

The Samsher Báhádur (109) of the 8th June says that the offence of opium-smuggling should be visited with a heavier punishment than at present. The mere imposition of a fine increases, instead of diminishing, such crimes. Smugglers in opium do not give up their nefarious practices though they are frequently fined. The imposition of fine and imprisonment will greatly check the crime. The Samsher hears that a law imposing fine as well as imprisonment in such cases is in contemplation.

A complaint against the unjust levy of the License Tax at Broach.

The Broach Samáchár (86) of the 14th June publishes the appeal of one Dáhya Pitámbar, a carpenter of Broach, against the rate at which he has been assessed to pay the License Tax and which has been presented to the Collector of Broach, and remarks that when 350 persons have preferred appeals against the License Tax assessments out of a total number of 632 liable to pay the tax at Broach, it appears that everything is not right. Such a large number of appeals betokens either mismanagement and indifference or intrigue. If the Collector of Broach or Ráo Bahádur Chunilál, who hears License Tax appeals, care to consult the public voice they should transfer those against whom the public have raised a cry and on whom either the Government or the public now look with suspicion to other places. If a notification is then issued removing the fears of the people and justice properly dealt out, the truth of the cry raised in certain quarters of the city against the unjust levy of the tax will become apparent. The exposure of the guilty parties in a court of law will set a good example to others.

Requests Government to deport to their country the large party of Baluchis travelling about in Gujarát.

The Bombay Chronicle (74) of the 10th June is glad that Government have deported to their country the one hundred and fifty Makránis and Baluchis who had come to Bombay and whose presence here was much disliked by the citizens on account of their unruly and thievish disposition. A large party of the same people are travelling about in Gujarát, causing great disturbance wherever they appear. They too ought to be deported to their country.

Suggests the appointment of two more Postal delivery peons for Cambay.

A correspondent of the Gujarát Mitrá (75) of the 10th June writing from Cambay says that there are only two Postal delivery peons for a population of 35,824 souls, and this leads to great delay in the distribution of letters. It is therefore necessary that there should be two more peons for this duty. It is not just to leave Cambay in this difficulty notwithstanding the handsome receipts secured by the Postal Department.

Complains of the inconvenience caused by the absence of a dharamshála and by the want of repairs to roads in Thálner in the Shirpur Táluka of the Khándesh District.

A correspondent of the Aryávarta (15) of the 9th June writing from Thálner in the Shirpur Táluka of the Khándesh District complains that notwithstanding the fact that the land revenue of the village is from Rupees 18 to 20 thousand, yielding a corresponding Local Fund revenue, the roads of the village are not repaired, while the travellers are obliged to put up with great inconvenience on account of the absence of a dharamshála. The writer says that it will be better if Government direct their attention to these complaints.

The Akhbáre Sodágar (81) of the 16th June observes that whenever serious accidents occur to any of the hands employed in the mills at Bombay the unfortunate persons are taken in a bullock cart or a buggy to a hospital and they suffer great pain from the joltings on the way. Excepting the Mánakji Petit Spinning and Weaving Mill none of the mills in Bombay appear to have any medical dispensaries and doctors attached to them for treating mill-labourers in cases of accidents. Government will, it is hoped, be kind enough to enact a law for compelling mill-owners to provide due medical aid for the mill-labourers injured by accidents.

Mill-owners in Bombay should be compelled to provide medical aid on the spot to mill-hands injured by accidents while working in mills.

The Indian Spectator (1) of the 10th June in an article headed "The sauce for the goose is no sauce for the gander," observes :—It is a question whether the appointment of a European medical officer of equal standing in the service with Surgeon Párakh to the Acting Chair of Midwifery in the Grant Medical College, would have elicited the same unfavourable criticism that is now poured forth in the columns of our Anglo-Indian contemporaries. We have an unpleasant suspicion that there would have been nothing of that sort. At the best a little noise might have been heard, soon followed by rigid silence. Much has been said about Surgeon Párakh being quite a junior officer in the Medical Service, and it is shown with much parade of statistics that he has been put over the head of many a senior. That such is the case we are prepared to admit. Surgeon Párakh has now been 9 years in the service. The late lamented Dr. Hughes was appointed Professor of Midwifery and Physician to the Obstetric Institution attached to Sir Jamsetji Jijibhái Hospital after only 6 years' service! The same is the case with Dr. Hatch, the Acting Professor of Anatomy. He is only 6 years in the service. Was there any hubbub about him when appointed to that chair about a year ago? One of the objections urged against Surgeon Párakh is his practice. May we ask the critics whether Dr. Hughes had greater experience when he was appointed Professor of Midwifery only after 6 years' service? Also, whether he did not jump over the heads of many a senior? Was there such a hue and cry regarding that accomplished doctor on his first appointment? It may be fairly asked whether the criticisms now hurled at the Native doctor have nothing like race-feeling at the bottom. The fact is being daily realized that educated Natives should now have an increased share in the higher offices of administration. It is evident that Government must, in pursuance of their generous and statesmanlike policy, offer them higher appointments to which they may be found qualified. But that is just the fact that is resented by European State servants, who fancy that they alone are entitled to the prizes of the services to which they may respectively belong. Hence, when a Native is offered such a prize, the European officials take it as a "thin end of the wedge." But it would be more graceful for them to cheerfully submit to the inevitable than decry such an appointment. They sullenly resented the other day the appointment of Bábu Ramesh Chundra Mitter as Acting Chief Justice of the Bengal High Court. But it is curious how silent these Anglo-Indian critics are when the rights of Natives to certain important posts are over-riden. Last year the Bombay Government appointed Mr. Lang to act as Advocate General. We objected to the appointment at the time on the ground that his two seniors, who are two eminent Native counsel not a whit inferior in forensic ability to Mr. Lang, were passed over. Neither Mr. Badrudin Tyabji nor Mr. P. M. Mehta was offered the appointment though it had been almost the universal practice to choose a senior counsel as Advocate General. The Anglo-Indian dailies here and at Calcutta avoided making any mention of so gross an injustice. They seem to act on the principle that what is sauce for the goose is no sauce for the gander. Again, take the latest instance of the appointment as a judge's clerk of Mr. Foublanque, an entire stranger to Bombay. He was imported all the way from Egypt as if the Chief Justice could not have found within the precincts of his court a single officer of merit! A grave injustice has been done by this appointment to an experienced and deserving Native officer of the court. The appointment might have been very well bestowed on the Head Assistant to the Prothonotary. It was his by right and prescription. He had more than once filled the acting appointment of a Judge's clerk. He is besides a Barrister. He has had experience of the administrative business for something like ten years. But he was curtly passed over and yet neither of our local daily contemporaries who are now so loud in their outcry about Surgeon Párakh's appointment had the generosity or grace to say a word in reference to the injustice done. After these significant instances, it is natural if the impartial reader suspect that the unfair criticisms on Surgeon Párakh's appointment are simply the outcome of race feeling. But it is common for Anglo-Indian journalists who talk of "justice and impartiality" to decry the Native at the expense of the European in almost all matters affecting the public. [The Rást Goftár (108) of the 10th June expresses similar sentiments. The Shiváji (60) of the 8th June approves of Surgeon Párakh's appointment.]

A reply to the objections urged against the appointment of Surgeon Párakh as Acting Professor of Midwifery in the Grant Medical College.

Censures the Detective Branch of the Bombay Police for not being able to apprehend Káku Wádia.

The same says:—We fear that there is something more at the bottom of the negligence shown by the Detective Police in apprehending Káku Wádia than the public care to utter at the present moment. But time will soon bring up to the surface grave matters now closely hidden from the public gaze. What the public is entitled to ask is whether the organization of the Detective Branch of the Police is all that it should be. The non-apprehension of Káku Wádia up to this time shows a lamentable want of diligence and organization in the Detective Police, and the interests of the public absolutely require that some satisfactory explanation ought to be given as to why they are impotent to apprehend him. What insuperable difficulties have the Police met with? Let the truth be probed to the very bottom so that the public may judge how far the non-apprehension is due to incompetency and how far to causes uncontrollable. [Several Gujaráti papers censure the Bombay Detective Police for not being able to trace the whereabouts of Káku Wádia.]

Local Self-government.

Prays for the speedy publication of the Draft Bill regarding the scheme of local self-government.

The Indian Spectator (1) of the 10th June observes:—We agree with the Bombay Gazette that after the incubation going on for full twelve months and more on the Local Self-government Bill for this Presidency, it is high time that the Bombay Government should publish the Draft Bill without further delay, so as to enable the press and the public to criticise it. According to the rules now resolved upon for securing publicity in legislation, it behoves Sir James Fergusson's Government to give ample time for a discussion of the Bill. Three months will be a quite adequate time. The Bill may very well be read a second time in Bombay during the cold weather. It will be a mistake to give less time to the public to discuss it, and it will be useless to have it passed in hot haste at Poona. For such an unstatesmanlike course will only plunge Government into difficulties from which it may be difficult to extricate themselves without loss of prestige or dignity. If Sir James is anxious to rehabilitate his reputation for popularity nothing will be better than to give the press and the public ample opportunity to criticise the worth of the Bill, which, it is to be devoutly hoped, will generously embody the broad policy formulated in the famous May Resolution of Lord Ripon. [The Bombay Chronicle (74) of the 10th June and the Yajdán Parást (120) of the same date express similar sentiments.]

Is much displeased with the Government nominees to the Surat Municipal Board for their having wasted the reserve fund on the public garden and electric lights.

A correspondent of the Bombay Samáchár (85) of the 11th June observes that in 1881-82 the reserve fund of the Surat Municipality amounted to Rs. 55,808, and in the 7th paragraph of its Resolution dated the 4th May 1883, the Bombay Government remarked that at Surat where also a large balance was in hand it was intended to improve the water-supply. But it must be noted that no efforts were made in 1881-82 for securing a water-supply, while Rs. 31,000 were spent upon electric lights, an extension of the public garden and other useless and unpopular works, thus reducing the balance to Rs. 27,000 in 1882-83.

In the budget of 1883-84 a further amount of Rs. 20,000 has been sanctioned for the same works and now the balance in hand is Rs 7,000 only. Thus the municipal funds have been wasted by the Government nominees by securing a majority on their side, against the wishes of the representatives of the people, and the latter are extremely sorry at this conduct of the Municipal Board. The public garden is not sufficiently attended to even at present and needs no extension whatever, and the electric light is admitted by all to be a failure. The representatives of the people in the Corporation opposed the proposals regarding the extension of the public garden and electric lights, but most of the Government nominees joined the Collector and carried the day by a majority. [The Deshi Mitrá (90) of the 14th June disapproves of the refusal of the Government of India to sanction the scheme for supplying water to Surat. As the Municipality also is unable to carry out the scheme, the people will have to continue to suffer.]

Legislation—The Native Magistrates' Jurisdiction Bill.

Advises Government not to withdraw the Native Magistrates' Jurisdiction Bill.

The Arunodayá (14) of the 10th June says:—The opinions of officers in this Presidency on the Jurisdiction Bill have gone up to the Government of India, and it is said that there is an equal number of opinions in favour of and against the Bill. Mr. Justice West advocates the withdrawal of the Bill on the ground that the discussion in regard to it has become too violent to allow of its continuance any longer. The object of Mr. Justice West is certainly very praiseworthy, but the means he has suggested for securing that end cannot be approved. As it is, the Bill cannot be withdrawn without any tangible proof of the unfitness of Natives for the concessions that are meant to be granted to them. A withdrawal of the Bill will imply that Natives are not competent to try Europeans, and therefore instead of cementing the breach between the two classes will make it wider. It is also likely to create an impression that Government have been forced to withdraw the Bill by the agitation created by their own castemen. It will also lead Europeans to attach little weight to the opposition of Natives and will incite them to treat the latter in a high-handed manner. Under these circumstances it is the duty of Government to do away with all the distinctions between Europeans and Natives existing in the present criminal law and thus to confirm the oft-repeated saying that India is for the Indians and that all her laws, regulations, &c., are for her good.

The Jurisdiction Bill should be passed into a law as it is.

In noticing the opposition intended to be raised in Parliament by Mr. Stanhope and Mr. Ashmead Bartlett to the Native Magistrates' Jurisdiction Bill, the Jáme Jamshed (98) of the 15th June observes that it is gratifying that Mr. Stanhope has to his own and his party's credit virtually given up his intention to oppose the measure. Mr. Bartlett has given notice that he will await the receipt of further information from India about the Bill before he resumes the question. But no fear ought to be entertained from him. His empty denunciations were once ably answered by Mr. Gladstone, and the Premier is sure to give him a second defeat if he persist in his indiscreet course. The newspapers that oppose the Bill boast that all Bengal officials are on their side. But this circumstance, if true, matters little, as the Governments of Madras, the Punjab, the North-West Provinces and Bombay and all the Judges of the Bombay High Court except one are in favour of the measure. Seeing that the Bill will not be rejected, its opponents suggest that changes should be introduced into it to the effect that European offenders should be allowed a choice of being tried either by European or Native Judges and that trials of Europeans should be held before a Jury. Both these suggestions are inappropriate. Under the existing law a European offender has a right of being tried by a European or a Native Judge, as he likes; and the suggested modification will not improve matters in any degree. On the other hand, a rough European offender brought before a Native Magistrate will get an opportunity of insulting the magistrate by insisting upon being tried by a European Magistrate. As regards the second suggestion, it will be difficult to find in the mofussil intelligent European or Native gentlemen competent to form a jury, and the institution will prove very inconvenient when it has to be resorted to in the case of every petty offence. The Jurisdiction Bill, as it is, is excellent and ought to be enacted without any modifications.

Suggests a compromise in the matter of the Native Magistrates' Jurisdiction Bill.

A correspondent of the Mahrátta (2) of the 10th June points out the benefits of a settlement of the Jurisdiction Bill question by a compromise, and suggests that the Native Magistrates' Jurisdiction Bill ought to provide that in the case of Sessions Judges and District Magistrates there shall be no distinction whatever, that is, a Native and a European Sessions Judge shall have the same powers, but in the case of other officials the accused may have a right to object to being tried by a Native. In the latter case the trial ought to be conducted by a Bench composed of a European and a Native Judge, and besides the accused ought to have the right of being tried by a jury which ought to be composed of Native and European jurors. The editor remarks in a note that if it is proposed to exempt European ladies from the operation of the would-be Act, the so-called strength of the opposition to the Bill will fail. [The Dátardun (89) of the 14th June disapproves of a compromise being effected.]

Disapproves of the recommendation alleged to have been made by Sir James Fergusson in connection with the Native Magistrates' Jurisdiction Bill.

The Bombay Samáchár (85) of the 13th June observes that Sir James Fergusson is stated to have recommended that Native Magistrates and Judges should be allowed to try European offenders, but if the latter ask for a jury the same should be composed of Natives and Europeans in an equal proportion. The proposed arrangement will cause embarrassment: it will be very troublesome to convene a jury for a trial before a Magistrate. Perhaps, His Excellency means that the trial should be conducted in the presence of two assessors one of whom should be a European and the other a Native. Since the practice of trying offenders with the aid of assessors already exists in the mofussil the recommendation may not be considered objectionable. If the European assessor acts properly there will be no hindrance to the course of justice. But what objection is there to Europeans being tried in the same way as Natives are tried? Really there ought to be none whatever. Instead of creating new perplexities and embarrassments it will be discreet to pass the Native Magistrates' Jurisdiction Bill as it stands.

Disapproves of the minute written by the Honourable Mr. Bayley, Acting Chief Justice of Bombay, against the Native Magistrates' Jurisdiction Bill.

The Indian Spectator (1) of the 10th June says:—That the Honourable Mr. Bayley, Acting Chief Justice of Bombay, has minuted strongly against the Criminal Procedure Code Amendment Bill is not a matter of surprise. Those who have known His Lordship's views about educated Natives have all along anticipated that he would lend the support of his name to the party of agitation. Opinion based on prejudice is one thing while opinion based on facts and reasoning is another thing. The Government will know best what importance to attach to it. The Supreme Government will not fail to recognize the special worth, if there be any, in the minute of the Judge who is said to have recommended, for the sake of so-called consistency, the retrograde step of appointing Europeans only on the Magisterial Benches of Presidency-towns, when fifteen years' partial experience of the efficient working of Native Magistrates, at least in Bombay, has conclusively emphasized the sagacious policy which it is now sought to extend elsewhere. We are inclined to the belief that compared with the minutes of the other judges of the Bombay High Court, especially those of Sir Charles Sargent and Mr. West, Mr. Bayley's minute will have the weight of a feather and no more.

Censures Mr. K. J. Bádsháh of the Bengal Covenanted Civil Service for expressing sentiments against the Native Magistrates' Jurisdiction Bill.

With reference to the report which appeared in the Indian Daily News that Mr. K. J. Bádsháh, a Pársi gentleman in the Bengal Covenanted Civil Service, has recorded his views in condemnation of the Native Magistrates' Jurisdiction Bill, the Yajdán Parast (120) of the 10th June observes that on account of his youth and inexperiene of Native character Mr. Bádsháh's views cannot be considered to be sound and mature. Notwithstanding this if the Europeans who oppose the Bill value his opinion highly they will only expose the weakness of their cause. Mr. Bádsháh seems to have scarcely realized to himself the injury he has done to himself by coming out in opposition to the interests of the whole of his countrymen. It is likely that the Natives of Bengal may burn the young Native Civilian in effigy as they did Rája Shivaprasád. Natives have a right to express their contempt of one of their own stock going against their interests. [The Jáme Jamshed (98) of the 14th June also censures Mr. Bádsháh for condemning the Jurisdiction Bill.]

Education.

Suggests an alteration in the nature of instruction imparted at the Rájkumár College.

The Gujaráti (94) of the 10th June says that the education that is imparted to Native princes at the Rájkumár College is not what it should be. It is not calculated to prepare the recipients for the responsibilities of the administration that they are called upon to wield at an early age. There has not been a single instance in which a Thákor on coming out of the College and assuming the reins of his principality has made a mark among his people. It ought to be his first care to think of the good of the people and to introduce extensive reforms into the Financial and Judicial administration of the State. But no tendency in this direction is observable. He is thoroughly ignorant of what is going on in the State, or it will be more correct to say that his kárbháris do not allow him to have an insight into the administration. The reason of such a state of things is not far to seek. The education that is imparted to royal youths at the Rájkumár College is not such as is calculated to make them competent administrators. They are simply taught many things that are of no use in political matters. It is necessary that these royal students should have a notion of what they are and what their ancestors were, and should receive instruction as to the revenues and expenditure of their States, as to the sort of administration that is carried on there and the reforms that are necessary to be effected in it, the manner in which justice should be dispensed and the advantages of a knowledge of diplomacy. It is also necessary that they should receive information as to the constitution of the English Government and the way in which particular reforms should be eliminated from it for introduction into their States, what the relations of the Political Agent and his Assistant with their States are, and how far it is necessary to regard the provisions of Treaties and Covenants. These subjects are not taught at this College, and how can the students be expected to make any material progress. These princes are generally born of rich parents, and being brought up in luxury from an early age they have very little original taste for learning, and if the greater portion of what they learn is useless it must be said that the money spent on their education is a sheer waste. The education received by princes in old days was of a quite different order. They were obliged to work very hard and were thus in a position to appreciate the same quality in others. Piano, lawn-tennis, balls and cricket did not form part of their education, but they used to be trained in the fighting of duels and in political craft. Of all the alumni of the Rájkumár College scarcely one has come up to the Thákor of Pálitána in point of skill in diplomacy. With all their travels to Europe they have not been able to maintain their honour in British courts. If this is so, where is the good of the Rájkumár College? This institution will never turn out a successful experiment so long as the lines on which the present management is conducted are not changed. If Government intend to make these princes capable, it is politically their duty to effect a change in the nature of the instruction imparted at this College.

Makes suggestions regarding the spread of education among the masses.

The Dnyán Prakásh (8) of the 14th June says that the report on the working of the Educational Department for 1881-82 shows satisfactory results. Considering the period for which the work of education has been going on in this Presidency the spread of it cannot be said to be inconsiderable. It is however not wise to be content with what has already been achieved. There is much yet to be done, and this work lies among a class of people who have not begun to appreciate the benefits of education. It is therefore a troublesome and an expensive task, and the attention of Government has been engaged in devising measures to face the difficulty. It is an undeniable fact that the amount spent by Government for the purpose of educating the people is inconsiderable and requires to be augmented. There is great room for a reduction of expenditure on the Inspecting Establishment of the Department. The inspection of village schools has already been entrusted to Committees of villagers. Government expect these Committees to superintend the working of these schools, and it appears that they have been acquitting themselves satisfactorily. In Poona and other districts, however, the Collectors and the Educational Inspectors complain of the want of interest in their work evinced by the Committees. But it appears that the Government officers are more at fault in this matter than the Committees. Our people have from the beginning not been accustomed to independent action, and it is natural therefore that in some cases they should display a sort of carelessness. But it behoves the Government officials to infuse in the people an interest in their work and thus to reconcile them to their new sphere. When such village Committees are able to efficiently discharge the duties of inspection a great saving will be effected. In the districts in which these Village Committees are known to have been working satisfactorily it is but just that the Government supervising establishment should be reduced and the saving utilized for the establishment of new primary schools. Another remedy for the spread of education among the masses is the encouragement and development of indigenous schools.

Points out certain defects in the standards prescribed for and the mode of tuition adopted in High Schools and other lower institutions of this Presidency.

The Jáme Jamshed (98) of the 11th June observes that the standards laid down for instruction in High Schools and other lower grade institutions of this Presidency are full of defects, and it is to be regretted that no attempts are made to remove them. Teachers in Government schools are compelled to adopt these standards while those in private schools cannot depart from them lest the parents of the students attending their institutions may withdraw their children on that account. Not only are the standards defective, but frequently the mode of imparting instruction is faulty. For instance, in the higher forms of High Schools the students are made to read a page of an English book and an attempt is made to explain the text in English without much regard to the capacity of the children to understand the explanation given in a language which they are trying to learn. The proper course would be to give an explanation in the vernacular language of the students and to make them translate the passages in their English lessons into their vernaculars. The consequence of the present system is that the students are not well-grounded in their knowledge of English. This defective system of instruction is adopted even in lower forms, and even English grammar is explained to the students in English. In addition to English, Gujaráti, arithmetic and even tiresome details of geography and history are taught to young children. Geometry, which is a rather difficult subject, is taught in the fourth standard, whereas algebra, which is comparatively easy to learn, is taught in the fifth standard. Examples in arithmetic are set for solution without explaining the principles on which their solutions can be worked out. The result is that in such an important study as arithmetic the children lag behind. The Jáme regrets that now-a-days teachers do not take an intelligent interest in the studies of their students, but confine their attention to their mechanical task. The Jáme recommends that in the place of Persian, Sanskrit or Latin, which are the second languages at present taught in High Schools, the French language should be taught, as the ignorance of that language proves a source of great inconvenience to such persons as visit Europe. In conclusion, the Jáme requests the Educational authorities to remove the defects pointed out above.

Complains that Hope's series of Gujaráti reading books is not suited to primary education.

In noticing the revised standards, recently published in the Government Gazette, of the studies followed in the Government Gujaráthi schools, the Yajdán Parast (120) of the 10th June observes that Mr. Hope's text-books for language which have been preserved are not suitable for the purposes of primary education. The lessons contained in them are not such as can induce children to make a progress in their studies—some of them are mere prattle, while others are suited to a mature understanding. When Mr. Hope's series was written education had not made much progress, and the short-comings of those school-books were therefore not brought to prominent notice. With the advancement of learning and better notions about primary education, the defects of this series have become glaring. It seems desirable that books for children should be such as will improve their knowledge, sharpen their intellect and induce them to study. The English series of Royal Readers is the best model to copy from, and a new Gujaráthi series ought to be composed on that model. The series ought to be illustrated by better and more attractive wood-cuts than are to be found in Mr. Hope's series. The defects of this series were pointed out long before this, and it is to be regretted that no steps have yet been taken to remove them. It is also to be deplored that now-a-days more attention is devoted to higher than to primary education.

Railways.

Suggestions to the G. I. P. Railway Company for the better management of their passenger traffic.

The Native Opinion (10) of the 10th June says:—We understand that certain changes in the rates of fares charged from passengers by the G. I. P. Railway are under contemplation. The rates for the first and second classes are to be reduced, it is said, by one-third; and that for the third by one pie per mile. If what we hear is not wrong, the proportion of reduction in the case of the third class is not properly adjusted, and we hope the Company will make a proper adjustment of the same. It is also necessary that the number of passengers that can be admitted in each third or fourth class carriage should be reduced from 50 to 40. The station platforms should be lengthened to avoid the inconvenience often caused to passengers alighting from carriages that are away from the platforms. It is usual to attach some brakes to trains in the ghâts and the seats in these carriages are so narrow while the compartments themselves are so ill-ventilated that some reform in them is urgently needed. We are of opinion that with regard to the amount of free luggage the Company owes the third-class passengers a rectification of their grievance. Third and fourth class passengers are only allowed ten sers, but to keep up the symmetry of proportion, the third class passengers require an allowance of fifteen sers at least. Again it is advisable to employ Native ticket-collectors in the place of European boys who are quite ignorant of the vernacular languages, but if this suggestion is not approved, we recommend the employment of female ticket-collectors as is done on the Hyderabad State Railway. Experience tells us that Native ladies travelling by railway are in many instances not properly treated by ticket-collectors, and to avoid this the employment of females is most desirable. We think the issue of third class return-tickets serviceable for a week will be a great inducement to many to travel by the third class, and will increase passenger traffic by that class. [The Dnyán Chakshu (6) of the 13th June makes similar suggestions.]

Complains of the inconvenience caused to passengers by the arrival of the Ahmedabad and the Bombay trains at Surat at the same time.

The Gujarát Mitra (75) of the 10th June says that great inconvenience is caused to passengers during the rains on account of the faulty arrangements for the arrival of Bombay and Ahmedabad Trains at the Surat Station. It so happens that the train that leaves Ahmedabad in the morning reaches the Surat Station in the evening, and about 15 minutes afterwards the ordinary Bombay train also arrives. The first-mentioned train is made to await the arrival of the second and then both the trains are taken to the platform and the passengers of both made to alight at the same time. The platform becomes therefore greatly crowded, and there is great danger of passengers missing their luggage. It also happens that many of the carriages of both these trains are outside the shed and passengers are therefore obliged to suffer from rain. It therefore behoves the Traffic Manager of the B. B. & C. I. Railway to arrange to receive the trains into the station one by one to enable the passengers to alight without inconvenience.

The Broach Vartamán (87) of the 11th June says that the mixed train from Surat to Ahmedabad and the one from Ahmedabad to Surat meet at noon at the Etola Station. As there is neither a shed nor shady trees to protect passengers for Surat from the sun and rain, the inconvenience and trouble suffered by them is very great. It is therefore advisable that the Railway Company should construct a shed on the other side of the Etola Station.

Prays for the construction of a shed near the Etola Station of the B. B. & C. I. Railway.

The Kaiser-i-Hind (100) of the 10th June is sorry that the Chanda Railway, which promises to be useful in developing the coal, iron and other mines of that part of the country, and in becoming a thoroughfare for a direct journey from Calcutta to Madras, has been made over for execution and subsequent working to an English Company. The nobles and the people of Hyderabad were willing to supply the necessary capital for this line, and thus to secure to the country the pecuniary benefits arising therefrom, but it is to be regretted that the Regency Council thought it fit to gag their enthusiasm and to transfer the prospective benefits of the line as well as of the mines to a foreign company.

Regrets that the execution and the working of the Chanda Railway line as well as the mines of that part of the country have been made over to an English Company.

Municipalities.

The Jáme Jamshed (98) of the 16th June observes that the complaint regarding the non-attendance of members of the Municipal Corporation of Bombay is of frequent occurrence. Many a time the work of this body is delayed for want of a sufficient number of members to form a quorum. It is desirable that a law should be enacted laying down that a member absenting himself from four consecutive meetings of the Corporation shall forfeit his seat. A complaint is raised in certain quarters against the inconvenience of the hours at which the meetings are convened, and morning and evening meetings are advocated. There is no harm in trying a change of time as suggested. [The Bombay Samáchár (85) of the 15th June also recommends the adoption of certain measures for the removal of the complaint.]

Suggests the adoption of some measures as a safeguard against the non-attendance of members of the Bombay Municipal Corporation.

The Gujarát Mitra (75) of the 10th June asks the Municipal Committee of Surat to furnish chairs or benches for the use of strangers that go to witness the proceedings of the Committee, as it is very unbecoming that they should be required to sit on the floor or to stand. It is also necessary that the practice of taking the opinions of members by the Secretary going to each of them, which is very objectionable, should be done away with, and that of giving votes by the raising of hands should be adopted.

Asks the Municipality of Surat to furnish benches for the use of strangers attending the meetings of the Committee, and suggests the abandonment of the practice of the Secretary taking votes of members.

The Hitechchhu (76) of Ahmedabad of the 14th June complains of the ignorance and indifference of the three employés of the local municipality who do the work of looking after the health of the city, and advises the municipality to remove to a distant part of the city some of the potters who carry on their work in thickly-populated quarters. The atmosphere is polluted by the potters' burning refuse and the health of the surrounding inhabitants is injured thereby. Potters are not allowed to have their kilns in any well-populated city or village, and why should they be allowed to do so in Ahmedabad? It is the duty of the municipality to attend first to the removal of causes which act injuriously on the public health and then to turn to the adornment of the city by constructing splendid roads and buildings.

Asks the new Municipal Board of Ahmedabad to remove potters' kilns from the thickly-populated parts of the city.

Native States.

The Shivâji (60) of the 8th June says:—Many persons remark that the Native States of India owe their existence to the kindness of the British Government. They maintain that when the rulers of these States were first defeated by the British the latter could, if they had wished, have very easily annexed their territories to their own. It is not however a difficult task to expose the fallacy of the above statement. In the battles fought between the Native States and the British Government, whenever the latter succeeded by false and crafty tricks in obtaining victory, they occupied the conquered territories. For instance, the British Government conquered and annexed the territories of the Peshwa, of Ranjitsingh and the Navábs of Bengal and Oude and many other princes, and extended their own dominions. But whenever they found that their opponents were not very pliant they did not resort to the extreme step of annexation, and the States of Sindia, Holkar, Nepal and several others serve as instances in point. Some of the States cultivated friendly relations with the British Government even from the beginning, and as there was no occasion to try their mettle, it cannot be said that such States were allowed to exist as a matter of grace. But this represents the state of things in the earlier stages of the British rule. When, however, the English became powerful they began to look down upon the Native princes as nobodies and initiated the policy of annexing their territories on some pretext or another. This indiscretion led to the mutiny of 1857 which put the British Government in a sorry plight and led them to pledge their word for the preservation in integrity of the existing States. These facts go to show that the British Government have preserved the Native States not as a matter of grace but because circumstances compelled them to do so. The British Government ought to bear in mind that even now if they act harshly towards the Native States they will have to pay for it as dearly as they did in 1857. The conduct of the British authorities towards Malhárráo Gáikwád, Sir Sálar Jung, Abá Sáheb Mahárâj of Kolhápur and several others was thoroughly unjust, and nobody would have blamed the latter if they had taken any steps in the right direction. It is true that these persons failed to represent to the British authorities their grievances and quietly bore the oppression exercised on them, but such results cannot be expected to follow always. The mutiny of 1857 did not occur on the annexation of one Native State, but after a number of these States were attached to the British territories, and similar consequences may in future be predicted to result from similar circumstances. The people have now become more intelligent and know more of British rule than they did before; opportunities for an interchange of ideas have increased, and a single act of injustice on the part of Government in one quarter is soon bruited everywhere and evokes criticism. Under these circumstances the stability of the British rule rests on the good behaviour of the British authorities. We have had enough of vain boasts that the Indian Empire was conquered by the sword and will be maintained by the sword. This boast can be safely indulged in so long as the people are not exasperated by the unjust conduct of the British authorities; but once their rage is excited, matters will come to a crisis. There are several kingdoms wishing ill to the British Government and they will not remain idle at such a juncture. The people of India are quite aware of all this. For these reasons, the British Government ought to be very cautious in their dealings with Native States. To construct a railway line may be advantageous, but it is quite wrong to force such a scheme on a Native State and to seize a portion of its territory in satisfaction of the payment of the interest on the funds spent upon the railway. The intention entertained by His Excellency the Viceroy to coerce the Regency into accepting this scheme and thus to lay the burden of six krors of rupees on the Hyderabad State for constructing a new railway is not proper and will lead to no good results. It cannot be predicted with certainty that evil consequences will follow within a particular period, but so much is certain that the conduct of the Viceroy will hurt the feelings not only of the people of the Hyderabad State but of the people of the whole of India. Signs of similar indiscreet conduct on the part of the authorities are shewing themselves, and if more indiscretions are committed the consequences will be serious. It has begun to be asserted that all land belongs to the State, that the holder thereof has no proprietary right in it, and that the State can resume it at its pleasure; and when these principles are put into practice disturbances will surely arise. The British Government ought therefore to take every step with great consideration and should deal with honesty especially with Native States. A Court composed of Native Princes and British officials should be constituted for deciding disputes which may arise between the paramount Government and any of the Native States, and the formation of such a Court will lead to a settlement of the line of conduct to be followed by the British Government and thus place matters on a satisfactory footing.

Comments on the conduct of the British Government with Native States.

Complains of fraud committed in weighing opium juice at Pátan in the Baroda territory.

A correspondent of the Jáme Jamshed (98) of the 14th June writing from Pátan in the Gáikwád's territory states:—Owing to the Opium Superintendent having left the place opportunity has been afforded to the subordinates of the Opium Department to practise fraud in weighing opium brought to the scales. It is to be hoped that the authorities concerned will take due notice of the complaint.

Complains of mal-administration in Porbandar.

A correspondent of the Gujaráti (94) of the 10th June writing from Porbandar says that the people of the place do not feel happy. The Rána is a miser and therefore does not introduce any reforms into the State. The officers of the State exercise great oppression on the people and justice is sold for money. Many of the servants of the State receive no remuneration and therefore behave as they like.

Comments on the restoration of Mr. Manibhái Jasbhái to the Divánship of Cutch.

The Gujaráti (94) of the 10th June hears from a reliable source that the Bombay Government has permitted the Cutch Darbár to re-engage the services of Ráo Bahádur Manibhái Jasbhái. The Gujaráti was in 1880 opposed to the policy of removing Mr. Manibhái from the post of Diván of that State which the Bombay Government determined upon adopting on the strength of certain intrigues and political reasons. That the very Government of 1880 should have now permitted Mr. Manibhái to return to Cutch supports the opposition of the Gujaráti and is calculated to lead the public to come to the conclusion that the steps taken by Government in 1880 in the matter of opposing the Cutch Darbár were taken without thought, without sufficient evidence, and on mere suspicion. It is, however, a matter of satisfaction that Government have corrected their mistake by the permission they have granted to the Cutch Darbár to re-employ Mr. Manibhái as Diván. The present Diván Mr. Nandshankar Tuljáshankar is known to have been doing well in the responsible post of Diván, and it appears that Mr. Manibhái has been allowed to revert to that post on account of the solicitations of Rána Jálamsingji. This retraction of a policy adopted in 1880, though very acceptable on account of the opportunity it gives to Mr. Manibhái to go back to Cutch, puts the Bombay Government in a very lamentable situation. The Government of Sir James Fergusson has within a very short period showed its weakness and incapability by the initiation of measures like the Game and Mhowra Bills, by its attitude towards the scheme of local self-government, by its advocacy of Madras time, and by its unsatisfactory settlement of the Junágad affair; and this Cutch question serves as a fresh supplement to them. It is however a matter of satisfaction that it has mended some of its errors during the past few months. The reversion of Mr. Manibhái will make it necessary for Mr. Nandshankar to go back to his original post. As, however, the administration of the latter officer is as agreeable to the people as to the paramount power and is spoken of in high terms of praise by the latter, it is very natural that the public will look upon this step as a correction of an error by another and will consider it as a stain on the British Government. To avoid any such misconstruction it is necessary that the reasons for the modification of the Resolution of 1880 should be made known. If the restoration of Mr. Manibhái to the Divánship is meant to correct the error committed by Government it will serve to give general satisfaction, but if it is intended simply to meet the wishes of the Ráo, it is neither honourable nor just that Mr. Manibhái should return to Cutch.

A correspondent writing from Cambay under date the 2nd June contradicts the reports published by the Gujarát Mitrá (75) of the 20th May and reported at page 16 of the Report on the Native Papers for the week ending 26th May 1883, regarding the intention of some intriguers to dethrone the present Naváb and to install his brother, and pertaining to the resignation tendered by Mr. Umedrám Anandrám. The writer alludes to the intentions of the present Diván to put female education in the State on a sound footing by importing female teachers from the Ahmedabad Female Training College, and says that the new Diván will secure the blessings of the people by such measures.

Contradicts the reports published by the Gujarát Mitrá in its issue of the 20th May regarding the unsatisfactory state of affairs at Cambay.

The Gujaráti (94) of the 10th June says:—As the Government of Bombay is sincerely bent upon correcting its past mistakes the best remedy to gain popularity is to review its own decision in the Junágad case and to deal out proper justice to the sufferers. Such a step will make the people forget all the past errors of the Government, and Sir James Fergusson's simple, frank and kind disposition will ever be regarded as exemplary.

Asks the Government of Bombay to review its decision in the Junágad case.

The Bombay Chronicle (74) of the 10th June observes that the families of the slaughtered Maiyás, who are quite homeless and penniless, are left by the Naváb of Junágad moaning in deep affliction and agony while he has made a gift of Rupees ten thousand from the State Treasury for the relief of the families of the men of the Indian Contingent that either died or were disabled during the war in Egypt. The money ought to be rejected by the Relief Committee as it stinks of the evident purpose of covering a scandalous crime. The Government of Bombay will do well to rebuke officially the Junágad Darbár for giving away such a large sum from its impecunious treasury.

Censures the Naváb of Junágad for neglecting to provide for the families of the slaughtered Maiyás.

Berár Affairs.

The Varhád Samáchár (67) of the 11th June observes:—While replying to the memorial of the people of Akola praying that under the scheme of local self-government they should be allowed the right of representation in their Municipal Corporations, the Secretary to the Resident of Hyderabad said under date the 4th January 1883, that Mr. Jones, the Resident, awaited the introduction of the scheme into the Punjab and the Central Provinces before moving in the matter. This reply led the people of Akola to believe that they would get the concession soon after the scheme was introduced into the Central Provinces. But though the law relating to those provinces has been passed and put into force, nothing is heard about any movement for the introduction of the scheme in Berár. On the other hand, the lists of the nominations of Municipal Commissioners for the year 1883-84 for Omráwati, Akola, Elichpur and Vásim have been published. This shows that Berár is not likely to get the benefits of the local self-government scheme for at least one year more. Certainly this is not fair.

Prays for an early introduction of the scheme of local self-government in Berár.

Notes.—A. The notices from the different Newspapers have been collected in the Report under different heads, which are printed in italics.

B. The names of Newspapers are printed in the body of the Report in italics, and the number of the Newspaper in the above list is printed in brackets after the name.

C. The proprietors of the Newspapers marked * have not given information as to the number of copies issued. In these cases an estimate has been made by the Reporter.

D. The system of spelling vernacular words followed by the Reporter is the same as that adopted in the Official Spelling List of the Bombay Presidency. One peculiar feature of this system is that when the long a (आ or á) is the last letter of a word, the accent is left out, and the short a (अ = u in gun) is, to prevent confusion, never placed at the end of a word. This rule has been strictly followed, except that when the short a appears to be absolutely necessary to complete the pronunciation of a word, as in Arunodaya or the well known Mitra, it is printed with a mark over it to indicate that it is short, thus—ă.

E. Berár papers are received in this office for report under the Resolution of the Government of Bombay in the General Department, No. 1795, dated 8th June 1881.

Politics and the Public Administration.

Says that the safety of the British Indian Empire lies in adhering to liberal principles in the administration of the country.

In reviewing Mr. Keene's lecture on "Liberal Principles in India," the Dnyán Prakásh (8) of the 18th June says:—At a time like the present, when an unreasonable cry is raised against the liberal tendencies of the Government of India under the Noble Marquis of Ripon, and when it is alleged by narrow-minded alarmists that a firm adherence to those liberal tendencies will ere long lead to the fall of the British Empire in India, Mr. Keene's interesting lecture has no doubt rendered an invaluable service to the cause of Indian reform by clearly pointing out that the only way to strengthen the foundations of the British Empire in India is to remain firm and loyal to those liberal tendencies in the administration,—tendencies which alone, so long as they were firmly and loyally adhered to, proved the greatest strength of the Mogal Empire in India. This historical example, together with its sequel that as soon as the liberal principles initiated by the Emperor Akbar were reversed by his great-grandson, the intolerant and narrow-minded Aurangzeb, and were replaced by illiberal and short-sighted principles, the way was paved for the early overthrow of that magnificent Empire,—this historical example will, we trust, not be lost upon our present rulers. The important lessons to be learnt from the foregoing example are too instructive to be ignored by the British rulers of India, who have to secure the attachment to their rule of a varied number of populations, differing from themselves in race, colour and creed, and aggregating one-fifth of the whole human race. Our British rulers ought to clearly bear in mind that it is not the strength of their bayonets that has hitherto maintained their Empire in this vast continent, but the liberal principles which have hitherto uniformly characterized their rule. The strength of bayonets sinks into utter insignificance when compared with the stength derived from the other source. The bare truth, in short, is that moral force is infinitely superior to mere brute force.

Expresses a wish that Her Imperial Majesty the Queen-Empress should pay a visit to her Indian dominions.

The Suryá Prakásh (79) of the 16th June says that Her Imperial Majesty the Queen-Empress of India is really fortunate. Though sometimes she is involved in troubles, she comes out of them uninjured, as the grace of God is upon her. She has been suffering in health since the last accident she met with. The death of one of her servants, John Brown, has increased her grief. Notwithstanding all this she is fortunate. Her good name has spread everywhere. The people of India have seen her in pictures, but it is their misfortune that they should not be able to see her in person. They very much long to see her. But where is the day when she will come to India and behold her dominions and subjects? Really she must visit her dominions and see her subjects. Seeing is far better than hearing. She will see how virtuous, mild and liberal are the people of India. May God inspire her with the thought of visiting India!

Expresses disappointment with the policy of the Liberal Ministry towards India.

The Samsher Báhádur (109) of the 15th June says that from the speeches and respectability of the leading members of the Liberal party it was anticipated that India would be greatly profited and would receive fresh privileges on that party coming into power. But the people of this country have been up to this time disappointed in their expectations. The Liberal Ministry have not tried to act up to their professions and have not bestowed fresh rights on the people of India. It is true that the Liberal Ministry are superior to the Conservative in many respects and have granted some concessions, but they are not enough to please the people of India and to earn their blessings. The administration of Lord Ripon has created fresh hopes. But if there had been another Viceroy in his place nothing could have been hoped for. India was made to bear a large portion of the expenses of the Afghán War with which she had nothing to do. She has also been compelled to defray a part of the expenses of the recent war in Egypt, which was undertaken with a view to serve English interests and to maintain the prestige of England. These are the results of the policy of the very Liberal party which when out of power inveighed so strongly against the Conservatives and advocated the cause of India. These results are a wonder of the age. The Liberals ought to repeal the Arms Act, place confidence in the Natives of this country, do away with race distinctions, and grant them fresh rights according to their deserts. But they should not excite vain hopes.

Comments on Mr. Stanhope's motion in the House of Commons regarding reductions in the expenditure of India.

Alluding to Mr. Stanhope's motion made in the House of Commons on the 8th of May last calling attention to the increased expenditure of India, the Indu Prakásh (9) of the 18th June says:—The long and short of it is that all this cry for economy and against increased expenditure leaves out of consideration the fact that, constituted as the Government of India is, there is no real and effective check upon the tendency to spend the money of the Indian Exchequer without an eye to the future and without a proper regard to the interests of India alone. The Viceroy is practically helpless. He may be the most economical of Viceroys that ever ruled India, but he is not his own master. There is in the first place the English Ministry. All the knowledge it can possess of Indian finance is superficial, and such knowledge is generally obtained more with a view to make India serve English interests when necessary than with a serious intention to benefit India herself. That was proved to be the case both during the Afghán and Egyptian wars. Whenever such emergencies arise, the first question which the Ministry seems anxious to decide is how to meet them without making the British tax-payer, on whose good graces the power of the Ministry to retain office rests, feel that he has to pay for them. India is, under the circumstances, drawn in, and the injustice of making India pay heavily for wars which do not directly concern her passes unnoticed and unchecked, because those that can notice and check it are profited by the injustice. This is the case with wars. As regards ordinary items of expenditure, it is forgotten that the India Office and the Government of India are practically helpless when most of these items concern a state of things which is not the creation of a day or two, but which has gradually established itself with the growth of the Government itself. The home charges are, as it were, a permanent incubus. They increase annually with the retirement of Government officers. Of all items, these seem to be the most unavoidable, and if any remedy can be applied to them it is that which the present Under Secretary of State for India, Mr. Cross, recommended in his reply to Mr. Stanhope's motion, namely, the gradual employment of a large number of Natives in the Government service. This cannot be done at once. But is it done even systematically, though gradually? Then again, economy in one direction is counteracted by extravagance in another. You cut down the expenditure by appointing Natives on lower salaries, but the money saved is spent in the creation of new departments or services somewhere else in the Government, and what may have otherwise proved beneficial to the finances of India is thus for the greater part prevented. The Civil Service, which governs India in spite of Viceroys and Secretaries of State, is not for economy but promotion. A block in promotion in the Panjáb or elsewhere gives rise to a cry and leads to some addition to the salary of each Civil Servant. Who has ascertained the prevalence of this system of increasing salaries because the Civil Service complains? Mr. Stanhope does not seem to know anything of it, for there is hardly an allusion to the fact in his speech. The Viceroy can check the evil, but he has only the semblance of power to do it; and recent experience but too clearly shows the difficulties that beset his path. In Calcutta the salaries of the High Court Judges have been reduced; but the English lawyers of the place have made a grievance of the arrangement, and all this agitation against Lord Ripon is rightly ascribed to the discontent of the English bar in Calcutta. If attempts at economy are condemned by the more influential interests in India, how can those attempts succeed? It is thus clear that the Government of India does not succeed in its endeavours to economize the increasing expenditure, because there is no practical incentive to economy and no effective check upon extravagance. All the check there is is against economy. In fact the evil really arises from a state of things which may be shortly described as follows: In India the taxes are paid by one class and the money is spent by and for another. The former are powerless, the latter are powerful. As long as this state of things lasts no real economy can take place. The best remedy for the evil lies in bringing within the class of tax-payers those who at present are only interested in the cause of expenditure. If these be made to bear their fair share of taxation, they will be brought to feel more directly than they do now the consequences of extravagant expenditure, and a greater interest will necessarily be shown by them in the question as to how the money that is taken from them is spent. A great mistake was committed when the Government abandoned the income-tax. That mischievous and short-sighted step has divided the Indian public into the two classes noted above, and the consequence has been that Indian officialdom, in whose hands it lies to economize the State finances, has not the motive power to advocate economy and to see that it is carried out.

Sanguinely expects that Mr. Ashmead Bartlett's opposition in Parliament to the Native Magistrates' Jurisdiction Bill will fail.

The Lok Mitrá (77) of the 17th June observes:—Anxious inquiries are being made in all directions as to the probable result of the discussion which Mr. Ashmead Bartlett's motion in connection with the Native Magistrates' Jurisdiction Bill will elicit, and various are the speculations indulged in on the subject. The interest and anxiety which the question has evoked in this country are perfectly natural and intelligible, for on the result of this discussion will depend the determination of the question whether India shall be governed in accordance with the solemn pledges repeatedly given by the highest authorities on occasions the most momentous in the annals of the country, in consonance with the dictates of justice and reason, and in conformity with the altered and changing conditions of political and social life in the country, or whether our rulers shall be guided by the bigotry, intolerance and selfishness of irresponsible clamourers. On which of these two principles India ought to be governed, in the interests both of the rulers and the ruled, will admit of no question whatever. Equally certain it is that the policy which is now being so rancorously assailed is the policy calculated and indeed intended to advance the highest interests both of this country and of England; and unless the traditions and instincts of the House of Commons have undergone a remarkable change, which there is not the remotest cause for supposing, the motion of which the member for Eye has given notice will end in his discomfiture and in the disappointment of his friends and constituents. In the first place Mr. Ashmead Bartlett is not qualified to maintain and prosecute the discussion to a successful issue. He is by no means a prominent member of Parliament, and his knowledge of India and of her present social and political condition is by no means such as to entitle him to be heard with respect and attention while assailing a policy fundamentally sound and forced on the rulers by exigencies which cannot be disregarded. Nor does he seem to have powerful friends and supporters to back him in the difficult task of playing the rôle of the champion of his oppressed and ill-used brethren in India. His opponents, on the other hand, who will assuredly muster strong on the occasion of the discussion, supposing that it takes place at all, are both powerful and united. Government have already approved of the principle of the Criminal Jurisdiction Bill, and are pledged to support the general policy of which that legislative measure is the outcome. The instincts of the Liberals will undoubtedly lead them to stand by a policy which partakes so largely of their teachings and associations, the Radicals being sure to uphold it through thick and thin, and the Irish Home Rulers too may be safely counted among the friends of the policy of the Government of India. Turning to the press, the Times is an out and out opponent of the policy, and has for some time past been playing into the hands of interested wire-pullers and betraying an amount of ignorance and intolerance which are certainly not creditable to it. Its partisanship, however, has been fully exposed, and it is not now to the columns of the Times that the English public look for clear and unbiased information regarding India; while the sober and judicious writings of such influential papers as the Pall Mall Budget and the Daily News have helped most effectually to dissipate the cobwebs of prejudice and misrepresentations which were woven so assiduously by certain classes of people, and to put the English people on the right track as to the real object and scope of the Jurisdiction

Bill and as to the humane and far-seeing character of Lord Ripon's policy. [The Yajdán Parast (120) and the Kaiser-i-Hind (100) of the same date express similar sentiments.]

Is thankful to the Secretary of State for India for ordering that the cost of the working of the Contagious Diseases Act in Bombay should not be charged to the municipality.

The Bombay Samáchár (85) of the 21st June is thankful to the Secretary of State for India for ordering the Bombay Government to cease to charge the municipality of Bombay with the cost of working the Contagious Diseases Act in that city. The Samáchár observes that the introduction of the Act was condemned by the Corporation, which did not fail to protest against any deduction being made from the police grant on account of the cost, but the authorities did not pay any attention to the protest. Lord Kimberley has done well in giving to the city that justice which was denied by the local authorities. The abolition of the Contagious Diseases Act in England has probably induced the Secretary of State to take this step, and if this be so, His Lordship will do well to order the discontinuance of its operation in Bombay as well. [The Jáme Jamshed (98) and the Akhbáre Sodágar (81) of the 21st and the Káside Mumbai (101) of the 22nd June express similar sentiments.]

Praises Lord Ripon's rule in India.

The A'ryávart (15) of the 16th June is sorry for the cry that has been raised in England against Lord Ripon, and praises His Lordship for having borne the brunt of all the silly criticism of partisan writers with an equanimity and strength of purpose that are peculiarly his own. It is said that Lord Ripon is not esteemed in India. But who are those that do not esteem him? It is those Englishmen that come to India for the love of lucre. It is those that do not look with favour on honesty and goodness. It is high time that the whole of India should join in an emphatic protest against this assertion and should show their gratitude by declaring that they revere His Lordship as they revere God. Lord Clive conquered India, but no Viceroy before Lord Ripon fixed the minds of the people on the British rule. The disaffection that originated at the time of the mutiny of 1857 reached its culminating point in the administration of Lord Lytton. But matters have assumed a reassuring colour since the advent of Lord Ripon, and he is perhaps the only well-wisher and representative of the British Government that has come to India since the beginning of the British rule.

Suggests the appointment of a land commission for making a thorough and searching inquiry into the impoverished condition of the Indian peasantry.

The Indian Spectator (1) of the 17th June, in an article headed "Land Reform in India," dwells on the causes of the present miserable condition of Indian agriculturists, and remarks:—The Bombay Gazette wishes a Native Arthur Young to come out and collect unimpeachable evidence regarding the condition of the peasantry by going from town to town and village to village. No doubt this will be a great step in the cause of the amelioration of the condition of the Indian peasantry. But we fear such a patriotic individual can scarcely be found unless public associations come forward to support him; and if found, the district autocrats, who have such a presumption of their own infallibility, are likely to discredit the evidence of such a Native economist in search of facts. We are of opinion that by far the best way of having a thorough and searching inquiry of a most reliable character is by means of a commission appointed by Government composed of two-thirds non-official members, being independent Native gentlemen selected for their information and knowledge from the different provinces of the Empire. For instance, Bombay may send Messrs. V. N. Mandlik and Nánábhái Haridás, the two gentlemen most experienced in matters of the land revenue system in vogue here. The former owns land in the Deccan, and the latter in Gujarát. Both are eminently qualified by their professional experience to sift evidence in a searching manner, and are well known for their independence and rigid impartiality. In the same way Native gentlemen of equal experience and independence may be selected from the other provinces. One-third of the commission may be composed of non-official and official Europeans. Such a commission should, like the Education Commission, be authorized to make a progress through the whole country. The latter, however, only visited important towns. But this land commission should visit important villages also, for there alone they would be able to collect local testimony of the nature needed for the inquiry. Public associations at the great centres may also be asked to give evidence through their recognized representatives. By this means such a mass of useful information and unimpeachable testimony will be collected as to make it almost invaluable for any Government to proceed to a wholesome land reform. It might be urged that the Famine Commissioners did something of this sort. No doubt they did, but in an entirely hole-and-corner fashion. And all their evidence was, besides, collected from officials. Their report on this subject is more or less tinged with official optimism. It is for this reason that we have more than once taken exception to some of their conclusions on the land question.

Urges the abolition of the Ecclesiastical Department of Government.

The Indu Prakásh (9) of the 18th June says that the expenditure of the Ecclesiastical Department of Government is not only useless, but it conduces to wean away the minds of the people from their proper religion, and that at the sacrifice of the money earned by them by the sweat of their brow. Why should such a department be maintained at the cost of India? The advocates of this department hold that it is as much in the interests of the people of India as for the spiritual welfare of the few Englishmen who come out to govern India that an institution should exist for keeping alive in the latter a faith in their religion. An admission of this conclusion argues that the British Government are, in the interests of the ruled, swayed by a desire to see that the religious faith of those to whom the care of the people is committed is protected. Bur are Government consistent in holding such a view? Take the instance of a district. There are only about 40 or 50 European officers professing the Christian religion, and for the sake of these few people an establishment is maintained at a monthly cost of Rs. 1,000 or so. Why should not Government make similar provision for their other servants professing other religions? Can Government mean that it is necessary that their Christian servants only should act according to justice and morality and that their other servants need not do so? Certainly not. European officers are equally liable to be called to account with Natives for any digression from the path of justice, and this view has been repeatedly borne out by Government. If this is so, it is not in keeping with the avowed impartiality of the British Government that a great amount should be spent for the spiritual well-being of a few Christians and that utter disregard should be shown to others who are a hundred times superior to them in numbers. This question has again another side. Our rulers are Christians and profess to speak the truth. They openly declare that distinctions on account of race, creed, colour and profession have no place in their administration. They are, however, seen to spend large sums for the propagation of Christianity, and how can their action in this respect be reconciled with their above professions? But if they undertake to give equal support to all religions they run a double risk. Firstly, any express provision for the maintenance of the churches of other religions will argue an admission of their inspired and revealed character, which is irreconcilable with the tenets of Christianity, and secondly, it will give rise to complications and involve Government in enormous expenditure. To free Government from this anomalous position there is only one remedy, and that is to abolish the Ecclesiastical Department altogether. There can be no objection to such a step either on administrative or political grounds. The people will not feel offended by it, nor will the Christian employés of Government suffer to any appreciable extent. Those who are religious do not necessarily require preachers that are paid by the State. Many years after the establishment of the East India Company there was no such department. Were the Company's servants less honest and religious than those of the present Government? A perusal of the history of those times will serve to show that with all the expenditure on the Ecclesiastical Department the servants of the present Government do not possess even a hundredth, nay, a thousandth part of the religiousness that was observable in the employés of the old John Company. Forging of documents, the dethronement of the Rája of Benares without cause, extensive corruption, selling clothes of rich people for the purpose of making money, rendering assistance in the exercise of oppression on the Rohillas simply for the purpose of extorting money from them—such deeds are certainly not without a parallel in later times. The annexation of numerous States by Lord Dalhousie on flimsy pretexts, the deportation of Malhár Ráo to Madras without any proof of his guilt, and the enactment of the Gagging Act are only acts of recent occurrence. In the same manner we are even now witnessing the spectacle of individuals and associations indulging in un-Christian-like and foolish talk in connection with the Ilbert Bill. The long and short of all this is that there is no difference between the officers that were ruling India without an Ecclesiastical Department and those now ruling with one. Lord Ripon is bent upon carrying to their fullest length the reforms that were initiated by Lord Mayo, and reductions in expenditure is one of them. It is therefore to be hoped that this subject will engage His Lordship's attention. As Government are not bound to look to the physical protection of their Christian servants, so they are not bound with regard to their spiritual protection.

Requests Government to repeal the Arms Act with a view to enable the people to defend themselves against the attacks of robbers and wild beasts.

Referring to the disturbance recently caused by the appearance of several gangs of Mekránis in the suburbs of Bombay and the measures taken by Government to deport them, the Native Opinion (10) of the 17th June says:—The utter disarmament of a people cannot be consistent with the economy and strength of good government, and wherever such disarmament is carried out the strength of the empire is in a sense lessened. What is necessary for self-defence is an independent capacity for it on the part of the people under ordinary circumstances, helped only under an emergency either by the police or by the military. This help from the people is a sort of permanent though irregular and semi-efficient aid of which our army is now completely shorn. The question of necessary help for the police or the army from the general public apart, the complete disarmament of a people is in itself ruinous. Such disarmament has contributed considerably to the helplessness or inability of the people to protect themselves. No sane man would ever doubt that if the people of the Deccan had weapons of personal defence in their possession, they could have met the dacoits of 1879 face to face and dispersed them in no time. To deprive people of the arms of defence first, and then to say that they are incapable of undertaking their defence themselves, is something quite inexplicable to us. Our rulers know full well of what warlike stuff the Marátha is made, and to deny to him the merest capacity of self-defence is to do him sheer injustice. When the Mekráni gang, while at Bhusáwal, showed tendencies to make things uneasy, the railway volunteers immediately came out and brought them to their senses. This was as it should have been, but one cannot expect to have volunteers in every part of the country, and that people may be able to defend themselves from such gangs wherever and whenever they put in their appearance until our preservers of the peace come to their assistance, they must be put in a position to defend themselves. But here the Arms Act comes in their way and people are required to apply for a pass to a Magistrate or Collector to possess even a sword or a matchlock to protect their cattle from wild beasts. Instances can be found in which villagers do not possess swords, much less guns, to protect themselves or their cattle from the attacks of the beasts of prey or of robbers and dacoits. The extent of our forests is gradually increasing, and the number of wild beasts must proportionately increase. Railway communication also must afford to the prowlers of the night increased facilities to carry on their avocation in different parts of the country. It is the people generally who must be put in a position to defend themselves against robbers, wild beasts and such like dangers, and for this purpose the removal of the arms law is very necessary. We hope Government will attend to this question at an early date.

The Satyá Shodhak (56) of the 17th June says that the Hindu inhabitants of Salem have been suffering great oppression at the hands of Government officials. It seems that in all disputes between Hindus and Musalmáns Government officers side with the latter and punish the former with great severity. It does not become the just British Government that their officers should act with such partiality. Mr. Grant Duff should take up the cause of the oppressed Hindus and thus immortalize his name as their advocate. It also behoves the Madras Government to remove all the authorities at present stationed at Salem to other districts.

Advises the Government of Madras to have mercy on the Hindu inhabitants of Salem.

The Maháráshtrá Mitrá (39) of the 21st June says:—It is reported that two European gentlemen wandering on a hunting excursion in the Baroda territory caused grievous hurt to a Hindu woman by the shots of their rifles. Such instances being of frequent occurrence it is not clear why Government do not take any measures for preventing them. Had the party injured been a European lady and the injurer a Native, matters would have assumed quite a different aspect. It is a question how the hearts of Natives can be bound with ties of loyalty to such Europeans as leaving aside the duty of protecting their subjects occupy themselves in hunting excursions. Though Natives have been praying for permission to possess weapons to protect themselves from wild beasts their prayer is not heeded. Why this distinction? How valuable is the thought that the possession of weapons will lead to disaffection among the people and subsequently to the overthrow of the British Government? But then the regiments are not entirely formed of Europeans. There are in their ranks Natives who have distinguished themselves in the cause of the British Government in campaigns like that of Egypt. It is time that Government should remove all distinctions between Europeans and Natives and should also enact a law prohibiting the hunting excursions of the former.

Urges Government to enact a law for prohibiting the hunting excursions of Europeans.

The Dnyán Prakásh (8) of the 18th June says:—Whatever the nature of the general administration of Sir Richard Temple as Governor of Bombay, his resolution on the subject of adopting measures for affording encouragement to graduates to enter the Revenue Department was very just, and being calculated to improve the status of graduates and the working of the department, would have proved beneficial to the people at large if its original object had been kept constantly in view. On the departure of Sir Richard Temple from this country the graduates of this Presidency lost in him a valuable patron and the stringency of the rules framed by him began to be relaxed. Collectors and other officials began to forward the claims of their old subordinates. Such a state of things served to mar all prospects of promotion for graduates and to make them unwilling to enter the Revenue Department. The few graduates that have hitherto entered the department have belied, by the satisfactory manner in which they have acquitted themselves in the discharge of their duties, the apprehensions of the old employés of the department that men fresh from colleges would not be able to do revenue work. If graduates have thus shown their superiority to the ordinary servants in the department it is not clear why special encouragement should not be given to them to accept service in it. It is seen that many of the old servants of the department are unable to realize the responsibility of their position and are given to currying favour with their superiors by improper means. It is therefore very surprising that revenue officers should think of subordinating the interests of graduates to those of such incompetent and illiterate persons. The duties of revenue officers are generally very important, and it is in the interests of the country that such officers should be intelligent. The class of officers which at present forms the bulk of the revenue service is not fitted to carry out the real objects of Government, while the latter not being informed of the real condition of the masses are at a loss to devise proper measures for their welfare. When there are many intelligent hands available it is not known why Government should content themselves with the services of less competent and less educated men. The higher grades of revenue and judicial departments are regulated by the same rules regarding examinations, and why should not the same be the case with the lower grades? To qualify himself for a Subordinate Judge's post one is required to attain to a certain degree of education, while there is no such condition in the case of revenue appointments. This is a very unsatisfactory state of affairs, and it will never be too soon to reform it. The Prakásh is of opinion that revenue offices afford greater opportunities of doing harm to the people than judicial ones, and it is the duty of Government to attract to the former as many intelligent and competent men as possible. There is no necessity for the inauguration of any new measures. It is sufficient that a strict obedience to the policy initiated by Sir Richard Temple should be enforced.

Suggests certain measures of relief for the sufferers from the locust plague.

The Indu Prakásh (9) of the 18th June, referring to the havoc committed by locusts in the different parts of this Presidency, says that as matters at present stand it is not at all likely that Government will receive a faithful account of the distress prevailing among the people from officers who consider it their duty to make reports such as are not calculated to wound the susceptibilities of their superiors. Affairs must continue in the same groove and the ryots must suffer so long as no deviation from the track above pointed out takes place. The locust plague has committed serious mischief in the districts of Poona, Ahmednagar, &c., and the people have begun to apprehend that their future prospects will be thrown into a state of jeopardy if these creatures remain as they are. It is said that Government have employed a special officer for the destruction of locusts, but the number of the locusts killed by the devices invented by this officer, when compared with the enormous flights that are engaged in the work of depredation, is like a drop in the ocean. It does not therefore appear that the measures hitherto adopted are calculated to prove efficacious. In addition to such measures others that may be suggested by competent men may be tried without regard to the cost entailed thereby. Any amount of expenditure on this score should not be grudged as it stands a fair chance of being compensated in the long run. The main remedy, however, for the alleviation of the distress prevailing among the people is the grant of remissions of land revenue. The usual policy of squeezing the ryot to the last drop and then allowing remissions to the extent of the amount recoverable must be abandoned, inasmuch as it is in no way calculated to afford relief. With the view of meeting the case with fairness and promptness, the Indu suggests that the district officers should move in their charges, ascertain the extent of the havoc committed by locusts, and assure the agriculturists of relief from distress. Such an assurance from Government officials is sure to keep up the ryots. It is necessary that European officers should make it a point to acquaint themselves personally with the grievances of the people and to represent matters to Government in their true aspect, however unpleasant it may be. Any relief afforded should be prompt and considerable.

Condemns the present practice of granting valuable pieces of public land to Europeans for building clubs and the injustice done to Natives by such grants.

The Indian Spectator (1) of the 17th June, in an article headed "Another variety of the goose and the gander sauce," says:—That is a very cool suggestion of the Times of India to relegate Native cricket players to the confined and undesirable strip of ground between the Elphinstone High School and the School of Art. May we ask if Europeans alone are entitled to the exclusive enjoyment of the Esplanade for purposes of healthy games? Those who have closely watched the encroachments which have from time to time been made on this one of the best and most eligible public places for recreation cannot have any doubt as to the favour Government have generally shown to one class of their subjects at the expense of another. It is this questionable, nay reprehensible, indulgence shown by Government that has now emboldened European players slowly and by degrees to drive out Native players to the farthest and quite ineligible portion of the Esplanade. We think they will succeed if Natives do not vigorously protest against so arbitrary an attempt at an usurpation of the common play-ground. Seriously, it is a question whether the Government of Bombay should show, even in this paltry matter, their predilection for the "privileged" at the expense of the unprivileged classes of their subjects. It may be perhaps worth arguing in the High Court with the friendly assistance of that great luminary of legal fiction, the public trustee otherwise known as "the Honourable the Advocate General," whether the maidán can be encroached upon in the manner it has been and is being allowed to be. The writer proceeds to quote certain instances in which valuable pieces of land have been granted for European clubs, such as the Yacht Club, the Byculla Club, and the new Swimming Bath Company, and says:—We have been constrained to point out these several instances because it is time that the injustice which the officials do to Natives in almost all public matters wherein the interests of Europeans and Natives are equally involved should be put a stop to. We do so in no jealous or carping spirit. We have no objection to Europeans having gymkhánás and other sports and games and clubs. What we do urge is that there should not be two standards of measure. If a European club wants an eligible plot to build a club-house upon, by all means give it at fair rates consistent with public interests. But do not, pray, deny the same request when made by a Native club. Do not throw obstacles nor delay replies. Let them be treated fairly and impartially. In short, Government ought to refrain from saying that the sauce which is good for the European goose is not good for the Native gander. We cannot help expressing our opinion that the principle underlying the disposal of matters of the nature we have expatiated upon is scarcely creditable to the authorities concerned.

Disapproves of the recent order of Sir Donald Stewart regarding the abolition of pensions to widows of Native soldiers dying at Quetta.

The same observes:—We are glad to learn that General Hardinge has taken up the cause of the poor Native soldiers on duty at Quetta. Nothing is apt to create greater discontent and heart-burning among the "black" defenders of the Empire than the shabby treatment which they may receive at the hands of the so-called "mábáp" Government. We have repeatedly commented on the miserly way in which the authorities at Calcutta treat our Native soldiers. Their pay, allowances, pension, ration, medical comforts,—all contrast very unfavourably with those of European soldiers. It is not that we mean that Rámsing should be remunerated on an equal scale with Tommy Atkins. But after making all allowance for the position of the latter in an Indian climate, we think the treatment given to the former is most discreditable. The injustice is so palpable that it has for a long time been the subject of public criticism. And though the commanders of Native regiments do all in their power to fight for the poor sepoy, the Supreme Government, or rather the Military head for the time being, sets his face against any proposals to deal with his case more liberally. Whenever reduction, or rather cheese-paring economy, is the order of the day, the sepoy is sacrificed for the comfort of the white soldier. This is the most deplorable feature in the military administration of the Empire. We have no hesitation in asserting that the European soldier is pampered at the expense of the Native sepoy. Surely the righteous administration of Lord Ripon will not any longer allow this standing iniquity to go without some remedy. It is this iniquity which tends to produce bitterness in the hearts of the poor sepoys and makes them feel a genuine disgust for active military service. Talk with any old sepoy who has seen service under the Company Báhádur and under the Crown, and he will tell you how happy he was every way under the old regime. These are facts, but the Pharisees at the Calcutta Military Secretariat do not care to take cognizance of them. But let them remember that dissatisfaction in the Native army, from whatever cause, is much to be avoided. The lessons of the past should not be forgotten. If the Native army is to be kept loyal to the core and ready to defend the Empire, it ought to be fairly remunerated and looked after. Now, is not that recent order of Sir Donald Stewart touching the abolition of pensions to widows of Native soldiers dying at Quetta a most short-sighted one? Is it fair that the poor sepoy, after having been led into the belief that service at Quetta will be requited as foreign service, should now be told that his family need expect no increased pension for the fatigues and privations he may have endured before his death at that distant station? They talk of recruits as difficult to be had. Are not the very illiberal terms on which a Native is asked to enter military service one of the causes of the difficulty? No doubt, General Hardinge is an honest soldier. His love for the Native army is so well known that we should have been surprised had he sat silent on the subject. It is to be hoped that his energetic protest will lead to a rescindment of the harsh and uncalled-for order. [The Bombay Chronicle (74) of the same date expresses similar sentiments.]

Thanks His Excellency the Governor for referring the Ratnágiri shooting case to the High Court and disapproves of the decision of the High Court on the subject.

The Bombay Samáchár (85) of the 21st June is thankful to His Excellency the Governor for referring Mr. Hewett's case to the High Court, as if the decision of the District Magistrate of Ratnágiri had been allowed to hold good, it would have led to unpleasant inferences among the public. The same of the 23rd June refers to the decision of the High Court on the subject and says that the view of the case taken by the High Court is not calculated to produce a deterrent effect on wrong-doers.

Says that the Márwádi speculators upon rain in Bombay ought not to be interfered with.

The Satyá Mitrá (110) of the 17th June observes that on the approach of the monsoon Márwádis speculate upon rain, and as in the case of other time-bargains meet their liabilities honourably and without ever resorting to a court of justice. In this they do nothing wrong and earn or lose as they do in other time-bargains. Notwithstanding this, a correspondent of the Times of India denounces their speculations on rain as gambling, observes that when the speculators lose their money they resort to theft and rapine, and recommends that the police should apprehend these speculators and get them punished. They ought not to be interfered with.

Complains of the inconvenience caused by certain procedure followed by the Bombay Collector's Office in the matter of the collection of the land-tax.

A correspondent of the Din Bandhu (5) of the 17th June complains of the inconvenience caused to the people of Bombay by the system of pasting advertisements on street walls requiring payments on account of land revenue to be made within a fixed period. Formerly it was the custom for the Collector's Office to prefer bills for the amounts due to owners of houses. That practice was lately abandoned in favour of a system of serving the parties with notices, and the latter also has been abandoned this year in favour of a system which is calculated to cause annoyance to the public. There is also another point which requires to be noticed in connection with this subject. The parties that go to make payments are required to take with them the bills for previous years, and unless such bills are produced payments are not accepted. Such people as are not aware of this new practice are thus put to great inconvenience and trouble by having to go back and return on the next day. As the Government records can furnish all the requisite information on the subject, the reason why the clerks in the Collector's Office subject people to so much annoyance is not apparent. The authorities concerned will save the people much trouble by ordering a reversion to the old practice.

Is thankful to the Government of Bombay for undertaking to repair and light the University clock.

The Lok Mitrá (77) of the 17th June observes:—Sir James Fergusson deserves thanks for the resolution to contribute towards the expenses of maintaining and lighting the handsome University clock. Indeed, such a concession was but the natural sequel of the abandonment of the unlucky "official" time, and it is gratifying to note that no time has been lost in following up the cancellation of the Government resolution regarding Madras time by the announcement of the willingness of Government to defray a portion of the expenses of repairing and lighting the clock. Now that His Excellency has gone so far in deference to popular wishes, Sir James may be respectfully reminded that it will be a graceful concession to public opinion in the mofussil to cancel that portion of the Government resolution which still requires "official" time to be kept in the mofussil under the evidently erroneous impression that the people are not averse to it.

Sir James must by this time have seen that the people of the mofussil, so far from being satisfied with Madras time, have with one voice condemned it and have been clamouring for the restoration of the orthodox time. [The Bombay Chronicle (74) and the Yajdán Parast (120) of the same date express similar sentiments. The Mahrátta (2) of the same date advises Government to order a reversion to Bombay time in the mofussil.]

Suggests the grant of extra remuneration to hospital assistants who are obliged to do additional work on account of the movements of civil surgeons in the districts.

The Dnyán Ságar (21) of the 18th June approves of the circular recently issued by the Surgeon-General with the Government of Bombay requiring civil surgeons to move in their respective charges and to examine the several dispensaries in the districts. Such a system is calculated to improve the sanitation of the districts and to impose a wholesome check on the work of hospital assistants. It is however a matter of regret that it will entail on the hospital assistants at head-quarters additional responsibility on account of their having to perform in certain cases some of the duties of the civil surgeon. The Ságar suggests the grant of some additional remuneration to such hospital assistants as may be required to perform the additional duties above referred to. Such a measure will stimulate the assistants to exertion. It behoves Government to consider the subject seriously.

Inquires if there is any objection to newspaper editors being furnished with a list of the articles reported from their papers.

The Mahárashtrá Hitechchhu (38) of the 18th June says:—Many newspaper editors are doubtful whether the Reporter on the Native Press with the Government of Bombay keeps the Government informed of various important suggestions made by the press. Is there any objection to the editors being furnished with a list of the articles that are reported from their papers?

Objects to the introduction of English figures in táluka and village accounts.

The Dhárwár Vritt (23) of the 4th June says that Government have recently issued a resolution in which they have directed that from August next English figures shall be used in the writing of accounts instead of vernacular. Perhaps Government infer from the fact that even village pátils have begun to go up for the Higher Standard Departmental Examination that the knowledge of the English language has spread even in remote tálukas and villages. But Government are much mistaken. There are still many kárkuns in tálukas who know only their vernacular language, and it will cause great confusion if they are made to write their accounts in English figures. It is to be hoped that Government will duly consider the subject.

Recommends the case of Mr. Sorábsha Bamanji, chief constable of Olpád, to the merciful consideration of the Superintendent of Police and the Commissioner.

The Gujarát Mitrá (75) of the 17th June does not approve of the transfer to Mándvi of Mr. Sorábsha Bamanji Modi, chief constable of Olpád. It seems that the Police Superintendent has been rather hasty in punishing Mr. Sorábsha in the way he has done. This gentleman is known to be perfectly honest and has succeeded in gaining golden opinions from the people of Olpád, a fact which in itself is very significant and which speaks volumes in favour of the character and qualifications of the officer. A closer inquiry into the matter may lead to the exculpation of Mr. Sorábsha. There is no reason to suppose that the Superintendent of Police was swayed by any ill feeling or malice in the matter. Perhaps he meant this punishment as an example to others, and if any guilt can be sufficiently established even a higher punishment than that awarded may be justifiable. But if this officer has been punished on mere suspicion, we recommend his case for the merciful consideration of the Superintendent and the Commissioner.

A complaint against malicious impressment for labour.

A correspondent of the Poona Vaibhav (48) of the 17th June, writing from Vengurla, states that one Bábli Rang Gauda, a military pensioner residing in the village of Kochre in the Vengurla Táluka, Ratnágiri District, was on the 27th March last impressed for labour by the police pátil and made to go to Vengurla. The man demanded his wages of the Mámlatdár, who told him to ask for them from the police pátil. Next day he laid a complaint before the Mámlatdár to the effect that though he was from 60 to 65 years of age he was maliciously impressed for labour. The Mámlatdár being of the same caste as the police pátil did not give any relief to the complainant, who thereupon preferred an appeal to the First Assistant Collector. It is to be hoped that the Mámlatdár will be taken severely to task for his conduct.

Desires a specific law for the trial of contempt of court cases.

In noticing the letter addressed by Mr. A. P. Sinnett to the Times containing some remarks in connection with the Bengáli Contempt of Court case, the Lok Mitrá (77) of the 17th June observes:—There can be no doubt that it is of the highest importance that the law governing the cases of contempt of court must be definitely and authoritatively settled, and placed on such a basis as to leave public writers free to discuss all important public questions without any danger of being sent to jail like so many thieves "if they happen to wound the vanity or supersensitive dignity of a High Court Judge by a departure from the unwritten rules of journalistic etiquette." Gross and flagrant extravagance of reckless writings must of course always be condemned and punished, but it is certainly the duty of all public writers alive to the difficulties of their situation, Native and European, to combine to bring about a definite settlement of the present dangerously vague and elastic state of the law of contempt of court, and to express disapproval of its stringent exercise in a case like that of the editor of the Bengáli. [The Bombay Chronicle (74) of the same date expresses similar sentiments.]

Local Self-government.

Disapproves of the arrangements said to have been proposed by the Bombay Government for the introduction of the Viceregal scheme of local self-government in this Presidency.

The Bombay Samáchár (85) of the 20th June observes that the arrangements said to have been proposed by the Bombay Government for the introduction of the Viceregal scheme of local self-government in this Presidency are good if judged of by the light of the sentiments expressed by His Excellency the Governor soon after the publication of the scheme, but are unsatisfactory when looked at from the standpoint of the objects of the original scheme. These arrangements are in unison with the sentiments expressed on the subject by Sir James Fergusson a few months ago at Ratnágiri and in Khándesh, and are in conformity with the course pursued in regard to the municipal corporations of Surat, Ahmedabad and some other places. The main principles on which the scheme of local self-government hinges are that the popular element should be sufficiently strong in municipal and local boards, and that these institutions should appoint their own president who should not be a Government official. But the arrangements proposed by the Bombay Government appear to ignore these important conditions. Sir James's Government has proposed that half the number of the members constituting a municipal or a local board should be the representatives of the people, while the remaining half should be the nominees of Government and that half of the latter again should be Government servants. This number of Government nominees is quite enough to suppress and nullify the popular element and to bring about a miscarriage of the praiseworthy object of the Viceregal scheme. A fresh instance of such miscarriage has been furnished by the Surat Municipality. The representatives of the people desired that the city should be supplied with water, but the Government nominees desired otherwise and have carried their point, against the wishes of the former, in behalf of the provision of electric lights and the extension of the public garden. The proposal in regard to the appointment of a president is also not satisfactory. It is left to Government to either appoint a president, or to authorize a board to select and nominate one. The result of this will very probably be that a Government official will generally be the president, and even if Government appoint a non-official member to this office, he will not be quite free to conserve the interests of the people. It is said that the proposals of the Bombay Government have been approved of by the Supreme Government. If this be true, it is not a little surprising that Lord Ripon should have approved of the arrangements which weaken his scheme by ignoring its two main excellences. The proposals of Sir James's Government are said to have been despatched to the Secretary of State who is not likely to take exception to them. The people of this Presidency ought therefore to be prepared to express in time their disapproval of them. [The Yajdán Parast (120) of the 17th June also disapproves of the Bills prepared by this Government as being calculated to mar the excellence of the scheme as laid down by the Government of India.]

Disapproves of the Panjáb Local Self-government Bill.

The Mahrátta (2) of the 17th June, in commenting on the Panjáb Local Self-government Bill, observes:—We regret to see that the Local Self-government Bill for the Panjáb has as highly disappointed us as the September resolution of the Panjáb Government pleased us. We sincerely wish that the Bombay Local Self-government Bill may belie our fears. The Bombay Government have the advantage of having before them all the Local Self-government Bills and the criticisms made thereon, and we have no doubt that they will amply avail themselves of the materials so ready at hand so as to enable themselves to reassert their topmost position in this very important administrative change. Sir Charles Aitchison satisfied himself with drafting and circulating a resolution that spoke very highly of the desirability of dividing the burden of governing the Panjáb between the people and Government, but we are sorry we do not see anything in the Bill to that effect. Though the Lieutenant-Governor held forth a happy future, he has acquiesced in lending his support to a Bill that does not meet the wishes of the people. To be of any practical use, a Local Self-government Act ought to be imperative and not permissive; for it is found by experience that permissive legislation has never been acted upon, because the operation of the measure lies most in the hands of the district officers, whose administrative capacities, position, education, liberality of views, prejudices personal and national, and other circumstances make a unification of the two interests, those of the governors and the governed, an impossibility. Unless the Panjáb Local Self-government Bill is essentially modified before it is allowed to pass into an Act, it cannot be said to harmonize with the liberal policy of the present Government of India. [The Native Opinion (10) of the same date also disapproves of the Panjáb Local Self-government Bill.]

Legislation—The Native Magistrates' Jurisdiction Bill.

Does not approve of any compromise being effected in the matter of the Native Magistrates' Jurisdiction Bill.

The Dnyán Prakásh (8) of the 21st June quotes an extract from an article in the London Daily News on the subject of the agitation both in India and in England against Mr. Ilbert's Bill, and remarks:—One curious feature of the present agitation is that it has made the loudest noise in the Bengal Presidency, and that the leaders of the agitation there have been vilifying the natives of the country in the coarsest language, though Bengal is one of those provinces which have been longest under the British rule. Where there ought to be the greatest cordiality and good-will between the rulers and the ruled, between Europeans and Natives, there we find nothing but unmitigated hostility and antipathy between the two races. What is the explanation of this curious phenomenon? We think it is not possible to account for it upon any ground other than that the consciousness of Europeans that they are a privileged class encouraged them to indulge in every kind of vilification of the natives of the country. This circumstance, coupled with the fact that the leaders of the agitation in Calcutta mismanaged the whole affair from the first, affords some explanation, though not quite satisfactory, of the curious phenomenon. Be the explanation what it may, one thing is certain, and it is this that there is now existing between the two communities the widest possible breach, which it will take years to bridge over. As the London journal admits, the Anglo-Indian community is mainly responsible for this deplorable state of things, and the result is that the Government of India will find it very difficult, if not altogether impossible, to effect any compromise whatever in the matter of the Native Magistrates' Jurisdiction Bill. If such a compromise is effected, the Government of India will be open to the charge of yielding to misrepresentation, violence and menace;—at any rate, it will be very difficult to convince the Native community of the contrary if such a compromise is effected. The Bill as now put forth is itself a compromise, and the Government of India will do well to seriously consider its position before it commits itself to any compromise whatever.

Comments on the opinion of the Bombay Government in regard to the Native Magistrates' Jurisdiction Bill.

The Gujarát Mitrá (75) of the 17th June says:—The Bombay Government, in giving its opinion on the Native Magistrates' Jurisdiction Bill, is said to have proposed that Native Magistrates should be empowered to try Europeans on this condition that the trial should be conducted with the aid of a jury composed of Europeans and Natives in an equal proportion. We have already seen through this trick of the Bombay Government. It wishes to deprive, though in an indirect way, Native Magistrates of the power of passing a sentence on European criminals. This Government knows full well that if trials are carried on with the aid of a jury there will be left no power in the hands of Native Magistrates. If the jury acquits a criminal the Magistrate will have no choice but to discharge him though he may be really guilty, or if the jury find the accused guilty but recommend him to the mercy of the Court, the Magistrate will have to accede to the recommendation. Moreover, in a jury composed of Europeans and Natives it is very natural that some of the latter should side with the former. In these days independence is a rare quality among Natives, and they will inevitably be overpowered by the influence of Europeans and be ready to go with them. When the Bombay Government is fully aware of all these particulars, why should it not make the proposals above alluded to? It is a different question whether the Supreme Government will accept the views of this Government, but it is certain that the latter have intended this trick as a sop to satisfy Natives. Such a policy, however, unmistakably betrays a want of confidence in the people of this country. The distinction between Europeans and Natives therefore remains intact. It is a matter of regret that such tricks on the part of high officials should serve to bring a stain on their honesty. With so many appellate courts it is not intelligible why Europeans should have been so much unsettled by the minor reform proposed to be introduced. They are known to look down upon Natives as thoroughly dishonest and malicious. This, however, is an insult not only to Native officers but to Her Majesty's Government, which has thought fit to engage their services. [The Broach Samáchár (86) of the 21st June expresses similar sentiments. The Lok Mitrá (77) of the 17th idem disapproves of the compromise said to have been proposed by this Government as unfeasible and least likely to be accepted by the Government of India.]

Wishes that the Jurisdiction Bill may be passed into a law as it stands.

The Bakul (16) of the 17th June observes that the Native Magistrates' Jurisdiction Bill is likely to undergo important changes before it is passed into a law, and should this happen, European offenders will easily escape punishment. The suggestions made by the Bombay Government for making certain changes in the Bill appear to be good; but it is doubtful whether they will be accepted and will lead to good results. If the Bill is not passed as it stands, there will be little or no hope of Natives getting further concessions hereafter. If Lord Ripon fails in his present attempt, Viceroys of less liberal sentiments will hardly be able to do anything of the kind. It is to be hoped that Government will disabuse the minds of the people of India of the impression that foreign rulers, howsoever civilized, will not concede to the conquered race the same rights and privileges as are enjoyed by the ruling classes.

Requests the Bombay Government to publish at once the opinions given by the officers of this Presidency on the Native Magistrates' Jurisdiction Bill.

The Yajdán Parast (120) of the 17th June expresses a hope that the opinions given by the Bombay Government and several of its officers on the Native Magistrates' Jurisdiction Bill will be published at once in pursuance of the permission given by the Supreme Government. The majority of Government officials have supported the Bill and it will be very gratifying to read their opinions. A Native officer, a Pársi Deputy Collector, has condemned the Bill, but since he possesses very little experience on the subject his opinion cannot be of any value. It is very surprising that Government should have thought fit to ask for the opinion of such an inexperienced officer of a low grade on a subject of such importance.

Education.

Prays Lord Ripon to encourage the study of the Sanskrit language.

The Dnyán Prakásh (8) of the 21st June, in a communicated article, dwells at considerable length on the present depressed state of the study of the Sanskrit language in India, and advises the British Government and Native States to strain every nerve to bring about a regeneration of the sacred language of the country. The writer prays Lord Ripon to give a fresh impetus to the study of Sanskrit by ordering catalogues to be prepared of the existing Sanskrit schools, by laying down particular standards of studies to be followed in such schools, and by allowing grants-in-aid according to the results of examinations.

Disapproves of the arrangements recently approved by Government for giving medical education to women.

In noticing the resolution of the Government of Bombay approving of the proposal of Mr. Chatfield and Dr. Carter to institute a new examination of female medical students similar to that of the Apothecary class, the Bombay Samáchár (85) of the 19th June observes that there seems no good reason for making such an incomplete arrangement as that proposed to be adopted. One cannot conceive what object can be attained by giving an incomplete education to women; and if the Grant Medical College authorities are not in a position to give the female students a knowledge of obstetrics, which is so very important in their case, they ought to admit their inability and await the perfection of arrangements for the accomplishment of that object. It will not do to make the female students learn with the male students of the Grant Medical College. Probably European ladies will be found willing to do so, but no Native women will come forward and the real object of giving medical instruction to Native females will be missed. It will be well therefore to await the arrival of a lady doctor from Europe and then to open a class under her direction. This class may be attached for practical instruction either to the Sir Jamsetji Jíjibhái or the Gokuldás Tejpál Hospital. If no funds are available to make this arrangement, they should be collected through the committee which has so disinterestedly undertaken the work of obtaining medical instruction for Native females. [The Jáme Jamshed (98) and the Akhbáre Sodágar (81) of the same date and the Dátardun (89) of the 21st June express similar sentiments.]

Considers the recently fixed standards for Gujaráti schools as defective in several particulars.

The Bombay Samáchár (85) of the 20th June observes that the standards recently fixed for the school course of the Government and aided Gujaráti schools lay down such heavy studies as to require young students to spend more time at home than at school to prepare their daily lessons, and to compel their teachers to spend all the school-hours in examining the boys in order to ascertain that the task set to them is performed. Such heavy work taxes the brains of the students to an evil extent and compels them to contract the habit of telling falsehoods. A complaint about the heaviness of the standards was made by several experienced persons before the Education Commission, and Dr. Hunter promised to lay it before the Supreme Government in his final report. The educational authorities ought to have awaited the result of the reference promised to be made to Government before prescribing new standards. Again, primary education will under the scheme of local self-government be shortly transferred to municipal corporations, and certainly it will be the duty of the municipalities concerned to lay down the different standards. The main defect of the newly fixed standards is that subjects in language are much curtailed, while arithmetical subjects are multiplied. This presses heavily, particularly on children of 6 or 7 years of age. In Germany and other European countries children are allowed nearly twice the time they spend on study for recreation, and this arrangement is found to be very favourable to their health and progress in learning; but the Educational Department of this Presidency allows to the students for the same purpose scarcely half the time that they are required to spend in learning their lessons. It is desirable therefore that the different standards should be so fixed as to prevent their becoming an unbearable burden on the students, particularly young children, who should be relieved of heavy arithmetical lessons and made to read instructive and entertaining lessons in language.

Says that the first five books of Hope's Gujaráti series should be printed in bold type.

The Yajdán Parast (120) of the 17th June observes that the first five books of Hope's Gujaráti series are read by children from five to nine years of age. These books are printed in small pica type and are stereotyped, but the smallness of the type injures the sight of the children. The sight of children is naturally weak and the small type injures it so much as to compel many of them to wear spectacles. Many Pársi boys are seen using spectacles, and this may to some extent be attributed to the smallness of the type of their school-books. A large type ought therefore to be used for these books without delay. This change may necessitate an enhancement of the price of the school-books, but the parents of school-boys will not grudge the extra cost for the protection of the sight of their children.

Disapproves of the conduct of Mr. Uttamrám, the Head Master of the Surat High School, in inflicting fines on the students who failed to post their exercises to him during the recent May vacation.

The Vartamán Sár (117) of the 19th June animadverts on the conduct of the Head Master of the Surat High School in having punished certain boys who failed to post their essays to the address of the Head Master during the recent vacation according to the instructions said to have been given by him. The practice of bringing undue pressure to bear upon students and of asking them to send their exercises by post is very objectionable. No European Head Master has issued such an order up to this day. Some of the defaulting students were fined from one anna to one rupee, some were exempted from the fine, while some free students also were made to pay the fine. The practice of inflicting fines which is spreading in this school is very objectionable. The parents of the students have to pay the fine and not the students. The scholars learn to resort to unfair means for the purpose of getting money to pay the fine when they are afraid of asking their parents for it. It is to be hoped that the Head Master will not hereafter resort to this mode of punishment.

Disapproves of the recommendation made by the Acting Commissioner of Berár that Government should leave the work of educating the people to private parties.

The Bombay Samáchár (85) of the 18th June observes that while experienced persons expressed their opinion before the Education Commission that Government should not give up the work of educating the people, Mr. Howell, the Acting Commissioner of Berár, recommends that the State should give up and the people should take up that work. He argues that as it is not the duty of Government to feed the people, so neither it is their duty to give them education. But he knows well that Government have been doing the work for many years past and no evil result has followed. Mr. Howell admits that if Government discontinue their connection with education in Berár almost all schools will be closed, but says that they will certainly be revived after a time. But how would the Commissioner feel if his growing children were excluded from education for some years, and what results would he expect from such exclusion? It is to be trusted that Government will not try the experiment in Berár.

Comments in connection with the Report on Public Instruction in the Hyderabad Assigned Districts and a prayer for the appointment of Mr. S. B. Jathár as Director of Public Instruction in case of the present Director retiring from the service on pension.

The Mahrátta (2) of the 17th June, in reviewing the Report on Public Instruction in the Hyderabad Assigned Districts for the year 1881-82, remarks :—During the seven years that Ráo Báhádur Náráyan Bhái Dándekar has been working as Director of Public Instruction in Berár he has been able to show a steady progress in all departments of education. When his appointment was made in 1875 some anti-Native exponents expressed their misgivings as to how far the Native Director would be able to direct the course of education and maintain it on a sound footing; but the work that he has been able to achieve during the last seven years by dint of care, assiduity and indefatigable exertions gives the best lie to any fears that may have been entertained. Berár is not comparatively an advanced province and we must not expect education to progress there with the rapidity of the prophet's gourd. Still if we examine the facts and figures given in this report there is every reason to be satisfied with the progress shown. It is pleasant to find that the Amráoti High School has been showing a decided superiority over the Akola High School, headed as it is by a European gentleman. During the four years from 1878 to 1881 the former passed 17 students at the matriculation examination, while the latter passed 6 only. The great superiority of the Amráoti High School, the Head Master of which is a Native, may serve as one of the many illustrations that are now seen of the fact that Natives are competent to discharge the duties of head masters of high schools. Much ought to be done by the Department of Public Instruction to incorporate private indigenous schools into the general system of education on the principle of grants-in-aid. Unfortunately the Department of Public Instruction in this Presidency has not done as much as it ought to have done for the improvement of indigenous schools, but we hope the Director of Public Instruction in Berár will vigorously encourage the indigenous school system on the principle of grants-in-aid, instead of starting a Government school whenever a desire is shown by the people to have one. On the whole, the Department of Education in Berár may be said to have shown quite satisfactory results under the regime of its present Director, perhaps more satisfactory than those under European Directorship. Ráo Báhádur Náráyan Bhái has fully justified the confidence reposed in his abilities by the Government of Lord Northbrook which made the nomination, and the public have no reason to complain of the department having been placed under Native management. We are sorry, however, that Berár will probably have to lose the services of this veteran officer, for it is believed that he will shortly retire from the service. Supposing he retires, we assuredly believe his successor will be a Native and not a European, especially under the regime of Lord Ripon; and that Native should, we think, be no other than Mr. Shrirám Bhikáji Jathár, B. A., who has long been serving in Berár as Educational Inspector and who now holds the acting appointment of Director. Whoever be selected, we have no doubt a competent Native will be appointed to the post, but the public will be fully satisfied if it be conferred upon Mr. Jathár instead of upon an educational officer imported from this Presidency or any other province. Mr. Jathár has contributed much to the organization of the Educational Department when Dr. Sinclair was Director of Public Instruction, and has by his manifold services and large educational experience shown himself in every way worthy to be Ráo Báhádur Náráyan Bhái's successor. We hope the public will not be disappointed in their expectations.

Railways.

Suggests the construction of a railway line from Bársi Road to Pandharpur.

A correspondent of the Pandhari Vaibhav (47) of the 17th June dwells on the inconvenience caused to pilgrims visiting Pandharpur by the absence of a railway line from Bársi Road to Pandharpur. This line is said to have been in contemplation for a long time, but matters do not appear to have progressed further than a mere survey of land. There is great prospect of the line proving a success, and it is to be hoped that the railway authorities will consider the subject in right earnest.

Municipalities.

Makes remarks upon the frequent postponements of the meetings of the Municipal Corporation of Bombay for want of a quorum.

The Lok Mitrá (77) of the 17th June observes :—It is hardly creditable to the public spirit and the sense of duty of the members of the Municipal Corporation of Bombay that its meetings should have to be so often postponed for want of a quorum. The irregularity and unpunctuality of some of the members of that body are growing into a scandal, and unless some strong measures are taken forthwith to ensure more regular attendance the business of the Corporation must come to a stand-still. The quarter of an hour of grace allowed by the Chairman is evidently not the right thing to secure the attendance of the members in time so as not to necessitate frequent adjournments, and unless a more effective measure is adopted it will be impossible to bring the defaulting members to a sense of their duty. The members who punctually attend, often at considerable personal sacrifice, to discharge the trust reposed in them have a right to complain of the injustice with which they are treated by the absent members, and surely it is very discreditable to Bombay, especially when the experiment of local autonomy on an adequate scale is about to be tried, that the members of its Corporation should so far neglect their duty as not to attend the meetings in time. This is a matter which Government will have to take in hand, unless a repetition of the scandal of frequent adjournments for want of a quorum is immediately done away with. [The Bombay Chronicle (74) and the Yajdán Parast (120) of the same date express similar sentiments.]

Advises the municipality of Bombay not to give up to Government the duties levied on tobacco and spirits, and makes some other suggestions on the subject.

The Jáme Jamshed (98) of the 19th June advises the municipality of Bombay not to accept the proposal made by Government to relieve the Corporation of the burden of police expenditure on condition that the latter should give over to Government the income derived from duties levied on tobacco and spirits, and should undertake to meet the educational and some other expenses. After alluding to Professor Peterson's arguments on the subject with approval, the Jáme observes that Lord Ripon's instructions in the matter are highly satisfactory, and hence the Corporation should request the Bombay Government to undertake the cost of the police and the Gokuldás Tejpál Hospital and to leave to the Corporation the maintenance of the educational establishments of the city, as the latter is a gradually growing item. If the Corporation gives up the duties on tobacco and spirits, it will unnecessarily forego its own rights and have to bear a pecuniary loss.

Observes that the town duty levied on wheat in Bombay should not be abolished before exempting from the burden rice, fuel and other articles largely consumed by the poor people.

With reference to the recommendation made by Government to the municipality of Bombay to abolish the town duty levied on wheat, and the discussion on the subject at the last meeting of the Town Council, the Bombay Samáchár (85) of the 18th June observes that the real question is that while a duty is levied on other kinds of grain, ghee, oil, fuel and other articles of food, why should the duty on wheat only be abolished? If it be said that wheat is to be exempted from the duty for the welfare of Bombay, is not a similar exemption of other articles of food desirable on the same ground? Rice, fuel and some other articles are mainly used by the poor and ought therefore to be exempted from duty before wheat, which is principally consumed by well-to-do and rich people, is freed from the burden. In conclusion, the Samáchár hopes that the Town Council will duly consider the above arguments and relieve the poor people from some municipal burdens before abolishing the duty on wheat.

Disapproves of worn out bullocks being destroyed by the Bombay Municipality.

The Native Opinion (10) of the 17th June and the Din Bandhu (5) of the same date express their disapproval of the resolution adopted by the Town Council sanctioning the destruction of old and worn out animals belonging to the municipality. The writers consider such a resolution as an outrage to humanity, and advocate the maintenance of the animals till they die a natural death.

Does not approve of the new drainage scheme for the city of Poona.

The Poona Vaibhav (48) of the 17th June does not approve of the drainage scheme for the city of Poona proposed for adoption by Colonel Ducat, and suggests that the scheme may be undertaken in parts, the municipality arranging to look to the requirements of those parts of the town first where even under the present arrangements there are no drains. Such a policy, while saving the people much annoyance and trouble, will obviate the necessity of the municipality involving itself in debt.

Complains of the spread of cholera in Poona.

The Dnyán Prakásh (8) of the 18th June says that cholera has made considerable progress in the city of Poona and censures the municipality for not having taken early measures for the prevention of the disease. The spread of the disease is owing to the impure nature of drinking water and the uncleanly state of the roads in the town.

Complains of the absence of lights in the Belgaum Camp.

A correspondent of the Din Bandhu (5) of the 17th June complains of the inconvenience caused to the public by the absence of street lamps in the Belgaum Camp, and requests the authorities concerned to remove the grievance at an early date.

Complains of the nuisance caused by open carts taking night-soil by the main roads in Surat.

A correspondent of the Gujarát Mitrá (75) of the 16th June says that it is very surprising that neither the Sanitary Superintendent nor the secretary of the Surat Municipality should have taken steps to remove the cause of the complaint raised by the town people regarding the annoyance caused by open carts carrying night-soil by the main roads near Chowk Bazár and Muglisara. In these days of intense heat, when it is necessary to take measures for the protection of the public health, carts with their filthy contents exposed to the public gaze, and which after passing leave behind for about a quarter of an hour a horrible stench, are allowed to spoil the sanitation of the place. If there had been a white-skinned gentleman living on these roads the nuisance would have been put a stop to at once.

A complaint against the Sholápur Municipality regarding the levy of the water rate.

The Kalpataru (32) of the 17th June is very much grieved at the hardship caused to the people of Sholápur in the matter of the levy of the water rate, and also at the disgraceful ignorance of law betrayed by the municipal commissioners. The obligation of the people to pay this tax until the debt incurred on account of water-supply is wholly cleared cannot be waived, but the committee seem to be wanting in the knack of collecting money without giving offence to the public. The first notice given by the municipality in 1881, declaring the imposition of the water rate, was itself incomplete and was therefore declared by a court of law to be illegal. The best course for the committee to follow under these circumstances was to remain content with their position. They have, however, ventured on an appeal to a superior court, and until the decision of such court is declared in favour of the committee there is no way of realizing the water rate for the year 1881-82. The commissioners have now, with the intention of doing away with the obloquy of having lost a year's income by their own ignorance of law, resorted to the trick of levying on the people the dues on account of this tax for the period commencing from 1st October 1881 and ending with 31st March 1883, on the strength of a notice given on 5th April 1882. The law provides for the issue of a notice as a preliminary step in all cases of taxation, but does not give a municipality power to levy a tax for a year preceding the date of notice. It is therefore very doubtful whether the committee can compel the payment of dues on account of the year 1881. In the notice given by the committee it is stated that the dues will be collected for every six months. Why then should bills be preferred by the committee for the dues of one year and a half? It will be a great hardship to the people to have to pay the accumulated tax in one instalment, and it is therefore necessary that the arrears should be realized in small instalments. People also complain of the way in which they have been assessed to the water rate, and the secretary to the municipality is said to have been gagging the mouths of the complainants and rejecting the petitions preferred by them. This conduct of the secretary deserves to be noticed by the municipal committee. [A correspondent of the Dnyán Prakásh (8) of the 18th June also makes a similar complaint.]

Objects to the assignment of a plot of ground within the municipal limits of Ratnágiri for slaughtering cattle.

The Satyá Shodhak (56) of the 17th June dwells at considerable length on the question that is at present engaging the attention of the municipality of Ratnágiri of allotting a plot of ground for slaughtering cattle on, and says that the necessity for such allotment was hitherto never felt and is not recognized even at this day by any persons other than a few Europeans. It is certain that if any space be so allotted, it will greatly offend the susceptibilities of the Hindu population. Even if the necessity of this measure be granted for the sake of argument, it will be imprudent to assign any space for the purpose within municipal limits.

Native States.

Requests the Gáekwád's Government to enquire into the alleged murder of eleven members of a family residing in a village near Amreli.

In noticing the report that the head of a certain Bania family residing in a village near Amreli in the Gáekwád's territory cut the heads of eleven members of his family, men, women and children, offered them to the family idol and at last destroyed himself, the Bombay Samáchár (85) of the 19th June observes that due enquiries ought to be instituted into the painful matter with a view to ascertain the truth. It is said that several Káthis of the village bore enmity to the deceased Bania, and are suspected of having committed the diabolical deed.

Is glad that Ráo Báhádur Manibhái Jasbhái has been restored to the Diwánship of the Cutch State.

After recapitulating the circumstances under which the late Cutch Regency was abolished and Ráo Báhádur Manibhái Jasbhái removed from the Diwánship of that State, the Yajdán Parast (120) of the 17th June observes that the re-appointment of the Ráo Báhádur to the Diwánship leads to the inference that the objection advanced by the late Regency to the appointment of a Bháyád in that Regency was just and that the conduct of the Bombay Government in the matter was erroneous. It is very gratifying that the Bombay Government has seen its mistake and has corrected it by restoring Ráo Báhádur Manibhái to his former office. He previously secured the good wishes of the subjects of the State, and it is to be hoped that he will achieve further success in the same line. [The Samsher Báhádur (109) of the 15th June expresses similar sentiments.]

Prays that the Ránis and Princes of the late Mahárája of Chhota Udepur may be treated with greater consideration than at present.

A correspondent of the Gujarát Mitrá (75) of the 17th June, writing from Chhota Udepur, says :—The case regarding the Ránis of the late Mahárája Jitsingji has not yet been decided. The Mahárája had during his lifetime given over some villages to these Ránis and the latter wish to retain in their possession the identical villages. The villages that are offered to them in lieu of the original villages assigned to them are so worthless that with their possession it will be difficult for the Ránis to maintain their position and honour. It is but just that the directions given by the late Mahárája in his will should be obeyed. It behoves the British Government to interfere in the matter and to deal out even-handed justice to the parties concerned. The police also have been causing great vexation to the Ránis. They asked the Ránis to allow them to search their palaces on suspicion that the rebel Thákor of Rájpur had taken refuge in them, but nothing came out of the search. The Ránis and Princes were much offended at this treatment, and it would have been better if some other trick had been adopted for securing the desired end. The Ránis have begun to think that their honour is no longer safe. The writer requests the Bombay Government to remonstrate with the Mahárája against any such treatment being accorded to the Ránis in future.

Comments in connection with the Pálitána Darbár.

The Samsher Báhádur (109) of the 15th June observes that the Pálitána Darbár is well-versed in intrigues and in maintaining its claims by means either fair or foul. The Thákor has not tasted of the excellent fruits of the civilization of the nineteenth century. How then is it to be expected that such a Thákor will go with the age and introduce reforms into his State? He is very conceited and is anxious to pass off as the wisest of all Káthiáwári potentates. If he appreciated learning he would certainly have sent his two sons to the Rájkumár College. It is not known what steps he has taken for the spread of education among his subjects. The wisdom of the Thákor consists in confining his young sons in the harem and teaching them to stick to old customs, while the petty Girássiás, Bháyáts and Rájás of Káthiáwár are sending their sons to the Rájkumár College for instruction. [The Vartamán Sár (117) of the 19th June disapproves of the above views and asks the Samsher to point out a Native State which is entirely free from intrigues. Who can maintain that a knowledge of English only makes a man clever and intelligent? Has not the Thákor introduced any reforms into his State? He has good reasons for not sending his sons to the Rájkumár College. They receive good education at home, an education which some persons do not receive even at the College. The writer understands the reason of the Samsher writing in this strain. When has the Samsher praised the Thákor? The Vartamán Sár considers the Thákor to be clever and intelligent.]

Requests Government to make the Rána of Porbandar appoint a Diwán for his State.

The Gujaráti (94) of the 17th June says:—What is to become of Porbandar? We do not understand what feat Colonel Barton has achieved by making the Rána dismiss his Diwán, Mr. Nagindás. For nearly a year there has been no Diwán at Porbandar, and this leads us to infer that Colonel Barton will allow anarchy to go on rather than have a man of opposite political views as Diwán. If this be so, what should we think of the Government of Sir James Fergusson? The injustice of making the Rána dismiss his Diwán can scarcely find a parallel in Káthiáwár, and the injustice has been aggravated by the Government of Bombay sealing the action of the Political Agent with their approval. However, what is done cannot be undone. We request the Government to coerce the Rána into accepting a competent Diwán, as otherwise the miseries of the people will never come to an end.

Says that the Chief of Dhrángadra should appoint a competent Diwán.

The Gujaráti (94) of the 17th June says:—The question of the appointment of a Diwán to the State of Dhrángadra has not yet been settled. Dhrángadra is a first class State, and so long as no competent Diwán is appointed to it there is no chance of the amelioration of the condition of the people. The Ránis seem to have much influence with the Darbár, and hence it is that no man has yet been selected. Of the several causes that have led to the maladministration in the State, the first is the influence of the zenána and the second the absence of a competent Diwán. It is necessary that the Rája should keep himself free from the influence of his zenána and should appoint a Diwán to administer the affairs of his State. The British Government also—not the Political Agent—should assist the Rája in securing the services of a qualified officer and thus put a stop to the complaints of the people of the State.

Mentions the cause of a strike amongst the merchants of Chánod.

A correspondent of the Ahmedabad Samáchár (80) of the 20th June, writing from Chánod, says that as the Assistant Political Agent, Rewa Kántha, has now come to the village of Mándvi, the merchants of Chánod are required to supply his men with the necessary articles of food. As these tradesmen were not sufficiently paid for the articles supplied by them, they discontinued the supply. On this the Rána Sáheb of Mándvi took action against Máneklál Ghela and eight others and sentenced each of them to four days' imprisonment and a fine of Rs. 10. All the merchants struck work and closed their shops on the 13th June. The shops had not been re-opened up to the time the correspondent wrote this letter. The same correspondent adds that thefts are on the increase on the Chánod railway station, and suggests that measures should be taken to put a stop to them.

Complains of mismanagement at Sáyla.

A correspondent of the Samsher Báhádur (109) of the 15th June says that the administration of Vakhatsangji, the present ruler of Sáyla, has not proved successful. He does not command the services of good kárbháris, keeps the company of his personal attendants, and holds orthodox views. It is necessary, therefore, that Government should give him an able Diwán and make arrangements for keeping him in good company. Complaints regarding the tyrannical management of the Darbár have reached the writer. The Darbár ought to encourage the introduction of reforms and ought to make the people happy.

Advances the claims of Mr. Bálkrishna Lakshman Bápat to the Acting Educational Inspectorship in Berár.

In alluding to the report that Mr. Bajába Rámchandra Pradhán, the District Inspector of Akola, will be appointed Acting Educational Inspector in Berár, the Varhád Samáchár (67) of the 18th June observes that in recommending Mr. Pradhán, the Director of Public Instruction seems to have overlooked the superior claims to promotion of Mr. Bálkrishna Lakshman Bápat, the District Inspector of Amráoti. The latter officer was serving in the Educational Department some years before Mr. Pradhán entered the department. Moreover, Mr. Bápat always gained higher grades in the service long before Mr. Pradhán was promoted to them. [The Pramod Sindhu (51) of the same date expresses similar sentiments.]

Notes.—A. The notices from the different Newspapers have been collected in the Report under different heads, which are printed in italics.

B. The names of Newspapers are printed in the body of the Report in italics, and the number of the Newspaper in the above list is printed in brackets after the name.

C. The proprietors of the Newspapers marked * have not given information as to the number of copies issued. In these cases an estimate has been made by the Reporter.

D. The system of spelling vernacular words followed by the Reporter is the same as that adopted in the Official Spelling List of the Bombay Presidency. One peculiar feature of this system is that when the long a (आ or ा) is the last letter of a word, the accent is left out, and the short a (अ = u in gun) is, to prevent confusion, never placed at the end of a word. This rule has been strictly followed, except that when the short a appears to be absolutely necessary to complete the pronunciation of a word, as in Arunodaya or the well known Mitra, it is printed with a mark over it to indicate that it is short, thus—ă.

E. Berár papers are received in this office for report under the Resolution of the Government of Bombay in the General Department, No. 1795, dated 8th June 1881.

Politics and the Public Administration.

Says that the British rule is good for the rich but not for the poor.

The Gujaráti (94) of the 24th June publishes in its leading columns an article in the form of a letter purporting to be written by a gentleman from Tithal in the Surat District who had some conversation with a member of the cultivating class, which elicited the following particulars :—The British rule has no doubt contributed to the protection of the people from robbers and dacoits, but it has served to impose upon the people the heavy burden of supplying Government officers with all the necessaries, though they may not be available for the use of the people themselves. Under the British rule poor people find it very difficult to obtain redress of their grievances. People used to be oppressed in former times, but when they were unable to pay their taxes they were relieved of the burden. The British rule is good only for the rich but not for the poor.

Approves of the despatch of the Secretary of State for India regarding the levy of a contribution of Rs. 15,000 by the Bombay Government from the municipality for working the Contagious Diseases Act.

In an article headed "The Secretary of State and the Contagious Diseases Act," the Indu Prakásh (9) of the 25th June observes :—If the Government of Bombay were to seek for a motto for itself, none would be more appropriate than the one which Dean Swift applied to a certain gentleman when he said of him that he had "the perpetual misfortune to be mistaken." The Government has perpetrated a series of mistakes. It was in error when it passed the Mhowra Bill; it was in error when it introduced Madras in the place of Bombay time; and it is already said that it has been found to be in error as regards the Junágad question. And now another of its errors has been found out. The Secretary of State has declared that the Government of Bombay was not justified in saddling the municipality of this city with an annual contribution of Rs. 15,000 for the Contagious Diseases Act against the wishes of the Corporation. After the declared condemnation of the principle of the Act in England, it was only to be expected that the Secretary of State would have to say some such thing to the authorities here. That is not local self-government which allows a government to set aside the pronounced opinion of a municipal body and carry a measure in the teeth of public opposition. [The Lok Mitrá (77), the Mahrátta (2) and the Yajdán Parast (120) of the 24th June express similar sentiments.]

Points out the necessity of reducing the public expenditure of India.

The Indian Spectator (1) of the 24th June says :—We have repeatedly expressed our conviction that owing to the inelasticity of important sources of revenue, it is highly desirable that there should be a complete revision of the present system of public expenditure in India. When this question is considered in all its bearings it will be found to resolve itself eventually into this, that India's hope of a prosperous finance lies in the employment of increased Native agency in the administration, and in the reduction of civil and military expenses, which at present eat away nearly five-eighths of the net annual revenue. We have repeatedly urged that the Government of India leans on a very weak reed when it counts upon opium and salt revenues. We take these two items to be the most disturbing elements of Indian finance. If you expunge opium receipts alone from the revenue side of the account, you are brought face to face with the appalling deficit of nearly 7 to 8 millons sterling. Is the most talented Finance Minister prepared to suggest some oiher mode of recouping this revenue either by direct or indirect taxation? tWe have already pointed out how oppressive is the salt duty even now. We ask, then, whether the finances of India can reasonably be said to rest on a stable foundation when nearly 8 millions are derived from taxing a foreign nation and $5\frac{3}{4}$ millions from taxing a necessary of life of an impoverished people whose average income per head is Rs. 27 per year? How long will such a state of things continue? Can Government always depend on the Chinese for giving it 8 millions? And is it humane to wrench from the half-starved even the smallest fraction of his income of Rs. 27 per year? Add to these the tax on account of registration and stamps, which is already very oppressive. Then look at the figure of 5 millions for pensions and allowances. But what is the use of referring to these hard and incontrovertible facts over and over again? You have had in the past commissions and finance committees by dozens and their reports by miles. But what have they availed? If at all, since the last finance committee that sat by the order of the House of Commons in 1871, you have increased public expenditure fully 16 per cent., while your revenue has only shown an improvement of 9 per cent.? When is the Government to make a serious beginning? We fear that all half-hearted attempts at reduction will prove a failure. If expenditure is to be reduced at all, you must first overhaul the revenue side of the account. Unless you first determine what amount of taxation can be derived without hardship from a population whose annual income per head does not go, and will not go for years to come, beyond Rs. 27 or Rs. 30 at the most, all attempts at overhauling the accounts will be so many temporary palliatives or makeshifts. No doubt you will be able to conduct the administration as you have hitherto done, but it will be administered, as it is now, by draining the vitals of the people. They collect from wealthy England, which has an annual income of 1,000 millions, only 83 millions for purposes of Government, that is to say, 8½ per cent. of the entire produce of the country. But they mercilessly squeeze India, which has an annual income of only 300 millions, to the extent of 60 to 65 millions, or 22 per cent.! What an appalling difference! Who is better able to bear the taxation of 22 per cent., England or India? And yet by a cruel irony of fate, a poor country, whose people can barely live from hand to mouth, who die of starvation by millions in a year of famine, whose necessary of life is heavily taxed, is filched of its annual produce to the extent of 22 per cent., while the wealthiest country in the world is made to pay only 8 per cent. But this is not the limit of India's misfortune. The 8 per cent. raised in England is expended in England and thus the capital of the country fructifies from year to year. But in India the case is very different. The 22 per cent. raised in the country does not remain there. Nearly one-half is drained away elsewhere. This adds to the misery of the helpless and voiceless millions. Now we seriously ask whether it is fair that India should be taxed 22 per cent. of its annual produce. Ought not 8 or 10 per cent., say even 12 per cent., as we have to feed a foreign agency, suffice for the wants of government in a wretched country like this? Is there no hope of adjusting the revenue side so as to eliminate all precarious items of receipts and reduce oppressive items? In short, whether you cannot bring revenue to a total figure of 40 instead of 60 millions? That is the primary problem which Indian financiers ought to solve. When we have such a set of financiers who, maturely considering the present woful condition of India, devise sound ways and means to raise the country from poverty to moderate prosperity,—when, in fact, they bring expenditure within a measurable distance of such revenue as can be easily borne by the people—expenditure which will leave a surplus and stimulate accumulation of capital in the country,—then and then alone will India be said to have really taken a new departure in State finance. All other remedies will fall far short of the desired object, and in proportion to their shortness will be the mischief that they will create. What is wanted is a radical cure.

Says that there is no fear of a Russian conquest of India so long as the British rulers command the affections of the people of this country.

With reference to the opinion expressed by the Temps that Mr. Gladstone by taking Egypt has not only lost the good wishes of France but has re-opened the Eastern question and furnished Russia with a pretext for accomplishing her various projects, the last step in which will be the conquest of British India, the Bombay Chronicle (74) of the 24th June observes that this opinion is indicative of the profound ignorance of the French journalist about the real state of India. The natives of India have a strong leaning towards the British Government and nation in preference to all other European and Asiatic nations, and they have begun to realize the fact that no foreign rule can possibly prove more beneficial to them than that of the British. As for Russia, let foreigners write and say whatever they like about the chance of her being the future mistress of India; but the people of India will never commit the mistake of looking upon the despoilers and oppressors of Poland as being ever likely to prove such good rulers as the generous and philanthropic British. So long as Britannia rules the waves and commands the affections of the people of this country by virtue of her right as the just, generous and freedom-loving suzerain, Russian conquest will be a mere dream and not a reality.

The Satyá Shodhak (56) of the 24th June describes the havoc committed by locusts in the Khed Táluka of the Ratnágiri District, and says that the people have become desperate. In such circumstances it is the duty of Government to assist the ryots and to relieve them from distress. It is necessary that urgent measures should be devised for supplying with corn such of the cultivators as have been reduced to a helpless condition on account of the locusts having eaten away the seed sown by them in their fields. Government should purchase corn and should make arrangements for distributing it among those who need it most either for sowing purposes or for feeding themselves. The importance of promptness in giving corn for sowing purposes cannot be exaggerated, as when the season is once past the cultivator will not be able to turn out any crop from his soil. Mr. Wilson is very well acquainted with the Ratnágiri District and is conversant with the wants and wishes of the people, and there is every reason to hope that he will lose no time in ascertaining by personal inspection the extent of the distress prevailing in the Khed Táluka and in organizing measures for distributing corn among the people. Matters are also threatening to assume a similar aspect in the Chiplun, Sangameshvar, Dápoli and other tálukas, and it is necessary that the Assistant Collectors in the district should take timely measures for affording relief to the distressed population.

Suggests certain measures for affording relief to the distressed population in the Ratnágiri District.

The Mahrátta (2) of the 24th June, in noticing the petition preferred by the people of Thána against the rules and orders of Government and their subordinates in the administration of the forests in that Collectorate, remarks:—Government know full well that the people have been crying against the Forest Department, not without reason, and it is now high time that the long-standing grievance should be redressed. From the petition it is evident that it is the executive that is at fault and not the Act itself; that it is the folly and imprudence of some of the responsible authorities, and not the habits of the people, that have done immense mischief; that the solution of the difficulty lies in a nutshell, and that too in the hands of the people assisted by Government. The memorialists point to the Survey Department as being in part responsible for the mischief; but we should like to say that the whole mischief is due to that department. Anyone who knows the history of the Survey Department will at once say that the initial error lay in the attempt to survey and assess the whole country. This was the first attempt at disturbing the equilibrium of nature, and it is no wonder that the scourge has come in due time. We are sure that if the Forest Act had been passed in 1855, there could have been no reason left for us to complain of the Act at this time; for during the last 30 years a strict and careful conservancy would have given us sufficient fodder, grass and trees, so that the usufruct of the land alone would have given us enough and to spare. We regret to find that their ardour of conviction and their zeal for the cause have blinded the memorialists and they fail to see the truth. We have pointed out on former occasions that proclamations like that of Mr. Dunlop, referred to in the petition, have done serious mischief, and the severity of the present rules of forest conservancy is the legitimate outcome of such fatal mistakes committed by unthinking and imprudent officers. The district of Ratnágiri is loudly proclaiming to the world what the results of Mr. Dunlop's proclamation have been, and it is much to be regretted that such a proclamation was ever issued. When it is remembered that the Forest Department is not intended to be a revenue-paying department, people will soon begin to believe in its great usefulness. The present Viceroy has in a most decisive tone proclaimed to the officers of the department that there ought to be no wish in them whatever to make the Forest Department a revenue-paying department, and for aught we know affairs have taken a favourable turn. We repeat that the grievances of the people as stated in the first part of the petition cannot fairly be traced to any defect in the law. It is all the fault of the executive, and Government ought certainly to look to it. For the fault of certain individuals Government have been incurring the hatred of the ignorant masses, a state of things not at all desirable.

Comments in connection with the petition of the people of Thána against the working of the Forest Act.

In commenting on the Ratnágiri shooting case, the Mahrátta (2) of the 24th June observes:—From the facts of the case it was certainly idle to contend that Mr. Hewett did not know what the consequences of his act would be, or, in plain words, that his act would cause grievous hurt, if not death, though he might not have intended, in the technical sense of the word, to cause it. But whether he intended or not was immaterial, since by our Penal Code mere knowledge is enough to complete an offence. Again, provocation is, in the Indian law, no excuse for committing an offence. Under the circumstances, therefore, our English contemporaries may excuse the Native public if they regard Mr. Hewett as one of those few lucky beings who chance to escape somehow or other under some such pleas as 'no intention,' 'misunderstanding,' 'madness,' &c. Poor Mr. Bánnerji is in jail for unintentionally wounding what Mr. Sinnett calls the supersensitive dignity of a High Court Judge, and that too after an apology; while Mr. Hewett escapes for having unintentionally, but without any legal excuse, wounded his Native servant! We do not know whether reputation is more safe in these days than one's body. For on no other ground can we explain the facts. But, oh! we forget how by reason of our black skin our brains are ill adapted to venture on any guess as to the thoughts that crossed the innocent mind of Mr. Hewett when he shot at his Native servant. Well may the Times of India quote these remarks as a patent proof of the incapacity of Natives to sit in judgment upon Europeans, especially in matters relating to life and death, as has been proposed by the Native Magistrates' Jurisdiction Bill. But are we to suppose that Mr. Justice Bayley thinks in the same strain? He too, like the local Times, is known to have protested against the Jurisdiction Bill. Is it not very surprising that while Natives can with great difficulty induce Government to sanction the establishment of arbitration courts, not for the adjustment of criminal but civil cases, criminal cases, in their nature sufficiently atrocious, should be allowed to be settled by compromise. We can perfectly well understand that there may not have been sufficient evidence to convict Mr. Hewett on a charge of attempting to murder, but that does not show that there was not sufficient ground to amend the charge. The charge can be amended at any stage, and inasmuch as the High Court has not done it, we have every reason to believe that the unanimous verdict of the public will be that a wrong has been allowed to remain without a remedy. There is not even a particle of information to throw the least suspicion on the fact of the servant having suffered at the hands of Mr. Hewett, and justice requires that he should receive his due. [The Indu Prakásh (9) of the 25th June observes:—It is melancholy to think that the case has been throughout very unsatisfactorily disposed of. But for this the Government of Bombay are not to blame. They have done their duty conscientiously, and their action, departmental as well as judicial, will, it is to be hoped, prevent the repetition of such acts of grave indiscretion as have at least put a sad end to young Mr. Hewett's official prospects. The Indian Spectator (1) of the 24th June says that the decision of the High Court in this case will prove a dangerous precedent. Is the matter to rest here? The Deshi Mitrá (90) of the 28th June disapproves of the High Court's decision, and sarcastically remarks that the two High Court Judges who gave such an excellent decision should be raised as soon as possible to the Chief Justiceship by turns. Several other Maráthi and Gujaráti papers comment on the decision of the High Court in a similar strain.]

The Lok Mitrá (77) of the 24th June observes:—Since the time that Dr. Sidney Smith was ousted from his chair of Hygiene, a technical plea has invariably been brought against all Native applicants for some of the minor chairs at the Medical College, that all the professorships there are reserved exclusively for the members of the commissioned medical service. Whilst in Madras some of these minor chairs are bestowed on members of the apothecary class, and in Calcutta on men not connected with army medical establishment, we fail to see how in Bombay these appointments have been reserved for that service. There are now thirteen chairs in the Medical College, and running over the names of their occupants we find that these have been monopolized by ten Surgeon-Majors, four of whom hold, in addition to their full-time chairs, the minor professorships (each worth Rs. 200 per mensem) of Medical Jurisprudence, Hygiene, Comparative Anatomy and Botany. We have no faith in pluralists, and we believe that, however expert a person may be, he can only be a professor of one subject and not many. Sir James Fergusson, with all his India Office experience and training as an Under Secretary of State, ought to look upon such matters from a different point of view than that of vested interests and exclusive privileges, and must insist upon introducing a reform that will break such a monopoly and secure at the same time for our Educational Department men thoroughly acquainted with their subjects and practically conversant with the art of teaching. [The Mahrátta (2) of the same date cordially thanks Sir James Fergusson for the appointment, and says that it will not only be an encouragement to Dr. Sakhárám Arjun, who has made a special study of the subject of botany, but it will have a great influence on Native students generally. This is the third appointment of its kind, and such substitution of Native agency for European will go a great way to endear Sir James to the people in spite of his Madras time and other hobbies. This is a practical and prudent step which will be much appreciated. Many other Maráthi and Gujaráti papers approve of the appointment, and say that the change of policy recently adopted by Sir James Fergusson shows that His Excellency has turned over a new leaf in his administration.]

Requests Government to censure the Civil Surgeon of Dhárwár for not properly attending to the case of a woman who was confined in a dharmashála under very peculiar circumstances.

The Chháva (20) of the 24th June gives the particulars of a case in which a poor woman was confined in a dharmashála in Dhárwár under circumstances which were very peculiar. There was no medical aid available, the Civil Surgeon who was sent for having declined to stir out of the hospital buildings. The writer requests Government to take the Civil Surgeon to task for the manner in which he trifled with this matter, which involved the life of a poor woman.

Complains of the inconvenience caused by vernacular writing having been expunged from Government stamped paper.

The A'ryávart (15) of the 23rd June does not understand why vernacular letters and figures have been altogether expunged from Government stamped papers. It would have been better if the authorities had made known to the public the reasons that necessitated this change. In the opinion of the A'ryávart this was a serious mistake. The knowledge of the English language has not made very considerable progress in this country, and moreover an English-knowing man is rare in táluka towns and villages. Since vernacular writing has been expunged from stamped paper the people have been obliged to put up with many difficulties and inconveniences. Complaints to this effect are frequently heard from several pleaders and other people. It is to be hoped that Government will remove the cause of the above complaint.

Makes certain suggestions in regard to stock notes and postal savings banks.

The Vengurla Vritt (70) of the 21st June says that the circulation of stock notes does not appear to have been extensive. The reason appears to be that these notes cannot be cashed until after the expiration of a specified period, and that therefore people do not care to invest their money in these notes. If, however, Government rule that these notes shall be liable to be cashed at every Government treasury, many people will prefer this investment to deposits in savings banks. With regard to postal savings banks, the Vritt suggests the advisability of establishing savings banks in all post offices, thus enlarging the sphere of their working. Such a policy will tend to further the original object of Government in establishing these banks, viz., that of encouraging thrift among the poor people of villages. The Vritt also invites the attention of the authorities concerned to the increase in the work of post offices caused by the introduction in the department of these and other novel experiments, and suggests the appointment of additional hands for the additional work.

The Kesari (34) of the 26th June says that it would be very convenient if money orders and postal notes could be cashed in the Poona Town. The general post office of Poona is nearly two miles from the town, and hence people having business in the office experience great inconvenience during the hot season and the rains. It is desirable that postal authorities should direct their attention to this complaint. It would be best if the general post office were removed to the heart of the town.

Points out the necessity of providing some convenience for cashing money orders and postal notes in the town of Poona.

A correspondent of the Bakul (16) of the 24th June states that kabuláyats or agreements for Khoti villages were till the last year obtained from the Khots in the month of September. This long-standing practice was abandoned last year and a notification was issued requiring that the kabuláyats should be produced before the 31st July, and stating that if any Khot failed to do this his village would be attached. This year a fresh notification has been issued altering the date to 30th June and conveying the same threat. Some persons attribute this great haste in the exaction of the kabuláyats to the desire of Government to protect themselves from loss. Locusts are hovering over the district, while the agriculturists have not completed their sowing operations. If the kabuláyats are exacted at once, the interests of Government will be safe in spite of any damage that may be done to the crops. The Khots will thus have to bear the loss; and if they fail to pay the Government revenue, their villages will be attached and they will lose their Khoti claims. Whatever may be the truth, the Khots have certainly been placed in a disadvantageous position. The Bakul recommends this complaint to the favourable consideration of Government.

Complains of the inconvenience caused by a notification requiring Khots to give in kabuláyats or agreements before 30th June.

The Karnátá Vritt (122) of the 17th June quotes an extract from the Karnátá Prakáshika stating that Shri Rang Bhattáchárya, the religious preceptor of the Chief of Chikka Ballapur, was assaulted and kicked by Major Rutherford, Deputy Superintendent of Revenue Survey, to whom he had been to lodge a complaint against certain over-assessments on his land, and expresses deep regret that Europeans should deal with Natives of such high rank in such an objectionable manner.

Comment on the assault made by Major Rutherford on Shri Rang Bhattáchárya, the religious preceptor of the Chief of Chikka Ballapur.

Local Self-government.

The Quarterly Journal of the Poona Sárvajanik Sabha (4), for the month of April but received in June, gives a short history of the origin and progress of local government in Great Britain, and remarks:—While in these two respects (viz., the maintenance of separate boards for separate duties and the provision for the compulsory relief of the poor) the local government organizations in England have nothing to recommend their adoption here, at least for the present, there are other features in respect of which there can be no doubt that we have much to learn from the practical success of the English system of local government. We allude chiefly to the large powers which the leaders of the landed and well-to-do classes possess as honorary magistrates in the management of local affairs. Their functions, it will be noted, are not confined to mere municipal and conservancy duties. It is as magistrates and guardians of peace that this voluntary agency proves most useful. The scheme of local self-government propounded by His Excellency the Viceroy in Council, while it enlarges and elevates the sphere of public-spirited activity in various ways, has one essential weakness at its root which will surely result in rendering the reform nugatory as a means of political education. It does not confide to the men of light and leading those functions of Government in which people feel most interest. If possible, it tends to sever the small connection which was hitherto recognized in the contributions to the police expenditure levied from municipal bodies. This severance has been justified for reasons which certainly appear plausible under present circumstances, but there can be no doubt that local government, limited to conservancy and charitable functions, is more or less a misnomer and is doomed to inevitable failure. For it will never secure the same enthusiastic support of the population which would have been enlisted if the local bodies had been organized on the English plan of appointing representatives of the local gentry conservators of peace and guardians of the law, and associating with them representative rate-payers in every local board. It will be found that in no single self-governed country of Europe or America has this power and responsibility of magisterial and police functions been denied to the local governing bodies. In Scotland the institution of justices of the peace is not of a very ancient date, and yet even there these honorary officers are required to exert themselves to protect the peace, to issue warrants against criminals, to try petty offences and breaches of revenue laws, and decide small civil suits not exceeding five pounds in value. In this latter respect the institution of village munsifs and of conciliators in some of the Bombay districts is a tardy recognition of their duty on the part of Government. A few honorary magistrates have also of late been appointed in some of the large towns, but they are too few to acquire the status of a recognized local authority and cannot make head against the officials. The necessity and importance of localizing police and magisterial functions cannot be exaggerated in a bureaucratic country like India. The old village community, with its panchâyat of elders and its voluntary system of night watch by the citizens in turns and its hereditary police officers, fulfilled the same purpose. The petty tyranny of the French prefects and burgo-masters in the Netherlands is aggravated with us by the difficulty of access to the district authorities, who in India are the only source of local power. A petty police constable is thus more powerful for evil than the richest sowkár or the largest landlord in the country. It is this evil of centralized government which enervates and demoralizes all the local springs of action. It will no doubt be said that these local representatives are more likely to abuse their power than even the worst officials. We think honorary magistrates, associated together and sitting as a bench once a month or more, may safely be trusted never to go wrong, and they will certainly relieve the hands of over-burdened officials. Their functions may also be duly subordinated to the superior authority of the higher civil and criminal courts. It is in this direction chiefly that we think our efforts must be directed in the future development of the great reform which is being introduced at the present day all over the country. The people generally, and certainly those residing in the larger towns, might well be expected to accept gladly even increased burdens if the lower magisterial powers and the control of the police were freely bestowed on them. The conservancy of public health, the charge of education and medical charity, and even the making and repair of roads and buildings, are not in any real sense of the word the distinctive duties of Government. They belong essentially to the sphere of private effort, and are only undertaken by civilized governments because their organization affords a ready-made agency for corporate usefulness. It is the magisterial and police functions which represent the distinctive feature of sovereign authority, and these must be localized if local government is not to be a misnomer and a certain failure. We are perfectly aware that the condition of self-governed countries is very different from the order of things which has been established in India; but this is no reason why no effort should be made to find room for local authority in these directions as far as the safety of foreign rule permits such a concession. The experiment may safely be tried in the larger towns and gradually extended to the country at large. The great principle underlying all these arrangements is, in the words of Mr. Mill, that power must be localized, while knowledge, especially technical, is most useful when subordinated to a central control. The principal business of the central authority should be to give instructions and to lay down fixed principles, and it should leave the local bodies to apply them in practice. Election by popular suffrage enlists public confidence in the acts of Government, and when a majority of elected representatives are duly mixed with a minority possessed of educational and property qualifications (and these at present must be the nominees of the central authorities), the organization so secured can alone afford full scope for the development of the political education of the people, and the growth of that self-reliant energy which is the best support and the highest justification of coercive rule.

Some suggestions in connection with the scheme of local self-government for India.

Disapproves of the proposal made by the Bombay Government for carrying out the scheme of local self-government.

The Lok Mitrá (77) of the 24th June observes:—The proposals drafted by the Bombay Government for carrying out the scheme of local self-government in this Presidency, though they appear to be conceived in a spirit of greater liberality than was displayed during the earlier stages of the discussion on this important question, do not seem to be sketched out on the lines so often and so clearly and emphatically enunciated by Lord Ripon. Looking to the objects of Lord Ripon's scheme and the principles on which the system rests, it is evident that the preponderance of the elective element and the appointment of a non-official president by the people are essentially necessary for efficient and satisfactory working of the proposed reform. Both these conditions, however, seem to be absent from the measures as drafted by the Bombay Government. Practically, the elective members will be only a half of the whole body, and the remaining members will be appointed by Government, half of whom may be officials; and notwithstanding the skilfully devised scheme for the appointment of a president, it may be taken as certain that presidents will be either officials or Government nominees. The non-official element will then be completely swamped by the official members and the nominees of Government, aided as they will be by the president appointed as aforesaid, who cannot be expected to represent the people's interests. What the consequences of such a constitution of the boards will be it will not require very great knowledge of such institutions to prophesy. The numerical strength of the official element in the Surat Municipality, recently constituted on the principle advocated by the Bombay Government, has enabled it to successfully pass resolutions for introducing electric lights and enlarging the People's Park in the face of the united and emphatic protest of the representatives of the people, who very properly contended that these ornamental works could very well be postponed till some of the crying wants of the city, notably a pure and sufficient supply of water, were remedied. But the opposition was futile and the independent members had to give way. Such being the case, it is necessary that care should be taken not to allow the elective commissioners to be pushed aside in a contest between them and the official members, and unless the constitution proposed in the new measures of the Bombay Government is very much modified such a result must inevitably follow.

Says that Government must either concede to the people the privilege of appointing presidents to municipal and local boards or should allow them to elect two-thirds of the members of such boards.

The Gujaráti (94) of the 24th June, referring to the Local Self-government Bills for this Presidency which are said to have gone up to the Secretary of State for approval, says that if Government intend to reserve to themselves the right of appointing presidents of local and municipal boards they will do well to allow the people to elect two-thirds of the members of such boards. If, however, they are unworthy to do this they should concede to the people the right of appointing presidents. In the absence of either of these concessions Government must be said to adhere to their original unfair position. It is to be hoped that the Government of Sir James Fergusson will consider these points before passing the Bills into law.

Legislation—The Native Magistrates' Jurisdiction Bill.

Comments on the agitation raised by Europeans against the Native Magistrates' Jurisdiction Bill and approves of a compromise being effected in the matter.

In an article headed "The agitation in regard to the Native Magistrates' Jurisdiction Bill," the Quarterly Journal of the Poona Sárvajanik Sabha (4) for the month of April but received in June, remarks:—The first great lesson of the political turmoil of the past few months which we wish our people to lay to heart is that they should not cherish any more the fond day-dream that the Anglo-Indian community will ever make common cause with them in their struggle for higher powers and privileges. A very large, we might well say an overwhelming, majority of their race will always occupy the position of conservatives in India, whatever may be their political partizanship in their own mother country. The official and non-official Europeans are as a body bound by the very reason of their privileged existence to resist all attempts to level up the Native populations, and with them the time will never come when freedom and equality may be safely conceded. Any misunderstanding on this fundamental condition of our political life can never fail to be attended with disaster and disappointment. The educated minority of the Native population, with their free press and their associations unconsciously sympathized with by the mass of their countrymen, represent the soul of Indian liberalism, and their strength is in the justice of their claim. Arrayed against them are the mighty forces of the official hierarchy, supported by the non-official phalanx of their countrymen here and the great reserve of power and prejudice stored in the large vested interests of their own mother country. These are the liberal and conservative forces at work in India, and between them there cannot be any genuine and permanent alliance. They must stand apart as opposite camps, between whom in the struggle for political power there may be temporary truce, but no real communion of thought and action. We can never hope or deserve success if we foolishly rely upon the personal magnanimity of those who rule India. There has not been a single measure of political emancipation which has been secured by the willing co-operation of the Indian bureaucracy or oligarchy, official and non-official. Every such concession has been the outcome of national resistance, or of the higher imperial sense of the English people, as expressed in their own press and Parliament, due chiefly to the growth of the liberal and radical sentiment among them. Of course it will not do to count too much upon the strength of the self-denying and Christian restraints of these sentiments, but it will be folly to ignore them altogether. In both countries the liberal sentiment as regards India will always be in the minority, and arrayed against it are the strongest forces of the world, all that constitutes the strength of brute force, vested interest, national pride, and religious bigotry. The struggle must be long and laborious, but the discipline is necessary and invaluable, and the length of time over which it is spread will be the source of its strength. The writer then tries to prove the fallacy of the supposition that India can be kept out of the sphere of party strife in England, and proceeds to remark :—It has been made plain enough to all that the real bone of contention is not the paltry measure of the proposed extension of jurisdiction. It has been seized as the catch-word of the agitation. It is simply the scape-goat upon which the pent-up indignation of the Anglo-Indian community has wreaked its vengeance. They have taken to heart the fact that this is only the thin end of the wedge, and their protest is against the general Indian policy of the Liberal Government as represented by Lord Ripon. In Ireland, as in India, the watchword of the dominant race is coercion, not concession,—repression, not reform. It is vociferated that the empire has been won by the sword, and that by the sword it must be retained. This prejudice and aversion is the natural and besetting sin of all conquering races. The long succession of English statesmen, who by superior diplomacy and force laid the foundations of British power in India, had the wisdom to profit by past experiences, and although they relied ultimately on the arbitrament of the sword, they knew full well that the sword was but a blunted instrument for ensuring permanent ascendancy. In the pride of continued success there was a temporary forgetfulness of this piece of inherited wisdom, but the Dalhousie aberration was terribly atoned for in a baptism of blood and fire, and the old policy of depending on moral and not physical superiority asserted its supremacy in a gracious Proclamation, followed since then by many concessions of power and privilege in the interests of the Native population. The ægis of British protection is an acknowledged necessity, and none feel its need with greater emphasis than the leaders of Native thought. But it is not as the representative of brute force, but of the order and genius of equal law, that we bow down to this supreme necessity. The argument of force, if it is resorted to as a justification for denying concessions in time, necessarily weakens itself for want of sanction. It cannot therefore be in the true interests of the empire that the British rulers of the country should be allowed to isolate themselves in this fashion. The iron hand must be concealed under the soft glove, and the sword sheathed in the scabbard of wise policy. The questions at issue, the extension of Native jurisdiction, the larger employment of Natives, the encouragement of Native manufactures, the transfer of power to local boards elected by the Native rate-papers—all these issues must be discussed and settled on the broad ground of practical expediency and administrative convenience, and the idle talk of appealing to the foundations of power must be set aside and race ascendancy as a distinctive principle of administration must be abjured. There can be no question that a nation of 250 millions can ever be permanently held down by sheer force, and sooner or later, in God's Providence and under the encouragement of British example and discipline, the people of this country must rise to the status of a self-governed community and learn to control their own affairs in subordinate alliance with England. The transfer of power is inevitable, and the duty of statesmen is to graduate it in a way to make the transfer natural and easy, so as to keep up the continuance of national growth. Considered purely as a question of practical expediency and administrative convenience, the policy of extending the jurisdiction of Native Magistrates and Sessions Judges over European offenders is brought within the field of candour and calm discussion, and we are at once prepared to admit that it is a fair subject for a judicious compromise. The Native population is interested in the recognition of the principle underlying this controversy, but their interest in it is not of such a rabid sort as not to listen to a reasonable solution. This calumny has been sufficiently answered now by the unanimous protests of the great centres of Native enlightenment in their assembled multitudes of sympathizing thousands, without distinction of race, creed, or colour. The Pársis have nobly refused to follow the discreditable example of the Armenians, Jews, and non-descript hybrids on the other side of India, and it cannot be now truthfully said that the Native population holds no opinion on the subject. We are free to admit that the question of principle being once settled, the measure of the proposed extension is a question for fair argument and moderate compromise. The privileges of Europeans have been inherited by them for such a length of time and have their roots so deeply fixed in the real necessities of the exceptional state of things which obtained in the last century, that nobody will advocate a revolutionary change. The change should be gradual and in proportion to the altered circumstances of the times. The cry of absolute privilege and birthright is, as everybody knows by this time, a misleading cry, and can never afford a justification for distinct recognition beyond what practical expediency and administrative convenience suggest. The birthright was not claimed when Natives were chosen to preside as Police Magistrates in the Presidency towns 25 years ago, and in Ceylon no such privilege has ever been claimed or recognized. After giving in extenso the arguments for and against the proposed extension, the writer concludes:—

We have been studiously anxious to set forth all the arguments on both sides of the question in their full force, and we can now confidently challenge any impartial student to say that the case thus stated leaves any room for doubt as to the side on which the preponderance lies. Whether regarded as the legitimate outcome of past legislation or the honest fulfilment of sacred pledges repeatedly vouchsafed and confirmed,—whether we look at the matter from the point of high policy or religious duty,—whether the question is disposed of on the weight of authority, or precedent, or considerations of administrative convenience, or the safety of the State,—all point to one single conclusion, viz., that the distinctions founded on race and caste must be removed from the statute book, and in their place the test of fitness, of moral and intellectual aptitude, be substituted as the only guiding principle of administrative action. We have no misgivings on the point of the ultimate success of our appeal to the good sense and Christian philanthropy of the great English nation. In the heat of the strife neither party would have listened to moderate counsel. If the question of principle be once conceded unreservedly, we for our part will counsel our countrymen, now that the agitation has subsided, to consent to a compromise by which the alarm of panic-stricken and honestly misled Anglo-Indians will be sensibly abated. The extended jurisdiction should belong to Native Civil Servants who rise to the status of District Magistrates and

Sessions Judges as a matter of unconditional right equally with their European colleagues. In regard to the other functionaries, we would allow an option to the accused to object to the trial if he so elects, and in that case a bench of Native and European Judges should hold the trial with a jury, in which both communities should be equally represented if one of the parties is a Native. We feel sure that very few indeed will avail themselves of such an alternative, and when this fact is practically demonstrated, the further amendment of the law will be carried out without the slightest opposition from any quarter. Before we bring these observations to a close, we would draw the particular attention of the Government authorities to the fact that the system of criminal procedure which has been elaborated with great effort by successive Law Members of Council is still so imperfect and absolute as to excite the worst apprehensions of Anglo-Indians whenever it is proposed to subject them to its provisions. In this respect the Code has been altered decidedly for the worse by Sir FitzJames Stephen's Act of 1872. The authority of the police has been rendered absolute beyond all former precedent, the Magistrates' good faith and discretion know no bounds, the security for personal freedom has been dangerously encroached upon, and the right of appeal needlessly clogged with the fear of enhancement of the penalties. It is these unusual provisions which justify to some extent the alarm of the English settlers when any proposal is made to assimilate their condition with the status of the Native population. Of course the necessity of amending further the law of procedure will force itself upon the attention of the executive authorities one of these days, and if the recent agitation hastens that consummation, we may console ourselves that the troubles of the last few months have not been inflicted and endured in vain.

Condemns the Amrit Bazar Patrika of Calcutta for its severe tone towards Government.

The Jáme Jamshed (98) of the 30th June condemns the article headed "Of what do the English boast?" which appeared in a recent issue of the Amrit Bazar Patrika as very shameful, and observes that every respectable vernacular paper treats it with equal contempt. The Natives are well aware of the excellence, superiority and other virtues of the English nation, and therefore pray their rulers to concede to them their just rights. The Native subjects of the British Indian empire have been loyal to their sovereign and will be more so after the enactment of the Jurisdiction Bill; and it will be a libel on the whole country to doubt their loyalty for the fault of one or two newspapers like the Amrit Bazar Patrika. It is not a little gratifying that the vernacular press of the Bombay Presidency has kept within the bounds of discretion in pointing out the flimsiness of the arguments advanced by the opponents of the Jurisdiction Bill. But it is to be regretted that the same cannot be asserted of the whole of the Bengal press. The Hindu Patriot and some other papers are really an ornament of the Indian press; but the Amrit Bazar Patrika and some other newspapers of its stamp are a disgrace and do much harm to the interests of Natives and the Native press. Parliament thought that severe notice should be taken of the Englishman for its thoughtless writings, and were that national tribunal to make a similar remark about the Amrit Bazar Patrika, the Native press will not be sorry in the least.

Education.

Approves of the formation of a ladies' class in connection with the Grant Medical College at Bombay.

The Subodh Patrika (11) of the 24th June says:—The Bombay Government has given its sanction to the formation of a ladies' class in connection with the Grant Medical College, the success of which will depend upon its attracting to its class-room by suitable inducements intelligent and at the same time respectable young ladies. Much caution and care will have to be exercised in the selection of pupils and in the conduct of the institution to avoid the slightest occasion for scandal. But we must confess that the curriculum of the class suggested by Dr. Blanc was far more calculated to conduce to the success of the class and to produce the sort of female practitioners wanted than the course which has been adopted. We trust, however, this question will be soon reconsidered and in the meantime we await with interest the actual opening of the class and heartily wish it every success.

In noticing the resolution of the Bombay Government sanctioning certain proposals for imparting medical education to Native women, the Lok Mitrá (77) of the 24th June observes:—These arrangements are certainly not calculated to advance to a successful issue the important question of giving medical education to Native females and are undoubtedly a step in the wrong direction. Why the authorities should be in a hurry to initiate a measure confessedly imperfect and temporary, it is not easy to understand. The prescription of a course of three years' training on the lines of that pursued in connection with the apothecary class will certainly not turn out competent female doctors, whatever else it may do. The most serious objection and one which will prove fatal to the success of the experiment is the omission from such a course of the study of the very subjects which are absolutely indispensable to a proper training of medical women, viz., diseases of women and obstetrics. There is no necessity for trying such a half-hearted measure for five years, and then instituting an examination on the basis of the test for the degree of Licentiate of Medicine and Surgery, which will of course include a study of these important branches of medical education. If the authorities are not prepared just now to initiate a movement for the thorough and efficient training of medical women, let them wait till such time as the difficulties are removed, instead of rushing into an experiment which is sure to fail.

Disapproves of the resolution of the Bombay Government sanctioning certain proposals for imparting medical education to Native women.

The Bakul (16) of the 24th June complains that good food is not supplied to the boarders at the Poona Training College. The Principal of the College is requested to adopt due measures to remove the cause of complaint.

Complains that good food is not supplied in the boarding-house attached to the Poona Training College.

Municipalities.

In noticing the accident to Dr. Cody, the Indu Prakásh (9) of the 25th June observes:—The steam-rollers are undoubtedly often a nuisance. There seems to be some foundation for the complaint that the working of the steam-rollers makes many a horse passing by restive and that the persons working at these rollers do not generally take the least care to stop the noise or whissing sound caused by their motion when carriages pass by. There is a good deal of practical sense in the suggestion that steam-rollers should work from 10 or 11 P.M. to the small hours of the morning, when carriages do not generally run. This is perhaps an opportune moment for us to suggest that there is another danger to which human life in Bombay is subject and which ought to be duly provided against before any accident happens owing to it. Bombay is already being flooded with bicycles and tricycles, which run in the streets, but since no noise is caused by their motion passengers in the streets have nothing to warn them to get out of the way of these vehicles before they are actually near their path. Why does not the municipality compel the owners of these new conveyances to have bells attached to them? Surely the Municipal Commissioner ought to look to this. [The Lok Mitrá (77) of the 24th June expresses similar sentiments. The Rást Goftár (108) of the 24th June does not approve of the cry that has been raised against steam-rollers. The working of these rollers at night will disturb the sleep of many poor people. Under the circumstances Captain Morland's suggestion that boards informing carriage drivers of the working of steam-rollers should be placed at the entrance of streets is worthy of approval.]

Comments in connection with the working of steam-rollers in Bombay.

The Jáme Jamshed (98) of the 26th June is highly thankful to Sir James Fergusson for taking up the question of the octroi duties levied in Bombay, and observes that the duties are levied on different kinds of grain, wines, beer and spirits, sugar, coarse sugar, fuel and timber, but in the interests of the poor people all kinds of grain and fuel ought to be exempted from them. The poor ought to get food as cheap as possible in order that they may be able to maintain their health and strength. The loss occasioned by the proposed abolition may be compensated by making a corresponding increase in the duty levied on wines and spirits. Some persons maintain that the price of grain will not fall by the removal of the duties, and say that it did not fall when the duty was abolished once before. But it ought to be observed that the experiment was not then given a proper trial, and a fall in prices must occur. It is therefore to be hoped that the municipality will remove the duties on grain and fuel.

Does not approve of a scheme of water-works for Dhulia.

A correspondent of the A'ryávart (15) of the 23rd June does not approve of the policy of organizing a scheme of water-works for the town of Dhulia when only a portion of the town is suffering from scarcity of water. Such water-works will not pay their way, and it will be advisable to dig a few wells in that part of the town when water is scarce, and if water cannot be reached the wells should be fed from the water-pipe that has been laid for the municipal gardens.

Advocates the appointment of a gardener for the People's Park at Surat.

The Gujarát Mitrá (75) of the 24th June, in an article headed "Penny wise and pound foolish policy of our municipality," censures Mr. White, the Collector of Surat, for declining to entertain the proposal for the appointment of a competent and skilful gardener for the People's Park on a salary of Rs. 30. The services of such a man are urgently needed if the garden has to be well kept and turned to good account, and the president will do well not to be so miserly in the management of the garden. [The Vartamán Sár (117) of the 26th June complains of the way in which Mr. White conducts the business of the new municipal board at Surat as its president, and urges the necessity of holding meetings of the board in the evening after office hours with a view to serve the convenience of the members of the board. It also advises the municipality to keep local instead of Madras time.]

A condemnation of the career of Mr. Fernandes, the permanent chairman of the Ahmedabad Municipality.

The Hitechchhu (76) of Ahmedabad of the 28th June quotes the memorandum written by Mr. Fernandes, the permanent chairman of the Ahmedabad Municipality, in the books of the municipality on the occasion of his retirement from Ahmedabad and dated the 17th March 1883, and the remarks made on it by Mr. Borradaile in a memorandum dated 7th May 1883, comments at great length on the original memorandum, concurs in many of the remarks made thereon by Mr. Borradaile, and concludes thus:—The entire population, save those who may have benefited by the construction of the new road at Ahmedabad, is displeased with the work Mr. Fernandes has done in connection with the municipality. As a chairman, Mr. Fernandes has acted unjustly and has committed a breach of faith. Like a wilful monarch, he has never cared for the municipal committee. As he was also a City Survey Officer, the people have suffered more. The people are displeased with the work done by him as the City Magistrate. The people of Ahmedabad are quite disgusted with his work in connection with the Kika case and are not likely to forget the vexation caused to them for a very long time to come. They tremble at his appearance and pray Government to keep him away from their sight.

Native States.

Suggests certain measures for dealing with the authors of the Junágad tragedy.

Referring to the appeal preferred to the Government of India in the matter of the massacre of the Maiyás by the Junágad Darbár, the Gujaráti (94) of the 24th June says that it will suffice if the Viceroy directs the removal from the Darbár of incompetent men and awards punishment to the perpetrators and abettors of the heinous act. If His Lordship pleases he may appoint a commission of inquiry or permit the High Court to investigate the matter.

Complains of the dissatisfaction prevailing amongst the subjects of the Rádhanpur State.

The Káside Mumbai (101) of the 27th June says that as the people of Rádhanpur have now preferred a petition against certain inconveniences suffered by them in the State, the tax has not been collected up to this day. The people have resolved, it is said, not to commence agricultural operations this year so long as certain arrangements are not come to. The trading community recently held a meeting for the purpose. Motirám Chobdár is trying to conciliate them, but if the Nawáb does not attend to their complaints it is said that they intend leaving the country and going into the Gáikwár's territory. This state of things is to be regretted. The Rádhanpur correspondent of the Kásid has sent very dreadful news. The Kásid is engaged in ascertaining their truth. The Kásid recommends the Nawáb to win the love of his subjects. If the State suffers some loss for the good of the people, some extravagant items of Darbár expenditure ought to be done away with with a view to make up the loss.

Notes.—A. The notices from the different Newspapers have been collected in the Report under different heads, which are printed in italics.

B. The names of Newspapers are printed in the body of the Report in italics, and the number of the Newspaper in the above list is printed in brackets after the name.

C. The proprietors of the Newspapers marked * have not given information as to the number of copies issued. In these cases an estimate has been made by the Reporter.

D. The system of spelling vernacular words followed by the Reporter is the same as that adopted in the Official Spelling List of the Bombay Presidency. One peculiar feature of this system is that when the long a (आ or á) is the last letter of a word, the accent is left out, and the short a (अ = u in gun) is, to prevent confusion, never placed at the end of a word. This rule has been strictly followed, except that when the short a appears to be absolutely necessary to complete the pronunciation of a word, as in Arunodaya or the well known Mitra, it is printed with a mark over it to indicate that it is short, thus—ă.

E. Berár papers are received in this office for report under the Resolution of the Government of Bombay in the General Department, No. 1795, dated 8th June 1881.

Politics and the Public Administration.

Advises the British Government to come to some understanding with Russia in regard to the progress of the latter in the direction of Afghanistan.

In alluding to the treaty recently made by Russia with Persia, the Bombay Samáchár (85) of the 7th July observes that the Afghan frontiers are sixty miles distant from Khilat-e-Nadiri, and until it is known how far the Russians have advanced in the direction of Afghanistan nothing definite can be said on the question of the Russian progress in Central Asia. However, it is not gratifying that the Russian Ambassador at the Court of Persia should possess with the Shah the great influence which was enjoyed in former years by the British Ambassador. The Russians have advanced towards Afghanistan and are sure to put forward fresh claims, and the British Government ought to be prepared to face such a contingency. Russian statesmen have been professing that Russia entertains no design against India, and that it is almost impossible to take a Russian army to the Indian frontiers. It is a question, however, what weight should be attached to such professions. Certain Russian statesmen have made no secret of their desire to extend the Russian frontier as far as the Hindu Kush and to cede Herat to Persia. These statesmen enjoy great influence in their country, and General Skobeleff and Professor Martaines are foremost among them. The Russians having arrived at a settlement of their frontiers with Persia, are likely to raise a similar question in regard to Afghanistan, and the British Government will have to be very vigilant about their proceedings in this direction. The British authorities ought to inform Russia that she should desist from exercising any pressure on Afghanistan in regard to the settlement of frontiers, and after obtaining from the Russian authorities an explicit statement of their future policy in Asia they should shape their own policy accordingly, both as regards Afghanistan and the general progress of Russia in Central Asia. The time is quite mature for the English authorities to come to a resolution in this matter. The Shah has with a large following gone to the Afghan frontiers on the pretext of performing certain religious ceremonies and is to remain there for four months. All these circumstances cry for early measures on the part of the British Government in the matter.

Comments in connection with the appointment of the Duke of Connaught to a command in the Indian army.

The Surat Akhbár (78) of the 2nd July, in referring to the appointment of the Duke of Connaught to a command in the Indian army, observes that it is hoped that some benefit will result to India by Princes of Royal blood serving in the country, but no good can be expected if they confine themselves to military service only. If the Duke studies some of the vernacular languages of India and accepts appointments, each lasting for two years, in the different presidencies, and acquires a personal experience of the inner condition and views of the people and the way in which officials behave with them, then and then only can material good result to this country. He should travel incognito and should try to read the vernacular newspapers. The information thus acquired and communicated by the Duke to the Queen will prove of greater use than that received from other sources.

Approves of the resolution of Government dismissing from Government service Mr. Hewett, Assistant Superintendent of Revenue Survey.

In noticing the Government resolution ordering the dismissal of Mr. Hewett, Assistant Superintendent of Revenue Survey, from the service of Government and incapacitating him for re-employment, the Bombay Samáchár (85) of the 7th July expresses gratification at the course taken by Government in this matter. The courts of justice, observes the Samáchár, allowed Mr. Hewett to escape punishment by giving him the benefit of the niceties of law, and if the executive authorities had taken no notice of the miscarriage of justice and had failed to do what they have done, Mr. Hewett's case would have served as a bad precedent.

The Mahrátta (2) of the 1st July observes:—The locust plague has spread very wide and it is feared that the destruction of crops will be so great that the year 1884 will be a year of famine. It is, therefore, to the greatest interest, both of the people and Government, that energetic steps should be taken to bring about their destruction. Officials complain that the people are apathetic and that they do not heartily co-operate in the destruction of locusts. It is therefore suggested in some quarters that some legislative measure should be passed by which such apathy and carelessness may be declared punishable. We are sure that if Native non-official opinion be consulted in this matter the unanimous verdict will be against any such compulsory legislation. We think it a safer policy to get things done by rewards rather than by punishments, and we therefore ask Government to give up the idea of legislating in this matter, if any such idea has at all sprung up. Let Government set apart a sufficiently large sum for rewards, and let it be made known to the villagers that their labour will be duly compensated. Two annas a ser is too small a sum to attract poor Wághris, Kolis and Kunbis to the business, and we think that the amount should be doubled. The revenue and police pátils ought to be instructed to convene meetings of their villagers, and mámlatdárs or some such officers of Government ought to explain to the people the advantages of killing locusts. The official part of the business ought to end here. Government need not teach the people to preserve the sources of their food, for, we believe, even the most ignorant villager has sufficient education in the branch of self-preservation. In addition to this, Government ought to give the people some idea as to the probable whereabouts of the insects and their eggs, so that when they are once set upon the track they will follow it up until they succeed.

Disapproves of the suggestion for the enactment of a legislative measure for the compulsory destruction of locusts.

The Jagan Mitrá (31) of the 2nd July says that the system of rewards for the destruction of locusts is not availed of to a desirable extent on account of the delay that is allowed to take place in the payment of the amounts due, and expresses a hope that Government will devise measures for a prompt adjustment of the claims of the parties concerned. [The Sristidarpan (62) of the same date points out the advisability of utilizing the money spent in the remuneration of special officers appointed for the destruction of locusts in granting remissions of land revenue on a very large scale. The Nyáyá Sindhu (45) of the 2nd July does not approve of the efforts that are being made for the destruction of locusts, and advocates the payment of higher rates of compensation for the collection and destruction of locust eggs. The Bakul (16) of the 1st July also suggests that the amount of rewards should be doubled during the cultivating season to attract agriculturists from their field work.]

Some suggestions regarding the payment of rewards for the destruction of locusts and their eggs.

The Din Bandhu (5) of the 1st July refers to the report of crimes committed in the city of Bombay during the year 1882-83, and says that the increase in the number of crimes during the year is simply attributable to the carelessness of the police and the municipal departments and to the injustice done by Magistrates. The Bandhu has been repeatedly asserting that these departments have been exercising undue pressure on the people, but it is a matter for regret that Government have as yet paid no attention to the matter. If justice continues to be administered in the same way as now, the number of crimes will increase. It is likely that the next report will notice fewer crimes, but the falling off will be the result of the unwillingness of the people to take their complaints to the courts on account of the improper administration of justice there.

Comments in connection with the report of crimes committed in the city of Bombay during the year 1882-83.

The Dnyán Prakásh (8) of the 2nd July invites the early attention of Government to the necessity of supplying the people with arms to enable them to defend themselves against the attacks of wild beasts that are being bred in large proportions on account of the policy of Government regarding forest conservancy. Such wild animals have already begun to do mischief in Sholápur and other districts, and unless effective measures are taken at this stage of affairs it will be difficult to check the evil in the future.

Disapproves of the increase in the fee levied on liquor at Surat.

The Surat Akhbár (78) of the 2nd July says that Government are going to impose a penalty on the people of Surat for the misconduct of their servants in the local A'bkári Department. The fees at present levied on liquor are heavy, and instead of reducing them Government have raised them higher. Up to the present time the fee for a gallon of liquor of 25° underproof was Rs. 2, but it is now enhanced by a quarter of a rupee. It is certainly desirable that the vice of drinking should decrease, but sudden changes in the fees levied on liquors are not proper. The rising generation may give up the use of liquor on account of its dearness, but those who have now become infirm and old, and who cannot but resort to it, ought to have their interests attended to by Government. The best way to diminish the vice of drinking is to fix the fee for every gallon of liquor of 30° underproof at Rs. $1\frac{3}{4}$ instead of having liquor of two different proofs. It is unjust to charge the same fee on liquor in Surat as is levied in Bombay, for the latter is rich and thriving, while the former is poor and ruined. Such heavy duties encourage dishonesty and theft. It is also to be hoped that Government will give up the practice of toddy-farming in Surat, as they must have seen the injustice of levying several taxes on this article.

Recommends certain measures for extending agriculture in Gujarát.

The Jáme Jamshed (98) of the 6th July observes that Gujarát is more fertile than the Deccan, but for all that the condition of the people of the former province is as bad as that of the Deccanis. The Poona Sárvajanik Sabha and other public associations of the Deccan readily carry the grievances of the people of their province to Government, but there is no association to perform similar good offices for the Gujarátis. The large rivers of Gujarát overflow their banks annually and great damage is done to the crops by these floods. There are several rich agriculturists in this province, but the mass of the cultivators are as poor as the Deccan ryots. Their poverty is so great that they do not get sufficient food. The very low rate of wages for labour attests this fact. From the last census report it appears that the population of Gujarát has increased considerably during the last ten years, and if the population goes on increasing at that rate the province will be inconveniently overpopulated at the end of the next decade. It behoves Government, therefore, to adopt the necessary measures for alleviating the present distress and the prospective misery. There is much waste land in the province and due encouragement should be given to the people to bring it under cultivation. Two crops are raised every year on the culturable lands and this process has impoverished the soil. The cultivation of waste lands will therefore afford some relief. Canal irrigation should also be provided for all parts of the province, and if this is done there will be very little fear of a famine overtaking that part of the country.

Points out the necessity of appointing duly qualified persons to the post of police pátil.

A correspondent of the Satyá Shodhak (56) of the 1st July invites the attention of Government to the necessity of appointing qualified persons to hold the office of police pátil. At present these officers are generally illiterate and are obliged to ask for the assistance of others in all matters of correspondence, accounts, calculations, &c. The police pátil is all in all in his own village, and if he is clever and able, he is in a position to bring to a settlement intricate and tough questions that cannot be satisfactorily decided even at the sacrifice of large sums of money by the High Court of Judicature. It is also necessary that the work of these officers should be subjected to as much supervision as is enforced in the Postal Department. A knowledge of the criminal law should also be a sine qua non of such an office, and its emoluments should be regulated by the standard of efficiency.

The Kaira Vartamán (99) of the 4th July complains of the way in which license-tax appeals are disposed of by Mr. Kennedy, the Assistant Collector of Kaira. The authorities do not pacify the cry of the people regarding the inspection of their books, but dispose of the appeals in a perfunctory manner. It is the duty of the district officers to do justice to the people and to please them.

A complaint regarding the way in which license-tax appeals are disposed of at Kaira.

A correspondent of the Ahmedabad Samáchár (80) of the 4th July says that most of the houses in Dholera are in an unsafe condition. Government ought to issue orders for their being pulled down and for the construction of new ones in their place, as otherwise fatal accidents will result from their fall. The city is not kept clean and fears are entertained of some epidemic breaking out. It is rumoured that the kacheri is to be transferred from the city to Dhandhuka. If this be true, the transfer will prove very injurious to the people. Dholera has already been reduced to the state of a village and will be plundered by the neighbouring Kolis. The authorities should therefore think well before undertaking such a measure.

Some grievances of the people of Dholera.

The Kaiser-i-Hind (100) of the 1st July observes that it is made legally punishable to keep a gambling house or to gamble within the precincts of the city of Bombay, but the same law is not applied to Bándra, Kurla and other villages of the Sálsette Táluka of the Thána District, and gambling is carried on there openly by some residents of Bombay. Houses are rented in those places for the purpose, and regular bazárs have been opened for the supply of provisions and other things to gamblers. There is no good reason why this vice should be permitted to be openly practised so near Bombay, and the authorities concerned ought to put it down at once.

Prays for the suppression of gambling in Bándra, Kurla and other places of the Salsette Táluka of the Thána District.

The Indu Prakásh (9) of the 2nd July says :—In May last a steam-ferry plying between Nágothna and Bombay was started by a newly formed company, to the great comfort and convenience of passengers. The ferry was however stopped on account of its proprietors having been fined by the Collector of Kolába at the instance of Messrs. Shepherd & Co. The public therefore are obliged to resort to the steam-vessels of Messrs. Shepherd & Co., and thus to put up with great annoyance. The restoration of the steam-ferry plying between Nágothna and Bombay will greatly contribute to the convenience and happiness of the people.

Prays for the restoration of the steam-ferry recently plying between Nágothna and Bombay.

The Lok Mitra (77) of the 1st July observes :—The resolution to dispense with the services of the Pársi Master Builder and his Assistant in Her Majesty's Dockyard was disapproved as being a grave injustice to the deserving officials concerned, who have rendered faithful and conspicuous services to the State for upwards of a quarter of a century. The circumstances justifying or necessitating such a treatment of so long and valuable services have not been published. The Government of India have, however, directed that the Master Builder should be allowed to retain his post for three years more. This will be some consolation to that officer, and the public will be glad to know that attention has been paid to the claims of the Master Builder. It is a pity that Government have not accorded the same consideration to his Assistant, who will have to make room for a European officer from Calcutta. Perhaps there are grave reasons of State for treating these officials in this way, but until the public knows what they are, they will be justified in holding that they have not been treated with the justice which their case undoubtedly merits.

Is glad that the Pársi Master Builder in Her Majesty's Dockyard at Bombay has been allowed to serve for three years more.

A correspondent of the Bombay Samáchár (85) of the 5th July observes in a telegram from Surat, dated the 4th instant, that the floods have not subsided and that the arrangements made by the authorities for the protection of the people were very incomplete and unsatisfactory. The Samáchár requests the attention of Government to this important matter.

Observes that the arrangements made by the authorities of Surat for the protection, &c., of the people from the recent floods were incomplete.

Legislation—The Native Magistrates' Jurisdiction Bill.

With reference to the remark made by the London Times that the passing of the Native Magistrates' Jurisdiction Bill will weaken the British power in India and encourage the alleged present dangerous temper of the Natives, the Bombay Chronicle (74) of the 1st July observes that the enactment of the Bill has become a necessity for the sake of maintaining intact the British prestige in India. That necessity owes its existence more to the attitude assumed by the opponents of the Bill against Government and the course pursued by them to prevent its being passed into law than to the circumstances which rendered the introduction of the Bill advisable. The enactment of the measure will prove disappointing to its opponents, but will highly strengthen the hold of Great Britain on India. The investment of Native Magistrates with the contemplated jurisdiction will not prejudicially affect the status of the English people in this country, nor will it make the slightest difference in the bearing of Natives towards Europeans.

Says that the enactment of the Native Magistrates' Jurisdiction Bill will not weaken the British power in India.

After expressing gratitude to Mr. A. O. Hume for his letter to the Daily News in support of the Native Magistrates' Jurisdiction Bill, the Bakul (16) of the 1st July observes that when the Bill was first introduced into the Legislative Council it did not attract the attention of Natives. They simply considered the measure as one of those which Lord Ripon was about to pass in the interests of the country; but when Europeans strongly opposed it and strove hard to prevent its being passed, it engrossed the attention of Natives, who commenced to exert themselves in favour of the measure as they thought that His Lordship wished to confer on them some of the rights to which they were entitled by the Royal proclamation of 1858. If the Bill is not passed Natives will think that the great promises given to them by Government were falsely made, and will be dissatisfied with Government. They would consider that Lord Ripon alone, and not Government, wished to treat them well; and if this belief gets strong, persons acquainted with history need not be told what will be its results.

Says that Natives will be dissatisfied with Government if the Native Magistrates' Jurisdiction Bill is not passed into law.

Education.

The Jáme Jamshed (98) of the 2nd July observes that most of the candidates who pass the Matriculation Examination of the Bombay University possess an imperfect knowledge of the English language, but they come out successful by dint of cramming. This kind of education does no good to these students, and hence it is desirable that appropriate changes should be made in the studies laid down for this examination. In the first place any attempt at an undue exercise of memory should be discouraged. There should be two standards according to which candidates for the Matriculation Examination should be examined: one for those students who have no desire to acquire collegiate education, and another for those who wish to enter the University. The former students should be made to pay more attention to their general education than is paid by them at present, and should not be required to study algebra, geometry, mechanics and chemistry. On the other hand, they should be made to study closely geography, history and the commercial products of different countries. In order that good teachers may be had for high schools their remuneration ought to be increased, and the order issued by the Director of Public Instruction prohibiting Government teachers from undertaking private tuitions should be withdrawn as the order is disregarded and a bad example is thus set to young students.

Prays for the abolition of entrance fees levied in high schools.

The Indu Prakásh (9) of the 2nd July requests the attention of the educational authorities to a complaint preferred by a respectable gentleman of Bombay regarding the anomalous nature of entrance fees that are levied on fresh admissions into high schools. The said gentleman maintains that the division of English schools into first grade Anglo-vernacular and high schools is merely conventional, and that the transfer of a student from the former to the latter does not involve any change of his status, and that the levy of entrance fees cannot be justified on any ground other than that of a long standing practice. In the opinion of the Indu Prakásh the complaint is reasonable and just, and it is to be hoped Mr. Chatfield will put a stop to this unlawful practice without minding the pecuniary loss to the department entailed by the abolition of entrance fees.

A prayer for the establishment of a gymnasium in connection with the Sholápur High School.

The Kalpataru (32) of the 1st July dwells at considerable length on the advantages of physical education as imparted at the gymnasia instituted by the Educational Department, and urges on the attention of the authorities concerned the necessity of founding a gymnasium for the Sholápur High School. It is to be hoped that the Head Master and his assistants will represent the matter in its full significance to the Director of Public Instruction, and should their endeavours not be crowned with success the elite of the town of Sholápur should leave no stone unturned to secure the desired object.

A recommendation for the appointment of Mr. S. B. Jathár to the Directorship of Public Instruction in Berár and of Mr. V. M. Mahájani to the Educational Inspectorship in succession to Mr. Jathár.

The Kesari (34) of the 3rd July, referring to the contemplated retirement from the service of Ráo Báhádur Naráyan Bhái Dándekar, the Director of Public Instruction in Berár, requests the authorities concerned to consider the claims of Mr. Shrirám Bhikáji Jathár to the Directorship of Public Instruction and those of Mr. V. M. Mahájani, Head Master of the Amráoti High School, to the Educational Inspectorship in succession to Mr. Jathár. Mr. Aitken, the Head Master of the Akola High School, appears from the last educational report of Berár to be not even qualified to hold his present office. His only qualification is that he is a European.

Makes a defence of Mr. Uttamrám, the Head Master of the Surat High School, from an attack made upon him by the Vartamán Sár newspaper.

The Surya Prakásh (79) of the 30th June does not approve of the attack made by the Vartamán Sár (117) on Mr. Uttamrám, the Head Master of the Surat High School, and reported at page 18 of the Report on Native Papers for the week ending 23rd June 1883. It was in the interests of the students themselves that they should have been punished with fine for not attending to the work given them during the vacation. It is the duty of the students to comply with the orders of their teacher, and it is just to punish those who fail to comply with them. Mr. Uttamrám has improved the condition of the school after his coming to Surat. A good number of scholars come out successful at the Matriculation Examination. He is much respected in Surat. He pays great attention to the studies and the interests of the scholars. He has recently succeeded in having a scholarship of Rs. 4 attached to the school by Mr. Tápidás Varajdás. He has also procured a gift of Rs. 1,000 from a gentleman living in Bombay for the use of the gymnasium attached to the school. In short, the attack made on Mr. Uttamrám is unjust and ridiculous and is unbecoming a public writer.

Railways.

Ill-treatment of Natives on the G. I. P. Railway.

In a leader headed "The G. I. P. Railway is not for the Natives," the Kaiser-i-Hind (100) of the 1st July observes that on this line Christians are preferred for employment, and when they cannot be had, Natives are employed but are given smaller pay than that for which the former are engaged. Moreover when a post held by a Native falls vacant it is given to a Christian. Young European boys who have had eleemosynary education at railway stations are at once engaged on salaries larger than those received by Natives who have been in the service of the company for more than fifteen years. The young boys receive promotions within six months or a year of their employment. They act high-handedly and haughtily, not only with their Native superiors, but also with the Natives with whom they come in contact in the discharge of their duties. If these young men are guilty of carelessness or misbehavior their fault is passed over, and if this cannot be done they are lightly punished and transferred to other stations. The reverse of the above conduct is adopted towards Native subordinates. Native passengers are roughly treated. The carriages set apart for them are more like stables than anything else, and are frequently so overcrowded as to compel some passengers to stand in the carriage throughout the whole journey. Some impudent passengers ride in a higher class of carriages than those for which they have paid their fare on the plea of their proper carriages being overcrowded. They evade the payment of excess fare by leaving the carriage at once after the arrival of the train at their places of destination, while simple persons falling into the trap are caught, and the young European lads treat them offensively in exacting the excess fare.

A suggestion to the G. I. P. Railway Company for the employment of Native ticket collectors and ticket examiners.

The Din Bandhu (5) of the 1st July complains of the inconvenience caused to passengers travelling by the G. I. P. Railway from Bombay to Poona by the carriages being overcrowded. The Bandhu also complains of the annoyance caused to Native passengers by the European and Eurasian lads employed by the company for the work of collecting and examining tickets. It is necessary that Native ticket collectors should be employed for the purpose of collecting tickets from fourth class passengers. Similarly females should be employed for collecting tickets from female passengers.

A complaint regarding the inconvenience to passengers by the Bhávnagar-Gondal Railway.

The Samsher Báhádur (109) of the 29th June says that it is advisable that the Bhávnagar-Gondal Railway authorities should attend to the complaint regarding the issue of platform passes. Only six platform passes are issued every day at the Limbdi Station, and hence great inconvenience is caused to passengers when they stand in need of more passes. At the Wadhwán Station, where the Bhávnagar-Gondal line ends, passengers are required to alight from carriages and are sent out of the compound, where they are obliged to wait for about an hour and a half before taking the B. B. & C. I. Railway. Though the carriages of the B. B. & C. I. Railway are large and commodious, no proper arrangements appear to have been made for urinals and closets. The practice of making Bhangis and Dheds travel in the same carriages with respectable Hindus is very painful. Why cannot a separate carriage be attached to every train for Bhangis and Dheds? If this measure were adopted, it would serve to give great satisfaction to the people. It cannot be understood why Government do not attend to this important question. Why cannot the Viceroy issue an order to that effect?

Complains of the inconvenience caused to passengers by His Highness the Gáikwád of Baroda's Railway.

A correspondent of the Samsher Báhádur (109) of the 29th June complains of the mismanagement prevailing on His Highness the Gáikwád of Baroda's Railway. A body of Hindu pilgrims returning to Ahmedabad were confined in a waiting-room at the Vishwámintri station, which was so very small that hardly 50 persons could be accommodated in it. The door was closed from outside. Hundreds of passengers, including females and children, became confused and began to cry and desired to go out for answering the calls of nature. The passengers had to put up with this inconvenience for about 2 or 3 hours before they were able to travel to their destination. It is very much to be regretted that the station-master should have refused to comply with the request of the passengers and allowed them to continue in their sad plight. Why are not passengers for Ahmedabad allowed to move about freely as is done at the Wadhwán city station instead of being confined in such a narrow waiting-room? It is to be hoped that the authorities concerned will attend to this complaint. [Another correspondent of the same paper says that passengers for Dámnagar alight at the Dhasa station. But there is no convenience at the station to enable them to rest from their journey at midday. Kánchardi and A'mbardi are two Gáikwádi villages near the railway line, and it is therefore extremely necessary that a dharmashála should be built in either of the two villages for the comfort of travellers.]

Municipalities.

Says that the municipal administration of Bombay is conducted on faulty principles.

The Indian Spectator (1) of the 1st July observes:—The municipal administration of Bombay is conducted on faulty principles. The chief fault seems to be that the citizehs' grievances or complaints are scarcely satisfactorily looked into. He who possesses influence has his business done far more expeditiously and cheaply than he who has no influence. Members of the Town Council and of the Corporation are municipal demigods. If their houses need repair, the inspectors may lend their help. If they need pulling down, they must not serve notices. If they have bills to pay, the bill-collectors can afford to let them stand over uncollected for a pretty long time. Has a member of the Town Council to complain of a nuisance in his locality? He has simply to call on the official of the Health Department and it is removed instantly. Has a rich friend of a member of the Corporation to foist a piece of vacant land on the municipality? The thing can be easily managed. But let a poor uninfluential person have anything to do with the municipality. If he enter into correspondence, he is lucky if he can be vouchsafed even an acknowledgment at the end of 3 months. If he personally try to manage his business, he will be sent from pillar to post till he gives it up in sheer disgust. We should like some public-spirited member to call for a return of correspondence during the last 3 years in order to ascertain the average period that has elapsed between the date of a complaint or application and the date on which it has been finally disposed of, firstly, in the case of ordinary people, and secondly, in the case of members of the Town Council and the Corporation. The result will very probably create so unpleasant a feeling among all right-minded persons that reform may follow. The fact is, there is one mode of transacting business for the rich and another for the poor. It will take chapters to expose systematically the many evils and abuses that have crept into the working of the municipality.

Wishes that a Native medical officer should be appointed to act as Health Officer of Bombay.

The Jáme Jamshed (98) of the 7th July prays Government to appoint a Native medical officer to act as Health Officer to the municipality of Bombay. The Town Council has requested Government to lend an officer for this post, and Sir James's Government will, it is hoped, depute a Native officer to fill the post, as a Native will be more useful than a European. A European doctor is not so well acquainted as a Native medical man is with the condition of the people. The latter will be better able than the former to adopt due measures for removing the filth and dirt collecting in Native houses. The natives of Bombay will also freely communicate their grievances to a Native Health Officer.

Says that the Municipal Commissioner of Bombay should not enjoy arbitrary authority independent of all check from the Corporation.

The Bombay Samáchár (85) of the 3rd July observes that at the discussion on the closing of the sheep market on the DeLisle Road at the last meeting of the Municipal Corporation of Bombay, it was stated that the Commissioner had full powers to do as he liked in the management of markets, and the Corporation had no right to interfere in the matter. This is not the first time that the plea of full powers alleged to be enjoyed by the Commissioner has been brought forward; it was advanced several times before, and the questions which gave an opportunity for its advancement were disposed of accordingly. But according to the constitution of the Corporation no arbitrary power ought to be vested in the Commissioner, and the Corporation ought to possess authority to manage all municipal affairs, while the Commissioner ought to be a mere executive officer. So long as this principle is not strictly followed, the management of municipal affairs will not be satisfactory. There is no objection, however, to authorize the Commissioner to dispose of unimportant matters and routine work, but even in these cases the Commissioner's decisions should not be unappealable. When the Corporation receives a complaint that a particular matter has not been properly disposed of by the Commissioner, it ought to have authority to call upon him for an explanation and to dispose of the matter as it thinks best.

Disapproves of the way in which electric lights are managed in Bombay.

In an article headed "The Electric Light and our Municipality," the Indu Prakásh (9) of the 2nd July says:—The introduction of the electric light into our streets and thoroughfares will undoubtedly be a valuable boon, though perhaps a costly one, to this city; but it seems to us that in trying to carry out this idea our municipality has commenced at the wrong end. The most crowded thoroughfares in the city, which are the centres of traffic day and night, have been left out in the cold, and the place first selected for the experiment is the ground around the Bandstand, where the elite of the society flock together in the evenings for pleasure or recreation. This is reversing the good old saying, "duty first and pleasure afterwards." In Mándvi, for instance, the roads are thronged with carriages even till the dead of night. The Kálbádevi Road is similarly situated, and it would have been better if the electric light had been introduced into one of these quarters. Even at the Bandstand the lamps are lighted after 7 P.M., when those who go there for their evening recreations return to their homes. The Municipal Corporation and the Town Council owe an explanation on this subject to the rate-payers. There are certain matters which are delegated to the Municipal Commissioner, and this is one of them. The closing of a sheep market is another. Properly speaking questions like these ought to be decided by the Town Council. [The Prabhákar (49) of the 5th July refers to the closing of the sheep market on the DeLisle Road by the order of the Municipal Commissioner, and says that the Municipal Commissioner should not have arbitrary powers under any circumstances. It is necessary that a distinct line of demarcation should be laid down between the provinces of the Corporation and the Commissioner.]

Complains of the unwholesomeness of the drinking water supplied to the people of Bombay.

The Indian Spectator (1) of the 1st July says:—Can the Chemical Analyser to Government do nothing to improve the quality of our water? Dr. Sakhárám Arjun seems to be too busy to notice the dead-rat smell of which we have been complaining. Is it not curious that even Mr. Navroji Fardunji's zeal cannot move the officials? But he must persevere. With our excellent Health Officer at the head of the municipality, something must be done to purify the water. The smell of dead rats and fish was almost overpowering on Friday and Saturday, the 29th and 30th June.

Complains of some nuisances on a certain road in Bombay.

A correspondent of the Kaiser-i-Hind (100) of the 1st July complains that the road leading from Rastamji Jamsetji Jijibhái's dharmashála to the Victoria Theatre stinks badly. A large pit has been dug by the municipality opposite to the dharmashála, in which rain-water has collected and which gives out an offensive smell. A heap of road metal is lying near the pit, which is enclosed with bamboo scaffolding, and this has caused great inconvenience to the carriages passing by the road. At a little distance from Bapty Brothers' flour-mill there is another pit, in which also rain-water has collected, and which emits a very bad smell. Further on on the footpath behind Freeborn's Bakery a heap of sweepings is collected and is the greatest nuisance. The attention of the Health Officer and the Municipal Commissioner is requested to the above grievances, and they are asked to remove these nuisances at once.

A suggestion to the new municipal board of Surat.

The Nyáyá Prakásh (106) of the 2nd July expresses satisfaction at the new municipal board of Ahmedabad being allowed by Government to elect its own chairman and members of the managing committee out of the whole body of municipal commissioners, and advises the new municipal board of Surat to request Government to confer a similar boon on it. So long as this is not done good fortune will not smile upon the people of Surat. The commissioners ought to have unity amongst them.

Observes that inconvenience is experienced in the absence of a good road between Khergaum and Balsár.

A correspondent of the Bombay Samáchár (85) of the 5th July observes that the absence of a good road between Khergaum and Balsár hampers cart traffic between the two places during the rains. Large quantities of mangoes and mhowra seed called "doli" are lying at Khergaum, as no carts can pass over the kacha road to Balsár and the dealers are suffering great losses. The correspondent also states that the absence of a good road frequently delays the arrival of the post in the monsoon, and expresses a hope that Government will not delay any more the construction of the road.

Complains that flesh of a bad quality is sold at Khergaum.

A correspondent of the Bombay Samáchár (85) of the 5th July complains that the butchers of Khergaum (near Balsár) sell diseased flesh, the use of which is likely to spoil the public health. The authorities concerned are requested to take due steps with a view to put a stop to this complaint.

Comments in connection with the misappropriation of the trust money of the Ranchhodlál Dispensary at Ahmedabad by Mr. Fernandez, the late permanent chairman of the Ahmedabad Municipality.

The Hitechchhu (76) of Ahmedabad of the 5th July remarks:—The Government of Bombay have at last seen one of the mischiefs done by Mr. Fernandez. The misappropriation of the trust money of the Ranchhodlál Dispensary was a culpable act of the dictator, Mr. Fernandez. As soon as Government became aware of it they ordered that the money should be recovered at once and taken away from the hands of the municipality. That the money should be recovered without delay is perfectly just, but why should the new municipal board be punished for the acts of the late official chairman and of those who supported him? Why is not an enquiry ordered into the matter? A boastful, and, we boldly say, untruthful, memorandum of the work done by the dictator was printed at his own expense and submitted by him to Government, to the municipal commissioners and to others. Why have not Government or any of the commissioners taken notice of it, and why was it left to Mr. Borradaile to reply to it? These are not difficult questions to be answered as far as the late commissioners and their president are concerned. Mr. Fernandez exercised an almost magical influence over a majority of them and their president. All opposition to his measures emanating from the local press and the people was considered groundless and arising either from envy and spite or from ignorance and stupidity. We are told that Mr. Reid, the present Acting Collector-president, when called upon to furnish an explanation regarding the misappropriation of the trust money, defended Mr. Fernandez on the ground that he had taken the consent of Mr. Ranchhodlál, the donor of the money, forgetting however that after making over the money in trust for a special object Mr. Ranchhodlál had no right to give his consent, and if he did give it he must be considered an abettor of the crime of misappropriation. When the last year's accounts were laid before the new municipal commissioners, they passed a vote of censure on the late permanent chairman and those who helped him for their irregular acts, and Mr. Reid ought to have at once reported such a serious matter as this to Government. We hear that Mr. Borradaile's memorandum is being circulated among the new commissioners, and the latter are freely discussing the question and recording their opinions. Some of them, we are told, have asked for a full investigation into the whole administration of Mr. Fernandez. We demand on behalf of the rate-payers of Ahmedabad that these minutes of the commissioners be laid before Government and then published with the resolution of Government thereon. The president should not shelve them and hush up the matter. [The Nyáyá Prakásh (106) of the 2nd July considers the misappropriation of the trust money by Mr. Fernandez as a breach of faith.]

The Hitechchhu (76) of Ahmedabad of the 5th July says that since the new municipal board of Ahmedabad has come into office, the municipal employés do not appear to discharge their duties satisfactorily. The roads were not properly watered in the hot season. The work of street lighting is not properly attended to. No supervision is exercised over halálkhors, who do not regularly clean the privies. It is not known whether the powder supplied by the municipality to the halálkhors is misused by them. The rubbish collected in the municipal dustbins is thrown in the flowing rain-water. The halálkhors throw night-soil in the rain-water whenever they can conveniently do so. The water from the house drains is allowed to flow on roads for 5 or 6 days after the rain has ceased. It is necessary, therefore, that the members of the managing committee of the municipality should move about in the city and attend to these complaints. [The same paper disapproves of the decision said to have been arrived at by the sub-committee of the new board regarding the levy of the house-tax on the suburbs of Ahmedabad, advances several arguments against the propriety of such a decision, and advises it to abstain from the levy of such an odious tax. Moreover, the income from the house-tax will be at the most Rs. 5,000, while it is very likely that the expenses of collecting it will be more than Rs. 6,000.]

Comments on municipal affairs at Ahmedabad.

Native States.

The Indu Prakásh (9) of the 2nd July says that the introduction of local self-government into the Native States of India is a great desideratum under the present altered circumstances of Hindu society. The institution of local self-government is peculiarly European, but the natives of India have become cognizant of its benefits and have begun to cherish a desire for its introduction among themselves. The British rulers, however, are reluctant to concede the rights and privileges which are the necessary accompaniments of such a scheme. They apprehend that an extension of local self-government will be fraught with consequences which will jeopardize the safety of the British rule. It is therefore too much to expect that the people of India will ever receive a training for wielding the powers which a scheme of local self-government is meant to confer. In these circumstances it is advisable that the rulers of Native States should try the experiment. It cannot be said with certainty whether the paramount power will look with favour on the introduction of such a reform into its feudatory States. The several treaties and covenants which govern the relations of Native States with the paramount power do not, however, seem to sanction an interference on the part of the latter in the affairs of the former in regard to questions like the one under discussion. The Indu Prakásh expatiates on the advantages that will attend the introduction of local self-government into Native States, and concludes by pointing out the desirability of Native administrations publishing in the form of annual reports all the important particulars of their management during a year.

Advises Native States to introduce local self-government into their territories.

In a leader headed "The Bhosla family and the conduct of Government towards it," the Bakul (16) of the 1st July observes that it is astonishing that though the British Government is foremost among civilized nations and boasts of being prudent, just and grateful, it should treat the few surviving Native principalities with contempt. Whatever may be the line of its policy, even an ignorant man can understand how far its conduct in not leaving to the princes a house to reside in will strengthen its rule. If these principalities are maintained intact, the British Government will be much strengthened, and if they are treated according to their respective ranks there will be every probability of its being permanent. It is therefore much to be regretted that the weight of these facts is not recognized by Government. The royal Bhosla family of Nágpur has been reduced to very straitened circumstances and is on the road to extinction. The account given of this family by the Friend of India and the Statesman shows that its condition is pitiful. After giving a few particulars of the case, the Bakul remarks that the family incurred a debt of five lákhs of rupees, which Government did not pay off, but sold the private property of the family in satisfaction of it. The elder Ráni informed Government that the cost of managing the estate was large and therefore the debt could not be cleared off, and prayed for the appointment of a Native Kárbhári to look after the property, but her prayer was not granted. The heavy expenses of the council of management and the instalments for the clearance of the debt will in course of time leave little for the maintenance of the family, which will thus be obliged to incur fresh debt; and this new liability will lessen the maintenance allowance still further. The young descendant of this family is aged seven years, and yet he has been separated from his mother and sent to the Rájkumár College for education. He was despatched in an ordinary second class railway carriage to Jabalpur. After describing the scene which occurred on the railway station at the departure of the boy, the Bakul observes that a tender-hearted person will be moved at the condition of the boy. He has not arrived at the age at which his education should begin, and even supposing that he has come to that age, he can well be educated at Nágpur itself. Many young princes have received good education without being sent to the Rájkumár College.

Complains of mismanagement in the State of Vádásinor.

A correspondent of the Hitechchhu (76) of the 5th July says that many intriguing persons have managed to get into the service of the Vádásinor State. When Mr. Parshotamrái resigned the post of Kárbhári, several designing persons got Mr. Premchand confirmed in that appointment. If Mr. Premchand acts justly, why should he have re-employed several damaged characters? If Mr. Premchand had justly attended to the complaints of the people, they would not have come out in a body to prefer a memorial against him. Though a municipality has been established, it is mismanaged.

Berár Affairs.

Complains that the old employés receive smaller remuneration than the recently appointed subordinates in the Registration Department in the Berárs.

After giving some details about the Registration Department in the Berárs, the Pramod Sindhu (51) of the 2nd July observes that, though this department realizes a good revenue, the old employés have not received any increase to their salaries. Those Tahshildárs that perform the registration duties receive ten per cent. commission, and when the registration work increases they do not get any promotion, and Sub-Registrars are appointed to perform the duty. The kárkuns also do not get any promotion though the work may have increased. On the other hand, those honorary magistrates that perform the registration duties get twenty per cent. commission, while the rural Sub-Registrars receive fifty-five per cent. commission. It will simply be justice to pay fifty-five per cent. commission to Tahshildárs and twenty per cent. to kárkuns. It is also a great injustice that Tahshildárs, salaried Sub-Registrars, and old kárkuns should receive small pay, while newly appointed persons should receive large salaries. In conclusion, the Sindhu hopes that the Inspector-General of Registration will duly consider the matter and remove the injustice complained of.

B. The names of Newspapers are printed in the body of the Report in italics, and the number of the Newspaper in the above list is printed in brackets after the name.

C. The proprietors of the Newspapers marked * have not given information as to the number of copies issued. In these cases an estimate has been made by the Reporter.

D. The system of spelling vernacular words followed by the Reporter is the same as that adopted in the Official Spelling List of the Bombay Presidency. One peculiar feature of this system is that when the long a (आ or ा) is the last letter of a word, the accent is left out, and the short a (अ = u in gun) is, to prevent confusion, never placed at the end of a word. This rule has been strictly followed, except that when the short a appears to be absolutely necessary to complete the pronunciation of a word, as in Arunodaya or the well known Mitra, it is printed with a mark over it to indicate that it is short, thus—ă.

E. Berár papers are received in this office for report under the Resolution of the Government of Bombay in the General Department, No. 1795, dated 9th June 1881.

Politics and the Public Administration.

Says that India was not conquered with the sword by the British.

The Subodh Patrika (11) of the 8th July says:—Was India conquered with the sword, and ought it to be governed by the bayonet? This question has of late been answered in the affirmative by men who have never known what it is to conquer or to govern, but who, by the labours of those who were able to undertake and carry out that task at a cost only known to themselves, have now been placed in a position to rave and rant, as they are doing, against Natives for being Natives and against Government for not making the latter hewers of wood and drawers of water for their own benefit. But a glance at the facts of history will show how hollow is the statement that India was conquered by the sword. No doubt force, and also fraud, were occasionally employed by the British in the acquisition of territory in India, but what was it that made it possible for these means to be employed? The population of India was neither small like that of Britain, nor so savage as to regard a cannon as a thunderbolt brought down from the skies. Further, the lowest Hindu regarded the mode of life of the English as an abomination and contact with them as pollution, while the hatred of the Moslem against their religion was equally great; and yet amidst such odds an empire was raised. This was effected simply through moral force and prestige, which the politicians of later times are willing to surrender in order to secure what they think is power. The reverse was the case of old. Power followed prestige then. For by carefully exhibiting the bright side of the English character, by fairness, moderation and staunch fidelity to oral or written engagements, by effectually proscribing from the country as dangerous 'interlopers' the predecessors of the present agitators and advocates of the blood-and-scalp school of politics, the shrewd East India Company conquered the hearts of the Indian people and all the rest followed. But for this, Plassey would not have been won, for the success was partly due to defection in the enemy's camp and among the leaders of civil society in Bengal. It was equally so in the west, for it would be absurd to suppose that the entire fighting power of the Marátha nation was represented by the rabble at Kirkee. The truth is that in the east as in the west, the people, tempted by the better government offered by the English, allowed their own rulers to fall, and even assisted towards that result, and thus occurred the revolution which placed the English in a supreme position in India; and are we now to believe that this supremacy thus acquired is to end in a government by the sword? As we remarked the other day, we have no fear that English statesmanship of the day will prove false to its past traditions and abandon a policy of safety and honour in its dealings with India and her people; but we are obliged to advert to these considerations because the anti-Native papers now confess that the Native Magistrates' Jurisdiction Bill is a mere pretext which they have taken hold of to vent their feelings against the entire policy pursued by Lord Ripon, that it is against the liberal character of that policy that they are arrayed and that they desire that it should be replaced by one of repression. It is because of this admission openly made at last that we think it desirable to revert to the times when and the means whereby the empire, which is now sought to be made a shuttlecock of by fortune-hunting sojourners, was secured and by which means alone it can be retained.

Says that the British Government should reform their internal administration of India, as in that lie the strength and stability of their rule.

The Suryodayá (64) of the 9th July earnestly advises Government to thoroughly overhaul their internal administration of India with a view to strengthen the foundations of their rule and at the same time to soothe the wounded susceptibilities of the people. It is generally very desirable that rulers should recognize the necessity of the wholesome check of public opinion. The land tax is certainly the legitimate due of the rulers, but as matters at present stand twice the amount of that tax is derived from other sources. Notwithstanding that the ryots are unable to secure a necessary of life like salt and do not get even a rag of cloth to cover their nudity, is it desirable that the rulers should think of subjecting them to stringent forest laws? It is necessary that Government should lay to their heart the wholesome maxim that, although soft, one should not dig the ground with his elbows. Should the people labour under anxieties for anything and everything? Such a state of things is neither beneficial to the people nor to their rulers. The evils of internal maladministration in Russia are too clear to be ignored. It is true that under the auspices of the British rule the people have been enjoying security of life and property, and that the whole of India now presents an appearance of uniform peace. But this is what is called the external condition of the country. Internal peace, however, is quite different. That the ryots should be prosperous, that they should have plenty to eat, and that they should be always free from anxiety—such a state of things is not observable under the British rule. Sufficiency of daily food is at the bottom of all happiness, and when that is wanting all external happiness is never appreciated. It is therefore urgently necessary that the British Government should reform their internal administration of India, as in that lie the strength and stability of their rule.

Comments in connection with the appointment of the Duke of Connaught to a command in the Indian army.

The Indu Prakásh (9) of the 9th July says:—The idea of a member of the Royal family, in fact no less a personage than one of the sons of our Gracious Sovereign coming to India as a Commander-in-Chief, seems to have quite captivated some of our contemporaries. They are almost jubilant over it, but we must say there is a good deal to be said on the other side too. The presence of a Royal Duke may for a time excite some interest, but what will the people say when they find the son of the Empress serving Government, and serving too, not as a Governor or a Viceroy, but as a Commander-in-Chief, a post subordinate in many respects to a Viceroy's and a Governor's? To hold a great office in India means to occupy a very delicate and at times an extremely painful situation. Whether a person be a Commander-in-Chief or a Governor, he has to give his opinions on different topics, and when opinion is divided on some of these topics he must displease some party or other. Her Majesty and all the members of the Royal family have till now taken a very affectionate interest in India, and on that account they are extremely popular with the people of this country. By appointing a son of the Empress to one of the great offices in the country the Ministry has placed him in a situation of delicacy. If it were not for the painful responsibilities which are the necessary accompaniments of an India career, such an appointment would have nothing to be said against it.

Disapproves of the appointment of Mr. Godley as permanent Under Secretary at the India Office.

The Bombay Chronicle (74) of the 8th July observes that the remarks made by a correspondent of Vanity Fair condemning the appointment of Mr. Godley to the post of permanent Under Secretary at the India Office will be widely echoed in India. Mr. Godley has no special fitness for the post, which he has obtained simply because he is a dependent of the Liberal party leaders. The appointment will serve to lend fresh colour to the allegation frequently made that no matter what party is in office, whether Liberal or Conservative, the interests of India will be cared for in England only to the extent of the requirements of party interests.

Approves of the recommendation of the Secretary of State for India for the development of jail industry in India.

With reference to the discussion on the subject of jail industry in India, the Bombay Samáchár (85) of the 9th July observes that the practice of exacting hard labour from convicts and making their life miserable is a remnant of old barbarous times and ought not to be followed in these days of civilization and progress. This principle is taken as a guide in determining the quality and quantity of the work performed in jails, and convicts are employed on industrial occupations according to their physical strength, their original callings, and similar considerations. This course is really wise and ought not to be departed from. A large number of convicts are persons who follow no occupation, but idle away their time when they come out of prison and commit thefts or other crimes in order to maintain themselves. If they are taught some sort of industry while they are in jail they will in all probability follow it after they are at large. As for the objection that jail manufactures interfere with the productions of free labour, it may be remarked that the former are produced in such small quantities as not appreciably to affect the consumption of the latter. The system of encouraging manufacturing industries in jails has this recommending feature about it, that it is calculated to make an addition to the productive industry of the country. Government should, however, take care that jail productions do not as a rule undersell similar articles in the open market.

Approves of the appointment of Sir Auckland Colvin as Finance Minister of India in succession to Major Baring.

The Indian Spectator (1) of the 8th July says:—In the interests of the general public Sir Auckland Colvin's nomination as Finance Minister of India, in the absence of a trained English financier of great breadth of view and extensive knowledge of the burning economical questions of the day, is eminently satisfactory. Sir Auckland's sympathy for the Indian impoverished peasantry is well known; and at the present juncture, when legislation is on the tapis touching Bengal ryots and the experiment of instituting agricultural banks in the Deccan is maturing, his presence in the Viceregal Council will give an additional guarantee that the interests of the cultivators will not suffer. [The Rást Goftár (108) of the same date also approves of the nomination.]

Thanks His Excellency the Viceroy for the resolution issued by him directing the deputation to Australia of certain persons for providing India with ghee prepared from Australian milk.

The Gujarát Mitrá (75) of the 8th July thanks His Excellency the Viceroy for the resolution which he is said to have issued directing the deputation to Australia of certain persons with the view of supplying India with ghee prepared from Australian milk. This resolution is calculated to prove as beneficial to India as to Australia. The people of India have been getting successive proofs of the unceasing interest that His Lordship takes in their welfare, and they will be sorry if their repeated representations for an extension of the term of His Lordship's Viceroyalty do not meet with success.

Says that the wretched condition of the Deccan peasantry will only improve when Government will minimize the pressure and rigidity of their land revenue demand.

Alluding to the discussion recently elicited in England on the subject of the establishment of agricultural banks in the Deccan, the Dnyán Prakásh (8) of the 9th July says:—The favourable reception which Sir William Wedderburn's scheme has met with at the hands of the British public will be of invaluable use to the successful issue of the negotiations here. Ever since the occurrence of the unfortunate agrarian riots of 1875 in some of the central Deccan districts, the attention of the public and of the authorities also has been forcibly directed to the deplorable condition of the Deccan peasantry, and it has ever since then been clearly admitted on all hands that every possible remedy should be fairly tried for affording the indebted Deccan peasantry every reasonable relief. Hitherto, however, no substantial relief has been afforded, Government contenting themselves with affording only legislative relief to the Deccan ryot. As we have repeatedly urged, the Government of India has proved false to its solemnly recorded declarations to the effect that unless the pressure and rigidity of the land revenue system were minimized mere legislative relief would in the long run prove of no avail whatever to the object of its solicitude. It is possible that Sir William Wedderburn may have directed the attention of his audience to this feature. The Deccan Agriculturists' Relief Act has now been in operation for four years, and we have yet to learn that it has done any real and substantial good to the people, to benefit whom is its avowed object. We have referred to this feature of the problem with a view to emphasize the point that even an agricultural bank, howsoever financially successful its operations may prove, will not be of much use to the Deccan ryot, unless the Government of India, throwing off its apathy and indifference, redeems its own pledges by minimizing the pressure and rigidity of its land revenue demand. It is there where the shoe pinches, and how can it be reasonably expected that the evil complained of will be remedied unless the sore is removed? One would have thought that a Government which has passed the Central Provinces Tenancy Bill, and which appears to be determined to pass the Bengal Rent Bill also, did not require to be taught any lesson regarding the duties of a landlord to his tenants. But such is not the case. The Government theory is that the State is the landlord in this country, and that the land revenue being a rent and not a tax, the landlord can enhance it at his sweet will and pleasure. It is further alleged that in enhancing the revenue the State landlord is not bound to take into consideration the poverty of the tenantry. It is even coolly said that if the tenantry cannot pay the enhanced rates they had better make room for others that will. The heartless manner in which and the cool assurance with which such remarks are frequently made by some of the revenue authorities stagger the reader, and we once more repeat that so long as such views are in the ascendant, no measure, however well considered it may be, will accomplish its primary object, namely, substantial relief to the Deccan peasantry.

Complains of injustice done to Native barristers by the Public Prosecutor and the Clerk of the Crown at Bombay through the unequal distribution of briefs in their gift between European and Native barristers.

The Indian Spectator (1) of the 8th July says:—We were under the impression that Crown favours should be fairly distributed between Europeans and Natives, particularly in small matters. This impression seems to be erroneous, and another impression, that everything in connection with a Court of Justice must be strictly impartial, is also found to be equally incorrect. We learn that in serious cases the Crown represented by the Public Prosecutor prosecutes and the Crown represented by the Clerk of the Crown gives criminals the assistance of counsel, the Crown paying the fees of counsel on both sides. Now we have observed during the last Criminal Sessions held at Bombay how these favours were distributed amongst the members of the bar by the Public Prosecutor and the Clerk of the Crown. The Advocate-General must, of course, be engaged in serious cases and paid for his services. Leaving him out of the question, it is calculated that twelve briefs were in the gift of the Public Prosecutor and the Clerk of the Crown during the last Sessions. How were they distributed? Eleven out of these twelve briefs were given to Europeans, and one solitary brief to a Native barrister. It has been ascertained that the local bar is composed of nearly as many Natives as Europeans. There are several Native barristers of longer and higher standing than a great many of their English collaborators. Taking the junior portion of the bar, we find that Natives outnumber by far the European juniors. Now we ask in the name of everything that is just, why it is that two Government officials who have the disposal of public funds should dispose of them in such an unfair way. Will the Public Prosecutor and the Clerk of the Crown condescend to explain why this is so?

Approves of the Government resolution ordering the dismissal from Government service of Mr. Hewett, Assistant Superintendent of Revenue Survey.

The Indu Prakásh (9) of the 9th July says:—The spectacle of the Executive taking the Judicial to task for not deciding a particular case in a particular manner and much as the Executive wished, is not always pleasing, but is very humiliating to those who are accustomed to think that the judicial courts, and especially the High Courts, are the palladium of their liberties and the stern upholders of their rights. The High Courts are constituted under the Letters Patent, and are, in a sense, independent of the Executive in India. Nothing that the Executive may do or say can affect their rights. But there are occasions when the High Courts err egregiously and require to be informed of their error. In the Hewett case the High Court did not make a satisfactory appearance, and public opinion has condemned the conclusion it arrived at in disposing of the case. The Government of Bombay now publishes a resolution concurring in the public opinion and pointing out the blunders committed by the District Magistrate who tried the case and by the Superintendent of Police who investigated it. The resolution does not allude in so many terms to the observations made by the two Judges of the High Court while disposing of the case, but its effect is to point out that the said Judges did not show a thoroughly judicial frame of mind when they made certain remarks not justified by the proceedings in the case. Government say that the Government Pleader did not properly argue the case before the High Court. This must be admitted as a correct view. Mr. Mandlik omitted to say a good deal he ought to have said, and what he did say was all made up of random arguments. It may seem a little out of the way on the part of Government to have tried to interfere with the highest judicial tribunal in the Presidency in respect of a matter in which even the Privy Council has no right to interfere. But the Government resolution does not profess to do anything of the kind. It simply tells the Judges how their verdict is thought of by the public, and that errors of this sort on the part of the High Court, if repeated, will assuredly shake the confidence of the public in the judicial tribunals of the country. Understood in this light, the resolution must receive the cordial approbation of every lover of justice. That Mr. Wilson, the Magistrate of Ratnágiri, who tried the case, acted most indiscreetly no reasonable man doubts. Mr. Goldsmid, the Police Superintendent, also failed in his duty. Were conduct of this sort to pass uncensured, attempts at murder would increase and people would lose all faith in the notion that the British Government protects life as well as property. The resolution has therefore been most opportunely issued, and howsoever much we may regret that the highest Court of Justice in the Presidency has placed itself in an awkward predicament by an awkward decision, we are bound to say that the Government of Bombay has done the wisest thing it could have done by assuring the public that, so far as it is concerned, it is prepared to do all that lies in its power to discourage attempts to shoot at people on frivolous grounds. [The Mahrátta (2) of the 8th July says:—The Government of Sir James Fergusson has done justice in the matter. This is as it should be; for the impression that European offenders are allowed to escape scot-free will be disastrous to the prestige of Government. We quite sympathise with Mr. Hewett for being now thrown adrift on the world. We may be sorry for him individually and in his private capacity, but we are glad to find that, though the individual is disgraced and ruined, the ends of justice have been satisfied. The Government resolution is, we think, a good commentary on the decision of Messrs. Bayley and Pinhey in this case. Several other Maráthi and Gujaráti papers express satisfaction with the resolution of Government. The Bombay Samáchár (85) of the 10th July, however, hopes that Government will not remain satisfied with the simple censure they have passed on the District Magistrate and the Superintendent of Police of Ratnágiri, who ought to be visited with further marks of the displeasure of Government. The Yajdán Parast (120) of the 8th idem advises Government to appeal against the decision of the High Court to higher authorities.]

Comments in connection with the Government resolution ordering the dismissal from Government service of Mr. Hewett, Assistant Superintendent, Revenue Survey.

The Dnyán Prakásh (8) of the 12th July says:—That is a very curious, interesting and instructive document which the Bombay Government has issued in the shape of a resolution on the celebrated Ratnágiri shooting case. The Governor of an Indian province or the Viceroy of India is said to be always popular during the first two or three years of his administration, and the fourth year of his administration is said to be a period marking the decline of his popularity. In the case of Sir James Fergusson, however, the general rule appears to have been reversed. During the first half of Sir James Fergusson's administration His Excellency was quite unpopular. That unpopularity culminated with the Bombay local self-government resolution of 19th September last. This period was coeval with the latter half of Mr. Ashburner's tenure of office, and it is generally believed that Sir James Fergusson's unpopularity was in a great measure, if not solely, due to the evil influence of the late senior member of Council over His Excellency. Whether the popular belief is well-grounded or not, it is a fact that since the retirement of Mr. Ashburner, the Government of Sir James Fergusson has been becoming every month less and less unpopular until at last the Government resolution now under notice has completed the redeeming work of the last six months. It is generally believed that such a resolution as the one now under notice would not have been possible at all during the ascendancy of Mr. Ashburner. The resolution is, as we have already said, a very curious, interesting and instructive document, and is moreover singularly lucid and plain-spoken.

Comments on the Jail Administration Report of the Bombay Presidency for 1882.

The Native Opinion (10) of the 8th July refers to the Jail Administration Report of the Bombay Presidency for 1882, and says that during the year under report the average expenditure on each prisoner was Rs. 65. It is said that of this sum only Rs. 26 were spent on feeding and clothing, while the remaining Rs. 49 were spent for other purposes. This sum of Rs. 26 again divides itself under three heads, viz., Rs. 22½ for food, Rs. 1½ for medicines, and Rs. 2½ for clothing. It will thus be perceived that each prisoner received food worth less than Rs. 2 per month and medicines worth two annas only. These particulars go to show the indifferent nature of the treatment received by prisoners in jails. It is also said that, notwithstanding a decrease in the number of prisoners during the year, the income of the department rose considerably, and that on the whole Government gained a profit of Rs. 57,000 during the year 1882. This circumstance shows that the prisoners were made to work more than in previous years with less food.

Points out the advisability of reducing the severity of the A'bkári and the Forest laws.

In alluding to the memorials submitted by the people of the Thána District against the Forest and the Ábkári laws, the Lok Mitrá (77) of the 8th July observes:—The operation of the Revenue, the Ábkári, and the Forest laws has for some time past given rise to the greatest distress and disaffection among the large and poor class of people affected by these measures, and many and bitter have been the complaints of the hardships regarding which they have now appealed to the Local Government. The origin and cause of their complaints is not so much these laws themselves as the unreasonable severity with which they are worked, and surely it is a wise policy to listen with attention to such a story of distress as these memorials unfold. So long, however, as Government are satisfied with the reports of their officers on the working of these laws and of the necessity of administering them as they are administered now in the supposed interests of the State, it is idle to expect that the memorialists will have adequate relief. Government should institute independent inquiries into the grievances complained of in these memorials, and satisfy themselves as to their justice or otherwise and should take due action thereon. Unless some such course is adopted, there will be no diminution in the sufferings or complaints of the people, and Government will recognize, when perhaps too late, the impolicy of a procedure calculated to bring in a few hundred extra rupees into the State coffers at the expense of the peace and welfare of large classes of people on whom the prosperity of the country depends in so large a measure. [The Surat Akhbár (78) of the 9th July expresses satisfaction with the reduction now made in the fees levied on liquor at Surat.]

Points out the advisability of Government starting local works for the relief of the people who have suffered by the havoc committed by locusts.

Referring to the havoc committed by locusts in this Presidency, the Maháráshtrá Mitrá (39) of the 12th July suggests the advisability of Government starting local works for the relief of the distressed population. It is necessary that the present opportunity should be utilized for the construction of various important railway feeder roads, such as may be calculated to develope the traffic of the country, and for the satisfaction of urgent local requirements of villages and towns. Under the latter category fall schemes regarding supply of ample and wholesome water to such places as may need it badly.

Advises that measures be adopted for the permanent improvement of the sanitary condition of the Ahmednagar District, where cholera appears almost annually.

The Yajdán Parast (120) of the 8th July observes that the last Government Gazette shows that in the week ending the 4th July there were 817 deaths from cholera in the Ahmednagar District. This is a high death-rate, which has come to its present figure within the course of four weeks, at the commencement of which period the mortality was 102. This fact proves two things, (1) that due measures were not adopted when the epidemic was in its first stage, and (2) that the sanitary condition of the district is very bad. Such fearful outbreaks are generally forgotten soon after they are put down, but this time the same course will, it is hoped, not be followed, and steps will be taken to make a permanent improvement in the sanitary state of the district.

A complaint regarding the hiring of unsuitable and unseemly rooms for the offices of the Survey Department stationed at Dhárwár during the monsoon.

The Chhâva (20) of the 8th July complains of the inconvenience caused to the establishments of the Survey Department stationed at Dhárwár during the monsoon by unsuitable and unseemly rooms being hired for their offices. Every Assistant Superintendent of Survey receives a monthly allowance of Rs. 75 on account of office rent. Out of this sum only seven or eight, or at the most fifteen rupees are spent for office rent. One Assistant Superintendent is said to have allotted his stables for this purpose. It is not known why these officers try to make a saving out of the handsome allowance received by them from Government. The allowance is neither entirely spent for its legitimate purpose, nor is the saving effected from it credited to Government. The question, therefore, whether the saving is intended by Government to be appropriated by the officers as an addition to their salary should be decided.

An alleged charge of accepting bribes against some of the officers of the License Tax Department at Broach.

The Broach Samáchár (86) of the 12th July points out the necessity of effecting an improvement in the present law regarding bribes, and observes that so long as the giver of a bribe is considered liable to punishment, people will not venture to come out and expose the parties who accept bribes. One of the complaints against the incidence of the license tax at Broach, against which a cry is being raised at present, is said to relate to this matter. Had it not been for the above-mentioned nicety of the law, many persons would have come out at this juncture and exposed the guilty parties. If Government were to issue a notification granting pardon to those who may have offered bribes and were to turn them into Queen's evidence, the truth would be soon out. This step would also go a great way towards putting a stop to a certain extent to the several rumours floating in the city and to the cry raised against the unjust levy of the license tax.

A prayer for the removal of Mr. Prescot, Post Master of Ratnágiri, from his present post.

The Satyá Shodhak (56) of the 8th July gives the particulars of the cases in which Mr. Prescot, Post Master of Ratnágiri, was lately prosecuted for assault, rape and other minor charges, and says:—It should be considered what measures the postal authorities have taken in the matter. Mr. Prescot was involved in similar prosecutions last year, and the Satyá Shodhak then pointed out the necessity of appointing a proper person in his place. But the authorities concerned do not appear to have paid any attention to that suggestion. The people have suffered great annoyance on account of the viciousness of Mr. Prescot's dog, and it is to be hoped that the authorities of the Postal Department will redress the grievances of the people at this stage of affairs. [The Jagan Mitrá (31) of the 9th July makes a similar complaint.]

Complains of delay in the receipt of letters at Bombay despatched from villages in the Dápoli Táluka of the Ratnágiri District.

A correspondent of the Bakul (16) of the 8th July complains that he receives his letters at Bombay addressed to him from villages in the Dápoli Táluka of the Ratnágiri District on the fifth day of their being posted. In the fair season the letters are received on the fourth day, and the present delay, observes the writer, seems attributable to the letters not being forwarded from the branch post offices before the post is closed in the head office. The Post Master General is requested to make such arrangements as will remove the cause of complaint.

Complains of the conduct of the village postmen who take the post from Jagudan to Kherva and from Rájkot to Gadhaka.

A correspondent of the Hitechchhu (76) of Ahmedabad of the 12th July says that the village postman who takes the post from Jagudan to Kherva appears to be very idle. He does not bring the post regularly, but comes once a week and takes the signatures of the people in his diary either by persuasion or threats. A school has been opened at Kherva, and there is a good number of merchants in the village. No letters are posted in the postal letter-box in the village, for the people are not certain of its being cleared in time. It is therefore to be hoped that the postal authorities will attend to this complaint. [Another correspondent of the same paper, writing from Gadhaka, complains of the irregularity of the postal rural messenger who takes the post from Rájkot to that village. Though the post is now received twice a week instead of on every alternate day as before, it is not received regularly. Sometimes postal stamps, covers and cards are not to be had from the messenger. It is feared that the local postal communication may cease. The postal authorities should therefore attend to the matter.]

Complains of the prevalence of speculation on rain at Dholera.

A correspondent of the Ahmedabad Samáchár (80) of the 11th July complains of the great prevalence of speculation on rain at Dholera and prays for its stoppage. A clique has been formed for the purpose. It entraps respectable people, deprives them of their money, and sometimes raises a quarrel. If this speculation is not stopped, it is feared that several persons will commit suicide on account of the scrape into which they may bring themselves. The local carpenters are much tyrannized over, and forced labour is exacted from them, for which they are not even paid. Even private work is not paid for and forced labour is exacted. The chief patel of the carpenter caste regulates the turns for forced labour, but his relatives try to avoid work.

Unsafe condition of the ferry at present plying on the river near the village of Bhilavdí in the Sátára District.

The Maháráshtrá Mitrá (39) of the 12th July refers to the unsafe condition of the ferry that is at present plying on the river near the village of Bhilavdi in the Sátára District, points out the danger from its being allowed to ply in its present condition, and invites the attention of the district authorities to the necessity of taking prompt measures in the matter.

A request to the Assistant Collector of Kaira to hold office in the city instead of in the camp at Kaira.

The Kaira Vartamán (99) of the 11th July says that as Mr. Kennedy, the Assistant Collector of Kaira, holds his office in the camp at Kaira, people find it very tiresome to go such a long distance. If he holds office in the old bungalow in the city, it will not be in any way objectionable. The transfer will prove very convenient to the people as well as to his subordinates in this rainy season.

Condemns the proposal made in some quarters regarding the revival of the Vernacular Press Act.

The Mahrátta (2) of the 8th July, in an article headed "Who deserves to be muzzled, the English or the Native Press?" remarks:—If historical and other evidence is to be believed, the natives of India are never offensive. Their spiritually contemplative mood always governs their passive habits, and it never occurs to them to stir themselves into action to shake off the effects of their indolence or patience. The Christian missionary fearlessly inveighs against their religion; the Anglo-Indian editor of a newspaper calls them a "brood of vipers"; the well-meaning Government officer speaks of them as "sheep" to be tended by a score of Europeans in each district; yet they are passive, quietly bearing all the indignities and miseries inflicted upon them by people whose right to touch these shores is derived from their descent from those who in quest of spices and gold won this Indian empire by acting in the various capacities of traders, advisers, army-lenders, allies to Native princes, and subsequently in the capacity of a paramount power. The natives of India who have any self-respect naturally dislike this treatment, and are sometimes inclined to resent it and to retaliate when the provocation is extreme. But the Anglo-Indian feels the retaliation and expends his powers of invective in his advice to Government. This time one of our contemporaries discusses the conduct of some of the Native newspapers and finds in their writings enough material on which to base his recommendation for the revival of the Vernacular Press Act in some form or other. The revival of the Act is of course visionary, but the publication of the article has the effect of only widening the breach that exists between Europeans and Natives. He again deals with impunity in sober abuse against Native editors and believes that force is a remedy. We believe that the chastisement of the elder brother works a great improvement in the younger ones, and therefore recommend that writings in the Anglo-Indian newspapers should be scrutinized by Government more scrupulously than those in the Native press. When the mouth of the head of the family is muzzled the other members will know how to act where the interests of classes jar each against the other. [The Indian Spectator (1) of the same date, in an article headed "The unmerited attack on the Vernacular Press," refers to the same subject, and remarks:—The alleged attempt of the irresponsible persons at Calcutta to gag the Vernacular Press, had it succeeded, would not have been viewed in any other light than that of a direct incitement to civil war in the country; and a civil war between a faction of the ruling race and the masses of the ruled is always fraught, as history has repeatedly illustrated, with the direst consequences. However arbitrarily India may be governed, it will be an evil day when a handful of elated persons presume in all the arrogance of race superiority to establish a "reign of terror" among the Natives. But we have firm faith in the wisdom of our rulers. The Government of India is fully alive to its grave responsibilities, and will repress with a strong hand any such silly attempt of a few audacious spirits to kindle civil dissensions. Whether the allegation as to the establishment of the "reign of terror" is true or false, we can only say that the attempt would have met with an ignominious fate at any time. Now that the alleged attempts of "the clique" at Calcutta to gag the vernacular press have been mercilessly exposed, they are endeavouring to turn the tables. They are posing as the injured innocents, as so many superlative swans, as if all the mischief now perceptible in the empire was entirely owing to the Native press, when it is a fact as clear as day-light that it is the rabid portion of the Anglo-Indian press that has organized itself for the purpose of intimidating the Government of India here and creating a false and mischievous alarm in the United Kingdom with a view to bring about the abandonment of the Ilbert Bill. They are simply busy making ropes of sand. They are the prime offenders, and if a gagging Act is again needed, then we agree with the opinion of the sedate Statesman that before the virulent Native journals are brought to bay it should be first vigorously applied to the rabid Anglo-Indian journals at Calcutta. The Ahmedabad Samáchár (80) of the 11th July is glad that the writers against the vernacular press have failed in their mean object, and that Government look upon the proposal to gag the Native press with contempt.]

Complains of the apathetic conduct of municipal and Government officers on the occasion of the recent floods in Surat.

The Gujarát Mitrá (75) of the 8th July gives an account of the recent floods in Surat, and complains that neither municipal nor Government servants excepting a few officers such as Mr. Whitworth, Mr. Henderson and Mr. Nánábhái rendered any assistance in affording relief to the distressed population. The Gujarát Mitrá attributes these tremendous floods to the unsatisfactory state in which the Varachha drain near the city is allowed to lie, and suggests its being kept in constant repair with the view of preventing the occurrence of similar floods in the future. [A correspondent of the same paper dwells at considerable length on the apathetic conduct of Government and municipal servants, and especially of the municipal secretary, in the matter of devising proper measures for affording prompt relief to the people, and requests the municipal commissioners to take up the subject and to move for the construction of ten to fifteen jolly boats to meet the contingency of floods in future. The Vartamán Sár (117) of the 10th July prefers a complaint similar to that of the above-mentioned correspondent of the Gujarát Mitrá and advises the new municipal board to appoint a committee to inquire into the matter and change the whole staff of the municipality if need be. It also asks the Bombay Government to appoint a commission of inquiry into the conduct of Government officers and into the great damage done by the floods. Everybody remembered Mr. Hope, the late Collector of Surat, at the time of the floods. It is said that the municipal secretary has made a report of what he did at the time of the floods, and has set forth his services in very glowing terms. This report ought to be circulated to all the members of the new board. Have all the daroghás submitted their reports? The Deshi Mitrá (90) of the 5th July complains that want of boats was greatly felt at the time, and says that this bespeaks a want of foresight on the part of the servants of Government and of younger ones, and therefore recommend that writings in the Anglo-Indian newspapers should be scrutinized by Government more scrupulously than those in the Native press. When the mouth of the head of the family is muzzled the other members will know how to act where the interests of classes jar each against the other. [The Indian Spectator (1) of the same date, in an article headed "The unmerited attack on the Vernacular Press," refers to the same subject, and remarks:—The alleged attempt of the irresponsible persons at Calcutta to gag the Vernacular Press, had it succeeded, would not have been viewed in any other light than that of a direct incitement to civil war in the country; and a civil war between a faction of the ruling race and the masses of the ruled is always fraught, as history has repeatedly illustrated, with the direst consequences. However arbitrarily India may be governed, it will be an evil day when a handful of elated persons presume in all the arrogance of race superiority to establish a "reign of terror" among the Natives. But we have firm faith in the wisdom of our rulers. The Government of India is fully alive to its grave responsibilities, and will repress with a strong hand any such silly attempt of a few audacious spirits to kindle civil dissensions. Whether the allegation as to the establishment of the "reign of terror" is true or false, we can only say that the attempt would have met with an ignominious fate at any time. Now that the alleged attempts of "the clique" at Calcutta to gag the vernacular press have been mercilessly exposed, they are endeavouring to turn the tables. They are posing as the injured innocents, as so many superlative swans, as if all the mischief now perceptible in the empire was entirely owing to the Native press, when it is a fact as clear as day-light that it is the rabid portion of the Anglo-Indian press that has organized itself for the purpose of intimidating the Government of India here and creating a false and mischievous alarm in the United Kingdom with a view to bring about the abandonment of the Ilbert Bill. They are simply busy making ropes of sand. They are the prime offenders, and if a gagging Act is again needed, then we agree with the opinion of the sedate Statesman that before the virulent Native journals are brought to bay it should be first vigorously applied to the rabid Anglo-Indian journals at Calcutta. The Ahmedabad Samáchár (80) of the 11th July is glad that the writers against the vernacular press have failed in their mean object, and that Government look upon the proposal to gag the Native press with contempt.]

Complains of the apathetic conduct of municipal and Government officers on the occasion of the recent floods in Surat.

The Gujarát Mitrá (75) of the 8th July gives an account of the recent floods in Surat, and complains that neither municipal nor Government servants excepting a few officers such as Mr. Whitworth, Mr. Henderson and Mr. Nánábhái rendered any assistance in affording relief to the distressed population. The Gujarát Mitrá attributes these tremendous floods to the unsatisfactory state in which the Varachha drain near the city is allowed to lie, and suggests its being kept in constant repair with the view of preventing the occurrence of similar floods in the future. [A correspondent of the same paper dwells at considerable length on the apathetic conduct of Government and municipal servants, and especially of the municipal secretary, in the matter of devising proper measures for affording prompt relief to the people, and requests the municipal commissioners to take up the subject and to move for the construction of ten to fifteen jolly boats to meet the contingency of floods in future. The Vartamán Sár (117) of the 10th July prefers a complaint similar to that of the above-mentioned correspondent of the Gujarát Mitrá and advises the new municipal board to appoint a committee to inquire into the matter and change the whole staff of the municipality if need be. It also asks the Bombay Government to appoint a commission of inquiry into the conduct of Government officers and into the great damage done by the floods. Everybody remembered Mr. Hope, the late Collector of Surat, at the time of the floods. It is said that the municipal secretary has made a report of what he did at the time of the floods, and has set forth his services in very glowing terms. This report ought to be circulated to all the members of the new board. Have all the daroghás submitted their reports? The Deshi Mitrá (90) of the 5th July complains that want of boats was greatly felt at the time, and says that this bespeaks a want of foresight on the part of the servants of Government and of the municipal secretary. The same paper has received several communications complaining of the sad want of arrangements for affording relief to the inhabitants of Sagrámpura. But a more pitiful sight than that of Sagrámpura was presented by the inhabitants of Dhed Talávdi, for much more water had collected there. If boats had been procurable the poor people could have been supplied with food. The Deshi Mitrá recommends the municipality to employ Mr. Dádábhái Dorábji Pándia, who worked very hard for three days and saved the lives of many drowning persons, as a superintendent in the local fire brigade department. The Yajdán Parást (120) of the 8th July advises the municipality of Surat to undertake defensive works with a view to protect the city of Surat from any future danger. The Bombay Samáchár (85) of the 11th idem requests Government to institute an enquiry into the real extent of the distress caused by the recent floods. It also prays Government and the public to reward the services rendered by Mr. Dádábhái Pándia by saving 102 lives. Some of the correspondents of the same paper report that Mándvi, Kathor and Suhali have also suffered by the floods.]

Local Self-government.

Is not satisfied with the Local Boards Bill of this Government.

The Bombay Samáchár (85) of the 13th July observes that the Local Boards Bill of the Government of Bombay has not been framed in complete accordance with the imperial scheme of local self-government and with the demands made by the people. The Government of Bombay does not appear to have completely got rid of the false impression that the people are not yet eligible for the powers which Lord Ripon wishes that they should possess and which the people themselves demand. It is, however, true that the arrangements now made are not so very objectionable as those previously contemplated by Government. A slight reduction has been made in the number of members first proposed to be nominated by Government, and a corresponding increase has been made in the number of members to be elected by the people. The Government has abandoned its view in regard to the necessity of an official president and has declared both official and non-official members elegible for the post. The concession is, however, made nugatory by the necessity of Government sanction to the nomination of a president. The supervision of the elections of popular members and the approval of their nominations by Government are also made indispensable. Further concessions are, however, promised according as the people show themselves deserving of them. The Viceroy wished that the people should enjoy a complete control over the local funds that have been mismanaged under official control, but the Bombay Government wishes to take time before full and complete concessions are made. It must, however, be remarked that there ought to be no objection whatever to make concessions to the people of this Presidency to the extent wished for by the Viceroy, considering their general aptitude for them.

Makes remarks on the District Municipal Act Amendment Bill.

Commenting on the District Municipal Act Amendment Bill, the Bombay Samáchár (85) of the 14th July observes that some of the provisions of the Bill are not objectionable. The most important question is the appointment of presidents of municipal boards. The Bill provides that Government will either authorize the boards to elect their own presidents and sanction the appointment on approval, or that they will make the appointment themselves. Both official and non-official members are considered eligible for the post of president. The reservation made as to the vote of an official president is a good provision, and there is much hope of the arrangement proving unobjectionable if Government use the powers retained by them with great discretion. Government have also retained the power of supervising the transaction of municipal affairs, but such an arrangement is not likely to meet with the approval of the people. In short, though the arrangements proposed in the Bill are not in accordance with the wishes of the people, yet if they are discreetly put into force there will not be much that can be objected to. Government should, however, exercise strict supervision over the work of the Collector as he is clothed with excessive authority. Past experience, however, creates misgivings as to whether this is possible, and the Native members of the Legislative Council will do well to try to introduce the necessary changes in this portion of the Bill.

The Hitechchhu (76) of Ahmedabad of the 12th July does not approve of the alleged retention of Collectors as presidents of district municipal and local fund boards, and remarks that Collectors exercise in the mofussil more power than that enjoyed by independent princes. The appointment of a committee and the transaction of business by a majority of votes is nothing short of a farce in the mofussil, for scarcely any person ventures to vote against the Collector. The nomination of District Collectors as presidents and the appointment by Government of half the number of the members of municipal boards are most pernicious to the scheme of local self-government. It is to be regretted that the Government of Sir James Fergusson has not seen its way to the removal of these defects. The expectations of the public about the Honourable Mr. Peile have not been realized. By his concurrence in the unjust resolution of the Bombay Government in the matter of the Maiya massacre and the non-correction of other errors of Government he has lost the affections of the people. If he still tries to remove the defect regarding the appointment of Collectors as presidents, he will regain the love of the people. Many instances of the mischief done by Collector-presidents and chairmen nominated by Government are patent facts. The mischief done by Mr. Fernandez, the late permanent chairman of the local municipality, is well known. It is to be hoped, therefore, that His Excellency the Governor in Council will remove this defect from the new Local Self-government Bills for this Presidency.

Disapproval of the alleged retention of Collectors as presidents of the district municipal and local fund boards under the new Local Self-government Bills for the Bombay Presidency.

The Shiváji (60) of the 6th July says :—The president has cancelled the election for the Ganesh Peth ward and preparations are in progress for holding a fresh election. On a former occasion the president cancelled the election of Mr. Bháusáheb Nátu and declared the next eligible candidate duly elected. If therefore the necessity for a fresh election was not then recognized, it is not clear why a different procedure should have been followed in the present case. It is much to be regretted that Mr. Moore should change his views so often. The proper course under the circumstances would have been to elect Mr. Bábáji Rangnáth, who was the next eligible candidate after Mr. Ghásswála.

Complains of the procedure adopted by Mr. Moore in the matter of the election of a member of the Poona Municipal Board in the place of Mr. Ghásswála.

Legislation—The Native Magistrates' Jurisdiction Bill.

The Dnyán Prakásh (8) of the 12th July says :—Lord Ripon will be known in history as a Viceroy constantly engaged in devising measures for the amelioration of the condition of the people of India, and such praise is not undeserved for the portion of his administration preceding the introduction of the Native Magistrates' Jurisdiction Bill. But since the time of that Bill the attention of His Excellency seems to have been diverted from its original object. This inference is necessitated by the circumstance that since the introduction of the Bill there have been no measures of public importance initiated by the administration. Considering the degree to which the Europeans have been excited on account of this Bill, it is not strange that His Lordship's mind should be so distracted. It is certainly a very unfortunate circumstance that Lord Ripon should have excited the wrath of his fellow-countrymen and should have been subjected to unfair censure while attempting to pursue a line of policy at once consistent with the assurances pledged by Her Majesty from time to time and with the resolutions of the Honourable Houses of Parliament, and consonant with the general principles of good government. Lord Ripon deserves to be thanked on all hands for the fortitude with which he has turned a deaf ear to the idle rant and the narrow views of his opponents. It is said that the Secretary of State and his Council are opposed to this Bill, but the Government of India being reluctant to retrace its steps, the question has been finally settled by the Ministry in favour of the latter. It is therefore not clear why the passing of the Bill should be delayed any longer. So long as the Bill is not passed into law all narrow-sighted Europeans will find it convenient to vilify Natives, and it is very likely that the latter will not be able to preserve their equanimity for a long time. Apart from this consideration there is reason to apprehend that the strength of the supporters of Lord Ripon's policy may also fail if any further delay is allowed to occur in the enactment of the Bill. Taking all these circumstances into consideration it is of very great importance that the Bill should be passed into law at an early date.

Effects of the agitation against the Native Magistrates' Jurisdiction Bill on Lord Ripon's policy and a prayer for an early passing of the Bill into law.

Regrets that certain retired officials of the Bombay Presidency should have joined the opposition raised in England against the Native Magistrates' Jurisdiction Bill.

The Jáme Jamshed (98) of the 11th July regrets that General Anderson, Mr. Rogers and several other retired officials of the Bombay Presidency should have joined the opposition raised in England against the Native Magistrates' Jurisdiction Bill. These gentlemen grew rich in India, and this is the way in which they are showing their gratitude to this country! Several of them, while in India, praised Natives very highly, but they have now turned round. When Mr. Rogers was feted at the Mazagaon Castle on the eve of his departure, he observed that he would take part in every work that was calculated to accomplish the welfare of Bombay, and yet he was one of those who said that any concession made in the direction contemplated was likely to lead to evil consequences. These gentlemen are sure to repent of their opposition to the Bill when in their calmer moments they are reminded of the feelings entertained towards them by the natives of India.

Education.

Says that some sort of primary education should be made compulsory.

Referring to the account of the progress of education in the Bombay Presidency as given in the last Census Report, the Indu Prakásh (9) of the 9th July points out with regret that the proportion of educated people to the whole population of the Presidency is far lower than that in the most backward country in Europe. It cannot be denied that the education of the masses is the work of the people, and the attitude of Government in the matter is also regulated by the same principle. But such education requires a long time to develop itself fully, and thus much time is lost in vain. As a safeguard against such waste of time, compulsory education should be resorted to. Government will thus be obliged to interfere with the independence of the people, but such interference is not calculated to prejudice the interests of the latter. The Indu Prakásh is of opinion that a legislative measure making it compulsory on the parents of children to give some sort of primary education to their boys and girls will go a great way in assisting the development of the material prosperity of the country by spreading education among the people.

Disapproval of the suggestion said to have been made by Mr. Modak, the Principal of the Elphinstone High School at Bombay, for the wholesale employment of graduates on the staff of that school.

The Srishtidarpan (62) of the 9th July censures Mr. Wáman Abáji Modak for a report which he is said to have made to his superiors advocating the wholesale employment of graduates on the staff of the Elphinstone High School. These proposals, if sanctioned, will involve a transgression of the vested rights of some of the old servants of the school, and it is therefore desirable that the educational authorities should not proceed in the matter without freely consulting public opinion.

Railways.

Approval of the order of the Government of India regarding the removal of the annoyance caused to passengers by dogs and heavy luggage being allowed to be taken in carriages.

The Prabhákar (49) of the 11th July approves of the order said to have been issued by the Government of India directing all railway companies to take effective measures for putting a stop to the annoyance caused to passengers by dogs and heavy luggage being allowed to be taken in the railway carriages, and suggests for the consideration of the same Government the desirability of issuing a similar order for preventing the nuisance caused by smoking. [The Bombay Samáchár (85) of the 10th July expresses similar sentiments.]

With reference to the sanction given by the Secretary of State for India to the construction of the Chanda Railway, the Bombay Samáchár (85) of the 12th July observes that there is no objection to the construction of this line. The subjects of the Nizám, however, objected to the project being carried out with the aid of foreign capital. They raised their voice against the proceedings of the authorities, but it has been put down with a high hand. Dr. Aghornáth and his co-adjutors in the agitation raised by them against the project have been deported from the State, but nothing is known as yet as to what enquiry is to be made in the case. An authoritative explanation is needed on this subject.

Disapproves of the sanctioned construction of the Chanda Railway with foreign capital.

The Dnyán Bodhak (24) of the 8th July, while thanking Government for the railway projects that have been undertaken in the Deccan and Southern Marátha Country, points out the advantages of projecting a branch line from Vengurla to Bágalkot, and requests the early attention of Government to the matter.

Suggests the advisability of constructing a railway line from Vengurla to Bágalkot.

A correspondent of the Gujarát Mitrá (75) of the 8th July, writing from Káthiáwár, says that it is rumoured that the State of Bhávnagar will construct a branch railway line from Botad to Rájkot. It is however very desirable that the branch line should be constructed at the joint expense of the Bhávnagar and Gondal States, as otherwise the expenditure incurred by the latter State on the extension of its railway to Dhoráji will be fruitless.

Says that the Gondal State should be allowed to take part in the construction of a branch line of railway by the Bhávnagar State.

A correspondent of the Kaira Vartamán (99) of the 11th July states that he cannot understand why passengers are put to great inconvenience on the occasion of fairs at Dákor. The public were informed that a special train would leave the station on Saturday, the 7th instant, at 2 P.M. A large number of pilgrims, drenched with rain, came to the station in time to catch the train. There was no accommodation to receive them at the station, and they had to wait for 5 hours in the rain before they travelled to their destinations. It is necessary, therefore, that the railway authorities should enquire into the cause of this delay. On the occasion of great fairs all the gates of the temple are kept open, but as on the present occasion only one gate was kept open, a great crush was caused, but fortunately no accident happened.

Complaint regarding the inconvenience suffered by Hindu pilgrims at the Dákor station.

Municipalities.

The Indian Spectator (1) of the 8th July, in referring to the proposal of Mr. Dosábhái Frámji to grant an extension of leave of three months to Mr. Ollivant to enable him to make himself pretty fairly acquainted with the schemes of water-supply and drainage in London and Paris, remarks:—We are of opinion that Mr. Ollivant will simply waste his energies in acquiring that experience of which his enthusiastic friends, Dr. Blanc and Mr. Dosábhái Frámji, have spoken in such glowing terms. Nobody grudges Mr. Ollivant a longer holiday. By all means let him enjoy the invigorating breeze of his native clime and return thoroughly refreshed to serve the city better. He is a prodigy of municipal administration in his own way, if all the miracles he is said to have performed in the municipality are to be believed. But this furlough affair strongly savours, we must speak out in the interests of truth, as a job pure and unmitigated.

Condemns the proposal made by Mr. Dosábhái Frámji to grant an extension of leave to Mr. Ollivant to enable him to make himself acquainted with the schemes of water-supply and drainage in London and Paris.

The Indu Prakásh (9) of the 9th July says:—The vacancy caused in the Municipal Corporation by the death of Dr. Cody could not have been better filled up by Government than by the appointment of Dr. Gray. The learned doctor is a rather unobtrusive gentleman, but he is not a man of prejudices or crotchets. It seems he has of late been paying his attention to the drainage question. The Corporation is likely to be benefited by this new addition to its ranks.

Complains of the filthy condition of certain parts of Bombay.

Alluding to the resolution recently passed by the Town Council of Bombay that Government should be asked to lend the services of a medical man to act as Health Officer during the time Dr. Weir acts as Municipal Commissioner, the Lok Mitrá (77) of the 8th July observes that there can be no doubt that some parts of the city are now in a most filthy state. There have been some cases of cholera in the city and the disease is evidently spreading; it is extensively prevalent in the districts, and it is of the highest importance that every effort should be made to check the progress of the disease. What energy the Health Department has seems to be expended on cleaning and re-cleaning the parts of the town inhabited by rich and influential people; and if half the attention paid to the cleanliness of these places were devoted to the sanitation of more thickly populated parts inhabited by ignorant people, the state of the city would present a marked contrast to its present filthy and unwholesome condition. The appointment of a Health Committee, such as the one suggested by Mr. Nowroji Fardunji, to enquire into the matter and to submit a report is a very sensible plan, which ought to be adopted. In the meantime care must be taken that the native town is carefully looked after and kept in as clean a condition as the circumstances can permit. It is to be hoped that the new Health Officer will accomplish this task. [The Bombay Chronicle (74) and the Yajdán Parast (120) of the same date express somewhat similar sentiments.]

Complains of the inconvenience caused to the people residing in the neighbourhood of the Onkáreshvar burning ground at Poona.

The Shiváji (60) of the 6th July complains that great inconvenience is caused to the people in the neighbourhood of the Onkáreshvar burning ground by the burning of dead bodies on the artificial bank raised by the municipality. It has been a custom to take dead bodies to the Náráyan Peth bridge during the monsoon. It is true an adherence to this practice would have caused some temporary inconvenience to the public, but the annoyance caused to the inhabitants in the neighbourhood of the first-named burning ground will be considerable. It is therefore to be hoped that the new municipal board will give due consideration to this matter.

A request to the municipality of Belgaum to remove the public privies from their present site.

The Dnyán Bodhak (24) of the 8th July complains of the inconvenience and annoyance caused to the public by the public privies in the town of Belgaum as at present located, and requests the municipal authorities to remove them to a more convenient site.

Complains of the inconvenience caused by the present hours of holding meetings of the new municipal board of Surat.

The Gujarát Mitrá (75) of the 8th July gives in extenso the text of a petition preferred to the president by certain members of the city municipality of Surat complaining of the inconvenience caused to them by the present hours of their meetings, as also of the president's reply thereto declining to change the hours, and invites the attention of the authorities concerned and of Government to the matter. The present hours are as inconvenient to Government servants in lower grades and pleaders as to those who belong to the trading profession. [The Vartamán Sár (117) of the 10th July makes similar remarks, and advises the municipal board to fight to the very last and to settle the matter once for all.]

Comments in connection with a portion of the business transacted at a recent meeting of the new municipal board of Surat.

The same refers to the remarks made by Mr. Dhruva at a meeting of the Surat Municipal Board on the subject of the non-entry in the last year's municipal accounts of the expenses incurred for the demolition of the city walls. The secretary of the municipality and his assistant state that about Rs. 300 were spent for the purpose, but that the amount was not entered in the accounts as it was calculated that something more than that amount would be realized by the sale of the debris of the walls. Such adjustment is certainly very irregular. The debris was purchased and sold by the same party, viz., the municipality, and how can the proceeds of such a sale be counted as receipts? But who listens to all these particulars? The president sometimes leans to one side and sometimes to the other, and no amendment of his resolutions is possible. As regards the electric light contract, Mr. Bhánushankar moved for the removal from the budget of the sum of Rs. 8,000 provided for the purpose. He held that according to the instructions of the Government of India the municipality could undertake the work if it was prepared for the responsibility attendant on it. But as the municipality was not prepared to take the responsibility, the provision of Rs. 8,000 must disappear. The president, however, was opposed to the motion, and it therefore necessarily fell down, the eight representatives of the people recording their inability to undertake any responsibility in the matter. The president referred to the awkwardness of retracting from the contract into which the municipality had entered with the Electric Light Company, but the company had on their own part not abided by the terms of their contract. Is it just that the municipality and the public should suffer for the default of the company, simply because their manager is the brother of the late Honourable Mr. Ashburner? It must be a matter for consideration whether any deduction from the amount contracted for should not be made on account of insufficient light.

Native States.

Makes a defence of the system of export and import duties at present obtaining in Native States.

The Indu Prakásh (9) of the 9th July does not approve of the cry that has been raised by certain Anglo-Indian papers against the system of import and export duties that at present obtains in Native States generally. It cannot be denied that even powerful and enlightened nations do not hesitate to resort to these sources of revenue for the purpose of balancing their expenditure, and it will not be fair to take the Native States of India to task for following suit. Even admitting that the taxes levied on articles of trade are heavy and indefensible on principle, such a policy cannot be said to be very oppressive. Even in the British territories import and export duties are levied on trade commodities either by Government or the municipalities, and there is nothing strange in Native administrations following the example of Government. Every Native potentate ought to recognize the necessity of removing all restrictions on trade, and it is not unlikely that the present rulers are alive to such a necessity. But the difficulty of putting the precept into practice is insurmountable and therefore they are obliged to ignore its teachings. It is said that the British Government should during their regency reform the administration of the Rewa State, and should secure its commercial interests from all future danger; but such interference in the affairs of the State is neither fair nor advisable during the minority of its ruler. If any reforms and changes in the system of levying export and import duties are deemed desirable, the British Government will do well to induce the young prince to accomplish them on his attaining majority.

Comments on the action of Government with regard to the massacre of the Maiyás by the Junágad police.

The same says:—Why are Government playing at bo-peep with the Maiyás? The members of the deputation they sent to Simla were referred to the Foreign Secretary. The Foreign Secretary in his turn referred them to the Government of Bombay. We all know this, and it is more than a week since the news was published. But the much-expected resolution of the Government of India, which it is believed has been for some time in the hands of the Government of Bombay, does not yet turn up! Was it lost on its way from Simla, or are the Government of Bombay preparing to fight a battle over it with the Supreme Government, as they did in the local self-government question? The mystery baffles all discovery, though for one thing, the delay in publishing the new resolution goes a great way in suggesting that the Government of India has probably set aside the Bombay Government's decision.

Berár Affairs.

Requests the Resident at Hyderabad to reconsider Mr. Lane's scheme for the improvement of the Registration Department in Berár.

The Pramod Sindhu (51) of the 9th July is sorry to learn from the Varhád Samáchár (67) that the Resident has not sanctioned the scheme submitted by Mr. Lane for the re-organization of the Registration Department in Berár. The Sindhu collected and published in its last issue certain information regarding this Department in order that the authorities might be acquainted with the facts that the old servants of the Department did not receive promotion and that the Sub-Registrars were not paid proportionably to the work performed by each. It will be better, therefore, if the Resident reconsiders Mr. Lane's scheme.

Notes.—A. The notices from the different Newspapers have been collected in the Report under different heads, which are printed in italics.

B. The names of Newspapers are printed in the body of the Report in italics, and the number of the Newspaper in the above list is printed in brackets after the name.

C. The proprietors of the Newspapers marked * have not given information as to the number of copies issued. In these cases an estimate has been made by the Reporter.

D. The system of spelling vernacular words followed by the Reporter is the same as that adopted in the Official Spelling List of the Bombay Presidency. One peculiar feature of this system is that when the long a (आ or ा) is the last letter of a word, the accent is left out, and the short a (अ = u in gun) is, to prevent confusion, never placed at the end of a word. This rule has been strictly followed, except that when the short a appears to be absolutely necessary to complete the pronunciation of a word, as in Arunodaya or the well known Mitra, it is printed with a mark over it to indicate that it is short, thus—a.

E. Berár papers are received in this office for report under the Resolution of the Government of Bombay in the General Department, No. 1795, dated 8th June 1881.

Politics and the Public Administration.

In alluding to the report that Abdul Rahman receives an annual subsidy of Rs. 12 lákhs from the Government of India, the Bombay Samáchár (85) of the 12th July observes that it appears that the subsidy is paid on the understanding that the Amir should treat the allies of the British Government as his own friends, and should look upon the foes of the latter as his own enemies. The British Government, however, do not appear to have bound themselves by any corresponding assurance. The late Sher Ali was very anxious to obtain the concession embodied in the latter clause of the compromise above mentioned, but not succeeding in his object, he tried to go over to the side of the Russians. This circumstance will furnish the rivals of the British Government in Central Asia with a pretext, of which they will make use in estranging the Amir from the sympathies of the former. The British Indian Government should therefore decide upon and declare a certain specific policy in this matter, as the present attitude of the Persians and Russians with regard to Afghanistan renders the adoption of such a step extremely necessary.

Advises the British Indian Government to declare some specific policy in regard to Afghanistan.

The Poona Vaibhav (48) of the 15th July complains that under the present regime corruption is rampant amongst Government officers from the merest pátil of a village to the Commissioner of a Division. The notion seems to have gained firm ground that a Government officer is nothing if not corrupt, and that the real object of an officer's position is to squeeze out money from illiterate and poor people. What a dangerous notion is this! All people are perhaps aware of the fact that this vice of corruption prevails to a great extent among the people of the Deshastha sect in the districts of Belgaum and Dhárwár, and seems to have been inherited from the English rulers. When the English first appeared in this country, the people were illiterate, were incapable of smoothly managing their own affairs, were prone to quarrelling amongst themselves, and therefore entrusted their kingdom to the all-powerful and all-virtuous English. The latter should in justice not have thought of resorting to illegal means of making money, and should have set to the people a good example by their own behaviour. But they have done nothing of the kind. On the contrary they have been misleading the people into this grave crime. Some European officers have become notorious for having opened shops wherein they openly sell to the highest bidder any Government post that may be in their gift, and there are in the city of Poona persons who have purchased such posts from these shops. The same system is also extended to watan settlements and criminal prosecutions. It is very strange that such officers should resort to these means of illegal gratification for the performance of business that forms part of their legitimate duties and for which they are handsomely paid by Government. Such a state of things saps the roots of the very idea of justice by creating an impression that money can enable a man to escape legal punishment, and it is quite unintelligible that Government should allow such corrupt officers to carry on their nefarious practices with impunity.

Complains of corruption being rampant amongst Government officers.

The Gujaráti (94) of the 15th July says:—The question of the employment of Natives in the higher grades of the public service has been engaging the attention of several Ministries, Viceroys and Governors of Presidencies, but it has not yet been brought to a satisfactory settlement. The employment of Natives in responsible posts is desirable from a moral, political, as well as a financial point of view. Judging from a purely moral standpoint, it cannot be denied that all posts under Government, of whatever rank, ought to be thrown open to all classes of subjects irrespective of their caste and creed and the colour of their skins. The political aspect of the question shows that its claims to consideration are even stronger. The generous champions of liberal education in India had indeed a very hard battle to fight before they could introduce the English system of education into this country. With the advance of liberal education the aspirations of its recipients also began to be developed. In the earlier stages of the British rule there was a very favourable field for educated men, but as time went on all the important berths began to be monopolised by the European and Eurasian classes, and thus educated Natives were left out in the cold. The cry, therefore, began to be naturally raised, what is to be gained by acquiring education? The advocates of the Government cause meet this position by saying that Government are only bound to educate the people but not to provide them with employment. Such a reply, though reasonable to a certain extent, is calculated to create disaffection and discontent. It is not politically expedient that such consequences should be allowed to result from the present policy of Government. The educated Natives are the real strength of the British rule, and it is dangerous to allow them to be discontented, while if they are allowed access to the higher appointments in the service they will prove to be faithful servants and will also set an example to others by their integrity. As for the financial aspect of the question, it was very lately admitted by the Under Secretary of State for India that the best remedy against the increasing administrative expenditure of India was the extensive employment of Natives in the public service. Natives are not as fond of pomp and show as Europeans, and the duties of many of the fat appointments at present enjoyed by Europeans can be satisfactorily performed by Natives with far lower emoluments than those enjoyed by the former.

Points out the necessity and advantages of giving to the educated Natives important appointments in the public service.

Says that the new 4 per cent. loan for 2½ millions sterling ought to have been raised in England.

The Indian Spectator (1) of the 15th July, referring to the notification for the issue of a new 4 per cent. loan for 2½ millions sterling, observes:—It is satisfactory to see that the objectionable practice of giving earlier notice at Calcutta and Simla than at other places, which was very much complained of last time, has been done away with. But when will the Government of India learn to borrow in the cheapest market? If they are such strong advocates of free trade, why do they not issue the loan in England? We have pointed out in these columns that it is ultimately cheap to raise loans in England, as the Indian exchequer is thereby saved, on the efflux of a loan, something like a million sterling, which it cannot afford to lose.

Says that the operations of the Survey and Settlement Department in Sind have caused deep discontent among the people.

The same says:—The operations of the Survey and Settlement Department in Sind have excited deep discontent among the people. We learn that the authorities, besides enormously increasing the assessments, have gone so far as to levy these increased assessments on crops cultivated before the expiration of the old 10 years' settlement and reaped before the announcement of the new rates. Now we know that in the Presidency proper the increased assessments are never levied in the year in which the settlement is introduced. In fact, the Bombay Land Revenue Code contains an express provision (Section 104) in this behalf. But this is the only section the Bombay Government has not extended to the province of Sind. The rest of the Code is as much in force there as here. We confess we are unable to see why an admittedly poor province like Sind should be deprived of the benefit of this section. It seems to us that in common fairness the Sind landholders were entitled to a notice before the enhanced rates could be imposed and levied. It would be most shocking to common sense as well as to justice if any law allowed a landlord to enhance his rent retrospectively without previous notice. Suppose that Section 13 of Act X. of 1859 and Section 14 of Act VIII. of 1869 did not exist in the statute-book, and that therefore there was no express law obliging a zamindár in Bengal to serve a reasonable notice upon his tenant before enhancing his rent. Can it be believed that any court would assist the landlord to recover the enhanced rent without such previous notice? The landlord will be compelled to point out an enactment expressly exempting him from the obligation of giving a notice. It will not be enough to show that there was no law expressly obliging him to give notice. In the absence of legislative enactments the law of "justice, equity and good conscience" prevails everywhere in India, and under this law no one can say that a notice is not obligatory before an enhancement of rent. Can the State, therefore, the greatest landlord in India, do in Sind what it has authorized no other landlord to do anywhere,—nay, what it has expressly prohibited other landlords from doing and which it cannot do itself in the Presidency proper? Is the State the only landlord not bound by the law of "justice, equity and good conscience," which it has itself ordained to be the supreme governing law in all cases not provided for by express statutes? Can it refuse to follow this law after recognizing and embodying its principles in all its local and special laws on the subject of tenancy? In our opinion the non-extension of Section 104 of Bombay Act V. of 1879 to Sind amounts to this, that in Sind there is no express statutory enactment obliging the State to give notice before enhancing the assessment. It does not amount to a repeal of Section 26 of Regulation IV. of 1827 or of the law of "justice, equity and good conscience" of which this section commands the observance in the absence of positive statutes, of usage, and of the law of the defendant. It was a curious coincidence that the very same Government Gazette which extended the Land Revenue Code with the exception of Section 104 to Sind declared Section 26 of Regulation IV. of 1827 to be in force in the province. If, therefore, it is in force in Sind, can any civil court refuse the necessary equitable relief to any landholder who has been forced to pay the assessment at the enhanced rate without any notice whatsoever prior or even posterior to the cultivation of his land? We are not sure whether the Bombay Revenue Jurisdiction Act, an Act which is a disgrace to this Presidency, at all bars such a suit. If it does, the more need there is for Government to give relief, which their civil courts would have otherwise afforded under their own laws, and which if not afforded will involve the Act, as well as the Government that passed it, in lasting condemnation. We presume Government did not transfer the jurisdiction of the civil courts in revenue matters to the revenue courts in order to absolve themselves from allegiance to the principles of law and equity. We conceive the object of the Revenue Jurisdiction Act was not to overrule all at once that admirable body of case-law which in England supplied the deficiencies of the Common Law, as Lord Bacon says, without subverting it, which in course of time became a real ars boni et æqui, and which being transplanted to India has furnished the raw material for most of our codified substantive law, and made our courts the heirs of juridical experience extending over centuries in England. The Bombay Government could never have succeeded in inducing the Supreme Government to pass such a revolutionary Act if this had been their avowed purpose. If, however, the Revenue Jurisdiction Act does not oust the jurisdiction of the civil courts in suits for a refund of excess assessments wrongfully levied without previous notice of enhancement, then we ask Government whether it is at all politic, wise or prudent to drive the people to litigation for the enforcement of an undoubted right unlawfully infringed by Government?

Does not approve of the censure passed by Government on Mr. Mandlik, the Government Pleader, in the matter of the Ratnágiri shooting case.

The same observes:—We agree with the main portion of the Government resolution in respect of the Ratnágiri shooting case, but we must protest against the attempt made to cast a portion of the blame on Mr. Mandlik, the Government Pleader. In the first place we doubt if Government ever got a full and correct report of all that occurred in the High Court. If we are to believe newspaper reports, no sooner did the Government Pleader advance an argument than he was met by exclamations of impatience, disbelief and sometimes downright ridicule. Government ought to have taken into consideration the difficulties of a man who was pleading a disagreeable cause before a tribunal which, by its conduct and by the treatment it accorded that advocate, very clearly showed that a strong bias had been already taken and that the finding was already a foregone conclusion. In our opinion that was an undeserved rebuke to a zealous Government official. [The Kesari (34) of the 17th July also expresses similar sentiments.]

The Jagan Mitrá (31) of the 16th July refers to the portion of the resolution of Government censuring Mr. Goldsmid, the District Superintendent of Police, Ratnágiri, for not taking Mr. Hewett into immediate custody and for not examining the barrel of the pistol which was reported by him to have been loaded, and invites the attention of Government to certain circumstances which, in the opinion of the Jagan Mitrá, exonerate Mr. Goldsmid from all blame in the matter. When the pistol was fired Mr. Hewett was at the village of Oni, which is 7 miles distant from Rájápur, and was in a precarious state of health. When the Police Superintendent went to the village to personally investigate the matter Mr. Hewett informed him that the state of his health did not admit of his being removed to the Superintendent's camp, and the latter therefore thought it advisable not to remove Mr. Hewett. It will thus be perceived that Mr. Goldsmid was not wrong in acting as he did. As regards the examination of the pistol, Mr. Goldsmid did not hand it over to the police pátil, but it was shown to him by the chief constable, whereon he ordered it to be delivered over to the Police Inspector in order to be produced before the District Magistrate. Mr. Goldsmid thought that the barrel was loaded, but he could not examine it as there was no ramrod available on the spot. These particulars go to show that Mr. Goldsmid was not guilty of any omission in this case. [The Bakul (16) of the 15th July expresses similar sentiments. The Hitechchhu (76) of Ahmedabad of the 19th July says that the public belief that race distinctions were observed in the justice dealt out by the High Courts was in some way supported by the Bengáli contempt of court case, and the decision of the Bombay High Court in the Ratnágiri shooting case strengthened the belief. It would not have been wrong if Government had set forth in their resolution in suitable terms the arguments against the decision given by the High Court in this case. It is, however, sufficient that the Government Pleader has been censured instead.]

Makes a defence of Mr. Goldsmid, the District Superintendent of Police, Ratnágiri.

With reference to the refusal of the Bombay Government to refund the contribution hitherto levied from the municipality of Bombay for the working of the Contagious Diseases Act, the Bombay Chronicle (74) of the 15th July observes that the refusal is made on the ground that the fact of the Secretary of State having withheld his assent to the levy of the contribution did not entitle the Corporation to the refund. But it ought to be remembered that the contribution was enforced against the deliberate, emphatic and repeatedly expressed remonstrances of the Corporation. The municipality was quite powerless to resist the unjust demand except in the constitutional way of appealing to the higher authorities. Under these circumstances the attitude taken by Government is neither liberal nor wise; and it is therefore to be hoped that Government will refund the contribution hitherto levied.

Requests Government to refund the contribution hitherto levied from the municipality of Bombay for the working of the Contagious Diseases Act.

The Bombay Samáchár (85) of the 20th July observes that the telephone wires in Bombay threaten to cause serious inconvenience to householders. Similar inconvenience has been experienced in England, where the people have carried the complaint to Parliament. In America the annoyance caused by these wires has induced the Government of that country to compel the telephone companies to put their wires underground, and the people in England recommend a similar course. The Bombay Government should, therefore, also insist upon the telephone wires in Bombay being put underground, before they prove a serious annoyance and before the public voice is raised against it.

Says that telephone wires in Bombay should be carried underground.

With reference to the intention of Government to transfer the Panvel and Karjat tálukas of the Thána District to the Kolába District, the Suryodayá (64) of the 16th July observes that if the transfer is made the ryots of the two tálukas will have to go a long distance to reach Alibág, the head-quarter station of the latter district. This inconvenience may be avoided by removing the sadar station from the last-named place to Pen without entailing any loss on Government.

Does not approve of the intended transfer of the Panvel and Karjat tálukas of the Thána Collectorate to the Kolába District unless the sadar station is removed from Alibág to Pen.

Says that a sentence of a few days' imprisonment would have been enough in the case of the persons who plundered the granaries in the Khed Táluka of the Ratnágiri District.

With reference to the sentence of one month's imprisonment with hard labour passed by the Subordinate Magistrate of táluka Khed in the Ratnágiri District upon each of the several persons who plundered the granaries belonging to some sávkárs in that táluka, the Bakul (16) of the 15th July observes that most of the prisoners are not professional robbers, but plundered the grain to save their lives from starvation brought on by the havoc committed by locusts. They committed the crime under great necessity, and ought to have been sentenced to about a week's imprisonment.

Complains of the introduction of the system of ábkári farming into Surat.

A correspondent of the Rást Goftár (109) of the 15th July says that it is much to be regretted that nobody minds the protest of the liquor distillers of Surat against the punishment that is sought to be imposed on them by the Commissioner of A'bkári on account of the detection of certain frauds in the sadar distillery. From the first proximo the system of farming the ábkári revenue will be introduced, which will have the effect of benefiting one man at the sacrifice of a thousand. Nearly sixty liquor distillers and ten keepers of liquor-shops will be deprived of their ancestral profession by the introduction of this farming system, and grave injustice will be done to thousands of poor people who have been accustomed to the use of pure liquors. The correspondent also complains of the injustice that has been done to the people of Surat by the discontinuance by Government of the distillation of the several choice wines for which Surat has gained a name in Asia and Europe.

Complains against the increase in the duty levied on brab trees in the Sálsette and the Bassein tálukas of the Thána District.

The Suryodayá (64) of the 16th July observes that though the petition against the working of the A'bkári Act was prepared and presented to Government by a large number of the people of the Thána District before the ábkári contracts were given away, yet the prayers urged in that document appear to have produced little effect on the authorities. Recently the tax on each brab tree in the Sálsette Táluka has been raised from Rs. 12 to 13, and in the Bassein Táluka the duty on the same kind of trees has been increased from Rs. 10 to 14. The Suryodayá advises the petitioners to carry their grievances to the Government of India and the Secretary of State for India successively.

Points out the necessity of providing a sanitarium for the poor convalescent in-door patients of hospitals.

The Bombay Samáchár (85) of the 19th July points out the desirability of providing a sanitarium for the poor convalescent in-door patients in hospitals, and exhorts the charitable public, the Municipal Corporation of Bombay and Government to contribute towards the accomplishment of that object. The Samáchár recommends Bándra as a proper locality for the purpose. The close proximity of this place to the city will be a source of great convenience to the inmates, who will thereby be enabled to see their friends and relations and to arrange their own affairs while they are in a convalescent condition.

Grievances of hospital assistants serving in the Bombay Presidency.

The Din Bandhu (5) of the 15th July gives some of the grievances of hospital assistants in regard to their low salaries, meagre allowances and slow prospects of promotion. These medical officers are admittedly a very useful class of servants, and their services are very amply drawn upon in cases of difficulties, such as prevalence of cholera or the breaking out of war. They are transferred to any station irrespective of its distance and healthiness or otherwise, and are made to work in season and out of season. Their special services and special claims for promotion are never brought to prominent notice, and it is therefore necessary that some sort of personal allowance should be allowed to these officers for special services. It is much to be regretted that hospital assistants do not receive any allowance for temporarily doing the work of an officer of a superior rank. The Din Bandhu understands that in the Bengal Presidency medical officers pay a certain percentage of their private income to hospital assistants for preparing their private prescriptions, while the officers themselves do all official work. In the Madras Presidency each civil hospital has a clerk for the performance of all official work. But it is a matter for regret that in the Bombay Presidency hospital assistants have to perform both clerical and professional work. The Din Bandhu describes the prospects of promotion of the subordinates in the several departments of the State, and comes to the conclusion that hospital assistants are the most unfavourably situated of the lot. In conclusion, the writer observes that hospital assistants are military men, being required to perform active field service when necessary, and are therefore entitled to the same degree of respect as is enjoyed by Native commissioned officers.

A complaint regarding the annoyance caused to the people bringing firewood into the town of Ahmednagar.

The Nyáyá Sindhu (45) of the 16th July complains of the annoyance caused to the people bringing firewood into the town of Ahmednagar by being required to procure a permit at a cost of two pies. In the present season all forest officers are required to move about in the district and attend at the sales of forest produce, and poor people are obliged to suffer great inconvenience for want of permits. It is understood that in the Khándesh District, fees are only charged on firewood brought from the jungles, while in the Ahmednagar District fees are also charged on fuel brought from one's fields. Why should there be a difference between the practices observed in these two districts? Why should there not be clerks stationed at each gate of the town for granting the necessary permits? It is to be hoped that this matter will engage the early attention of the district authorities.

Injustice of making the people pay for the repair of irrigation works in the Dhárwár District.

The Dhárwár Vritt (23) of the 12th July points out the injustice of making people pay for the repair of irrigation works in addition to the tax levied on them for the use of water, and requests Government to prevent the same.

A complaint regarding the prevalence of gambling in the town of Vengurla.

The Vengurla Vritt (70) of the 12th July complains of the prevalence of gambling in the town of Vengurla, and requests the Commissioner of the Southern Division to take measures for the application of the Gambling Act to the town.

A complaint regarding the evil of allowing carriages to be furiously driven in the streets of Bombay.

The Prabhákar (49) of the 19th July points out the evil of allowing carriages to be furiously driven in the streets of Bombay, and requests the attention of the municipal and police authorities to the necessity of taking measures for preventing it. [The Bombay Samáchár (85) of the 17th idem says that, notwithstanding that some Europeans drive furiously and on prohibited sites, they are not punished, and remarks that the police ought to prevent such persons from acting as they do.]

Requests Government to abolish the punitive police at Surat.

With reference to the objection raised by the municipal commissioners of Surat to the continuance of the punitive police in that city, which annually costs fifteen thousand rupees, the Bombay Samáchár (85) of the 17th July observes that this fine was inflicted on that city in connection with the late Surat riots, which occurred five years ago, and it is strange that the municipality did not object to this fine long before this. It is an important question why the authorities should have continued the additional police till now when the riots occurred five years ago. Do they believe that the people of Surat are not yet free from the boisterous spirit that possessed them then? Do the local authorities believe that the people may at any time create similar disturbances? Do they consider the people of Surat as excitable as the Afridis, Waziris and other tribes on the north-west frontier of India? The Surtis are generally traders and merchants and are very meek. They are quite loyal to Government and will not commit any serious indiscretion. The additional police was imposed on the city soon after the riots, and there was no objection to its imposition then. Five years have passed over those events, and it is an injustice to the city to continue the police now—nay, its continuance is a blot on the character of the people who are required to pay its cost. The system of punitive police is objectionable in principle, and the Samáchár has raised its voice against it whenever an occasion presented itself. The system is calculated to inflict punishment on many innocent persons for the faults of a few. The Parliament has also expressed its disapproval of the system, and recently it gave expression to the same view in connection with the late Salem riots. For these reasons the punitive police at Surat ought to be removed. If on account of an increase in the population of the city or for some other reason the authorities be of opinion that the present strength of the police is indispensable, Government should make some provision for the additional force, but should not fail to remove at once the blot on the character of the people of that city. [The Vartamán Sár (108) of the 17th July also disapproves of the continuance of the punitive police at Surat, and asks whether Government mean to exact the fine for ever, as they have not removed it though five years have now already elapsed since its imposition.]

A prayer for the immediate destruction of rotten grain at Surat.

The Suryá Prakásh (79) of the 14th July says that cholera has burst out in Mándvi. It is due to the foul stench emanating from grain rotten by being under water during the recent floods. The authorities at Surat ought to have the grain destroyed immediately. There will be an epidemic amongst cattle if they are allowed to be fed upon it, and their milk will do great injury to its consumers.

Suggestions in connection with the amelioration of the distressed condition of the people of Surat and a complaint regarding the apathetic conduct of Government and municipal officers at the time of the recent floods.

The Gujarát Mitrá (75) of the 15th July says:—It is very important that provision should be made for the contingency of future floods by constructing boats, rafts, &c. It is also necessary that the services of competent boatsmen should be permanently engaged. The authorities of the local fund department and the several municipalities concerned should at once undertake the repair of roads. The license tax has been imposed on the people ostensibly for the purpose of providing a reserve fund for famine times. As the present occasion is as critical as a famine, why should not Government afford relief to the distressed people from the proceeds of that tax? It is necessary that the Government of India should direct their attention to this matter. The apathetic conduct of the secretary of the Surat Municipality in the matter of determining the extent of injury caused by the recent floods is indeed very surprising. It is nearly ten days since the floods have subsided, and yet neither the secretary, nor the president, nor the commissioners have any idea of the nature and extent of the damage caused. Certainly a more active and intelligent secretary should be at once appointed. The present incumbent is not capable of coping with any such critical occasions and is accustomed to report matters in a vague and general manner. In his report regarding the assistance rendered by independent parties he has sung the praises of some of his caste people and altogether left unnoticed those of certain Hindu gentlemen. It remains to be seen what weight Government attach to this report. [The Vartamán Sár (118) of the 17th July also prefers a similar complaint against the secretary of the municipality, and advises the new board to call a special general meeting for the consideration of a detailed report, which should be called for from the secretary. Every superintendent and overseer and the assistant secretary should also be required to furnish their reports and their diaries should be examined. While this is not done, the outcry raised against the municipality will not subside. A correspondent of the Rást Goftár (109) of the 15th July complains of the annoyance caused to the people of Surat by large heaps of dirt and refuse being allowed to lie on the roads and lanes of the city, and requests the attention of the authorities concerned to the necessity of removing those heaps in the interests of public health. A correspondent of the Deshi Mitrá (90) of the 19th July also makes a similar complaint. The Gujaráti (94) of the 15th July also refers to the havoc committed by the floods, and says that it is a matter for regret that the Bombay Government and the English public generally should have been so indifferent in the matter. When there is a famine in Ireland or a fire in England large funds are raised to afford relief to the sufferers and the people of this country are called upon to pay their quota. But very few Englishmen have contributed towards the relief of the sufferers on the present occasion. Is it not the duty of the Bombay Government also to assist the people that are at present distressed? The Yajdán Parast (121) of the same date also exhorts the European public to contribute towards the relief of the people of Surat.]

Some suggestions in connection with the relief of persons who have suffered by the recent floods at Surat.

The Suryá Prakásh (79) of the 14th July, in writing on the recent floods in Surat, observes that the local funds department has not been able to discharge its duties satisfactorily. It is necessary that dharmashálas be built on elevated places and wells dug near every railway station. The lives of the residents of such places and those of travellers will be saved in times of peril by supplying these wants. It is the duty of Government to compel the local funds authorities to construct roads and dharmashálas and to dig wells near every railway station. The district authorities ought also to induce the public to carry out these works. Though relief funds have been started in several cities for the alleviation of the sufferings of the distressed people of Surat and its suburbs, it is necessary that Government also should give a good amount of money for the purpose. It is the duty of Government to aid the people in times of public calamity. It is to be hoped that Mr. White, the Collector of Surat, will draw the attention of Government to the necessity of Government aid on this occasion. The cause of the floods is alleged by some to be the washing off of the works built for the passage of water near Pánjar, where water finds its way in great quantity from Khándesh, and of the channel for the diversion of water towards Kánkrákhádi. In fact, some such cause must be at the bottom, otherwise floods could not have overtaken the city for the last two years successively. The Public Works Department and Government ought to attend to this matter. If floods like the one that has overtaken the city this year are not prevented, how can the people escape from heavy losses in future? [The Indu Prakásh (9) of the 16th July observes:—By the way, what is the Sanitary Commissioner doing? It is on occasions like the present that the services of this officer become necessary and useful. We also hope that Government will appoint a special officer to go about the villages which have suffered from the floods and to submit a carefully prepared report of the loss caused by them.]

Requests that a commission may be appointed to enquire into the complaint of the people of Surat that the local authorities did not render due help to persons in distress on the occasion of the recent floods.

The Yajdán Parast (121) of the 15th July observes that the people of Surat loudly complain that the local authorities gave no intimation whatever to the people of the approaching flood, and when the flood water rose high in the city they failed to afford due help to persons who were encompassed by danger by taking boats to their assistance. The people of Surat also observe that an English daily of Bombay has bestowed undeserved praise on the local anthorities for their conduct on the occasion of the floods. Government should therefore appoint a commission to enquire into the truth of these complaints in order that the duties of the local authorities on such dangerous occasions may be definitely laid down and the distress from future catastrophes mitigated as far as possible. The commission should also be entrusted with the work of reporting upon the defensive works needed to protect the city from high floods, and Government should compel the municipality to construct them at once. [The Broach Samáchár (86) of the 19th July also makes a similar prayer. The Bombay Samáchár (85) of the 17th July remarks that the city of Surat is surrounded with a castellated wall, which the local authorities are anxious to pull down; but before they are allowed to do so, an enquiry should be made as to how far this wall serves to keep back flood water, and if it be of some use in this way, it should be repaired and kept in good condition. It should also be ascertained whether the raising of the bank of the Tápti on the Surat side will be useful to prevent the flood water from entering the city. Mr. Hope, when he was Collector of Surat, had a canal constructed at some distance from the city for carrying away flood water, and his object was satisfied to a certain extent. This canal is said to have been silted up and needs to be dredged. Similar canals ought to be constructed near the towns and villages which are flooded by the rising of the Tápti. The same of the 16th July says that it is likely that Surat may be visited with another flood this year, and requests the authorities concerned to take all precautionary measures. A correspondent of the Vartamán Sár (118) of the 19th July expresses a fear that Balsár, where petty floods are of frequent occurrence, will some day be overtaken by heavy floods and will suffer great loss, as the local authorities have not provided themselves with suitable means for meeting such floods]

A defence of the authorities at Surat from the attacks made on them regarding their apathy on the occasion of the recent floods.

The Surat Akhbár (78) of the 16th July says that the local authorities, and especially Messrs. Nánu Mián and Nánábhái, rendered praiseworthy services during the recent floods without caring for their lives. It was owing to the exertions of these officers that no life was lost in such a large city as Surat although the floods came on with great force and of a sudden.

Local Self-government.

Comments in connection with the Local Self-government Bills for the Bombay Presidency.

Commenting on the Local Boards Bill for the Bombay Presidency, the Indu Prakásh (9) of the 16th July expresses serious apprehensions as to the object of Lord Ripon's original object in inaugurating the scheme of local self-government being thoroughly satisfied by its provisions. The members constituting these local boards are to be partly nominated and partly elected. The Bill requires the Collector to prepare a list of candidates eligible for election, and though there may be no room to doubt the Collector's discretion in the matter of the preparation of the list, still the very fact that the people's election will succeed that of the Collector's is calculated to render the concession of election nugatory. The Bill also provides that excepting the president the number of elected members shall not be less than half the total number of members constituting the managing committee, while the president will generally be a Government nominee. This is tantamount to giving a preponderance to the official element. It is provided in the 27th section of the Bill that the president of a local board will either be nominated by Government, or by the people, if the latter be empowered by Government in that behalf. The latter alternative clause seems however to have been inserted simply with the view of soothing the susceptibilities of the public and is not likely to be adhered to in practice. The duties of a president as laid down in the Bill are very onerous and important, and it is almost impossible that Government will be able to find out among the Native non-official classes a man qualified for the post. On the whole, the provisions of the Bill do not seem to be calculated to fulfil its avowed object, which is the extension of the powers at present vested in the people in the management of their local funds. The Indu Prakásh suggests that the people should have power to elect two-thirds of the members of local boards, and they should be left to exercise their free will in the matter of elections, subject to such rules as Government may deem fit to lay down. The Collector may also, if necessary, be empowered to interfere in cases where interest, and not qualifications, may have played an important part in the election of members. The main principle which should be recognized in these matters is that the money which goes to form the local funds belongs to the people, that its expenditure should be carried on with their consent, and that Government interference should not go beyond checking the mismanagement and maladministration of those funds. It is therefore in keeping with this principle that Government should try to delegate to the people all the powers beyond the scope of their legitimate function. Now-a-days it is observable that many a village, however large may be its contribution to the local funds, does not possess a single good school to educate its children nor means to repair its dilapidated wells. To reform such an unsatisfactory state of things should be the object of the present Bill. The people should clearly imbibe the idea that the local funds are their own property and that their management is solely theirs, and there is every chance that they will try to prove themselves worthy of the trust reposed in them. The Bombay Government seems to have been from the beginning of opinion that the present state of affairs is as it should be, and that any change in it is not warranted by the circumstances of the present times, and the present Bill seems to have been framed in accordance with this view. Some change in the number of members and the conditions of election is necessary if local self-government is not to be a mere delusion and a name. Some people argue that Natives have not yet acquired the necessary fitness for wielding the powers of local management, but this argument is as fallacious as saying that a man should not enter water before he knows how to swim. [The Native Opinion (10) also urges the necessity of increasing the numerical strength of elected members on municipal and local fund boards. It also points out the advisability of giving an independent vote to educated people and of modifying the rule which declares persons who have been criminally punished ineligible to vote. It is necessary that an exception should be made to this rule in the case of crimes against particular persons. The Native Opinion also suggests that at least one seat on the municipal and local boards should be reserved for the editors of newspapers published in the mofussil. The Arunodayá (14) of the same date expresses sentiments similar to those of the Indu Prakásh, but suggests that the number of elected members should not be less than three-fourths of the total number of members. The Kesari (34) of the 17th July is of opinion that the provisions of the Bill as they at present stand are not only not calculated to prove beneficial to the interests of the people, but are likely to cause injury to their cause. This seems to be merely a trick for throwing all the burden of expenditure on the municipalities under the garb of conferring extensive powers on the people. All the real power is vested in the Collector, the Commissioner and the Governor in Council, while a mere shadow of it rests with municipalities. The Akhbáre Sodágar (81) of the 20th July expresses sentiments similar to those of the Indu Prakásh.]

Comments in connection with the Local Self-government Bills for the Bombay Presidency.

The Mahrátta (2) of the 15th July, in noticing the Local Self-government Bills for the Bombay Presidency, says:—To our greatest regret we find that our Provincial Government has yet not been tamed completely in the matter of the scheme of local self-government. So far as we can make out, Bill No. 4 of 1883 appears to be only a tentative measure; for evidently enough it can never be taken to embody most, if not all, of the leading features of the self-government scheme. The delay caused in the publication of the Bills, and the news that they were sent to the Secretary of State for India for approval, have served to create an impression that any criticism that may now be made on the details of the Bills will be practically useless; for the Government of Bombay will not now show even the least inclination to accept the suggestions that may be made. But this is clearly a mistake. For it is not the Bills as they now stand that have been approved of by the Government of Lord Ripon or the Secretary of State; but it is the principles upon the lines of which the Bills have been framed that have been approved of. Every word of comment that may find its way into public prints or memorials is therefore necessary and welcome. The importance of the subject demands a prompt and fair criticism from all public bodies in general and from municipalities in particular. The Act now proposed is too vague and leaves the details under the different sections to be worked up by rules to be published under the Act. We are surprised to find that the Bombay Government has failed to publish draft rules along with the Act; and we regret it the more because the large number of resolutions that have been issued upon the details of the local self-government scheme are not before the public. Had they been published, the difficulty of knowing what the rules under the Act would be could easily have been avoided. The Local Funds Bill is still worse. In it the Bombay Government has tried, under the name of election, to bring its nominated members into the district board, which is the chief executive centre as regards the management of local funds. If Section 7 of the Bill be allowed to pass as it is, we need not hope for anything better than the mere name of election. In short, we may safely say that the Government of Sir James appears to be as adverse as ever to the independence of these local bodies, though the opposition is now couched in a more elegant style than hitherto. The ex-officio men will now figure as salaried servants and nominated men will come in under the new name of election. The creation of a vice-president is indeed a new feature, and might have proved to be of some use had the constitution of the district board been more liberally framed. [The Hitechchhu (76) of Ahmedabad of the 19th July is not satisfied with the draft Bills, and observes that the good aim of Lord Ripon will not be fulfilled by them. The Bombay Government appears to have stuck to its former opinions on most points in these Bills, and the expectations formed by the public have not been realized. The retention of Collectors as presidents of district municipalities is subversive of the good objects of the scheme of local self-government. The right reserved by Government of confirming the president elected by a municipal board, in cases where that board is permitted to do so, will not produce good results, for the approval of Government is tantamount to the approval of the Collector and the Commissioner. When the views of these officers are not in consonance with those of the board, the approval of Government will not be accorded to the election made by it. If Government use this right with moderation good results may follow. But such a thing is not to be expected. The section regarding the supervision to be exercised by Government over the work done by municipalities is equally objectionable. So long as these two defects are not remedied, the Bills cannot be said to be framed in accordance with the views of His Excellency the Viceroy. It is to be hoped that suitable improvements with regard to these two points will be introduced into the draft Bills before they are read in the Legislative Council, and that Mr. Peile and other members of Council will support them. It is also to be hoped that local committees and associations in Bombay and the mofussil will memorialize Government once more on the subject and pray for suitable changes in the Bills.]

Approves of the principles on which the Bombay Local Self-government Bills have been framed.

The Bombay Chronicle (74) of the 15th July observes that the Bills are evidently free from the tinge of that bias which was unfortunately displayed at the outset by the Government of Sir James Fergusson. A partial change in the personnel of the Government has been the cause of an almost entire modification of its policy with regard to the imperial scheme. Both the Bills give evidence of the earnest wish of His Excellency the Governor in Council to improve and enlarge local self-government on the liberal principles laid down in the Viceregal resolution of 18th May 1882. They are of course mainly framed in view of the requirements of that resolution, but with due regard to the system at present obtaining in this Presidency, which has been found productive of no small good to the people of most districts where local bodies have been in charge of and are conducting local affairs according to arrangements more or less suited to the peculiarities of the several localities. The anxiety of the Governor in Council has been to improve in a solid and substantial manner, and not to clog, the work of local self-government by the new Bills. In short, His Excellency has spared nothing in the way of honest intention and sincere desire to do all in his power to meet the wishes of the Government of India and to satisfy the aspirations of the intelligent public.

Criticises the statement made in the Local Boards Bill that the administration of local funds has on the whole been highly successful.

The Lok Mitrá (77) of the 15th July refers to the statement made by Government in the course of a review of the history of the local funds that the administration of these funds has been, on the whole, highly successful, and remarks:—Such a statement would not have arrested attention and would have passed unchallenged if the whole story of the origin and administration of these funds, told with such clearness and force and based on such incontestable testimony by Mr. Javerilál Umiyáshankar in his very valuable and interesting 'Note on Local Self-government,' had not been known to the public. Mr. Javerilál has told us how in their inception the local funds were raised with the object of promoting education and works of local utility in the districts, and how it was contemplated to give to the cess-payers an influential voice in the disposal of these funds, so as to accustom the people to take an interest in the management of their own affairs, and how during the last twenty years the original objects sought to be promoted in raising and expending the funds were 'inexcusably departed from' and the funds systematically misapplied by the Government of Sir Richard Temple and the system of local funds thereby completely subverted. In the face of this impeachment, supported by chapter and verse from Government records, it is amusing to be informed that the administration of the local funds has been, on the whole, highly satisfactory. That the expression of this opinion has been qualified by the saving words 'on the whole,' does not affect the question.

Legislation—The Native Magistrates' Jurisdiction Bill.

Writing on the Jurisdiction Bill, the Indu Prakásh (9) of the 16th July observes:— The question lies between passing the Bill in its present form and passing it subject to some modification in the nature of a compromise. The question is not what will please one party or another, but what is expedient, practicable, and reasonable. Lord Ripon acted in a very judicious manner when, finding the clamour of a certain class of people staring him in the face in regard to this Bill, he postponed its final settlement to November next and thus gave full eight months' time to its opponents to convince Government that theirs was the right view of the case. But the postponement was apparently not meant for that purpose only. The Viceroy has shown by this readiness on his part to give ample time for public discussion that he is so fully convinced of the expediency as well as the righteousness of the measure that he is not for a moment afraid of giving the fullest opportunity to the champions of the other side of ventilating their grievances, if they have any, and of facing their opposition, whether here or in England. Had the cause taken up by the Viceroy been a weak one, or were he disposed to carry out his policy without waiting to hear what the other side had to say, he would have passed the measure in the way in which Lord Lytton carried through his Council the Gagging Act. Having so far lent a willing ear to the cry of the opponents of the Bill, he can also as reasonably see if he can make a further concession in the matter without in any way infringing the main lines of the policy he has laid down in regard to this measure. All that the Natives require is that none of the civilians belonging to their class should be prohibited from holding appointments in places where European planters reside, merely because the law does not give the former the right of trying cases in which the latter are concerned. If this anomaly is remedied we get all we want, and we shall not care much if in remedying the anomaly, the Legislature, out of regard for the fancied or real interests of the European residents in India, rules that whenever they are tried by Native Magistrates or Judges they should have a right to demand the empanelling of a jury of their countrymen, or that they should be tried by Native Magistrates or Judges along with a European Magistrate or Judge. We do not of course mean to suggest that the one or the other of these two proposed compromises should be adopted and that there is nothing objectionable or impracticable in them. But it seems to us that the suggestion of a compromise should not be set aside simply because it happens that the opponents of the Bill are not inclined to accept it and wish nothing short of the total abandonment of the Bill. We therefore think that the Government of India should now settle the course which it will finally adopt in regard to this Bill. Lord Ripon should now declare that the withdrawal of the Bill being out of the question, he proposes to pass the Bill in its present form or to pass it subject to some modification. He should publish the opinions on the Bill which have been received by the Government of India, and invite public discussion on the several suggestions for a compromise which may have been made to Government in the opinions that have already been received. By so doing, he will satisfy all sensible men who are disposed to listen to reason and argument rather than to bluster and bullying, that he is quite ready to make reasonable concessions to those who think that the passing of the Bill will land the country into dangers and difficulties.

A request to Lord Ripon to publish the opinions received by the Government of India on the Native Magistrates' Jurisdiction Bill and to declare the policy he means to pursue with regard to the Bill.

Severely censures the Europeans who have raised an opposition to the Jurisdiction Bill and foully abused Natives.

The A'rya Dnyán Vardhak (83) for the month of Chaitra of the Samvat year 1939 (March-April 1883) severely censures those Europeans who have raised a strong opposition to the Native Magistrates' Jurisdiction Bill and have not failed to shower foul abuses on natives. This conduct on their part has served to expose their own ignorance and illiberal minds. Natives are discreet and loyal to the British Government, whose just and impartial rule ignores all invidious distinctions of race and colour. And yet the opponents of the Bill insist upon such distinctions being preserved between the rulers and the ruled, and thus tarnish the high reputation of the English nation. How would the scales turn and what evil results would follow were the Bráhmans, the Kshatriyas and the Vaishyas to object to being tried by their foreign rulers, the Mlenchhas? But they are calm, meek and loyal, and never think of such a foolish demand. India is deeply grateful to Lord Ripon for having brought the Jurisdiction Bill in the foreground.

Education.

Regrets that Government should have refused to permit the students attending the Jamsetji Jijibhái Hospital to visit the different hospitals in Bombay for clinical instruction.

With reference to the refusal of the Bombay Government to sanction the proposal made by the Surgeon-General to allow the medical students attending the Jamsetji Jijibhái Hospital to visit the different hospitals in Bombay for clinical instruction, the Bombay Samáchár (85) of the 19th July observes that the practice of compelling students to attend different hospitals obtains extensively in England and on the Continent, that there is no doubt that the system is highly useful for securing sound practical education, and that the suggestion has met with the approval of such high medical authorities as Dr. Blanc, the Sanitary Commissioner for the Bombay Government and the president of the Grant College Medical Society. The advantages of the proposed system are so very evident that all other medical officers are sure to approve of it. After mentioning the advantages pointed out by Dr. Blanc at a recent meeting of the society, the Samáchár remarks that the reasons which have induced Government to refuse to sanction the proposal have not been published and the public are very anxious to know them. A prayer should be made to Government to publish them, and continuous efforts should be made to obtain the concession which has at present been denied.

Points out the necessity of having an uniform rate of fees for Government schools in the city of Bombay and in the mofussil.

The Indu Prakásh (9) of the 16th July complains of the injustice of the variety in the standards of fees levied in Government schools in the mofussil and in the city of Bombay. If the standards of instruction imparted in all Government schools is the same throughout the Presidency, and if Government profess to be impartial in their dealings with the people in the different parts of their dominions, it is unintelligible why the rates of fees levied in the Elphinstone High School at Bombay should be higher than those charged in the mofussil. It is not known whether the attention of the Education Commission has been drawn to this anomaly, but if not, it is but proper that the Director of Public Instruction should get the subject duly considered. The Indu Prakásh strongly urges the necessity of securing uniformity in this matter by effecting a reduction in the rates that are at present very high. It is very undesirable that this circumstance should have strengthened a long existing belief that in whatever they undertake the English are swayed with a desire to squeeze out money from the people.

Necessity of removing from the Maráthi educational series all such matter as relates to love affairs.

The Arunodayá (14) of the 15th July, while reviewing the work entitled "Kávyadoshavivechan, or a critique on the verses inserted in the Maráthi Educational Series," invites the attention of the authorities concerned to the necessity of expunging from the series all such matter as relates to love affairs and which produces an unwholesome effect on the youthful reader.

Railways.

The danger of running mail trains at night during the monsoon on the B. B. & C. I. Railway line and a complaint regarding the want of suitable arrangements at the stations near the recent break on the railway line north of Surat.

The Surya Prakásh (79) of the 14th July, in writing on the recent floods in Surat, says that it is very dangerous to run mail trains at night on the B. B. & C. I. Railway in this season, as the permanent road cannot withstand the effects of the stormy monsoon. It is a well-known fact that great damage is done to the line every year in the rainy season, and the Railway Company should not therefore throw into danger the lives of hundreds of passengers. It is said that the railway authorities are unwilling to run mail trains at night in this season, but that Government, with a view to serve postal convenience, compel them to do so. If this be true, the obstinacy of Government in this matter is not beneficial to the public. If Government want to serve postal convenience, they can easily do so by having a special train with the mails only run as at present during the monsoon. The mail trains which now leave Bombay and Ahmedabad in the evening should start in the morning and should convey passengers. They may be termed mail passenger trains. This arrangement will cause a little extra expenditure to the Company, but is very advantageous to the public. Moreover, the petty stations on the line are wanting in conveniences to passengers and the staff of employés on them is very limited. Some of them have only one employé, who acts as station-master, booking-clerk, ticket-collector and telegraph-signaller. The Kim station is an instance in point. The station-master and his only assistant there were tired beyond measure in despatching telegraphic messages at the time of the recent break near that station. It is to be hoped, therefore, that Government and the railway authorities will discontinue the running of mail trains at night during the monsoon. The repairs that are being now speedily undertaken to the road on the north and south of the Sayan station cannot be said to be lasting. There is a necessity of constructing water channels in many places. So long as the repairs are not undertaken on a new and well-formed basis, they cannot last long. The Agent and the Traffic Manager of the Railway Company and the Government Engineer should visit the scene of the damage. At present there exists a great necessity of having competent men on the staff at the Sayan station. The arrangements at the station at the time of the recent floods and after they subsided were very imperfect. Though the trains could have been taken to a greater distance than they actually were, the passengers were compelled to walk over a long distance owing to the mismanagement of the railway authorities.

Municipalities.

Is grateful to the Supreme Government for not insisting upon the abolition of the town duty levied in Bombay on Europe spirits and wines.

With reference to the desire evinced by the Bombay Government that the municipality of Bombay should cease to levy the town duty on brandy, beer, wines, and other similar drinks, the Bombay Samáchár (85) of the 20th July observes that the duty is levied not only on these drinks, but on all kinds of provisions. Now, if the Corporation can without feeling the loss abolish this duty totally, it will be a matter for congratulation, since rice, pulse, fuel and other articles of ordinary consumption will also be freed from the tax. Were Government willing to pay compensation to the Corporation for the loss of revenue entailed, there would be no objection to discontinue levying the duty on spirits, wines and beer. Under the new A'bkári Act a heavy duty has been imposed on mhowra liquor on the plea of its contributing to check the vice of intoxication. Even toddy, which is free from all intoxicating qualities, has also been heavily taxed on the same ground. Ought not Europe spirits and wines, which are so very intoxicating, to be heavily taxed for the same reason? Government, however, have refused to give compensation for the loss which the Corporation will have to bear by the abolition of the duty levied on the last-named articles, while on the other hand the Corporation is not able to bear the loss, nor can that loss be well made up by increasing any of the other municipal taxes. Moreover, the town duty is one of the sources of income which contributes towards the liquidation of the large debt incurred by the Corporation for the construction of extensive drainage works. Under these circumstances the Government of India has, fortunately for this city, come to the aid of the Corporation. The Supreme Government has prohibited the local Administration from enacting a law insisting upon the immediate abolition of the town duty levied on Europe spirits and wines, and has left the Corporation free to abolish the entire duty at its own convenience. This decision of the Viceroy is quite just and the Corporation ought to be highly grateful to him for the same. [The Jáme Jamshed (98) of the same date expresses somewhat similar sentiments.]

Complains of the inadequacy of the measures adopted by the municipality of Ahmednagar for affording relief to persons attacked with cholera.

The Nagar Samáchár (41) of the 14th July says that the measures adopted by the municipality of Ahmednagar for affording relief to those that are attacked with cholera are not sufficient to meet the requirements of the case. It is necessary that municipal or police peons should be stationed at the junctions of important lanes and roads, who should promptly supply cholera medicines to those that need them. It should also be their duty to take a note of the names and addresses of the attacked parties and to inform the medical officer of the division of the same. This will be a sure way of reaching all the persons that may be in want of medical aid.

An advice to the municipality of Sholápur to be lenient towards the people in the matter of the realization of the water rate.

The Kalpataru (32) of the 15th July advises the municipality of Sholápur to be lenient towards the people in the matter of the realization of the water rate. The average municipal tax per head in the city of Sholápur is as high as Rs. 2, and it is unreasonable to blame the people for demurring to pay such high rate of taxation. It is very cruel to dun the people for the payment of the water rate under these circumstances. The financial condition of the municipality of Sholápur is not very straitened, as will be perceived from the fact that notwithstanding the circumstance that there was no revenue derived from the water rate during the last two years the municipality was able to meet all its charges without difficulty. Why then should not the committee think of exempting from the incidence of the water rate all persons that may not make use of the water supplied from the new works? With a reasonable reduction in the present extravagant expenditure, the committee can afford to relieve the people of a portion of their burden, and it is but proper that they should recognize the necessity of doing so.

Disapproves of the extension of the People's Park at Surat at a time when the city has suffered heavily by the recent floods.

The Vartamán Sár (118) of the 17th July gives the proceedings of the meeting of the managing committee and the subcommittee of the People's Park at Surat held on Saturday last for taking measures for the extension of the park, and expresses regret at the want of foresight and sense displayed by the authorities concerned in spending money on the extension of the park when it is now sadly wanted for repairing the heavy damages done by the recent floods. It is very surprising that the Bombay Government does not prevent this expenditure. Is the Surat Municipality to be allowed to go to ruin? Will not the Bombay Government pay attention to the voice of the representatives of the people on the municipal board and to public opinion?

Does not approve of the desire of some of the members of the new municipal board of Ahmedabad to receive fees for the work they do as municipal commissioners.

The Hitechchhu (76) of Ahmedabad of the 19th July hears that some of the members of the new municipal board of Ahmedabad wish to receive fees for the work they do as municipal commissioners. If they wish to be remunerated for their services, as is done in Bombay, about Rs. 7,000 will have to be spent for that purpose every year. The municipalities in the mofussil are at present in a very miserable condition, and the public are anxious to see their expenditure reduced as much as practicable. At such a time the expenditure of about Rs. 7,000 on the commissioners' fees will be most unwelcome, and those commissioners that have been elected by the people will be regarded as a burden on them. In that case the commissioners elected by Government will be far more preferable than these hirelings. The candidates for election came forward, and will hereafter come forward, with a view to secure the position of the favourite leaders of the people and to be styled Ráo Sáhebs and Khán Sáhebs, as also to acquire the honour of being commissioners. It is advisable, therefore, that they should rest contented with what they get. Those who do not wish to lend their services gratuitously may safely resign and make room for numerous competent persons who are willing to serve without receiving fees.

Native States.

The Gujaráti (94) of the 15th July advises all Native States to endeavour to send the curiosities of their territories to the approaching international exhibition to be held in Calcutta. They should raise a fund for the purpose and should spare no pains to make a good figure at the exhibition. Various new articles are being manufactured in the Baroda and Bhávnagar territories. Navánagar has reason to be proud of several mineral products. In the same manner other Native States can boast of their own peculiar curiosities, that can very fairly represent them at the exhibition.

An advice to Native princes to send the curiosities of their territories to the forthcoming international exhibition at Calcutta.

The same, in a communicated article, complains that the administration of Baroda has not yet been placed on a sound footing. There does not appear to have been any change for the better in the administration of justice since the installation of the present Gáikwád. Great delay and irregularity are allowed to occur in deciding even trifling cases, while the authorities do not appear to be seriously inclined to take any trouble to arrive at the truth. The rights of the State are also not properly guarded. The grássiás and pátils sell their own lands without any regard to the conditions of their tenure. Nobody cares to see how far such a state of things is detrimental to the interests of the State. The revenue laws of the State are very troublesome. There is no uniformity in the systems of land revenue assessment.

Says that the administration of Baroda has not yet been placed on a sound footing.

The Poona Vaibhav (48) of the 15th July refers to the changes that are said to be imminent in the personnel of the Regency of Kolhápur, says that among the candidates for the post of Diwán Mr. Meherji Kuvarji is the most eligible, and points out the inadvisability of conferring the post on Ráo Bahádur Khanderáo Vishvanáth Ráste, whose name is said to be on the card as a candidate for the vacant post.

Recommends Mr. Meherji Kuvarji for the post of Diwán of Kolhápur.

A correspondent of the Hitechchhu (76) of Ahmedabad of the 19th July gives some instances of the great oppression exercised on the people by Mr. Premchandbhái, the Diwán of the State of Vádásinor, and says that the people have drawn up a long petition complaining against the Diwán with a view to present it to the Political Agent at Godhra, and have engaged the services of a pleader from Surat to represent their case. The people complain that the Political Agent does not deal justly with them. If they do not get justice at Godhra, it is said that they will petition the Bombay Government. What is the Nawáb doing? Why does he not attend to the complaints of the people instead of being under the thumb of the Diwán? A serious disagreement has arisen between the people and the Diwán during the last ten months, and the latter is greatly oppressing the people, who are mild and poor, are ignorant of the law and have nobody to advocate their cause or protect them. As the great enmity that has arisen between the people and the Diwán will never be appeased and as its end will be very dreadful, and as it is feared that the people will be crushed in the contest, it is necessary that the Nawáb should make proper arrangements. The Political Agent should also attend to the matter.

Berár Affairs.

Finds fault generally with the present policy of the British Government in India.

The Varhád Samáchár (67) of the 16th July, after expatiating generally on the vicissitudes of time, censures the British Indian Government for forgetting its pristine condition when only a handful of Europeans appeared in India as traders and begged of the Native princes to give them a small plot of ground for establishing their warehouses. The behaviour of the rulers shows that they are labouring under the impression that they have bought this country, but they should remember that during the first stages of their administration, they shone like glowworms before the sun. By a pure irony of fate this country has been very much degraded in the scale of nations, and how much are the people and the Native States obliged to suffer! What a row has been created in the matter of conferring on Natives the power of trying Europeans, and yet the Bill has been disallowed! The same is the case with local self-government. With repeated promises for the restoration of Berár to the Nizám, the policy of shelving the question for ever seems to be maturing. The British rule in India will be uninterrupted only if the rulers recognize the necessity of acting with the people in a friendly manner. They should also consider whether it was trade craft or State craft that contributed to bring their administration to its present strength, and whether they have stuck to their promises made to Native States with the solemnity which marks the character of statesmen.

Complains of the annoyance caused by the order issued by the municipality of Akola prohibiting the use of river water by the public.

The Varhád Samáchár (67) of the 17th July complains that the municipality of Akola having prohibited the people of that town from using the water of the river Morna for drinking and culinary purposes, and left them to make use of well water, much inconvenience and distress are at present experienced. The order is said to have been issued on medical advice. In the first place it has not been proved that the water of the Morna contains elements which may give rise to an epidemic like cholera. Again, there is not a sufficient number of wells in the town, and those that are contain brakish and unhealthy water. They get dry in the hot season, and after a few showers of rain begin to store water percolating from the surface of the adjoining soil. Moreover, Hindus, Mahomedans and all other classes being obliged to draw water from the same wells, the religious prejudices of the Hindus have been offended against, and there is general discontent prevailing among the public with regard to the measure. The river water is far better than well water, but the municipality has been so much frightened by the consequences supposed to result from its use that a prohibition has been placed on the use of river water even for building purposes. While seeming to act so strictly in regard to water, the committee has adopted no measures to prevent the importation of an epidemic from other places. The disease is said to be raging at Basim and His Highness the Nizám's dominions, but no steps have been taken to stop communication with those places. At Paras and some other places also cholera is raging and people from those localities come to the weekly market held at Akola, where the epidemic already exists. The committee has commenced to construct gutters on road sides close to the walls of houses, and consequently many of them have fallen down and the ground floors of several buildings have become damp. This circumstance has also its own share in making the town unhealthy.

Expresses satisfaction with the career of Ráo Báhádur Náráyan Bhái Dándekar, the Director of Public Instruction, Berár.

The Urdu Akhbár (12) of the 3rd June, in alluding to the approaching retirement on pension of Ráo Báhádur Náráyan Bhái Dándekar, observes that as Director of Public Instruction in Berár he showed great ability and worked hard and gained the good opinion of his official superiors. There were, however, some faults in his management of the department, which have made his name somewhat unpopular in the province. He was always easily led away by one-sided representations. Some of his acts betrayed favouritism and partiality. Before he became Director there was much confusion in the department and he had to labour hard to restore order out of chaos. He has introduced many good reforms, which have placed the system of education in Berár on a par with that existing in the most advanced parts of India. He leaves the department in a very healthy condition.

Notes.—A. The notices from the different Newspapers have been collected in the Report under different heads, which are printed in italics.

B. The names of Newspapers are printed in the body of the Report in italics, and the number of the Newspaper in the above list is printed in brackets after the name.

C. The proprietors of the Newspapers marked * have not given information as to the number of copies issued. In these cases an estimate has been made by the Reporter.

D. The system of spelling vernacular words followed by the Reporter is the same as that adopted in the Official Spelling List of the Bombay Presidency. One peculiar feature of this system is that when the long a (आ or á) is the last letter of a word, the accent is left out, and the short a (अ = u in gun) is, to prevent confusion, never placed at the end of a word. This rule has been strictly followed, except that when the short a appears to be absolutely necessary to complete the pronunciation of a word, as in Arunodaya or the well known Mitra, it is printed with a mark over it to indicate that it is short, thus—ă.

Politics and the Public Administration.

Says that the safety of the British Government in India lies in its knowing its duty towards the people.

The Indu Prakásh (9) of the 23rd July, referring to the last of the three letters very recently addressed by Professor Wordsworth to the Bombay Gazette regarding the Native Magistrates' Jurisdiction Bill controversy, says :— It may be taken as admitted on all hands that the British Government is not only a necessity but a beneficial necessity to India. The people have not the powers of coherence among themselves, and a foreign rule which can keep them together and at the same time give them the blessings of a good government must be looked upon as a blessing in itself. But what is good government at all? After dwelling at some length on the positions of the two sets of political thinkers whom Professor Wordsworth has styled "Emotional" and "Intellectual," the writer goes on to say :—But the greatest error common to the "emotionals" and the "intellectuals" seems to us to lie in their not correctly appreciating certain facts. They think that the people of India are divided among themselves; but they ignore the fact that partial legislation, disregard for promises, breach of faith, and the haughtiness of the rulers serve but to bring together these divided people and to give them a common basis of political feeling by subjecting them to common wrongs. Then again the class of politicians above alluded to see that the people of India have not been accustomed to political aspirations, and infer from it that they are not the people to trouble themselves with political thoughts as long as they are kept down by brute force. But it never occurs to this class of thinkers that the people of India refrain from thinking of their Government only so long as all goes on well. They are not likely, it is true, to run mad, like the Irish, after a home rule for no other reason than that they must have it. But when the governing race in India grows haughty or partial, adopts one system of legislation for itself and a different system for the ruled, and continually reminds them that if they do not submit it will force obedience from them at the point of the bayonet, political feeling is naturally aroused and the attention of the people is diverted from its ordinary groove to a criticism of the conduct of their rulers. It is then that the treatment accorded to them is contrasted with the treatment accorded to the members of the ruling race. The divided elements of the Indian community are thus drawn together into a bond of sympathy, and this feeling, bad enough in the beginning, becomes worse when long cherished, and ultimately pervades the Indian bazárs. The warnings of history teach that it is this feeling which ultimately finds its way into Communism, Nihilism and Fenianism. In India it may work its way more slowly and invisibly than elsewhere, but it cannot be absent under an imperious and an indifferent regime. As long, however, as the British Government in India gives no scope for this feeling, but keeps the people to their ordinary pursuits by anticipating their wants and consulting their wishes, and prevents the members of the ruling race from becoming haughty and partial, it secures its own permanence. The Government must be strong, but a sense of strength without a sense of duty must make its tenure precarious. Let it be a despotism, if you will. A foreign rule must be despotic. But it must be a despotism represented by what Professor Wordsworth calls "a strong, resolute and enlightened central government bound by its own explicit engagements and promises, watchful of public opinion and superior to all those prejudices of creed or colour which fill so large a space in little minds." Then alone there is every chance that the divided people of India will have no common sufferings to excite their jealousy and unite their voices of discontent; and then alone is the Government able to secure its permanent tenure. The people of India are not a sentimental race to run after ideas of self-government. Given a good and impartial rule, it does not matter to them in the least whether it is foreign or not. But the moment it ceases to be good and impartial, and relies upon its sword, it draws that sword round its own neck and allows history to repeat itself. "I wish to see a people full of faith and a government full of duty," says a character in one of the popular novels of the late Lord Beaconsfield. The sentiment applies to India with peculiar force, and the letter of Professor Wordsworth so ably and accurately points out the necessity of its application that both Natives and Europeans will profit by laying its lessons to heart.

The Lokahitavádi (37) for the month of June, in continuation of its article on the subject of the present depressed condition of the people of India, reported at page 3 of the Report on Native Papers for the week ending 9th June 1883, says:—At present the cry is general that the re-introduction with some modifications of the system of administration prevailing in this country in former times is calculated to prove beneficial to the people at large; and the cry is indeed very reasonable. The greatest defect in the present system of administration lies in the circumstance that Government do not allow any voice to the natives of this country in the management of public affairs. Government are accustomed to look down upon them as undeserving of trust and mean, and therefore not entitled to have a voice in the administration. Whatever is done by Government is proper and must be acceded to by all concerned. What kind of justice is this? Is the conquest of India by the British the result of the past sins of the people of India, and is it on this account that the rulers are so inclined? The distinction that is made by Government between Europeans and Natives and the ignorance of the former in regard to the manners and customs of the latter lead to grave injustice. Europeans do not like to associate with Natives and therefore they have no opportunities of having a knowledge of the peculiarities of the manners and customs of the latter. It is, however, very surprising that Government should have been persistently conniving at the injustice thus caused to the interests of Natives. It may be argued that with greater experience of the circumstances of this country Government will reform their system of administration, but there are no signs apparent of such a tendency, while the cry of the people is still unabated. It is not, however, meant to be inferred from this that Government have no desire to introduce any reforms into their administration. Their desire cannot be gainsaid and they may even have begun the work of reform. But it is a matter for deep regret that the particular respects in which people wish for and expect a reform have been altogether left out of consideration. These respects are (1) the tenures of land and the systems of land revenue assessment, (2) the modes of realizing Government dues, and (3) the administration of civil and criminal justice. If these departments of administration are subjected to a thorough and wholesome reform, then the very root of the grievances of the people will be removed. The present system of land revenue assessments, the modes of the realization of Government dues and the tremendously expensive nature of the justice administered by civil and criminal courts have served to reduce the people to the greatest straits. The system of administration of justice in vogue in primitive days was very simple and inexpensive. Justice used to be administered by panchá-yats, the members of which were nominated with the consent of the people. The re-introduction of that system is not an impossibility under the present circumstances. Those that are enjoying handsome pensions can certainly discharge the duties formerly devolving on panchayats with less likelihood of injustice being done to the people. But all this presupposes the existence of the confidence of Government in Natives which is entirely wanting. It is said that those that are in the service of Government enjoy the confidence of their superiors though in a very small degree, but those that are out of the pale of the service are looked upon as incarnations of untrustworthiness. Is there any truth in this? In the early days of the British rule respectable Natives had an important voice in the administration of affairs, and every Collector had a Daftardár whose voice was almost dictatorial in all matters relating to the management of the district. But that system has now made way for independent and arbitrary rule, and Europeans of this day consider it below their dignity to consult Natives in matters of administration. The present system of administration is indeed very complex compared with that obtaining in former times. The poor cannot get justice through the labyrinth of the present procedure of courts with their vakils and advocates. The case of a pátil or kulkarni regarding the settlement of his one-anna share in a watan defies the joint intelligence of officers from the mámlatdár to the High Court Judge or the member of Council. Government officers are generally fond of taking things very easily and are not disposed to give any consideration to the disposal of intricate cases. They have no regard for the inconvenience and annoyance caused to the parties concerned in the cases pending before them by their being required to dance attendance on them from day to day. All their solicitude is centred in the approach of the pay-day. Such a state of things naturally creates disgust in the minds of those who try to secure justice. Provision is made for giving an opportunity of appealing to higher courts against the decision of lower courts, but the trouble and enormous expense attendant on such appeals more than neutralizes the advantages meant to be derived from the institution of appellate courts. The suitor looks upon these courts as the instruments of squeezing out money from the people, and not being inclined to risk the whole of his present fortune for the distant and doubtful prospect of redress from an appeal, he sits down contented with his present lot. In these circumstances the re-introduction of the panchayát system will be looked upon by the people as an invaluable boon.

Complains of the large and costly foreign agency employed by the British Government in the administration of India.

The Indian Spectator (1) of the 22nd July, in an article headed "India's greatest misfortune," approvingly refers to Mr. Seymour Keay's article on "The Spoliation of India" in the Nineteenth Century, and observes :—The annual drain of 30 millions sterling and over is the root of all the present woes of India. This appalling drain is of course the direct result of a foreign agency. There are honest publicists who would justify the extravagant cost of this agency. They are of opinion that for the security of life and property enjoyed by the natives of India the cost is not much, that it is of no use inveighing against it, and that to minimize that cost to an appreciable extent is out of the question for many a year to come. Journalists who hold these opinions speak without the book. Their opinions cannot harmonize with the first essentials of political economy, neither are they based on practical statesmanship. They are not supported by any precedent or parallel in the history of the world. Nay, they even seem to forget the impoverishment that seriously threatened England in the 14th century, and culminated most disastrously at the commencement of the 16th century, under circumstances similar to those now found in a more marked degree in India. But we confess, and we have repeatedly acknowledged, that the natives of India are fully alive to the blessings of security of life and property which are the concomitants of the British ráj. For this service rendered Indians are willing to bear all the necessary taxation. What they complain of is that the British, in their zeal for the protection of the country, have unconsciously built up a system of administration which in its practical working is extravagant beyond all conception,—so extravagant that it would not be tolerated in any other part of the civilized world. It is not only unjust but opposed to statesmanship, opposed to the only true policy which should guide great empires that have millions of subject races under their sway, and lastly, it is opposed to the truths of political economy. By all means carry on the administration on honest principles. By all means employ European agency in the higher offices. What Indians urge is this: do not employ Europeans in such indefinite number and on such exorbitant salaries and pensions as to entail that heavy withdrawal of capital that has gone on for years past,—a withdrawal which, having been officially calculated at 3 millions sterling in 1812, has risen to 18 millions per annum in 1883, irrespective of private savings, which lead to a further yearly withdrawal of at least 12 millions. The Indians desire that their rulers should bear in mind the increase of population in the country at the rate of nearly one per cent. per annum and the consequent pressure of such a population on a soil which successive official inquiries have authoritatively proved to be nearing exhaustion. Have they the means of subsistence? Is it not a fact that 40 millions of people go half-starved all the year round in times of agricultural prosperity? Ought not the annual produce to increase in proportion to the means of subsistence required by an increasing population? Industry or labour is necessary for the purpose. But industry, as economists have proved, is limited by capital and capital is nowhere. It is being drained away. Our rulers have incurred heavy war debts on which heavy interest in gold has to be paid. Moreover, they have to pay for the large and costly foreign agency they have established in the country. In short, India has now to produce more to pay off her annual foreign debt in gold—a debt in the incurring of which she had no voice, and a debt which, it is maintained by a school of officials and publicists, should be perpetuated! Thus not only is capital withdrawn, but there is no such thing as saving. The candle is made to burn at both ends. It remains to be seen how long this will continue. The day of reckoning must come sooner or later—the day when our rulers will be forced to administer the affairs of India in the interests of the Indians and not those of England. The writer concludes with some quotations from Draper's Intellectual Development of Europe bearing on the condition of England in the 14th century, and says:—We earnestly appeal to those who are for perpetuating an extravagant foreign agency, pure and simple, to contemplate the dismal picture given by the historian, and profit by it in time if India is to be spared similar or even worse misery.

Advocates the extensive employment of Natives in the higher grades of the public service.

In continuation of its article on the subject of the employment of Natives in the higher grades of the public service reported at page 3 of the last Report on the Native Papers, the Gujaráti (94) of the 22nd July says that even in the time of Emperor Akbar there were Mussalmans who shared the narrow views entertained by the Europeans of the present times regarding the inadvisability of employing Natives in responsible posts on account of their untrustworthiness. But the Emperor did not agree with them, and it was therefore that his liberal government was preferred to that of other Emperors and his name was indelibly written on the hearts of the people. The Gujaráti asks, what have the British to fear if they follow the line of policy pursued by Abkar? History furnishes good proofs of the soundness of such a policy. The virtue of loyalty has always characterized the Hindus, and the people have given undeniable proofs of its existence on several occasions. The armies of the founders of the British Empire in India chiefly consisted of Natives trained under European supervision, and the principal victories gained by them were through the valour and staunch devotion of the Native armies. The recent instances of the fortitude and forbearance shown by Native armies in Afghanistan and Burma must be fresh in everyone's memory. Proofs of the administrative capacities of Natives are also not wanting. The successful administration of statesmen like Sir Dinkar Ráo, Sir T. Madhav Ráo, Sir Salar Jung, Mr. Ranga Charlu and others, the capacity for a proper administration of justice displayed by Justices Mitter and Nánábhái Haridás, and the satisfactory work done by Native civilians as district officers, go to prove beyond question that Natives are qualified to fill important posts in all departments of the State. In support of this assertion the Gujaráti quotes extracts from the writings of officers like Sir Thomas Munro, Lord Elphinstone, Sir George Jacob and Sir Bartle Frere.

Says that the British Government should determine the policy it will follow under the various contingencies which are likely to arise from Russian chicanery in connection with Afghanistan.

The Bombay Samáchár (85) of the 26th July observes that the Amir of Afghanistan is preparing to proceed to Herat, while the Shah of Persia has left Teheran for Meshed. The English statesmen acquainted with Central Asian affairs hitherto believed that the Turcomans were a strong barrier to Russian progress in that quarter, but the Muscovite Government has of late reduced them to subjection and gained over the Shah to its side. The Czar's Government has been, it is well known, casting a wistful look on the countries surrounding India, and Afghanistan presents to it a favourable field for carrying on its diplomatic tricks. It is true that the British Indian Government has made the Amir its ally by agreeing to pay him an annual subsidy of 12 lákhs of rupees, but it has given him no assurance to protect him from the attacks of his enemies. In doing this the Indian Government has probably acted wisely, but nevertheless this trick does not save Afghanistan from falling into the snares of Russian chicanery. It is also well known that the Shah desires very much to obtain Herat, which has hitherto remained untouched by him through fear of incurring the displeasure of the British Government. But the fact that the British Government though paying the Amir an annual subsidy is unwilling to take him under its protection will probably appear to the Russians a weak point in the English policy. Again, the Amir will have, in the event of a misunderstanding between him and the Russians or the Shah, to settle his own account with them single-handed, and in the case of such a contingency the bait of an annual subsidy will not prove of much service. Moreover Abdul Rahman was once under Russian protection, and the Czar's Government will very likely not be backward to take due advantage of these facts to win over the Amir to its side. The British Government should therefore closely watch the course of events while Abdul Rahman remains at Herat, and should at once determine the policy it will follow under the various contingencies which are likely to arise. [The Jáme Jamshed (98) of the 25th July expresses similar sentiments.]

Disapproves of the grant of a subsidy of 12 lákhs of rupees to the Amir of Afghanistan.

The Indian Spectator (1) of the 22nd July says:—India is avowedly a miserably poor country, and yet its rulers make a present of a permanent gift of about 2 krors of rupees (yielding an interest of 12 lákhs a year) to the Amir elect of Afghanistan. This enormous bribe is given to avert Russia's advance towards India. From what little we know of Afghan Chiefs, and of Amir Abdul Rahman in particular, we fear that by the new arrangement effected at India's expense the British Government is courting the danger it is so anxious to avert. The lákh of rupees per mensem from India (five times the Viceregal salary) may only serve as a stimulus for another lákh from the Russian treasury. Such things have happened even under less suspicious circumstances. Would it not be infinitely more statesmanlike to leave intriguers to their devices and to conciliate the subject races of India by equitable government? Let India live contented, and under British rule she has every chance of enjoying contentment, and she can not only defy aggression on her own frontiers, but prove a pillar of strength to England in an hour of need. What a pity that this obvious truth has so long been evading Anglo-Indian politicians! [The Káside Mumbai (102) of the 23rd July expresses similar sentiments, and says that the safety of India does not consist in giving a subsidy of 12 lákhs of rupees to the Amir for nothing, but in having a fine military camp and a fortress in some strong place in the Amir's territories at a cost of double the amount of the subsidy. It cannot be understood why experienced statesmen in India delay the execution of such a plan.]

Says that England should pay a portion of the subsidy to be given by the Government of India to the Amir of Afghanistan.

The Arunodayá (14) of the 22nd July says that it has been reported from Simla that the British Government has proposed to the Amir of Cabul to pay him an annual subsidy of 12 lákhs of rupees in consideration of the Amir promising to keep up friendly relations with the British Government and to watch its interests. It is not clear whether the Amir demanded any particular sum on this account from the British Government, and it is therefore necessary that an explanation on this subject should be forthcoming. It is likely that the Amir may have demanded from the British Government a certain sum in his present circumstances. If this be so, it is not intelligible why the Amir should have delayed to intimate his compliance with the proposal made to him, and this circumstance lends colour to the supposition that the Amir's demand is greater or that he is not inclined to accept the terms offered to him. Be the facts what they may, this affair does not appear to be satisfactory, judging it in the light of the circumstance that Abdul Rahman, before he obtained the throne of Cabul, was in receipt of a pension from Russia. The question of the subsidy of 12 lákhs derives additional importance from the fact that Russia has been gradually advancing towards India, and that there has recently been a treaty between her and Persia. It is in the interests of Russia to secure the sympathies of Abdul Rahman, and the latter may already be in receipt of an annual pension from her, and he may consider the amount offered by the British Government as small. Ayub Khán, who is a protége of Persia and who lays claim to the throne of Cabul, is ready to advance on Herat, and it may be that the attention of the Amir is at present directed to this matter. The delay in replying to the proposals of the British Government is therefore very significant. As to the question of the subsidy itself, it is not clear why the Government of India should be prepared to pay it. Looking at the question from a political point of view it does not appear that the payment of the subsidy will render it advisable to effect any reduction in the force that is at present required to be maintained for the protection of the north-western frontier, as it will neither be expedient nor safe to rely on the Amir's assurances. Besides, the results of the subsidy that was agreed to be paid to Amir Sher Ali by Lord Mayo's Government are too prominent to be lost sight of. In these circumstances the subsidy that is promised to the Amir is not calculated to be politically beneficial. There is no doubt, however, that it will go a great way in protecting the commercial interests of the British Government. This subsidy will enable the Amir to keep up uninterrupted communication between India and Afghanistan, and India will be benefited by her commodities finding a market beyond her frontier. But these commercial advantages will be enjoyed not by India alone but by England in an equal, nay greater, degree; and it is therefore but just that England should contribute her share towards the payment of this subsidy. It is to be hoped that Lord Ripon will strain every nerve to make England pay at least half the amount of the sum proposed to be paid to the Amir, and that Mr. Gladstone will prove his love for justice by acceding to the proposal.

Requests the Secretary of State to utilize the services of the engine-drivers available here instead of advertizing for them in England.

The Panchánan (46) of the 22nd July does not understand why the Secretary of State for India should have advertized in England for the services of engine-drivers for employment on the State Railways in India, when it is reported that there are already a dozen drivers in this country in want of employment. This shows either that the Home Government is careless of the interests of India or that it willingly connives at such things. It is to be hoped that the Secretary of State will utilize the services of the engine-drivers who are available here.

Approves of the proposed publication of a quarterly journal regarding agricultural affairs by the Department of Agriculture with the Government of India.

The Nyáyá Prakásh (107) of the 23rd July says that the proposed publication of a quarterly journal regarding agricultural and other affairs by the Department of Agriculture under the Government of India is very praiseworthy. It will encourage Native arts and thus prevent the drain of the wealth of the country to foreign parts. The writer praises Lord Ripon for undertaking the publication of the journal, and asks who can be willing to see such a beneficent ruler leave this country.

Requests Government to give encouragement to the development of the iron industry of India.

The Dnyán Bodhak (24) of the 22nd July dwells at considerable length on the advantages of developing the iron industry of India, and requests the attention of the Local and Supreme Governments, as also of all independent and patriotic associations, to the subject. The writer says that iron is plentiful in the Belgaum and Dhárwár Districts, but that the workers in that line were much discouraged in their industry on account of restrictions on the use of forest produce. Iron requires a great quantity of coal to allow of its being manufactured, and so long as no coal mines are discovered in this country it is advisable that Government should be liberal in allowing the free use of fuel for being made into coal.

Suggests an improvement in the constitution of the Local and Supreme Legislative Councils.

The Jáme Jamshed (98) of the 23rd July agrees with Professor Wordsworth that parliamentary rule will not suit India either in the present or the following century, and observes that in the absence of such a rule the different Local and Imperial Legislative Councils ought as far as possible to be made representative. These Councils are at present a farce. The official element considerably preponderates over the popular and enacts laws as it thinks best. The non-official members are moreover appointed by Government, and some of them generally side with the official view of the questions coming before them. The constitution of the Councils ought therefore to be modified. There should be 32 members in each Council, half of whom ought to be the representatives of the people. The members ought to be free to bring to the notice of the Council any acts of maladministration that may have been noticed by them. Each Presidency should be allowed to return two or more representatives to the Imperial Legislative Council. These concessions ought to be made not only to Natives, but also to Europeans residing in the country. Unless the above-mentioned privileges are enjoyed by the people of India, they will not be able to secure such political education as Government desires to impart to them.

Says that the duty levied on opium should be reduced.

The Jáme Jamshed (98) of the 24th July notices the increased sale of improved Persian opium and the indigenous drug in the Chinese market and the diminished consumption of the Indian article, and observes that the latter is not now sought after by the Chinese because the heavy duty levied on it by the British Government has made it very dear. Though the Persian and the indigenous drugs are very inferior to the Indian article and are injurious to health, yet they are sure to find favour with the Chinese on account of their cheapness, and if this happens, the Indian trade will be ruined and the Indian finances will suffer a heavy loss, which the people will hardly be able to make up without suffering much inconvenience. Government should therefore reduce the duty levied on this drug, in which case there is great probability of an increase in the revenue from this source. [The Akhbáre Sodágar (81) of the 24th and 26th July expresses similar sentiments.]

Requests Government to repeal Section 58 of the Irrigation Act, 1879.

The Násik Vritt (42) of the 21st July complains of the inconvenience and annoyance caused to the people by being impressed for labour on the irrigation works at Waghad in the Dindori Táluka of the Násik District under Section 58 of the Irrigation Act, 1879, and requests Government to repeal the provisions contained in that section. The Vritt also says that the irrigation works constructed with such hot haste were washed away within eight days of their completion, and requests that an enquiry may be instituted into the matter and that those who may be at fault may be duly punished.

A complaint regarding the way in which the license tax is levied in the mofussil.

The Hitechchhu (76) of Ahmedabad of the 26th July, in its local columns, observes that the amounts of license tax assessments are sometimes doubled by mukhis, talátis and mámlatdárs if merchants do not rest satisfied with the assessments once fixed. As one Hathisang Gopal, of the village of Visalpur, was at enmity with the taláti of the village, the assessment was raised this year from Rs. 40 to 80. The officer who heard the appeal, relying on the statement of the taláti that Hathisang was a respectable landed proprietor, did not inspect his books, saying that he had no confidence in them. Forty persons from Dhandhuka came to Ahmedabad at great expense and inconvenience for the purpose of preferring an appeal against the assessment levied on them; but the assessment was reduced by half in one case only, in which the widow and children of the party appeared. Neither were the books of these appellants inspected nor their complaints enquired into. What a specimen of justice administered by the Collector sitting as an appellate court! Did these forty persons prefer a false appeal, travel over a long distance in this rainy season, incur expenditure and suffer inconvenience for nothing? This case serves to give an idea of the oppression exercised in the mofussil in the levy of the license tax. [The Kaira Vartamán (100) of the 25th July also makes a similar complaint in its local columns.]

Advises Government to take measures to afford relief to the people of the districts affected by cholera.

The Rást Goftár (109) of the 22nd July asks if there is nobody who can take pity on the poor people of the Deccan when thousands of them are falling victims to the epidemic of cholera. Poona, Ahmednagar, Khándesh and Násik have been the greatest sufferers, while other districts are not quite free from the contagion. The number of deaths is increasing every week and is equal to nearly half the number of those affected. Is it not very distressing that about two thousand souls should die every week in the Deccan? What are Government about? The public does not know what measures Government have taken to put a stop to or to alleviate the effects of cholera. The Rást Goftár says that it has based its remarks on the figures given in the weekly health reports published by Government. But who knows if the aspect of affairs is not even worse than what it is represented to be? Bombay ought to be very watchful of the progress of this disease in the mofussil, and should at the same time adopt measures for the alleviation of the sufferings of the poor. [The Indu Prakásh (9) of the 23rd July also invites the attention of Government to the same subject, and says that it is high time that Government should abandon the policy of being contented with giving written instructions on the subject to district officers and should resort to practical measures. It is necessary that relief should be offered to the sufferers irrespective of the expenditure entailed thereby. It will not do to bring forward the technical plea that as no amount is provided in the Budget for the purpose it is not possible to render any pecuniary assistance to the people. As money is always forthcoming for purposes like the Afghan War and the payment of a subsidy to the Amir of Cabul, the expenditure of a small sum of money for saving the people from death will not be out of place. It is necessary that dispensaries should be opened in all the affected places and the services of competent medical officers engaged. The Yajdán Parast (121) of the 22nd July says that the Sanitary Commissioner ought to suggest some means of putting a stop to the appearance of cholera in this Presidency almost every year.]

Recommends the abolition of the punishment of whipping awarded in the case of perpetrators of petty offences.

In noticing the reply given by the Secretary of State for India to a question in the House of Lords about infliction of the punishment of whipping on perpetrators of petty crimes in India, the Bombay Samáchár (85) of the 28th July observes that Lord Kimberley stated that the local authorities considered this mode of punishment necessary and that it could not therefore be well abolished. His Lordship should, however, have ascertained the reasons for which the Indian authorities insist upon the continuance of the barbarous punishment. Perpetrators of serious offences are punished with imprisonment or fine, and have not these punishments proved sufficiently deterrent? If this was not the case, crime would have enormously increased in India, whereas it has not so increased, and since imprisonment has produced good results, there is no reason why the same punishment should not be inflicted on perpetrators of petty offences. It is therefore to be hoped that Lords Kimberley and Ripon will seriously reconsider the question and abolish the barbarous punishment.

Does not approve of the reduction made by Government in the amount of the provincial contribution towards the maintenance of the Gadag, Hubli and Haveri dispensaries.

The Dhárwár Vritt (23) of the 19th July regrets that Government should have reduced the amount of the provincial contribution to the Gadag, Hubli and Haveri dispensaries. Government are of opinion that the deficit should be made up from municipal and local funds. If all the money is collected from the ryots it is not clear why there should be such a distinction between the funds from which dispensaries have to be supported. Municipal and local funds have already more demands on their resources than they can conveniently satisfy. It is therefore to be hoped that Government will make the provincial revenues pay more liberally towards the maintenance of the dispensaries in question.

Asks the Commissioner of Customs, Salt, Opium and A'bkári to make provision for the employes of the Salt Department at Goa whose services may be dispensed with on account of the contemplated closing of some of the salt-works.

The Panchánan (46) of the 22nd July is very sorry to hear that the services of some of the employés of the Salt Department employed at Goa are about to be dispensed with on account of the contemplated closing of some of the salt-works. These servants were transferred from the Presidency proper to Goa on higher emoluments on account of their experience and ability, and it is very sad that they should be thrown adrift for no fault of their own. The Panchánan requests the Commissioner of Customs, Salt, Opium and A'bkári to give the subject due consideration and to make provision for the servants in question in any of the departments under his charge at the sacrifice, if necessary, of the employés who may be of a lower standing in the Government service.

The Poona Vaibhav (48) of the 22nd July complains that the standing order of Government that a person who undergoes imprisonment in a criminal jail is ineligible for employment under Government has been violated by one of the Divisional Commissioners. A chief constable in the Ahmedabad District was committed to prison for using violence to the person of a criminal. On his release from jail that officer is said to have been employed as a clerk in one of the Commissioners' offices. It is very surprising that the chief constable should have been so rewarded!

Complains of the injustice said to have been committed by one of the Commissioners of Divisions by employing in his office as a clerk a person who has undergone imprisonment.

A correspondent of the Jagadádarsh (30) of the 22nd July says that great inconvenience is caused to the public by the absence of a Government ferry at the confluence of the Godávari and the Pravara near the village of Toka in the Ahmednagar District, and requests the attention of the authorities concerned to the matter.

Points out the necessity of establishing a ferry at the confluence of the Godávari and Pravara near the village of Toka.

The Vengurla Vritt (70) of the 19th July invites the attention of the authorities concerned to the necessity of repairing the Mánasi bridge near Vengurla. The Mámlatdár examined the bridge personally, but he does not appear to have taken any steps for its repair.

Requests the authorities to repair the Mánasi bridge near Vengurla.

The Indian Spectator (1) of the 22nd July says:—The case in which the administrators of the late Mr. Kharshedji Ashburner sued the Secretary of State for India for damages to the extent of two lákhs and a half was dismissed by Mr. Justice Birdwood the other day on a technical point raised by the Advocate-General, who represented the Crown. This is scarcely satisfactory. We believe that before the passing of the A'bkári Act many people who held land on which toddy or date trees stood received handsome compensation. The plaintiffs, who own Bhándup and one or two adjoining villages, tried their very best to get compensation from Government, but failed. Now, though in litigation it is the right of a private individual to raise all kinds of legal and technical defences, we consider that when a claim is filed against Government by a subject for a wrong done by Government, it is more satisfactory that it should be disposed of on its merits than on some technical point. It would be more to the honour of Government if the attempts to burke all inquiry into the grievances of a subject by a competent legal tribunal were less frequent.

Expresses dissatisfaction with the way in which Government defended the suit brought against it by the administrators of the late Mr. Kharshedji Ashburner.

The Kesari (34) of the 24th July learns from its Pandharpur correspondent that the police authorities of the place greatly interfered with the celebration of certain religious ceremonies by the pilgrims on the occasion of the recent fair. It is said that the fair was dispersed on account of an outbreak of cholera of a very virulent type among the pilgrims, and any steps taken by the authorities within the bounds of their powers are justifiable. But if the police exercised undue oppression on the poor pilgrims, as it is said they did, it behoves Government to institute a minute enquiry into the matter and to punish those that may be guilty.

Asks Government to enquire into the truth of the complaint that the police exercised undue oppression on the pilgrims on the occasion of the recent fair.

The Shiváji (60) of the 20th July animadverts on the conduct of the officer who released Bábu Surendranáth Bánerji from jail at an early hour and thus frustrated the intention of the people to do him honour on his release, and remarks:—It is a historical phenomenon in India that a political revolution takes place after every 150 years. There was not a single ruler whose family reigned more than 200 years. Nearly 130 years have elapsed since the British rule began in Bengal, and the conduct of the officials has reached that state of depravity which generally forebodes the early advent of a revolution. Can it be said that the decline of the British power has begun?

Severely censures certain authorities for their conduct towards Bábu Surendranáth Bánerji.

Says that Government ought to aid the people in their present distress arising from the recent floods at Surat and Khándesh.

Referring to the occurrence of floods in Surat and Khándesh, the Poona Vaibhav (48) of the 22nd July says that it is the duty of a Government that collects cart-loads of money from the people to protect them in their present distress. But why should such a Government care for the people when it has come to such a long distance simply for the sake of collecting money? A few days back, when this Presidency was visited with famine, the rich Government, whose duty it was to protect the unfortunate people from distress at its own cost, contented itself with allowing one pound rations and imposed a new tax for providing a reserve fund for meeting the contingency of future famines. It is necessary that the proceeds of that tax should be utilized for affording relief to the sufferers by these floods.

Comments in connection with the recent floods at Surat and the suggestion of certain preventive measures.

The Indian Spectator (1) of the 22nd July says:—It is really bad of the Surat authorities to publish incomplete reports of the recent floods and the havoc wrought by them. We certainly prefer the reports of the Gujarát Mitrá to the half-truths foisted on the public by the minions of the municipality. Surat has been overtaken by the greatest disaster in its history, and yet the mischief done to life and property is so light that it is scarcely worth mentioning! Nothing can be more heartless than this way of quieting the fears of Government and the public. The public, though thus assured, has done its duty. It is now the Government's turn. Instances are on record when the Government of Bombay has made substantial grants under similar circumstances. As the Gujarát Mitrá contends, the proceeds of the license tax may with propriety be diverted to this purpose. We regret to see our European citizens holding back at this crisis. Sir James Fergusson and Mr. Hope have set them a timely example. European firms may well follow Messrs. Greaves & Cotton's generous example. We have no right, and no wish either, to wound susceptibilities, but as a matter of duty we cannot help telling our European friends that their apparent unconcern is being felt by the Native community. It is time one of the banks should take the initiative. As to the loss of life, we are constrained to say from private inquiries that it may have to be counted by hundreds. We will only too gladly accept the official figure, but it is ridiculous. The loss in property will not fall under 12 lákhs of rupees, whatever officials may say to the contrary. And mark that 12 lákhs represent the ruin of scores of what Surat calls "well-to-do" families and of hundreds of poor ones with ten-rupee huts and two-rupee furniture. Add to this the loss in cattle, and then you can realize what the floods have done. We know Surat and the neighbourhood as if we carried its map in the palm of our hand, and our calculations cannot therefore be very wide of the mark. What Surat wants at once is shelter for man and beast, temporary provision for sufferers, restoration of cattle to the cultivator, clearing away of the mud from streets, and preventive efforts against fever, cholera and concomitant disorders. All this means money, and money must be forthcoming without delay and distributed without partiality. What is wanted in the immediate future is that the authorities should concert preventive measures. It will be folly to wait till another disaster comes on. They must see if efficient outlets cannot be given to the river, if the embankments cannot be raised, if the Surat fort cannot be used as a partial barrier instead of being dismantled to secure imaginary relief from pestilence. We now understand why the people of Surat are so sore on this point; they know their interest much better than "scientific" official crotchet-mongers. Whilst relief is being carried to Gujarát, poor Khándesh should not be neglected. It is gratifying to see that the services of the famous Pársi swimmer, Dádábhái Pándya, are being recognized. The Collector may yet report him to the Government of Bombay, and Dádábhái may yet get his gold medal from the Humane Society. But the Collector had better give up the idea of ruining him with a Khán Báhádurship. He may make him a police constable or a municipal darogha. [The Surat Akhbár (78) of the 23rd July says that the local authorities should, during the monsoon, put themselves in telegraphic communication with the authorities on the Ghats, from which water finds its way to Surat, and keep themselves informed of the fall of rain and the height of water there, and warn the public of any apprehended floods. The outlets for water should be so constructed as not to allow flood water to come in, but they should allow rain-water to flow out of the city when there is no flood. The places where fire-engines are kept should be provided with boats during the rainy season. The level of the roads should be raised an inch or two every year, when the public will also raise the level of their houses accordingly. By the time that such a heavy flood as that of the present year occurs, perhaps after a lapse of 25 or 50 years, the level of the city will be equal to that of the height of the flood waters. If the flood waters then find their way into the city, they will perhaps enter the streets in some places, but not the houses. The authorities should have the power to spend a certain amount of money in times of emergency, for great damage may result before the necessary sanction is obtained from Government. As great difficulty was experienced in knowing the state of the different suburbs of the city at the time of the recent floods, it is extremely necessary that telephonic communication should be established as soon as possible between them and the city. It will prove of great service in times of floods, fire and riots. The Deshi Mitrá (90) of the 26th July complains of the scarcity of fodder for cattle, and asks if there is no one to look after the dumb creatures. The Yajdán Parast (121) of the 22nd and the Bombay Samáchár (85) of the 24th July are of opinion that the unconcern of the European community on this occasion is attributable to the evil feelings created by the Native Magistrates' Jurisdiction Bill.]

Local Self-government.

Criticises the Bombay Local Boards Bill.

The Mahrátta (2) of the 22nd July observes:—There is very little to be said on the preliminary section of the Bombay Local Boards Bill except that the idea of partially repealing the old Acts and rules does not appear to be sound. The present Local Funds Act is a small enactment of 16 sections, and is so imperfect as to require a long supplement of 67 rules framed by Government under Section 12 of the Act. Out of these 16 sections it is now proposed to repeal nearly 12, retaining such as relate only to the levy and assessment of the rates. There will thus remain unrepealed 3 or 4 sections in the Act, which will then become a mere revenue enactment. This separation of what may be called the revenue from the administration portion of the Act may be deemed by some to be expedient inasmuch as the two duties will now be performed by different departments, but for the sake of convenience, if for nothing else, it would have been more desirable to incorporate these sections in this Bill and thus to consolidate the law in one enactment according to the tendency of recent legislation. The measure as now proposed cannot obviate the necessity of new rules under the new Act. If these new rules are therefore to be published sooner or later, it will be better if they are published with the Bill, so that the public may know definitely what concessions have been made to them. It is said in the Statement of Objects and Reasons that the statement that the number of elective members will not be less than one-half of the whole number on the board exclusive of the president is introduced into the section with the object of enabling Government to increase the proportion of the elective members if they deem fit to do so. The object is indeed plausible and the time of its fulfilment is welcome. But whatever may be the future expectations, it is quite certain that for the present the Bombay Government mean to keep up practically an official majority in these boards. The ex-officio element is abolished and salaried Government servants are put in their place. This is no improvement on the present laws. The officials can now freely appear as candidates for election, and considering the influence which the police and the revenue authorities possess in the mofussil, it is not very unlikely that those men may get themselves elected. Although the word ex-officio has been banished from the new Bill, we think that its substitute is not better. We hope that the change may not be one from King Log to King Stork. Under the new provisions Government can nominate a president, who may not be the Collector, and if they do so there will be three Government servants to control, or, in plain words, to curtail the independence of the local board. The appointment of a vice-president is a sort of a relieving feature, but we regret to find that the duties of this latter officer are not defined, and the president can, if he will, deprive him of all importance. The substitution of salaried servants of Government in the place of the ex-officio element is not calculated to encourage independence in the local boards unless revenue and police officers are prevented from competing at the elections, unless the provisions of control are considerably relaxed and the duties of vice-presidents clearly defined in the Act. As to the statement that Government may one day give up the nomination system altogether, we look upon it as simply rhetorical, considering that they have not granted even to the advanced municipalities in the Presidency the concession of electing more than half the number of their members. Vague expressions such as "the representative system is better understood and valued," and those too in the Statement of Objects and Reasons and not in the body of the Act, mean nothing substantial. They are mere statements which the Local Government has been forced to make. Otherwise we do not understand why this important concession is not made to depend on population and income, or on the wishes of the majority of voters in a particular district. We think that in larger districts such as Poona, Sátára and others the experiment of allowing election to a greater extent can be tried at once both in municipalities and in local boards, and nothing but the conservatism of the Local Government prevents it from so doing. There is no indication in the new Municipal Bill how far the principle of election will be extended to táluka municipalities. The distinction between town and city municipalities is to be abolished for the purpose of enabling Government to grant election even to town municipalities. But what are we to understand by this vague provision? Government have nowhere distinctly stated what proportion of the members of these táluka municipalities will be elective, and in the absence of such an express declaration we think we are justified in believing from the concessions that have already been made that these rural municipalities will hardly get the right of election, or, if they do, the proportion of the elected to the nominated members will be very small. If Government really mean that the popular element should be properly represented in these boards, they should either allow a greater proportion of elected members in the rural municipalities or insert a proviso to the effect that the delegate sent by these bodies to the táluka board shall be one of the elected members or at least such as is approved by them. Unless some such provision is made, nothing will prevent nominated members of municipalities in tálukas from taking their seats on táluka boards as elected ones, contrary to the intention of Government and the expectations of the public. The same objection may be raised against Section 7. There is again another difficulty which appears to have been overlooked. It is provided that táluka boards and municipalities must delegate one of their members to the district board. This restriction, though just, is unworkable for the present. Under the new Bill the meetings of local boards will be more frequent than hitherto, and the delegates of the táluka boards will certainly find it inconvenient, to say the least, to go to the zilla town to attend every meeting, especially when the work is simply honorary. We must admit that there is not so much of public spirit, at least in the rural districts, as to make the delegates attend every meeting of the district board, and we are surprised to find that Government, who have made much of this fact, should have overlooked it in this particular. The difficulty can be obviated by offering some pecuniary inducement or allowing the táluka boards to elect a person outside their body, if they so wish, just as the Inámdárs have been allowed to do, in which case they may elect a person from the zilla town itself to represent their wants. Another remedy appears to be to declare that general meetings of the district board will be held during particular months only, the opinions on all other occasions being obtained by the circulation of the necessary papers. In short, there should be a regular session of the district board so as to make it convenient for the táluka delegates to attend. If none of these or similar other provisions be adopted, we fear that the attendance of the táluka delegates cannot be secured, and the object of granting the elective franchise will be entirely defeated.

Comments in connection with the draft Bills regarding local self-government in the Bombay Presidency.

The Indu Prakásh (9) of the 23rd July says :—Not even the most thorough-going champion of official authority can with any semblance of reason find fault with the spirit in which the two Bills on local self-government of the Government of Bombay have been prepared. While making certain concessions to the people, Government have reserved in these Bills a great deal of power in their own hands and in the hands of the Collectors. The most striking feature of the measures is that which relates to that part where it is provided that in case local boards or elective municipalities are found to be apathetic or inactive, either neglecting their work or misusing their powers, Government may use their discretion and abolish the system of local self-government with reference to these particular bodies, and adopt such measures as may seem to them necessary for carrying on their work. The Collector does not lose the chance of being president, since the nomination of that officer lies with Government and Government will not be restricted in their choice to the non-officials. The Collector will still rule, as he does rule at present, since in the case of any emergency or in the case of any neglect on the part of the local boards he will be quite at liberty to do the needful on his own responsibility and charge the expenses of the work to the local boards. The Bills authorize him to inspect the books of the local boards at any time. So far then as the officials are concerned, there is no room left even for captious criticism. All that remains to be seen is whether the Bills have been prepared with a careful regard for the interests of the people and with a sincere desire to make local self-government a reality and not a farce. The boards will consist of (1) elected members and (2) of nominated members, i. e., those appointed by the Collector with the approval of Government. The elected members shall not be less than one-half of the whole, and of the nominated members not more than one-half shall be salaried servants of Government. It will be seen from this that Government reserve to themselves the power of increasing the proportion of the elected members. At present it is not considered desirable to go further than limiting the proportion to one-half. In the case of the more backward parts of the Presidency, the boards shall, at the option of Government, consist wholly of nominated members, or of elected and nominated members in such proportions as Government like. This exercise of caution in the case of such places has nothing to be said against it. But it seems to us that it would have been better if the provisions of the Bill as regards the more advanced places had been prepared in a more liberal spirit. Without for a moment contending that privileges should be thrown broadcast amongst the people, whether they are prepared for them or not, we may point out that to put the elected members at one-half of the whole is to leave things much as they are, considering that the president will still be the nominee of Government. Perhaps the one-half proportion is devised as a safeguard against an improper independent spirit being shown by the elected members. But that safeguard seems unnecessary in the face of the fact that Government will still reserve to themselves the power of superseding the local boards if they think they have failed to discharge their duties properly. It will be better, we think, to make some distinction between the district and táluka boards in this respect. The district boards being located in the district towns, where the number of educated and intelligent inhabitants is admittedly large, the number of the elected members should be larger than the number of the nominated members. In a place like Thána, Poona, Ahmednagar, Sátára, or Belgaum, Government can safely trust to the capacity and intelligence of their citizens. Why should the people elect only one-half of the members of the local boards in such places to be swamped by the official nominees? The necessity for the reconstitution of the boards arises from the fact that hitherto Government have had the best time of it and the popular voice has been quite at a disadvantage. All that the present Bill seeks to concede is the privilege of election; but if the privilege is to be given at all, it must be something more than a privilege nominally bestowed. But to put the elective nominees at one-half of the whole body is to weaken their influence and reduce the privilege to a mere semblance of power. Government admit that "the administration of local funds" has been "on the whole highly successful." The districts might then have been easily divided into three classes, (1) those where the administration has succeeded very well and where the number of intelligent and educated inhabitants is large, (2) those where it has succeeded fairly, and (3) those where it has but very partially succeeded. To the first class the privilege of electing two-thirds of the members required for the boards may be given. It seems to us that the provisions of the Bill on this subject require revision and modification on the lines indicated by us or on some similar principle. The mere knowledge that the people have the power to elect their representatives is not likely to impress them with the consciousness of their responsibilities. That consciousness will be realized in its true aspects only when the people know that they can assert their rights without being set at nought by Government. Besides this there is another consideration which justifies us in saying that the proportion of the elected members should be larger, at all events in the more advanced places and in the district boards if not in the táluka boards. In the districts the Collectors enjoy great influence, and even the elected members are likely to consult their wishes first, seeing that these officers have the power of reporting their doings to Government unfavourably and of inspecting their proceedings. There is no necessity, therefore, for making the proportions of the elected and nominated members equal. [The Arunodayá (14) of the 22nd July is of opinion that the provisions of the Bills as they at present stand are not likely to prove beneficial to the people, but that their defects are calculated to bring into ill odour the names of those that may be allowed to take part in bringing them into force and thus stamp Natives generally as being incapable of wielding the powers conferred on them. The Gujarát Mitrá (75) of the same date approves of the Bills on the whole, but says that pensioned officers of Government should be considered as eligible for nomination by Government. The Mitrá also expresses sentiments similar to those of the Indu Prakásh in regard to the proportion of the elected to the nominated members. The Native Opinion (10) of the 22nd July says:—We hope that when the Bills come for discussion before the Council our legislators will perceive that clause (c) of Section 1 of the District Municipal Bill creates an unnecessary difficulty. A man's aptitude for work depends much more upon his future conduct than upon his past incidental misbehaviour. We do not mean that past conduct should not be taken into account as a qualification; but the triviality of the incidents embodied in clause (c) is so patent that it must strike the most superficial observer. We think the clause is flagrantly mischievous and hope the Council will not fail to expunge it from a law which is to be the very corner-stone of our municipal government. The Rást Goftár (109) of the same date expresses similar sentiments, points out the necessity of giving an independent vote to the educated classes, and enquires why the Maráthi and Gujaráti translations of the Local Self-Government Bills have not yet been published. The Suryodayá (64) of the 23rd July says that people should be allowed to elect three-fourths of the number of members on municipal boards and that educated persons should be allowed the privilege of voting even if they be under 21 years of age. The Bakul (16) of the 22nd idem does not approve of the provisions of the Bills as they at present stand.]

Disapproves of the draft Bills on local self-government in the Bombay Presidency.

The Poona Vaibhav (48) of the 22nd July says:—The Local Self-government Bills drafted by the Bombay Government appear to be simply intended to throw dust into the eyes of the Government of India and the public generally. The original object of Lord Ripon in inaugurating the scheme of local self-government was to transfer some of the powers of district officers to the people, but a careful study of the provisions drafted by the Local Government will show that they are calculated to concentrate all power in the hands of Government officers. The Bombay Government ought not to have exhibited its narrow-mindedness on this occasion. It ought to have considered the extent to which Lord Ripon is prepared to concede to the people the powers of local self-government. It also ought to have judged of the feelings with which the people look upon the Viceroy and the earnestness evinced by the people to receive the concessions contemplated to be made. Had the Government of Sir James Fergusson showed a tendency to be straightforward and had drafted the Bills accordingly, it would have secured the affections of the people in a very great measure. As the measures proposed to be adopted are, however, in a crude state, it is to be hoped that in bringing them to perfection the Bombay Government will not try to render the privileges that are sought to be conferred on the people by the Government of India useless by placing unnecessary restrictions on their enjoyment. If, however, the Bombay Government fail to carry out the views of the Government of India, the Supreme Government should not sanction the enactment of the Bills without effecting the necessary modifications.

Legislation—The Native Magistrates' Jurisdiction Bill.

Advises Government not to effect any changes in the present form of the Native Magistrates' Jurisdiction Bill.

The Dnyán Prakásh (8) of the 23rd July advises Government not to effect any changes in the present form of the Jurisdiction Bill. The opponents of the Bill will not be satisfied with anything short of the total abandonment of the Bill, and any mere tinkering of it will not pacify the cry they have raised against it. Besides, the provisions of the Bill as it at present stands are not meant to confer any extensive powers on Natives, and therefore any curtailment of the already small powers intended to be conferred will deprive them of all their charm and they will not be looked upon as a concession in the narrowest sense of the term. It is said that out of the officers consulted by Government after the introduction of the Bill many have abandoned their opinions which were given before its introduction, and it is therefore proper that Government should pay no regard to the opinions of those that are opposed to the Bill, while they should duly weigh the arguments brought forward by its supporters.

Education.

Disapproves of the decision of the Grant College Medical Society that the female students wishing to attend the medical class to be formed should have passed the Matriculation Examination.

The Yajdán Parast (121) of the 22nd July regrets that the Grant College Medical Society should have decided that the ladies to be admitted into the Grant Medical College for receiving medical education should have passed the Matriculation Examination. The number of Native girls who have received English education is very small, and not one of them has hitherto passed the Matriculation standard. In the same manner a very small number of English or European ladies has passed the examination. It will therefore be almost impossible to get any female students to join the College, and there will be no female class for the next ten years. The new condition sought to be imposed on admission into the new class ought to be abandoned.

Railways.

Inconvenience to passengers by His Highness the Gáikwád of Baroda's Railway.

The Samsher Báhádur (110) of the 20th July says that the trouble and inconvenience suffered by passengers from Chándod to Ahmedabad is very great. His Highness the Gáikwád of Baroda's Railway is undoubtedly a wretched concern. The Wishwámintri station is wretched and as small as a cottage. Passengers for Ahmedabad are required to get down at this station, and are packed like sheep in a roofless and miserable waiting-room. It is very wonderful that while the railway authorities do not allow males and females to travel together in one carriage, they confine and crush them together in such a waiting-room. Great confusion prevails at the time when men, women and children are thus locked up and the scene is heart-rending. They are not allowed to go out of it even for drinking water, satisfying hunger or answering the calls of nature. It is a matter for surprise that the railway authorities are not in the least anxious to remedy the evil. It is to be hoped that they will put a stop to it as early as possible.

Municipalities.

The Bombay Chronicle (74) of the 22nd July observes that the rule that a refund of town duties can be obtained on such goods only as are exported within six months from the date of their importation has always formed the subject of complaint on the part of the mercantile community of Bombay. It is therefore to be hoped that the municipality will so amend the objectionable rule as to minimize the inconvenience and injustice of which it is the cause. Some relief to the trade in this matter is certainly due at the hands of the Corporation.

Suggests a modification of the rule regarding the refund of town duties in Bombay.

The Akhbáre Sodágar (81) of the 28th July requests the Health Department of the municipality of Bombay to keep a sharp watch on the bazárs in order that no lean flesh, rotten fish, vegetables, fruit, and grain may be put up for sale and consumed, as the use of such articles creates cholera. The Sodágar states also that large quantities of a spurious kind of ghee are sold in the bazár and ought to be prevented from coming into public use, as the use of this article also brings on the epidemic.

Asks the Health Department of Bombay to keep a strict watch on the sale of rotten articles of food.

The Satyá Shodhak (56) of the 22nd July points out the irregularity of the appointment of a chairman at a special general meeting of the municipality of Ratnágiri. In the list of business to be done by the special meeting there was no allusion to the question of the appointment of a chairman, nor to that of the appointment of a managing committee, and yet both the questions were at once decided. Under the new rules it was necessary that the important subject of the appointment of a chairman should have been placed before the committee for some time before it was brought on for discussion, and it was not right to dispose of it in this hap-hazard manner. It cannot be said that there are no non-official members capable of performing the duties of a chairman, while the Mámlatdár of the city has too many duties to attend to in his official capacity to allow of his being reasonably burdened with the responsibilities of the office of chairman. It is to be hoped that in these circumstances the question will be reconsidered.

Points out the irregularity of the appointment of a chairman for the municipality of Ratnágiri at a special general meeting.

The Gujarát Mitrá (75) of the 22nd July does not approve of the decision recently come to at a meeting of the managing committee of the Surat Municipality in regard to the extension of the public park, and points out that the decision was neither prudent nor legal. The general committee is called upon to censure the managing body for the decision, and the commissioners are exhorted to pursue the subject through thick and thin in all its possible stages. Where is Mr. Whitworth, who is known for his prudence and justice, gone? How can he connive at such flagrant injustice. [The Gujaráti (94) of the same date also requests the authorities to interfere with the decision of the municipality in this matter, and says that it is unwise to spend large sums on the extension of the public park when the distress of the people caused by the recent floods has greater claims on the municipal treasury.]

Does not approve of the determination of the municipality of Surat to carry out the contemplated extension of the public park.

The Deshi Mitrá (90) of the 26th July says that the landing place at the Návdi Bandar, Nánpura, has fallen into such a bad condition that it has become dangerous to use it. Fears are also entertained of the bursting out of some epidemic in the city, as the stinking mud in the street drains has not yet been removed. It is advisable, therefore, that the Secretary of the municipality should have it removed at once.

A complaint against the Surat Municipality.

The Hitechchhu (76) of Ahmedabad of the 26th July points out the necessity and advantages of constructing a town hall for Ahmedabad, and observes that the site of the new vegetable market is best suited for the purpose. The vegetable-sellers are not willing to use the market. It is not good that the local municipality should waste its money on this affair. If the site is given by the municipality for the construction of a town hall, the public as well as Government will be benefited. The work can be carried on by public contributions amounting to ten or twelve thousand rupees. Moreover, the market will not prove remunerative to the municipality. If the new municipal board gives the site of the market for this purpose, the charitable public of Ahmedabad will not fail to make up the necessary amount. Moreover, the money raised in Ahmedabad as a contribution to the Surat Relief Fund may be used for this object, now that it is said to be no longer wanted for its original purpose. It is to be hoped, therefore, that the new board and the public will take some measures in this matter. If the present opportunity be allowed to escape, it will be useless to hope for another suitable opportunity.

Native States.

Some remarks in connection with the rumour that the Gáikwád has consented to cede some of his districts to the British Government in connection with the Baroda contingent.

A correspondent of the Indu Prakásh (9) of the 23rd July, writing from Baroda, says that it is rumoured that on the occasion of the installation of the Gáikwád to the gádi it was arranged by Sir T. Mádhav Ráo that the British Government should receive a sum of Rs. 3,75,000 on account of the contingent force. On the occasion of the recent visit of the Gáikwád to Calcutta, His Highness is said to have consented to cede to the British Government the districts of Kodinár and Chhota Bhávnagar, which yield an annual income of Rs. 5 lákhs. Referring to the above the Indu Prakásh says that the Mahárája cannot be held responsible in this affair. The sole responsibility lies on the heads of those who originally proposed these terms and the Mahárája cannot now retract from the step which Sir T. Mádhav Ráo took. It is also reported that Government intend taking over Dwárka, which is on the Baroda frontier, on the plea that the Gáikwád has not been able to manage the affairs of that place properly. Such usurpation, if once allowed, will go on for ever until the whole of the Gáikwád's dominion becomes no more. Such a step, therefore, is not advisable. If the Gáikwád has not been able to direct the affairs at Dwárka properly it is the duty of the paramount power to show him the right way. It will not be just to annex it to the British territory. Such a policy will surely smack of Dalhousieism.

Disapproves of the proposed extension of the term of office to Colonel Barton, Political Agent, Káthiáwár.

The Indu Prakásh (9) of the 23rd July says:—For a time the courtiers of Káthiáwár have distinguished themselves! Junágad, Bhávnagar and Jámnagar have gone into mourning because their favourite hero, Colonel Barton, is about to retire. They have telegraphed to Government to have mercy and to spare Colonel Barton for some years to come. The other States of Káthiáwár resent this movement, and it is said they will be glad to get rid of an officer who cajoled those who cajoled him and menaced those who did not. The Government of Bombay let down Colonel Barton gently in the careless part he played in the Maiya affair. A little more of caution and a little less of favour for the Junágad Darbár on his part would have saved us the enactment of a disgraceful tragedy. But he blundered from first to last and Government are now asked by a knot of States to prolong his tenure! [The Native Opinion (10) of the 22nd July says:—We hear complaints have been made by the other Káthiáwár Chiefs that these three Chiefs alone, viz., those of Bhávnagar, Junágad and Jámnagar, should have preferred a request of such a nature without their consent. We think this is a legitimate grievance. The three principalities have no right to arrogate to themselves the representation of the whole peninsula. The existence of such complaints shows that the wish to have Colonel Barton as their Political Agent for another term is not universal in the province, and we are sure that the Viceroy, before arriving at a final decision, will consult the wishes of the complainants. The Indian Spectator (1) of the 22nd July remarks:—It is proposed to make Colonel Barton a permanent fixture in the political affairs of Káthiáwár. He has had two extensions of his term already. But there was no such move that we know of when exceptionally able men like Colonel Keatinge and Mr. Peile left the charge. It must be remembered that Káthiáwár is composed of nearly 200 States and estates which ought to have a voice in the matter. But even supposing that the consent of all the Chiefs has been obtained (and nothing so easy in Káthiáwár), the Government of Bombay must consider whether such a step will conduce to justice, fair play and efficient administration. Does Junágad want Colonel Barton for another military exploit? Does Navánagar want him in the hope of replenishing its exchequer? What does Bhávnagar want him for?]

Does not approve of the delay that is allowed to occur in the disposal of the appeal to the Government of India in the matter of the massacre of the Maiyás by the Junágad Darbár.

The Gujaráti (94) of the 22nd July says:—As already anticipated, the Government of Bombay has sent in its reply to the Government of India defending the line of policy pursued by it in regard to the massacre of the Maiyás by the Junágad Darbár. Though we cannot say more at present as the proceedings are not published, still it must be asserted that there is no necessity of any delay in coming to a decision in an affair which involves life and death. The Maiya case is no private affair, and, if possible, all papers in connection with it should be published at an early date.

Complains of the oppression exercised by the Thákor of Mánsa on his subjects.

A correspondent of the Hitechchhu (76) of Ahmedabad of the 26th July says that the people have been greatly oppressed since the time the present Thákor of Mánsa came into power. The ryots and others once preferred a strong complaint against the Thákor to the Political Agent, but unfortunately they did not get redress. Though the old corrupt kárbháris have been removed from their posts, the old order of things continues. Bribery prevails to a very large extent. The Thákor is self-willed and arbitrary. He is in the third class of Tálukdárs, and though the power of passing the sentence of whipping is not allowed to Tálukdárs in Mahi Kántha, he makes free use of it. Even women and old and infirm persons do not escape this punishment. Though the Thákor pretends to be in favour of reforms, he is really their deadliest enemy. He has not done any solid work of reform and wastes money on trivial things. He spends thousands of rupees on the gratification of his desires and keeps a large company of prostitutes. It is to be regretted that no improvement has taken place in the State even since Mr. Fatechand came into office. The Thákor and his officers ought to look to the welfare of the people. The editor, in a note, says that he cannot understand why the cry of oppression is raised by the people when the Thákor and his kárbháris are shrewd and active. The Political Agent ought to enquire into the truth of the above complaint and redress the grievances of the people if there be any truth in them.

Notes.—A. The notices from the different Newspapers have been collected in the Report under different heads, which are printed in italics.

B. The names of Newspapers are printed in the body of the Report in italics, and the number of the Newspaper in the above list is printed in brackets after the name.

C. The proprietors of the Newspapers marked * have not given information as to the number of copies issued. In these cases an estimate has been made by the Reporter.

D. The system of spelling vernacular words followed by the Reporter is the same as that adopted in the Official Spelling List of the Bombay Presidency. One peculiar feature of this system is that when the long a (आ or ा) is the last letter of a word, the accent is left out, and the short a (अ = u in gun) is, to prevent confusion, never placed at the end of a word. This rule has been strictly followed, except that when the short a appears to be absolutely necessary to complete the pronunciation of a word, as in Arunodaya or the well known Mitra, it is printed with a mark over it to indicate that it is short, thus—ă.

E. Berár papers are received in this office for report under the Resolution of the Government of Bombay in the General Department, No. 1795, dated 8th June 1881.

Notes.—A. The notices from the different Newspapers have been collected in the Report under different heads, which are printed in italics.

B. The names of Newspapers are printed in the body of the Report in italics, and the number of the Newspaper in the above list is printed in brackets after the name.

C. The proprietors of the Newspapers marked * have not given information as to the number of copies issued. In these cases an estimate has been made by the Reporter.

D. The system of spelling vernacular words followed by the Reporter is the same as that adopted in the Official Spelling List of the Bombay Presidency. One peculiar feature of this system is that when the long a (आ or ा) is the last letter of a word, the accent is left out, and the short a (अ = u in gun) is, to prevent confusion, never placed at the end of a word. This rule has been strictly followed, except that when the short a appears to be absolutely necessary to complete the pronunciation of a word, as in Arunodaya or the well known Mitra, it is printed with a mark over it to indicate that it is short, thus—ă.

Politics and the Public Administration.

The Jáme Jamshed (99) of the 31st July is glad that Parliament has adopted Mr. Stanhope's motion regarding reductions in the administrative expenditure of India, but observes that the honourable member's suggestion to curtail the public works expenditure and to lay out a smaller amount than is expended at present on railways is objectionable and ought not to be accepted. It is the railway works that have secured to England and America their present prosperity and developed the commercial resources of India. Competent judges are of opinion that the ten thousand miles of the Indian railways ought to be quadrupled in order to bring prosperity to the country. The railways of this country are not an unprofitable concern; they yield more than five per cent. interest on the capital laid out on them, and bring to Government an annual income of five krors of rupees. The Jáme then points out the necessity of curtailing the exorbitant salaries of European officials and of employing Native agency in the place of European, as being calculated to secure appreciable reductions in expenditure.

Says that the grant for public works, and particularly for railways, should not be curtailed.

In noticing the reply of the Government of India to the memorial of certain landholders of Sálsette in the Thána District complaining of the unnecessarily rigorous working of the Forest Act, the Lok Mitrá (78) of the 29th July observes:—There is nothing like an attempt at answering or refuting the arguments advanced in the memorial, and the complaints of the memorialists are dismissed in a most summary, not to say contemptuous, manner. The construction sought to be placed by the memorialists on the provisions of the Act is declared to be untenable. Why or how it is so is not mentioned. If their construction was untenable, the memorialists would certainly have liked to know the construction placed upon the Act by the Government of India. The memorialists are further taken to task for having preferred complaints that are, in the opinion of Government, unreasonable; and the reply winds up by saying that any inconvenience arising from the working of the Act, if properly represented, will receive due consideration from the Bombay Government. No notice is taken of the fact that a memorial was submitted to the Local Government as early as November 1881 and that no redress was obtained. It is not easy to believe that the memorial has received careful consideration, seeing that no inquiries were instituted nor any special report called for as to the manner in which the Act is being worked. Nothing of the kind appears to have been done, and the memorialists are referred back to the Bombay Government for redress of their grievances. Surely there is something singularly unsatisfactory in the unceremonious way in which a matter of such extreme importance is disposed of. It is out of the question for the memorialists to expect redress at the hands of the Local Government when the latter has been patted on the back and its conduct endorsed in an unequivocal manner by the Supreme Government.

Disapproves of the reply of the Government of India to the memorial of certain landholders of Sálsette complaining of the rigorous working of the Forest Act.

The Deshi Mitrá (91) of the 2nd August, in referring to the question asked in the House of Commons regarding the punishment of whipping awarded in certain cases in India, observes that it should not be entirely done away with. The punishment of caning juvenile offenders prevailing in Bombay has affected the commission of crimes to a small extent. The flogging of unruly prisoners in jails is also necessary. If whipping is abolished, juvenile offenders will have to be sent to jails or workhouses, which will be full of them and Government will find it hard to maintain them. Flogging should therefore be retained to some extent at least.

Disapproves of the abolition of whipping in India.

The Indu Prakásh (9) of the 30th July says:—The country rejoices to see that Major Baring has been knighted. To have earned this honour on the eve of his retirement from India is no great thing for him. Sir John Strachey was a knight when he was in charge of the financial portfolio of the Government of India, and Major Sir Evelyn Baring now reaches that distinction, with this difference, however, between the two, that no honour that may be conferred upon the latter by Government can equal the feelings of respect and gratitude entertained by the people of India towards him. Allusion has been made in some quarters to the abolition of the import duties, and a question has been asked whether Sir Evelyn consulted the interests of this country in taking that step. The only answer that seems to us to meet the captious criticism implied in such remarks is that if we were to judge of a statesman by every act of his and condemn him because among many acts that are good there is one that is bad, there would be few statesmen capable of reaching this high standard. In view of the fact that the remission has not benefited Manchester it must now be admitted even by those who strongly demanded some years ago the abolition of the import duties that Major Baring could have spared the duties without injuring anybody. The Bombay Branch of the East India Association is preparing an address to be presented to him before his departure to Egypt. What is the Poona Sárvajanik Sabha doing? We wonder why the British Indian Association of Calcutta has as yet made no move in the matter. [The Gujaráti (95) of the 29th July, the Lok Mitrá (78), and the Bombay Chronicle (75) of the same date express similar sentiments.]

Comments on the working of the Sind Encumbered Estates' Act.

The Indian Spectator (1) of the 29th July quotes an extract from the Bombay Administration Report for 1881-82 bearing on the subject of the debt due by the encumbered estates in Sind, and remarks:—Deducting the discount, so to say, of 2½ lákhs of rupees from 17 lákhs, and further deducting the 12 lákhs that still remain due, it follows that the estates themselves have as yet paid only 2½ lákhs to the creditors out of their claim of 32½ lákhs. In other words, the creditors could not be paid 8 lákhs in cash without incurring a liability to Government for 5½ lákhs. What is the conclusion? Is it not that it has not been found possible to keep down private debts without increasing the public debt in nearly the same proportion? This fact, taken in conjunction with the frank admission made in the Administration Report that "one manager finds it difficult to exercise control over so large a number of separate estates," is in our opinion a conclusive proof of the failure of the Sind Encumbered Estates' Act. No less than 121 estates were added during the year, notwithstanding this inability of the manager "to exercise control" over them. We dare say many more have been added in 1882-83. How long Government intend to persist in this dangerous experiment we cannot guess. But we have no doubt that the longer they persist in it the more will they emasculate and enervate the active energies of their protéges and reduce them to a state of perpetual tutelage. The writer here quotes John Stuart Mill on the nature of assistance generally, and proceeds:—Here Government have substituted themselves for the zamindár's own "labour, skill and prudence"; in other words, they have chosen to exercise what political philosophers call the authoritative form of interference. Had Government confined themselves to non-authoritative intervention,—had they instructed their revenue officers to give advice and information to the indebted zamindárs, to acquaint them with their rights, to protect them from gross imposition, to assist them by loans or even to exert their good offices in procuring composition with creditors on advantageous leases,—we should have had nothing to say against it. We should, on the contrary, have welcomed such a healthy form of intervention and rejoiced at it. But when a prohibitory regulation is passed interdicting all persons from entering into any contracts with a certain class of zamindárs and ousting the jurisdiction of the ordinary courts in their transactions,—when Government step into the shoes of these indebted zamindárs, become the judge as well as the defendant in all claims against them, lay down hard and fast rules for the decision of these claims, and representing the insolvents dictate terms to the creditors which the latter have no option but to accept,—terms irrespective of the insolvent's property,—then we think it is high time to speak out boldly against a line of policy calculated "to starve the development of some portion of the bodily or mental faculties, sensitive or active," of the very zamindárs whom it is intended to succour, to deprive them of all real initiative and direction in their own personal affairs, to disqualify them for the struggle of life, to injure their credit for ever by breaking faith with their creditors, and to reduce them to so many inane dummies, if not non-entities. Government candidly confess that their agent is unable to manage so many as 349 estates. But let us remind them that all the facilities of access to information which a Government enjoys and all the means which it possesses of remunerating, and therefore of commanding, the best available talent in the market, are not an equivalent for the one great disadvantage of an inferior interest in the result. This is an elementary truth as well as a lesson of experience. Let us hope it will not be lost upon our Government.

Disapproves of the contemplated legalization of forced labour by the Government of Madras.

The Native Opinion (10) of the 29th July says :—The end of the nineteenth century is about to legalize and sanction what its first two quarters seemed to condemn as barbarous and inhuman. To the civilian, veth (forced labour) has been an abomination, and for it the Khots and their patrons the Peshwas and other Native principalities have been dragged through the dirt. But the times have changed and with that change what was once thought barbarous is about to be considered religiously sanctimonious. The Government of Madras has introduced a Bill into the local Legislature legalizing forced labour for the preservation of irrigational works. We hope the local Government will think twice before it passes the new measure through the Council. The tradition is that the shackles of a bondsman drop down as soon as he touches the shores of England, but here in India the people of the very same country are putting shackles upon us in the shape of the above Act. What a pitiful contrast! Has climatic change anything to do with this phenomenon?

Asks Government to annul or modify Section 58 of the Irrigation Act, 1879.

The Khándesh Vaibhav (36) of the 27th July, in an article headed "Legal Oppression," refers to the distress said to have been caused to the people of táluka Dindori in the Násik District by being impressed for labour on the irrigation works at Wághad, and says :—The officers of Government having a part in this affair, the people were obliged to suffer great miseries. Where should the people go when those who are appointed to protect them oppress them? Even well-to-do people, respectable and rich merchants, pátils and school-masters who were never accustomed to this sort of work were dragged forth, and their feeling at being obliged to work with low-caste people cannot even be imagined. At first the people refused to work, but when the Executive Engineer for Irrigation prosecuted about 700 persons for committing a breach of law, and when the District Deputy Collector fined about seven persons of the lot in the sum of eight annas each, all those that demurred to work in the first instance were obliged to give way. This seems to be certainly a wrong application of Section 58 of the Irrigation Act. If the legislators had the least idea that the provisions of the section would be subjected to such a wide interpretation as that put in the present instance, they would certainly have omitted this section altogether. In the opinion of the Khándesh Vaibhav such compulsory provisions are not at all necessary. It may be proper to have such a coercive law in contingencies like war. Even at the time of the late Afghán War, when Government were in great need of men, they did not resort to impressment, but induced people to come forward by offering high salaries. Moreover such impressment of labour is not sanctioned by the laws of political economy. In these circumstances it is to be hoped that Government will either annul or modify Section 58 of the Irrigation Act, 1879. [The Suryodayá (65) of the 30th July expresses somewhat similar sentiments. The Bombay Samáchár (86) of the 3rd August also refers to the matter, and asks Government to take due notice of the conduct of the officers who exacted labour from the people.]

Requests that conciliators for Jávli Táluka may be selected from Sátára and Wái.

A correspondent of the Mahárashtrá Mitrá (40) of the 2nd August hears that Dr. Pollen and Ráo Báhádur M. G. Ránadé have expressed their views in favour of the appointment of conciliators for the Jávli Táluka of the Sátára Collectorate. If conciliators for this táluka were once dispensed with it is desirable that those to be again appointed for the duty should not be selected from the Jávli Táluka, because there are no people in the táluka who deserve the honour. It will therefore be better if respectable and deserving people from Wái and Sátára are appointed conciliators for the Jávli Táluka. This táluka borders upon those of Sátára and Wái, and people from the former frequently visit the latter for various purposes, and it will therefore not be inconvenient to them if their conciliators are appointed from the latter tálukas.

Disapproves of the policy of Government in regard to spirituous drinks manufactured in the Thána District.

The Suryodayá (65) of the 30th July observes that the ábkári revenue for 1882-83 in the Thána District amounted to seven lákhs and twenty-seven thousand rupees. By the questionable expedients adopted by the Commissioner the contract for 1883-84 has been given for Rs. eight lákhs, two thousand and seven hundred. It will thus be seen that Government devote more attention to increasing their revenues from this source than to the discouragement of the vice of drinking, in spite of all their professions that all their efforts are directed to the latter object. The Suryodayá disapproves of the proposals made to abolish the town duties levied in Bombay and Thána on European liquors, and observes that the exertions of Government appear to be directed towards the encouragement of the use of European liquors at the sacrifice of the interests of country drinks.

Approval of the services of Mr. Hart, Private Secretary to His Excellency Sir James Fergusson.

The Indian Spectator (1) of the 29th July says:—Sir James Fergusson need not have troubled himself about contradicting the rumour as to Mr. Hart's appointment as Collector. To be sure Mr. Hart stands low on the civil service list; but he is an exceptionally able man, and has worked hard for a number of years in a difficult and delicate position. We have heard of worse Private Secretaries having fared better than Mr. Hart is likely to do. Besides, with due respect for age and experience, one may say that a capable young man is to be preferred to an elderly mediocre man for administrative work. Promotion by seniority is a good rule, but there are exceptions to every rule.

Points out the injustice of the people of Surat being still made to pay for the punitive police imposed on them after the license tax riots in that city.

The same says:—The people of Surat have a legitimate grievance in the matter of the additional police charge they have had to pay since the occurrence of the so-called license tax riots. The plan of punishing a community for the sin of individuals is in itself objectionable. It savours of sharp practice. But even if Government cannot find a more equitable way of dealing with the offenders, it is hard that a whole population should remain under a sort of perpetual ban after the guilt of a few has ceased to operate. This will puzzle even believers in the doctrine of eternal punishment.

Says that Government should devote a year's revenue to the relief of the persons who have suffered by the recent floods at Surat.

The same, in writing on the recent floods at Surat and the havoc committed by them, says that Government is bound to devote a year's revenue to the relief of the persons who have suffered by them. Surely that is not asking too much!

Observes that the buttresses of the fort on the river side at Broach urgently need repairs.

A correspondent of the Jáme Jamshed (99) of the 30th July states that the town of Broach is protected from the annual inundations of the river Narbada by the buttresses of the fort; but as these have grown very old, they stand in need of repair. If the necessary repairs are not made within a few days the buttresses may tumble down, and in that case the town will be exposed to the inundations of the river. The early attention of the authorities concerned is requested to the subject.

Requests Government to allow court fee stamps to be sold at post offices.

The Nagar Samáchár (41) of the 28th July says that the recent resolution of Government directing that each court fee stamp shall bear the name of the party to whom it is sold, the date on which it is sold, and the signature of the licensed vendor, is likely to cause inconvenience to the public. Since the introduction of the Deccan Agriculturists' Relief Act the profession of stamp-vendors has undergone considerable depression, and they are therefore obliged to seek other occupations in addition to the business of stamp-vending. People in need of stamps are obliged to find out the hours at which stamp-vendors are at home, and are required to dance attendance on them for the sake of a court fee stamp. It will therefore contribute to the convenience of the public at large if court fee stamps are allowed to be sold at the different post offices in the Presidency, the post masters receiving the usual commission for the work done by them.

Suggests some means for an extensive destruction of serpents.

The Jáme Jamshed (99) of the 2nd August observes that notwithstanding that Government grant rewards for the destruction of serpents an appeciable decrease has not been effected in the number of these dangerous reptiles nor in the number of deaths caused by their bites. It is desirable, therefore, that more effective measures should be taken for their destruction. It is said that serpents lay eggs in the month of July; so if a reward three or four times the value of the usual grant is offered for the destruction of female serpents in the months of April, May and June, much good will result. Again instructions should be given to villagers as to how and when to kill serpents, and due encouragement should also be given to the destruction of these reptiles in winter when they are not very active. The wolf-pest in England was removed by the offer of rent-free lands to cultivators, and the same means might be adopted with success for the cure of the serpent-evil in India.

Makes some suggestions to the Presidency Post Master, Bombay.

The Din Bandhu (5) of the 29th July censures Mr. Stuart, Presidency Post Master, Bombay, for being blind to the requirements of the public at large. Some days ago the authorities of the Postal Department sanctioned an extra expenditure of Rs. 800, but Mr. Stewart has not yet thought fit to utilize the sum, and has thus allowed the public and the department itself to suffer inconvenience. This sum was originally sanctioned for the employment of additional delivery peons, and the Post Master could have utilized the amount partly for this purpose and partly for the opening of branch money order offices. At present money orders can be cashed in the General Post Office only, and this arrangement causes inconvenience and annoyance to the public. Moreover the present hours between which the money order department of the Post Office is open are very inconvenient, especially to those who have to attend offices, and nothing but the opening of branch offices will meet their requirements.

Says that letters addressed to places on the B. B. & C. I. Railway line and received in branch post offices after the prescribed hours should be sent direct to the Grant Road station.

The Din Bandhu (5) of the 29th July understands that while letters that are received in the branch post offices after the appointed hour and addressed to places on the G. I. P. Railway line are sent direct to the Byculla station, no similar arrangements are made for sending letters addressed to places on the B. B. & C. I. Railway line direct to the Grant Road station. Why should there be such a difference? If runners are engaged by the Postal Department, why should not the people of Gujarát be equally favoured with those of the Deccan?

Certain complaints regarding tram cars in Bombay.

A correspondent of the Kaiser-i-Hind (102) of the 29th July observes that tramway cars do not begin to run till half past six in the morning, and consequently the large number of persons who go to the mills or the vegetable market at Byculla early in the morning at 4½ or 5 o'clock cannot avail themselves of the convenience afforded by them. It is desirable, therefore, that the Tramway Company should run their carriages from 4½ o'clock in the morning. The writer also complains that car drivers do not completely stop the cars when old men, women or children want to get into or out of them, that cars are not run on broad streets with sufficient speed, and that the fares are rather high for poor people and need to be lowered.

Complains of the bad conduct of some Pársi miscreants towards Pársi ladies in the Fort.

A correspondent of the Jáme Jamshed (99) of the 3rd August complains that for some time past a number of Pársi miscreants have met every evening between 7 and 9 o'clock in that part of the Bazar Gate street which lies between the corner of the Mánekji Shet's Agyári lane and Bamanji Wádia's fountain, and gibe at the Pársi ladies who happen to pass by that way. These budmashes sometimes address indecent words to the ladies and sometimes waylay them. It is strange that policemen standing near the fountain should not apprehend the miscreants. The attention of the Commissioner of Police is requested to the complaint.

Local Self-government.

Congratulates the Government of Sir James Fergusson on the liberal character of the Local Self-government Bills and criticizes them.

The Dnyán Prakásh (8) of the 2nd August says:—We must congratulate the Government of Sir James Fergusson on the liberal character of the Bills which, so far as their general scope and provisions are concerned, must, we think, satisfy at least the moderate section of the party of advancement and enlightenment amongst the Native community. We are aware that the extreme section of the community which, in the language of Professor Wordsworth, may be aptly described as the "emotional" wing of the party of progress and reform, will feel disappointed when they see that the whole measure of reform, as sketched out in the now memorable resolution of the Government of India, dated the 18th May 1882, has not been conceded to the Bombay Presidency by the Government of Sir James Fergusson. But it is impossible in the very nature of things to satisfy the ambition, or rather the crotchets, of this emotional section, which, we must say, forms but a very insignificant minority of the party of progress and reform. That section very conveniently forgets that even the Government of India, when it promulgated its resolution of 18th May 1882, never meant to force any hard-and-fast system upon the subordinate Provincial Governments and Local Administrations, but left them a great latitude of action with a view to enable them to adapt their measures of reform under the scheme to the actual state of things in their respective provinces and charges. The initial blunder which this section commits consists in its regarding the Government of India's resolution as a resolution which can be given complete effect to at once in all provinces irrespective of any circumstances, whereas the real truth appears to us to be that the resolution in question does not differ in any degree from the Court of Directors' Educational Despatch of 1854. Both these State documents are important only so far as they contain an exhaustive and comprehensive exposition of the policy of Government in respect of the subjects to which they relate. The premature introduction of any of the reforms or of all of them as shadowed forth in these two State documents would not only defeat the objects of Government, but would be in the highest degree detrimental to the interests of progress and reform. We shall here give an instance in order to more clearly illustrate our meaning. It is a well known principle of the Educational Despatch of 1854 that as soon as the circumstances of the case will permit, but neither earlier nor later, the State should withdraw from all direct connection with higher education, and the said principle is so sound in theory that no sane man will question its utility or propriety. But it is equally admitted on all hands that a premature application of the said principle, far from advancing the interests of that branch of education, will check its healthy growth, which in the absence of efficient private agency can be secured by the State's intervention and control only. The same is precisely true of the principles of election and of having non-official presidents at the head of local boards, both urban and rural. A single premature step would be sufficient to discredit the whole system and to call into question the wisdom, foresight and statesmanship of its originators. We cannot afford to ignore, as the section of the party alluded to above appears to do, the lessons of history which teach us that no government, however powerful and beneficent, can create national institutions by mere legislation, but that these must be the works of time and of the people themselves. For a reform to be durable a desire for that reform must precede its introduction. And we challege any man whatever, be his position what it may, to say that a desire for the introduction of the elective system into the constitution of our urban and rural local boards and for having non-official presidents at the head of those local boards is so universal as to justify Government in introducing the same everywhere. Holding these views as we do, we cannot but congratulate the Government of Sir James Fergusson on the permissive and elastic character of the principal provisions of both the Local Self-government Bills. So far as the principle is concerned the Bills leave nothing to be desired, but lest we may be misunderstood, we must frankly state that they are not quite perfect in all their details, which in our opinion admit of considerable improvement. As we all along suggested, the Bills have, we learn, been referred officially to the leading municipalities and district local fund committees for their opinion, and we have not the slightest doubt that, while according to the Bills a general approval, the local bodies consulted will suggest the necessary alterations in the detailed provisions of the Bills. As regards Section 5 of the Local Boards Bill, we think it is necessary to amend it, so far as district boards are concerned, by providing that the nominated members shall not be more than one-third of the total number of elective members. Such a course is necessary for two reasons, first, because the elective members in district boards will not be returned directly by a democratic constituency but by a process of filtration, and second, because the nominated members in táluka boards will also be eligible as delegates from táluka to district boards. This is the best course to follow, but should there be any difficulty in adopting it, we would suggest as an alternative step that the nominated members in táluka boards should be declared ineligible as delegates from those boards to district boards, for the obvious reason that in the latter Government would have their nominees to the extent of one-half. As regards Section 6, clause (c), and Section 7, clause (c), we think it advisable that the privilege of nominating a representative given to an Inámdár, should there be one such only in the táluka or the district, should be also extended to Inámdárs as a class, provided that if their choice fell upon anyone who was not himself an Inámdár, that person must satisfy any of the conditions laid down in the Act for membership. We see no use in circumscribing the circle of their choice. It is quite possible that even if there be more than one Inámdár in the táluka or district they may all agree that there is none among them quite competent to take care of his interests and those of his brother Inámdárs. As regards Section 8 we would in the first place restrict the power of Government to táluka boards only, and we would empower the táluka boards so formed to return their own delegates to the district board under Section 7, clause (b). The reason is obvious. Government ought surely without any hesitation to rely upon their own nominees to exercise intelligently their right of electing their delegate. We would further add a proviso to this section that if one-third of the number of rate-payers in such a táluka prayed for the removal of their disability under Section 8, and if their prayer was supported by a majority of three-fourths of the members on the district board, Government should forthwith remove that disability. We would also provide that even if any táluka were exempted according to the provisions of Section 8, the elections to such a táluka board under Section 6, clauses (a) and (c), should in no way be affected by the exemption. The reasons for both these provisions are obvious. [The Indian Spectator (1) of the 29th July expresses somewhat similar sentiments regarding the general scope of the Bill, and after contradicting the assertion made in the Statement of Objects and Reasons that the management of local funds has on the whole been hitherto highly successful, expresses its disapproval of the provision granting an election of half the number of members on local boards, and says:—But since Government have expressed great willingness to give as much effect as possible to the system of election, we do not see why Section 5 should not be amended. The contemplated introduction of the system of election much more largely than at present indicated in the Bills into the constitution of local boards is honourable, but it has unfortunately been notorious how far the actions of the servants of Government fall short of their intentions. After all, their measures are carried out by the Collector in the district. Government generally depend on his reports. They seldom invite non-official opinion. Hence, in the advanced districts and tálukas it will eventually depend on the whim of the Collector whether he will have more than half the members of local boards elected or not. There is thus a wide discretion left to the Collector which is prejudicial to the development of self-government as now sought to be introduced. Practical experience suggests that the discretionary power should be withdrawn. Let Government append a schedule to the Act, wherein should be mentioned the names of all the districts and tálukas where, owing to their backward condition, only half the number should for the present be elected for the boards, and let it be enacted in the fifth section that the rest shall have the privilege of electing three-fourths of their members. If Government really desire to place the people in advanced districts "in an independent position" for purposes of self-government, there can be no harm in adopting the suggestion. People will thereby have confidence in the intentions of Government. As Section 5 stands at present, we are inclined to the belief that it leaves a door open to give local boards a constitution which will in all probability be semi-official, and therefore not representative or independent.]

Expresses dissatisfaction with the Bombay Local Boards Bill and criticizes it.

The Indu Prakásh (9) of the 30th July says:—The more one examines the provisions of the Local Boards Bill, the more does he find reason to complain that the Bombay Government has not attempted to do justice to the people in preparing it. It seems to give the right of election and to invest táluka boards with some powers; but all this is neutralized by the bludgeon clauses which have been introduced into the Bill, giving very extensive powers to Collectors and reserving still more extensive powers in the hands of Government. Beyond giving the people the right of electing one-half of the members of local boards, does it give anything? How does it enable the members of local boards to manage their affairs without being unduly influenced and intimidated by official crotchets? What safeguards does it place against the interference of the Public Works Department with the construction and management of local works? These are questions which are not at all satisfactorily met by the Bill before us. In short, it appears to us to be a reluctantly and cleverly drawn Bill, seeming to give rights in one place, but in another place quietly neutralizing their effect or nullifying them. And this view of ours about this Bill we are prepared to justify by minutely examining its salient features. The two most important features of the Local Boards Bill are those appertaining to the introduction of the elective system and the nomination of president. As to the principle adopted with regard to the elective system, Government do not mean in the beginning to concede to the people a greater right than that of electing only half the number of members required for táluka and district boards; and as to the nomination of president, the Bill provides that Collectors shall cease to be ex-officio presidents and that these posts shall be conferred on any member of the boards irrespective of the consideration that the person to be elected is an official or not. These two provisions must be considered together, since for the attainment of the object which the local self-government scheme has in view—namely, enabling the people to do for themselves what is at present done for them by Government officers,—the first essential condition is that the people should have a fair share in the administration of local funds and should not be left altogether dependent on Government officers. Now, what is it that has, under the administration of local funds since the passing of Act III. of 1869, allowed the funds to be diverted to purposes other than those for which they were collected? As far as the conditions put down on paper by Government and by the Legislature for the administration of the funds went, they all looked good and reasonable. Government took care to provide that although the entire strength of the boards should consist of members nominated by it, yet the non-official element in them should never be less than one-half of the total number of members on a board. Here the people were represented, in a sense, by persons, who, being not dependent on Government, could be expected to take an independent view of questions brought before the boards. But they did not.

Was that not because, being the nominees of Government, they thought that they should not go against their views? It was so; but will the change which it is now intended to make by allowing the people to elect their own representatives at one-half of the entire strength of the boards make any material difference? Why should Government hold the balance of election equally between themselves and the people? One-half will be official representatives; and in such a state of things we cannot say that the people have much chance of being enabled to do for themselves what is at present done for them. It may indeed be said that Government do not mean to restrict the proportion of elected members to one-half of the entire strength of the boards. What the Bill provides is that the proportion shall never be less than one-half, so that Government can, in the case of any given district or táluka board, increase that proportion. But even by Act III. of 1869 it was provided that the number of non-official members should never be less than one-half the entire strength of the boards, and still the number was never increased to more than one-half. Let us see now whether the chances of elected members being kept down by an equal number of official representatives are promoted or lessened by the other provisions in the Bill. Of these provisions the first that deserves consideration is that relating to the nomination of president. That provision, we contend, is also not satisfactory. Collectors will still have the chance of holding that office; and we contend that if the object of the present Bill is to enable the people to look after their local works under official guidance and advice, that object will be frustrated by the Bill so long as it enables Collectors to be members or presidents of local boards. In the case of táluka boards it is indeed desirable for the present that Assistant Collectors should still continue to preside. But in the case of district boards such a precaution seems undesirable. It may be contended that, whether as presidents or as controllers and directors of boards from outside, there is equal chance of Collectors bringing their views to bear upon the boards and getting them to act up to them. But still there is a difference in the two positions. What that difference is is best ascertained by a perusal of Section 28 of the Bill, which provides that the president of a local board shall in fact be its executive officer. Now, as president or executive officer of a board, the Collector shall have to identify himself in fact with the initiation and execution of everything relating to the board, and thus lose the opportunity of considering the merits of measures so initiated and executed without any bias. It seems to us that the Collector should be free from such trammels. He should be left free to supervise and control the doings of the boards from outside, and that he may be so free it is essential that he should enjoy the opportunities incidental to a neutral but still a controlling position The initiation of measures and their execution, the financial and executive administration of the board, the exercise of supervision and control over the acts and proceedings of all officers and servants of the board, &c., should remain in a non-official member elected president by the board itself; and in such cases the Collector will be better able to look at the doings of the board with an unbiased mind and to exercise the healthy influence of a guide, adviser and impartial judge. By being in the board, whether as member or president,—and the Bill still leaves Government free to elect him as either,—he will have to take part in the debates, influence the board by his views, and thus carry everything before him. The chances then must be that everything will be done by him, and that the members will perform mere consultative functions. But if the Collector watches it from outside, the board will be more than a consultative body. The Collector will no doubt be still able to bring his opinions to bear upon the board, but this, we think, it will be difficult to avoid in any case as long as the Collector is the head of the district. All that is practicable and desirable is that the boards should be enabled to do their work themselves. Now, how does the Bill deal with the Collector? It in fact gives to the Collector more than two positions inconsistent with one another. He can, under Section 5, be nominated a member of a district or táluka board; under Section 24, "if at any election of a member of a local board under this Act there is an equal number of votes in favour of each of two or more persons who are willing to take office, the selection of one of such persons shall be made by the Collector by lot in such manner as he shall deem fit"; under Section 27, there is nothing to prevent him from being president of a local board; and under Section 59, the Collector shall have powers of inspection and supervision. Now, these seem inconsistent, not to say delicate, positions for one and the same person to occupy. Government are no doubt at liberty under these provisions to prevent the Collector from occupying all of them in his own person; but after all it is discretional with them. If the Collector is to be the supervising and controlling authority, as Sections 10, 24 and 59 provide, he must remain distinct from the local boards. It would therefore be better if the Bill were modified so as to give the Collector the supervising and controlling authority only, and to declare him ineligible for the office of president or for nomination as a member of either táluka or district boards.

Criticizes the Bombay Local Boards Bill.

The Mahrátta (2) of the 29th July points out the necessity of the early publication of the draft rules to be framed hereafter when the Bombay Local Boards Bill becomes law. The whole of the Bill is simply permissive and consequently vague. Without the rules it is quite impossible to come to any definite conclusion as to the merits of the scheme. Unless, therefore, Government wish to take undue advantage of the permissive nature of the Bill to the prejudice of the local bodies and thus legally disappoint the public in their expectations, they should give early publicity to the rules. We do not understand why municipalities should send their delegates to the local boards. It is true that the functions of municipal and local funds committees are similar, but this does not justify the representation now granted to municipalities. Local funds committees have no jurisdiction within municipal limits, nor have municipalities any control outside their municipal districts. It is only when their works are supplementary to each other that any occasion arises for consultation; and if for this one reason only municipalities are allowed a voice in the management of local funds, we do not see why local boards should be withheld from having a similar voice in the management of municipal affairs. To carry the principle a little further, district boards will have to provide seats for members from surrounding districts and also for representative educational and public works officers who under the present Bill can attend the meetings of the boards but have no vote. But as nothing like it is to be found in the Bill we must look for another principle on which the representation given to municipalities can be justified. Can it be on the ground of advanced social status of the inhabitants of municipal districts? This appears to be the only other ground, but the provisions in the Bill do not fully bear it out. If the principle be once granted, however, it follows that the management of local boards should go more into the hands of the inhabitants of the principal towns in the táluka, and that the representatives of the groups of villages in the táluka should come in only as secondary members. To some extent this will be the case even now considering the relative advance in civilization in the towns, and we think that this principle should be distinctly recognized and provision should be made by which a greater proportion of the elected members of a táluka board should come from the principal towns in the táluka. As local self-government becomes better understood in the districts this position may be changed and the members of the board may be allowed to be chosen out of the rate-payers in the táluka only; but till then a greater portion of the members of táluka local boards must come from the towns. Considered in this light the provisions of the Bill are singularly defective. Thus for a táluka local board one delegate has been allowed to every municipality which comprises more than 5,000 and less than 18,000 inhabitants. The provision is open to the obvious objection that if a táluka contains a town having more than 18,000 inhabitants this town cannot send a delegate to the board. No doubt it will send one to the district board, but that is no reason why it should not be represented in the táluka board directly. The case is not an imaginary one. Let us take for instance the Haveli Táluka, which contains the city of Poona. Now Poona can send a delegate to the district board, but not to the táluka one. We do not understand why the táluka committee should be deprived of the assistance and advice of members coming from a comparatively advanced town. Poona has as much to do with the táluka committee as the other towns in the táluka have,—perhaps more,—and yet it has no delegate on the board. We think, therefore, that the restriction of 18,000 should be removed entirely. Secondly, if the principle above alluded to be once acknowledged, more advanced towns ought to be allowed to send more than one member to the táluka board instead of each municipality being indiscriminately allowed one member. By this means the táluka board will be made to consist of a greater number of independent members than it can be under the present scheme. The local self-government scheme will thus become more a city than a rural franchise; but this is inevitable under the existing state of things. In Section 10 no vote has been allowed to education as such, while the trading and other classes are allowed to come under clause 5 of Section 10. In connection with this one more fact remains to be noticed, viz., that while Section 10 prescribes so many qualifications for an elective member of a táluka board there are no restrictions by which the choice of Government will be limited in nominating members of the same board. It is indeed a question why Government should be allowed to nominate a member which the voters are not allowed to elect. There ought to be one rule for both, and Government should bind themselves as much as the public. There appears to be again some mistake in giving the qualifications for voters. We looked for the reason of the partial exclusion by which an ordinary trader, but not a landholder, in a smalls municipal district can have a right to vote at the elections of the members of a táluka board by virtue of the proviso of clause 2 of Section 18, but we could not find any. It cannot be urged that the proviso is intended to guard against the double right of voting, as all others except landholders get it. The provision, therefore, is quite unintelligible, and in the event of its being retained we hope to receive an explanation regarding it. As it stands it is one-sided and partial, and probably an error.

Criticizes the draft Bill to amend the Bombay District Municipal Act.

The same, in criticising the Bombay District Municipal Act Amendment Bill, says:—The people ought to thank the Government of Sir James Fergusson for the extension of the elective franchise even to town municipalities. But in the very section which gives Government this power there is something for which the people have greatly to complain. Section 10, which regulates the constitution of municipal boards, is only permissive. It does not make it obligatory that the Governor in Council shall declare that towns of a particular status or cities of a particular standing will have the privilege of having their municipalities constituted according to the provisions of the section. Sir James and the other members of his Council are sufficiently sincere and liberal, but because we have the present Government of a particular kind it does not follow that we shall always have liberal Governors and liberal Councillors. We therefore urge that the section should be so modified as to make it obligatory and to say what municipalities will derive the benefits of the amended Act and from what date. It appears from the proviso that the Government of Sir James is not inclined to remain satisfied with giving half the number of seats on municipal boards to the people; it may even give more, and if we correctly interpret the motives of the present Government, we may say that the ten cities which under the old Act had city municipalities before the 1st of April last will, in all likelihood, have at least two-thirds of the whole number of seats on their boards reserved for their citizens. But the people are impatient and earnestly hope for such a declaration, for, they say, who knows, times may change and an autocratic Governor like Sir Richard Temple may come and leave the whole Act to remain a dead letter. The people demand, and we see no reason why Government should not grant the request, that a notification fixing the total number of commissioners and the proportion of the elective to the nominated commissioners in the different municipalities should be publishe d along with the report of the select committee. Of course the lists embodied in such notification will be subject to any alterations which circumstances may necessitate; but the draft lists will do immense good and avoid administrative difficulties which Collectors and commissioners will be put to. We have already suggested that the draft rules should also be published, and we have every hope that our present suggestion will receive its proper share of attention at the hands of the authorities. The power given to Government by Section 12 is indeed too large, and the fear is that should it remain in the hands of Government it may be abused by a despotic Governor.

Government should no doubt possess such or similar power, but some counterpoise to it should be left in the hands of the people as well. Subordinate Judges ought to be excluded from becoming municipal commissioners for the same reason for which District Judges have been excluded in Section 15. It is these Subordinate Judges before whom municipal cases come for decision, and they therefore ought to have nothing whatever to do with the boards. The disqualification mentioned in clause (c) of Section 15 should be changed into "one who has been sentenced to rigorous imprisonment by any criminal court when such sentence has not been subsequently reversed or quashed." If any reason for this change is wanted, we may say that offences punishable with simple imprisonment are not in their nature such as necessarily bring moral turpitude upon the person who commits them. Besides, instances may be cited in which persons found guilty by a criminal court for a particular offence will be incapable of becoming municipal commissioners, whereas persons of the same rank and social position convicted of the same offences by a court of equal competence will be eligible. We think that this should be left to the electors themselves. A person who commands their respect and confidence, notwithstanding a short imprisonment, may safely be allowed to become a municipal commissioner. The words "within 2 months" should be substituted in Section 18 for "as soon as it conveniently can be." After words "personally liable" in Section 20, line 15, we think the words "only so far as may fall to his share" be added. In Section 20, clause (b) should be omitted. We do not see how it can stand to reason that a person should be made to lose his rights of citizenship simply for an unfortunate mistake or an accident or even an offence. Government have very properly omitted the residential qualification in the case of voters; for though a person may not be a resident, yet he may have an interest in the working of a municipality for the reason of his holding some property or having a business concern in the municipal district. In Section 22, line 8, we should like to see instead of "the date of election," "the date of the declaration of the result." In the last paragraph of Section 22, line 22, after the word "fixed," the words "by the municipality" should be inserted. [The Gujarát Mitrá (76) of the same date says that the power reserved by Government under Section 11 of the Bill should be delegated to municipal bodies, that the limit of age mentioned in clause (a) of Section 15 should be increased to 25, that the period of the tenure of office of municipal commissioners laid down in Section 17 should be reduced to 2 years. The Mitrá also suggests that a provision may be inserted in the Code directing that an appeal shall lie to the High Court against the decision of the District Judge in cases of disputes regarding elections. The Kesari (35) of the 31st July says that the following rules should regulate the constitution of municipal boards:—(1) Municipal towns with a population of more than 20,000 souls should have the power of electing their own president. (2) Where the president is a salaried servant of Government on account of the population being less than 20,000, the people should have the power to elect at least three-fourths of the members on the board. (3) Where there is an elected president the people should elect two-thirds of the members on the board. (4) The distinction of town and city municipalities should be recognized on some principle or other. The Belgaum Samáchár (17) of the 30th July does not approve of the partial repeal of the old Acts by the new Bills, and suggests the desirability of having one enactment on each of the subjects of local boards and municipalities. The Dhárwár Vritt (24) of the 26th idem says that the restriction of age in the case of a voter or commissioner should be modified by making persons above 18 years of age eligible to vote and to be commissioners, and that the period of the tenure of a commissioner's office should be reduced from 3 years to 1 year. The Chhára (21) of the 29th and the Nyáyá Sindhu (46) of the 30th July generally disapprove of the provisions of the Local Self-government Bills.]

Requests Government to grant a city municipality to the town of Vengurla.

The Vengurla Vritt (71) of the 26th July prays Government to grant a city municipality to the town of Vengurla. A petition in this behalf was preferred last year to His Excellency Sir James Fergusson by the Hita Chintak Association, but to no effect. It is nearly eight years since a town municipality was established at this place, and during this period nearly a lákh of rupees have been spent by the committee on useless projects. The establishment of a city municipality will put a stop to all such mismanagement, and will give the people an idea of the real advantages of municipal institutions.

Education.

A suggestion regarding the introduction of some changes in the course of studies prescribed by the Bombay University and the appointment of a few auditors to detect mistakes in the adding up of marks by the examiners.

The Native Opinion (10) of the 29th July says :—A thorough overhauling of our educational system is very desirable, and mere shifts will not do. To our mind the change which is most desirable is in the vehicle or medium through which instruction is at present imparted in all our high schools. We are not to be understood to mean that the English language should be knocked on the head; what we mean is that English literature up to the present matriculation standard should be taught in schools, and even with greater care than is taken at present; but all the other subjects, such as mathematics, sciences, history, &c., should be taught in the vernaculars. The change may be looked upon by some as radical, but if carried out it is expected to check considerably the premature drain on the youthful energies of students. Instruction through the vernaculars will give the students considerable ease and a ready and thorough comprehension of the subjects they are taught. Besides, they will be enabled to acquire a more comprehensive knowledge of various subjects than they do at present. To our mind language is a mere outward dress, and when purely English literature is taught in our high schools up to the present matriculation standard, no difficulty whatsoever will be felt in imparting college instruction to these very students. While the drain on youthful energies will be checked considerably, one important point will be gained, and that is the cultivation of the vernaculars without any check upon the cultivation of the English language. It may be urged by some that the conveyance of instruction in all subjects through the medium of the English language gives the candidates greater facility to pick up a variety of expressions. But the argument must lose its force when it is considered that English literature is to be taught as hitherto, and with still greater care and precision. Even in colleges the University will do well to add the vernaculars to the studies already laid down by it. Instruction through the vernaculars at schools will necessarily serve as an impetus to their cultivation. The introduction of the dead languages into the University course may be said to have abated to some extent the amount of earnestness with which under other circumstances the vernaculars would have been cultivated. It is true that to be able to enrich the vernaculars we have to fall back upon our ancient languages, and as a means of such enrichment the cultivation of the dead languages is considered a necessity. But for all that the cultivation of the vernaculars is not the less important, and the question of the addition of the vernaculars to the University studies is therefore worthy of the consideration both of our educational authorities and the Senate of our University. The question was once raised, but then the tide of public opinion ran so high in favour of our ancient languages that the question had at that time to be abandoned. The question is one of importance and we hope the educational authorities will fully consider it. [The Indian Spectator (1) of the 29th July says :—A good deal of unpleasant speculation marks the results of our University examinations. This will continue so long as some candidates meet with failure, for it is often these men that revenge themselves on the authorities by spreading idle rumours. For our part we have never had reason to question the bonâ fides of the work done by the examiners. But the stock complaint about mistakes in adding up marks would disappear if the University were to appoint a few auditors whose business it should be to detect and rectify such mistakes. Considering that failure mars the future of hundreds of candidates, the authorities might very well ask the examiners to put down their marks in words and not in figures, so that clerks may have no excuse for mistaking 12 for 2 or 2 for 20, and so on. Another general complaint, which the authorities must try their best to remove, is about the vagaries of examiners in putting awkward questions and dealing with the answers according as it pleases the will of each examiner.]

The Satyá Shodhak (57) of the 29th July dwells on the inconvenience caused to the scholars in Maráthi schools by being required to sit on the floor, and invites the attention of the educational authorities to the necessity of furnishing all vernacular schools with gunny cloth or mats to cover the floor.

Complains that scholars in Maráthi schools are compelled to sit on the floor.

The Ahmedabad Samáchár (81) of the 1st August complains of the very low salaries paid to vernacular school-masters in the mofussil, and says that it is informed that assistant teachers and monitors in the city are now required to attend in turns the offices of their superiors out of school hours to do official work. This is justifiable only in the case of temporary pressure of work; but if it is a permanent arrangement, then there is much to be said against it. The miseries of these badly-paid officers should be lessened and not increased. It would be a proper thing to increase slightly the salaries given to vernacular school-masters.

Complains that vernacular school-masters are made to work out of school hours.

Railways.

The Dnyán Prakásh (8) of the 30th July regrets that the recent changes in the tariff of rates on the G. I. P. Railway have not conferred any benefits on the poor. The railway authorities ought properly to direct their attention to the interests of the lower classes, but such does not appear to be really the case. There has been no reduction in the rates of charges for the fourth class, while the rates for the first and second classes have been considerably lowered to the advantage of Europeans and Natives of higher classes. Considering the high salaries drawn by Europeans it is not likely that they will appreciate the advantage which the company has tried to confer on them, while to poor Natives even a slight reduction in the charges they are required to pay would have been welcome. Middle-class Natives will suffer greatly under the new arrangements, under which carriages of an intermediate class have been abolished. Such persons cannot travel by the second class as the charges are too heavy for them, nor can they travel by the fourth class and be crushed with the people of the lower classes. To redress the grievances of this class of passengers the company should issue return tickets for the second class for half as much again as the single fare, or should devise such measures as may contribute to the solution of the difficulty. [The Poona Vaibhav (49) of the 29th July ridicules the idea that passengers will take return tickets when the charge is as much as they would have to pay if they took single tickets.]

Says that the recent changes in the tariff of rates on the G. I. P. Railway are not likely to prove beneficial to Natives.

A correspondent of the Dnyán Prakásh (8) of the 30th July complains of the prevalence of cholera at Bhusával. The misery is aggravated by the importation of the disease from Pandharpur and other places. Pilgrims are packed like sheep in carriages, and when there are no such conveyances available they are despatched in cattle trucks, and on their arrival at Bhusával they indiscriminately find shelter in the dharmashála, where they lie in a precarious condition. The merciless conduct of the railway authorities towards passengers is indeed reprehensible and should be severely noticed by Government. Carriages which are intended to carry 50 passengers are made to convey from 65 to 70, and any remonstrance against the treatment received by passengers is visited with kicks. It must be borne in mind that the disease of cholera spreads by contagion, and it is also very likely that it is caused by the filthiness of the cattle trucks in which passengers are made to travel. The medical officer of the place requires the payment of a fee of Rs. 2 before he treats any of these patients, and thus these travellers are placed in a helpless condition. The people will thank Government very much if they adopt measures for affording prompt and easy relief to the sufferers by means of medical advice and medicines allowed free of charge. It is also necessary that travellers affected by the disease should not be allowed to put up among those that are free from the contagion. There is a Government school located in a portion of the dharmashála above alluded to, and the educational authorities ought to recognize the necessity of removing it from its present quarters under the above circumstances.

Complains of the prevalence of cholera at Bhusával and the ill-treatment of pilgrim passengers by railway authorities.

Asks the authorities of the B. B. & C. I. Railway Company to open branch offices in the city for the convenience of passengers by that line.

The Prabhákar (50) of the 1st August approves of the contemplated opening of a booking office near Páydhownie for the convenience of passengers by the G. I. P. Railway, and requests the attention of the authorities of the B. B. &. C. I. Railway Company to the necessity of their doing the same.

A complaint regarding the inconvenience caused to passengers by His Highness the Gáikwád of Baroda's Railway.

A correspondent of the Samsher Báhádur (111) of the 27th July complains of the miserable condition of the carriages on His Highness the Gáikwád of Baroda's Railway. The Goa Gate station is miserable. There is no proper resting place for travellers. As very few carriages, which again are small and narrow, are attached to a train, passengers have to be packed in them like sheep. It is necessary that more carriages should be attached to trains than at present with a view to give comfort to passengers, and especially to Hindu pilgrims who use the line. Proper arrangements should also be made for the safety of passengers from the sun and rain. The management of the Bhávnagar-Gondal Railway is far superior to that of the Gáikwád's Railway.

Municipalities.

Comments on the sanitation of Bombay and its suburbs.

The Rást Goftár (110) of the 29th July says that it will not be surprised if the present outbreak of cholera in Bombay is attributed to the filthy condition of the suburbs of Máhim and Dádur and to the noxious gases that are exhaled by the town sweepings that are deposited on the Byculla flats. The Rást also regrets to be under the necessity of taking exception to the purity of the pipe-water. The cry of the people on this latter head is as unmitigated as ever. Formerly such complaints used to be made only in the hot season, but this year, though half the rainy season has already passed, pure water is not received through the pipes. [The Gujaráti (95) of the same date says that cholera has been prevalent in Bombay for many months past, but that it did not attract the notice of the municipality until it showed itself among respectable classes. Why should not prompt and effective measures be taken when the municipality levies so many and heavy taxes on the people? The Din Bandhu (5) of the same date refers to the same subject, says that the money spent by the municipality on sanitation is not at all proportionate to its income, and points out the desirability of taking more effective measures for the health of the city.]

Says that the municipality of Bombay should either erect markets or allow others to do the same.

The Bombay Samáchár (86) of the 3rd August observes that for some time past the municipal authorities of Bombay have been observing the policy of reserving to the municipality the work of opening new markets, and whenever they have entered into agreements in this behalf with private persons they have imposed very stringent conditions. The consequence of this procedure has been that the residents of several quarters of the town suffer great inconveniences on account of the absence of public markets within their easy reach. It is therefore desirable either that the municipality should construct public markets on its own account or should allow them to be constructed by private persons on moderate terms.

Requests Government to reduce the import duty on grain levied by the municipality of Belgaum.

A correspondent of the Din Bandhu (5) of the 29th July deplores the present depressed condition of the trade in grain of the town of Belgaum, and says that the cause of it lies in the enhanced rates of duty levied by the municipality on cart-loads of grain. Belgaum, where lákhs of rupees used to change hands, has been reduced to such a beggarly condition that the daily transactions in grain do not now amount to even five rupees. Several traders have left the British territory and emigrated to the adjoining territories of the Chief of Sángli. Formerly no import duty was levied in this town, but now it is as high as annas 12 per cart. Such a state of things is prejudicial to the interests both of the people and the municipality, and it is to be hoped that Government will cause the duty to be reduced to annas 2 per cart, whereby both the municipality and the people will be benefited.

Recommends the Surat Municipality to take special measures for the preservation of the health of the people.

The Surat Akhbár (79) of the 30th July says that owing to the moisture that has spread in the city on account of the recent floods dysentery, fever and other diseases and even cholera have appeared in Surat. Why cannot the local municipality undertake special measures for the safety of the people in this season, as is done by the Bombay Municipality? If neglience is allowed to prevail, bitter will be its results.

Dissatisfaction of the people of Jambusar with their municipality.

The Broach Samáchár (87) of the 2nd August says that the municipality of Jambusar at a meeting held on the 26th ultimo resolved to increase the fees levied by it on cloth, sugar and sundry other articles. Not only were the entire public against the increase in the fees, but a great number of the municipal commissioners were also against it, and still the president carried the resolution. The people of Jambusar therefore became very excited and struck work from the afternoon of the 27th to the 29th July, when they resumed work. A meeting of the Mahájans was held on the 28th July and a resolution was adopted for petitioning Government. A sum of about Rs. 4,000 was also collected for the purpose. The people are very much dissatisfied with the commissioners, for only a few of their number can boast of a sound education. The president ought to do his best to pacify the people. From this commotion it appears that the people of Jambusar are not in a position to bear the burden of heavy taxation. The authorities concerned ought to interfere and prevent matters from taking a worse turn.

Disapproval of the action of the Bombay Government in connection with the misappropriation of the trust money of the Ranchhodlál Dispensary at Ahmedabad by the municipality of that city.

The Hitechchhu (77) of Ahmedabad of the 2nd August, in commenting on the order of the Bombay Government requiring the municipality of Ahmedabad to pay off at once the sum of Rs. 20,000, being the trust money of the Ranchhodlál Dispensary appropriated by the municipality, says that the action of Government in this matter is not just. The present municipal board and its president, Mr. Reid, are quite ignorant of this affair. The municipal exchequer is empty and the new board is obliged to incur fresh debts on account of the mismanagement prevalent in the time of the late chairman, Mr. Fernandez, when the misappropriation of the trust money took place. The alleged consent of the donor to the diversion of the money from its original purpose is illegal, for he had no power to give it. On the contrary his action in the matter amounts to an abetment of a breach of trust. It would be just if Messrs. Fernandez and Ranchhodlál were called to account. It is to be regretted that the action of Government in this matter should tend to lower the credit of the Ahmedabad Municipality at a time when it is involved in debt. It is still to be hoped that Government will take proper measures in this case. [The same paper refers to the disapproval expressed by the Revenue Commissioner of the substitution of a toll in the place of the house-tax leviable on the people residing in the suburbs of Ahmedabad by the local municipality, and observes that it cannot be the intention of the Government of India that the house tax should be levied by force in places to which it is unsuited. The house tax will never suit Ahmedabad. The enlargement of the municipal limits and the inclusion of the suburbs of the city in them was very inconsiderate. The proceeds from the inclusion of the suburbs within the municipal limits will fall far short of the expenditure entailed thereby. The income from the house tax is Rs. 5,000 and the expenditure is Rs. 6,400. Moreover, the extension of the municipal limits will not prove beneficial to the people living in the suburbs. It is advisable, therefore, that the local municipality should not extend its limits to the suburbs if Government are not willing that a toll should be levied instead of the house tax. The local funds committee can construct roads, &c., for the benefit of the people living in the suburbs out of their contribution to the local funds. The Samsher Báhádur (111) of the 27th July disapproves of the intention of the Ahmedabad Municipality to raise a loan of Rs. 50,000, and observes that if the vegetable and green markets and other buildings owned by the municipality are sold off there will be no necessity for incurring this fresh debt. It cannot be understood why the commissioners wish to increase the burden of debt on the municipality.]

Native States.

Advises the Council of Regency at Hyderabad to reform the administration of the State on the British system.

The Maháráshtrá Mitrá (40) of the 2nd August says that the present state of Hyderabad shows that times are out of joint and offers a word of advice to the Council of Regency in view of their being enabled to set them right. The State of Hyderabad lost in Sir Sálar Jung an invaluable jewel, and the death of that statesman will be a signal for misrule and anarchy. The policy of the British Government in connection with the states will be one of gradual interference. It will begin with issuing mandates to the State authorities in cases in which maladministration is brought to their notice. When the Nizám comes of age he will be invested with powers of administration, and no sooner will a year or two elapse than he will be asked to work with a Diwán appointed with the consent of the British Government, and further on a joint administrator will manage the administration. As the British ascendancy increases, valour and spirit of independence which at present characterize the Hyderabadi will vanish and all the dignitaries of the State will content themselves with an unmolested enjoyment of a portion of their present income. All independent Jághírdárs will lose their civil and criminal powers. Inám commissions and alienation departments will spring up and all important appointments in the State will be monopolized by Europeans. The criminal law will be enforced with the greatest rigour, and what are now considered as insignificant crimes will be looked upon as heinous. At present every subject of the State is armed from top to toe, but during the course of a decade people will be afraid of walking in the public streets with sticks in their hands. The youth will be reduced to an emaciated condition by education. Rates of land revenue assessment will be enhanced, a forest department will be organized, and the people will be reduced to a state of starvation. A Watan Act will be introduced and an enquiry instituted into the saranjáms of sardárs. A Political Agent will be kept to watch the conduct of petty Jághírdárs and the estates of many will be resumed on the plea of their immoral conduct. Some special circumstances will bring on the imposition of an income tax, which in course of time will be followed by a license tax. Municipalities will be established at different places and people will begin to be oppressed by the imposition of a local fund cess. In these circumstances it is the duty of those to whom the cares of the administration are at present committed to act prudently and cautiously and not to allow any complaints from the people under their charge to reach the British Government. It is uncertain what turn events may take and no time should be lost in reforming the administration on the British system.

Suggests an investigation into the conduct of the Diwán of Ali Rájpur in connection with the disturbances created by the Bhil chieftain Chhitu.

In noticing the trial and punishment of Chhitu, the Bhil leader who recently created disturbances in the Native State of Ali Rájpur, the Bombay Chronicle (75) of the 29th July observes that the trial has disclosed a condition of affairs at Ali Rájpur which shows that the State requires close attention on the part of the paramount power, and that the lot of the condemned Bhil chieftain deserves public commisseration. All the witnesses examined for the prosecution on whose statements the accused was condemned were unanimous that Chhitu was the victim of circumstances which goaded him on to unlawful acts. He and others similarly circumstanced petitioned, complained and remonstrated against the hardship and ill-treatment to which they were subjected for years, but did not get any redress. It was stated at the trial that the harsh, unjust and oppressive proceedings of Mr. Venkatráo, the Diwán or Kárbhári of the State, drove the Bhil chieftain and other so-called rebels to desperation. Mal-administration of all sorts is laid to the Diwán's door. It has been broadly stated that but for the wise and vigorous action taken by the British authorities the little rebellion would have become a very serious affair. This statement, if true, proves the necessity for a formal and searching investigation into the causes which brought about that rebellion.

Asks the Government of Lord Ripon to contradict the report that the Gáikwád of Baroda has consented to cede some portion of his territory to the British Government in satisfaction of the expenses of the Baroda contingent.

Referring to the report that the Gáikwád of Baroda has consented to give over to the British Government a portion of his territory in satisfaction of the expenses of the Baroda contingent, the Arunodayă (14) of the 29th July says that the report, if true, is likely to make the administration of Lord Ripon unpopular. The Gáikwád's treasury is not known to be insolvent like the British Exchequer—nay, it is said that the former has a large balance—and there appears to be no reason why the British Government should be apprehensive of any failure on the part of the Gáikwád to regularly meet all demands on account of the contingent. Moreover, to entertain such apprehensions when the administration of the young Gáikwád, tutored and brought up under European influences, is only in its first stage, and to resolve upon taking a portion of his dominions, is nothing short of an imitation of the most reprehensible policy of Lord Dalhousie. The Arunodayă, however, cannot be persuaded to believe that Lord Ripon's administration can be capable of such conduct. The evil effects of detaching portions of the territories of Native princes on the minds of the public have been brought to light in the Berár affair, and it cannot even be imagined that an administrator of Lord Ripon's fame, and with his desire to watch the interests of India and England, will commit himself to such a policy. It is necessary that His Lordship should take measures against the minds of the people being unsettled by such damaging reports and should give them an official contradiction.

Complains that the Mahárája of Baroda does not devote much attention to the administration of justice.

A correspondent of the Poona Vaibhav (49) of the 29th July, writing from Baroda, complains that the Mahárája does not devote much attention to the department of the administration of justice, and that all cases are generally decided in the way they are explained by the officers in charge of them. The subjects, therefore, do not get impartial justice and are very much discontented.

Disapproves of the career of Colonel Barton as Political Agent, Káthiáwár.

The Indian Spectator (1) of the 29th July says:—We have no serious objection to Colonel Barton remaining in Káthiáwár two months longer. But we wish he had made over the charge of his office to his successor and spent the time in travelling over Káthiáwár as a private individual. He would have learned much by this means and unlearned not a little. It would be a great gain if officers were to lay aside their official spectacles and see the country as ordinary men before they left it to air their experience at home. Nothing is so misleading as the experience of men in office, whom the truth of a matter seldom reaches except in a very distorted form. This is the misfortune of the average English officer. He is either impenetrable to outside light or is led by the nose by rascally underlings. It is direct communication with the people and encouragement of an expression of popular opinion that lead to good government. Colonel Barton came to Káthiáwár a most popular man; he goes out of it perhaps the most unpopular Political Agent, save of course with a dozen or two interested persons. The policy of the majority of political officers seems to be to support the strong against the weak—a policy from which Native States have suffered untold misery; and this policy the officials claim as based on the principle of the survival of the fittest. In real truth, however, it is the reverse; it is not the fit but the unfit that can live and prosper in Káthiáwár; it is the selfish and the corrupt that profit by this policy. [The Samsher Báhádur (111) of the 17th July says that Colonel Barton has, from the time of his appointment as Political Agent in Káthiáwár, done his best to protect the rights of Native potentates, and hence many of the princes of Káthiáwár love him. Notwithstanding this policy his conduct in the matter of the appointment of a Diwán to the Porbandar State was not free from comments. He is on very good terms with the authorities of the Bhávnagar State, and perhaps for this the latter are trying to have his stay in the province prolonged. Mr. Maganlál, the present Kárbhári of Jámnagar, is much favoured by Colonel Barton and has risen to his present high post through the kindness of the Political Agent. His great error in the matter of the Maiya massacre and his defence of the Junágad State will perhaps never be forgotten. The Hitechchhu (77) of Ahmedabad of the 2nd August disapproves of the attempt of the Kárbháris of Junágad, Bhávnagar and Navánagar to raise a fund with a view to commemorate Colonel Barton's connection with Káthiáwár, and remarks that owing to the Maiya massacre, the outcry raised by the people of Dhoráji, his conduct in connection with the appointment of a Diwán to the State of Porbandar and other vexatious acts done by him, the people will always look upon him with disgust and contempt. It is advisable, therefore, that these States should not move in the matter in vain. The Akhbáre Sodágar (82) of the 31st July says that but for the independence granted by Colonel Barton to the Káthiáwár Chiefs and the bad use made by them of the privilege which served to bring his name into ill odour, the Colonel's administration would have proved very beneficial to the States under his charge.]

Junágad and Porbandar affairs.

A Káthiáwár correspondent of the Gujaráti (95) of the 29th July says:—The administration of Junágad appears again to be involved in some embroglio. Messrs. Mansukhrám and Purshottamrái have returned from a visit to Poona. Diwán Sále Hindi is reported to have sent in his resignation. It is also rumoured that the Political Agent has recommended the Darbár to remove from his office Sulemán, who headed the band of the Junágad police during their attack on the Maiyás, and also to dismiss from its service all Mekránis and other hot-blooded servants. The Darbár suggested the names of Mr. Chunilál Sárábhái, Manager of Vánkáner, and Mr. Ratilál, Kárbhári of Chuda, for appointment on the commission to enquire into the grievances of the Maiyás, and the Political Agent supporting the suggestion, Government are said to have sanctioned the appointment of those two members without paying any consideration to the protest raised by the Maiyás against the nomination. The Rána of Porbandar does not appear to go with the present age of civilization. The mismanagement in the revenue department of this State will scarcely find a parallel in any other State. The Rána possesses an immense amount of money, but it is wrong to consider that the prosperity of his people will be achieved by storing the money in his treasury. The real wealth of a State lies in the protection of the life, property and independence of the subjects. It is the principal duty of a State to dispense impartial justice to its subjects. But it is not so in Porbandar. One Mr. Cassum, a respectable and well-to-do merchant of Porbandar, has been put into prison on an alleged charge of attempting the murder of the Rána. For various reasons Mr. Cassum is not in the favour of the Darbár, and this is said to account for his present treatment. As the report goes, there is said to be no evidence of the crime fathered upon Mr. Cassum, and even if there be any, neither the Rána nor any of his courts are competent to try the case in which the Rána is the complainant. It is therefore necessary that the Political Agent should institute immediate enquiries into the matter. The writer also quotes another instance in which injustice was done to a relation of a rich merchant on account of the latter being at enmity with the Darbár officials. It so happened that the wife of this rich merchant went to a relation of hers, and while amusing herself with some game in company with her relation and his wife the police arrested the latter on a charge of gambling. They were detained at the police station for a night and released on bail the next morning through the intervention of several influential persons. It is thus clear that there is great insecurity of life and property in the State of Porbandar. Why does not the Bombay Government pay any attention to such maladministration? The Political Agent and his Assistant may have reported against the administration to Government, but since the matter does not appear to have received due consideration, it is necessary to suggest that the question of reforming the administration of civil and criminal justice in Porbandar should receive special attention.

Cambay affairs.

The Gujaráti (95) of the 29th July says:—It is in vain to hope for any reform in the administration of Cambay. Since the departure of Mr. Shámráo, Cambay has been reduced to a miserable condition. One Mr. Raghunáthráo Dámodar has become the Chief Justice; he is ignorant of the most ordinary procedure followed in a court of justice. Diwán Nabhikhán is not qualified for the post he holds and there is no reason to expect that he will achieve any success in the administration of his charge. The old intriguers who secured the overthrow of Mr. Shámráo are planning schemes anew to make matters worse. The majority of the officers at present employed by the State are incompetent for the performance of their duties and have secured their positions more through interest than by their own qualifications.

Cambay affairs.

The Deshi Mitrá (91) of the 2nd August refers to the arrest of several persons by the Cambay authorities, and says that for some reason or other the Nawáb and his Diwán are not now on good terms with each other. The Diwán has gone to Bombay and disorder prevails in the State. If the British Government do not appoint their officers to the different posts in the State and keep an eye over it, the State will suffer. How have the people of Cambay profited by doing away with the old servants of the State?

Berár Affairs.

Suggests that a Native gentleman from each district of Berár should be admitted into the conference which will be held by the Resident at Hyderabad in connection with the scheme of local self-government.

Referring to the report that the Resident of Hyderabad will hold a conference with the Commissioner and the Judicial Commissioner of Berár for the purpose of eliciting official opinion on the petitions of the people of Akola and Amráoti praying for the concession of local self-government, the Varhád Samáchár (68) of the 23rd July observes that in addition to the Commissioners a non-official Native gentleman from each district of Berár should also be invited to represent the opinion of the people on the subject. The disposal of the question after consulting public opinion is sure to prove satisfactory.

Recommends that pleaders should be admitted in revenue cases.

The Varhád Samáchár (68) of the 23rd July asks why parties to revenue suits in Berár should not enjoy the right of representation by pleaders, and quotes the remarks in favour of the concession made by Mr. Howell in his revenue report for 1881-82. It is a year, observes the Samáchár, since the Commissioner pleaded for the concession, but nothing has yet been done in the affair. Several parties to revenue suits were ruined because their cases were not properly represented. In the absence of pleaders the Umedwárs or petition-writers naturally step in and spoil the business of their clients.

Makes certain suggestions regarding the Hindu and other holidays prescribed to be observed in Berár.

With reference to the circular issued by the Resident of Hyderabad prescribing the Hindu and other holidays on which the public offices in Berár will be closed, the Varhád Samáchár (68) of the 23rd July observes that up to 1881 the civil courts of this province were closed for two months on account of the summer vacation, but in that year the Resident curtailed the period by one month, and the same order is upheld in the present circular. In the Bombay Presidency the rigour of the summer is not so great as it is in Berár, and yet six weeks' vacation is granted to the courts in the former while a month only is allowed to those in the latter. The Samáchár points out that A'shádhi and Kártiki Ekádashis have been omitted from the Hindu holidays, and that no provision has been made for the grant of holidays on the days of fairs in particular localities, and expresses a hope that the requisite changes will be made in the order.

Notes.—A. The notices from the different Newspapers have been collected in the Report under different heads, which are printed in italics.

B. The names of Newspapers are printed in the body of the Report in italics, and the number of the Newspaper in the above list is printed in brackets after the name.

C. The proprietors of the Newspapers marked * have not given information as to the number of copies issued. In these cases an estimate has been made by the Reporter.

D. The system of spelling vernacular words followed by the Reporter is the same as that adopted in the Official Spelling List of the Bombay Presidency. One peculiar feature of this system is that when the long a (आ or á) is the last letter of a word, the accent is left out, and the short a (अ = u in gun) is, to prevent confusion, never placed at the end of a word. This rule has been strictly followed, except that when the short a appears to be absolutely necessary to complete the pronunciation of a word, as in Arunodaya or the well known Mitra, it is printed with a mark over it to indicate that it is short, thus—ă.

Politics and the Public Administration.

Points out the improbability of Russia invading India within the next two years.

With reference to the statement made by the Cabul correspondent of the Civil and Military Gazette regarding the intention of Russia to attack India within the next two years, the Jáme Jamshed (100) of the 6th August observes that this statement need not create any alarm. The route to India viâ Afghanistan is very difficult, and the people of India are so very loyal to the British Government that they will fight till they lose the last drop of their blood in defence of the British rule. These facts are well known to everybody; but nevertheless the British Government ought not to be indifferent to the Russian designs on India. No faith ought to be put in the declaration of Russia that her progress in Central Asia has been effected in the interests of commerce alone, for it is a mere blind and her real object is to open a road to India through Afghanistan. Russia has been trying hard for several years past to achieve this object and has now partially succeeded. She has conquered the Turcomans and gained the Shah of Persia over to her side, and it seems probable that she is casting a wistful look on India. Supposing that Russia wishes to approach India for purposes of commerce, there is great probability of her acting hereafter the rôle played by the late East India Company. Again, when Russian commerce comes in through Afghanistan, there is a probability of the British Government now and then falling out with the Amir, and on such occasions Russia is not likely to remain neutral. It is desirable, therefore, that the British Government should either induce or compel the Amir to make up the quarrel existing between him and the Shinwáris, and to open the Khyber Pass for the peaceful passage of traffic. If this is not done, there is great fear of Russia pouncing upon Afghanistan under the pretext that the internal dissensions in that country disturb her commerce. It will be better if the British Government open the Central Asian market to British goods, since Russian articles are inferior to British products and are not liked by the people of Central Asia. If once the Central Asian nations come in contact with the British, they will certainly like them better than the Russians. [The Akhbáre Sodágar (82) of the 8th August condemns the statement of the correspondent of the Civil and Military Gazette as quite worthless, and points out the different reasons which make it impossible that Russia should make an invasion on India from the north-west. The Suryodayá (65) of the 6th August, in writing upon the same subject, requests the British Government to keep a sharp watch on Russian movements in Central Asia and on the north-western boundary of India.]

Makes remarks upon the recent debate in Parliament on the public expenditure of India.

The Bombay Chronicle (75) of the 5th August observes that the recent debate in the House of Commons on the public expenditure of India must have convinced thoughtful observers more than ever that the Ministry, whether Conservative or Liberal, so long as they have to consider and dispose of great Indian questions without reference to the exigencies of their party, are found to act upon the broad principles of British justice and British statesmanship, and to try to consult Indian interests to a fair extent. Since the coming of the Gladstone Ministry into power, the high-sounding professions of the Liberal party about doing justice and fair play have been but partially redeemed,—that is, only so far as the exigencies of the party have allowed. At times the disposal of important questions affecting the rights and interests of the people of India have been as roughly overridden by the Ministry as had been done by their predecessors, and this in spite of the remonstrances of the heads of the departments of Government in this country and the voice of the people generally. The abolition of the Indian import duties and the imposition of a portion of the cost of the Egyptian Campaign on this country are instances in point. The impropriety of the proceedings of the Ministry in the latter case was shown by a demonstration in the House of Commons during the recent debate, so that all lovers of justice and reasonable men of all parties seemed inclined to vote against the proposal. But justice to the dumb and unrepresented people of India was denied by a clever ruse of the venerable Prime Minister.

When he saw that his arrangements about the war expenditure were about to be set aside, he threatened to make this a party question and to make the fate of the Cabinet depend upon the decision of the House in this matter. This had of course the desired effect. Most of the members loathed the prospect of a fresh election so soon. Many began to waver in their idea of doing justice to India. To help these waverers out of their predicament, the venerable Premier coolly informed them that India would have the surplus of a million sterling this year. This incident should teach Natives that they will be making a mistake in supposing that they will fare better at the hands of one particular English political party than another. The best course for them is to remain as a rule perfectly indifferent to the vicissitudes in the fortunes of these parties and to think equally well of them all. Another important result of the debate is the unqualified and unequivocal admission by the leading men of all parties that the public expenditure of this country was steadily increasing, that the increase had already reached a point that ought not to be viewed with equanimity by those who knew the condition of the country and the capacity of the people to bear the burden of taxation, and that the said increase required to be checked by a reduction in expenditure. The more speedily this is accomplished the better will it be for the peace of Government and the happiness of the subjects. Another and still more important result of the debate is the virtual withdrawal of the restriction placed some years ago by Parliament on the carrying out of reproductive public works. These works have been of inestimable benefit to the country; they have served to develop its resources, to extend internal communication, to augment commerce, to help the public finances, to check the calamities of famine, and to improve the general civilization of the people; and all this has been accomplished without the least burden on the State, since every rupee laid out has been productive of a money return in the shape of good interest. [The Kaiser-i-Hind (103) of the same date expresses some of the above sentiments, and points out that the army, the home charges and the civil service are the items of expenditure to which the scissors of economy can and should be applied.]

The Mahrátta (2) of the 5th August says:—The House of Commons has agreed to Mr. Stanhope's motion that "in the opinion of the House it is necessary that early steps be taken to reduce the expenditure of India." This is very generous of the House indeed! How often have such resolutions been passed by that august assembly and what result have they produced! To us in India such resolutions mean nothing if they are not rigidly acted upon. A conquered nation, however, cannot expect even this much from its conquerors, and when that venerable House condescends to while away a few hours in discussing questions of vital importance to the subject nation, the latter must, as in duty bound, thank the former. [The Samsher Báhádur (112) of the 3rd August points out the necessity of reducing the public expenditure of India, and expresses a hope that Lord Ripon will not fail to give due attention to the resolution adopted by the House of Commons on the subject. The present is the time for the people of India to pray once more for a reduction in the expenditure of the country.]

Necessity of reducing the public expenditure of India.

The Indian Spectator (1) of the 5th August says:—The authorities are ill advised in allowing Mahárája Dhulip Singh to return to India. It is to be hoped he will on no account go to the Panjáb. Ranjit Singh's anglicized heir is himself as harmless as the Grand Llama, but there are A'ryans who will not fail to make capital out of his presence in the country of the five rivers.

Disapproves of Mahárája Dhulip Singh being allowed to visit India.

The Indu Prakásh (9) of the 6th August comments in detail on the essay recently read before the East India Association in London by Sir William Wedderburn on the subject of the establishment of agricultural banks in the Deccan. Referring to the unsatisfactory nature of the relations at present existing between the ryots and their sávkárs

Comments on Sir William Wedderburn's views regarding the establishment of agricultural banks in the Deccan.

Sir William observes that now that communication between Europe and India has become speedy and easy it is high time that European capital that is now lying idle should be employed in the establishment of agricultural banks in the Deccan. The Indu Prakásh is, however, of opinion that it is a mistake to suppose that any permanent relief will be afforded by such a measure. It is true that for some time the agricultural classes will enjoy the convenience of low rates of interest, but in the end they will suffer much. As European bankers cannot be expected to be acquainted with the manners and customs of Natives, they will have to seek the assistance of Native experts, the cost of which they must make up by raising the original rates of interest. Much good is, however, likely to result if European capitalists, prepared to be content with an interest of 3 or 4 per cent., carry on a philanthropic concern with the aid of competent and benevolent Natives. But the question is, how is such philanthropy to take root in the English heart and grow permanent? In the second portion of his essay Sir William gives illustrations of the working of similar measures in the different countries of Europe. But the fact cannot be ignored that the different countries cited by him are self-governing and therefore materially differ from India. It is, however, to be hoped that with the gradual advance of education among the agricultural classes everything will be set right. The third part of the essay is devoted to a narration of the experiments already tried in this Presidency with the view of affording relief to the agricultural classes. A committee has been recently formed at Poona with the view of making a practical experiment on a small scale in the matter of granting loans to cultivators from private capital, and that committee is reported to have sought the aid of Government for a solution of the difficulty that has sprung up in connection with the grant of loans on the security of lands the assessment on which is likely to be enhanced on the introduction of a revision survey. The Indu Prakásh is of opinion that the period of settlement should be raised from 30 to 60 years. Such a change will inspire confidence in the agriculturist that the assessment on his land will not be raised at least for one generation, and will stimulate him to improve his soil. The committee above referred to will also find it convenient to recover its advances without exercising undue pressure on their debtors. It cannot be denied, however, that a compliance with this suggestion means the sacrifice of a portion of their revenue by Government, but such sacrifice is necessary if any relief to the cultivating classes is seriously contemplated. Sir William Wedderburn deserves the thanks of the public for his disinterested efforts, but it is advisable that he should secure the co-operation of English capitalists as philanthropists and not as traders, because all commercial transactions intended as a drain on the wealth of this country threaten to be productive of more evil than good. It is therefore proper that all efforts should be directed towards inducing Natives to establish the necessary banks with the assistance of Government.

A request to the people of Bombay to take steps to perpetuate the memory of Sir E. Baring.

The Indian Spectator (1) of the 5th August says:—The Bombay Branch of the East India Association is about to present an address to Sir E. Baring. We hope the opportunity will not be lost to Bombay of signalizing at the same time its sense of the invaluable service rendered by Sir Evelyn, not only as a successful Minister of Finance but as a capable and thoroughly honourable administrator. The example set by Bombay may be followed by the other presidencies and provinces. It was suggested that Bombay might collect about Rs. 20,000 and make over the sum, on account of the Baring memorial, to the trustees of the Jamsetji Jijibhái Industrial School Fund. This idea has our cordial approval.

Condemns the practice of allowing farms and contracts to be sublet.

The Kaiser-i-Hind (103) of the 5th August observes that farmers and contractors plunder the Government treasury and impoverish the country. The Public Works Department is notorious for affording opportunities for such illicit gains. The scheming contractor gets his tender accepted and sublets the contract. The process of subletting passes several hands, and each sub-contractor receives his own profit. The subletting process, in which several persons receive profits without actually doing any portion of the work, suggests the conclusion that the work is either not properly executed or that it has cost the State more money than was actually necessary. If this defective system of giving contracts is abolished the State will be considerably benefited in a pecuniary point of view.

Censures the Bombay Government for the paltry contribution paid by it to the International Exhibition.

The Gujarâti (96) of the 5th August thoroughly approves of the censure passed by Mr. Thomas Lidbetter on the Bombay Government subscribing the paltry sum of Rs. 1,000 to the International Exhibition of Calcutta. Considering the general utility of the exhibition to India it is disgraceful to the Government to pay such a small sum. "As the king so the subjects" says the proverb, and it is very likely that the exhibition will meet with similar support from the people.

Comments on the creation of the office of Director of Agriculture for the Bombay Presidency.

The Native Opinion (10) of the 5th August says:—Mr. E. C. Ozanne, C.S., has been appointed Director of Agriculture for the Bombay Presidency. These are not the days, we think, for creating fat berths, but if our demi-gods are in favour of such a policy there is no withstanding their will. Could not the Revenue Commissionership for the Central Division have been, without reducing the efficiency of the department, safely converted into the new berth? That berth was a temporary arrangement to meet a famine emergency which has passed away. Will our rulers have some mercy upon the poor tax-payer? The creation of an Agricultural Department may be a necessity, but it was the duty of those who knew the history of the third Revenue Commissionership to suggest the merging of it into the new office. But we are not fortunate in having rulers like Lord Ripon everywhere, and hence the wayward manner in which our money is expended. Will His Excellency Sir James Fergusson look to this? [The Indian Spectator (1) of the same date says:—We heartily welcome Mr. Ozanne as Director of Agriculture. He is a most promising civilian, and with his new experience we look up to him to infuse fresh life into agricultural studies in the Presidency. The Kesari (35) of the 7th August says that it is not good to increase the burden of taxation on the poor by the creation of unnecessary posts, and expresses a hope that the attention of Sir James Fergusson will be directed to this matter.]

A suggestion for the amalgamation of the office of the Sindhi Translator to Government with that of the Educational Translator, Sind.

A correspondent of the Indian Spectator (1) of the 5th August writes:—One of the most undeniable sinecures in Sind is the office of Sindhi Translator to Government. This office has been invariably given to a European, while in the Presidency proper the vernacular translators to Government are mostly Natives. At first the Judge of the Small Cause Court, Karáchi, was paid Rs. 250 a month for performing the duty of signing the translations made by the Assistant Translator. When Mr. Ollivant became Assistant Commissioner the office changed hands, and since that time its emoluments have formed part of the regular salary of the Assistant Commissioner. The duties of the office cannot be satisfactorily performed without a thorough knowledge and command of the vernacular. Can Mr. Pollen or his equally able successor, Mr. Edgerley, declare that he has these requisites? Can he say that he has time enough at his disposal to devote to translations? Is it not a notorious fact that all translations are made by the First Assistant, who is a Native, and that they could not be made by the translator himself, even if he had time for the purpose, without effective Native assistance? And yet the fun of it is that while the nominal translator gets Rs. 250 for signing the translations, the de facto translator, his assistant, gets only Rs. 150 for preparing them! The work has now enormously increased and will continue to increase, as the Government of India have very wisely insisted on the translation of all Bills and Statements of Objects and Reasons. It will shortly be imperatively necessary to add to the establishment. Ought not Government then to ask why the emoluments now enjoyed by the Sindhi Translator should not be utilised to provide a new assistant and to reconstitute the whole office? Even supposing that no further call is made upon the public purse, is not Government bound to inquire why this sinecure should be maintained any longer? A clear saving of Rs. 2,400 a year could be made by nominating to this post, say on Rs. 200 a month, the present assistant who is every way qualified for it. Or if some doubt be felt on this point, why should not the office of Sindhi Translator to Government be consolidated with that of the Educational Translator, who is now paid Rs. 210 a month and whose salary might be increased to Rs. 300 for the extra work he will have to do? It is to be hoped that the Commissioner in Sind will see the necessity of introducing this much-needed reform in the interests both of economy and efficiency.

Complains of the oppressive nature of the forest policy of Government.

The Maháráshtrá Mitrá (40) of the 9th August says:—The officers of the Forest Department have been wandering in the district (Sátára) and telling the cultivators that if they willingly give up such of their lands as are required for forest purposes they will receive compensation from Government, but that if they decline to come to terms their lands will be forcibly taken without any compensation being paid for them. This has served to create a feeling of dissatisfaction among the people. Poor people have been crying over their future lot. Is it not very surprising that Government should deprive poor cultivators of lands on the improvement of which hundreds of rupees have been spent and immense labour has been bestowed? A notification of 2nd November 1882 declared that Government were willing to grant for purposes of cultivation lands on the slopes of mountains which had before been reserved for forest purposes. How can this notification be reconciled with the conduct of the forest officers above referred to? The Forest Department has proved to be a source of great annoyance to the people, and it is meet that Government should secure reliable information on the subject by sending its confidential emissaries to the Jávli Táluka.

Hardships caused by the operation of the A'bkári Act.

The Indian Spectator (1) of the 5th August, in writing on the case of the administrators of the late Mr. Kharsedji Ashburner v. the Secretary of State for India, remarks:—Looking to the A'bkári Act itself, its progress and history, and the subsequent occurrences in connection with it, we are more than ever convinced that it has been a most unjust and mischievous measure. It is quite true that it affects only a few landholders; but then the Legislature ought to have borne in mind that the rights acquired by every single subject must always be considered as sacred. Because the Government is strong and all-powerful, that is no reason why these rights should be trampled upon. These rights were acquired for valuable services rendered, or for valuable concessions made to Government by the forefathers of those men whose rights are at the present moment ignored and defeated. This mischievous Act tramples upon rights solemnly given to subjects, it provides clauses for burking inquiry, it makes the High Court of Judicature incompetent to inquire into real wrongs suffered by the subjects, it gives compensation to some and arbitrarily refuses it to others without any inquiry. We say, therefore, that both on moral and political grounds it is the bounden duty of Government to look into this matter and remove the hardships inflicted by hasty and unjust legislation.

Comments on the increase of liquor-shops in the Presidency.

The Dnyán Prakásh (8) of the 6th August quotes in extenso the petition presented by the people of Ahmedabad through their leading representatives to the Acting Collector of the district against the increase in the number of liquor-shops in the city, and remarks:—We are enabled to state that Mr. Reid has closed two of the shops and ordered the removal of two more from their present locality. On being requested to reduce the number of shops still further, Mr. Reid has, we learn, advised the petitioners to represent the matter to Government. We hope the good example set by Ahmedabad will be followed by other towns throughout the Presidency. The evil is increasing daily, and unless a regular crusade is organized against its further development, it will assume a very serious form. As the municipal law is undergoing an amendment it will be better if the law provides some remedy against the evil by giving some power to municipal boards for regulating the number of liquor-shops within their jurisdiction. We hope the Honourable Member in charge of the Bill will seriously consider the suggestion we have ventured to make. Perhaps in no other department is the action of the Christian British Government of India more unchristian-like than in this A'bkári Department. The revenue-seeking instincts of the A'bkári Department have been allowed to override all other considerations of policy and expediency, and accordingly the oft-repeated professions of Government have been more honoured in their breach than in their observance.

Complains that bad country liquor is sold at Surat.

A correspondent of the Bombay Samáchár (86) of the 8th August observes that the large quantity of country liquor brought for sale from Poona by Mr. Dádábhái Hormasji Dubásh, the liquor contractor of Surat, though nearly tasteless, produces a burning sensation in the throat and the stomach. This bad stuff is to be sold until a new distillery is erected and liquor is distilled at Surat. The authorities concerned are requested to see that the people of this town get good liquor.

Says that the writings of some of the European writers are likely to produce evil impressions on the minds of Natives.

The issues of the Jagadádarsh (31) for the 29th July and 5th August contain two articles commenting on the remarks contained in a communication published in the Civil and Military Gazette, damnatory of the character of Hindus. After giving a translation of the remarks above referred to, the writer goes on to say:—We first ask what stronger proof than the writings of an author like Lord Macaulay is necessary to show that Lord Clive was guilty of dishonesty, treachery and forgery? Are there few writings of Europeans that can bear testimony to the fact that Warren Hastings enriched himself by bribes in the shape of presents, and that being overpowered by passion eloped with the wife of another person? Can any European have the hardihood to say that the great philosopher Lord Bacon was not corrupt? Had the Duke of Malborough no failings? Hundreds of fresh instances can be quoted to illustrate the fact that Europeans are not free from vices. The Mysteries of the Court of London give ample proof of the so-called morality of the English nation! Of course it cannot be maintained that there are no bad characters among Hindus, but to generalize from individual instances and to calumniate a whole nation is not only foolish but under the present circumstances dangerous. As regards the assertion that all the learning of Natives lies in deceiving others, it is not borne out by the straightforwardness and integrity displayed by them in the several walks of life. On the contrary it is known everywhere that the English are a hundred times more skilful than Natives in the art of deception. As regards the introduction of railways and the establishment of schools, it cannot be urged that these reforms were undertaken purely in the interests of Natives. These reforms were intended to secure the permanence of the British rule in India and to enable the rulers to have all sorts of luxuries. The English have carried away enormous wealth from India to England and the same course is being followed even now. England that was very poor has become the abode of the goddess of wealth, and is this not a sufficient recompense for the trouble the people of that country have taken in introducing various reforms into this country? Why then should they be boasting about the benefits conferred by them? It appears from the general tenor of the British administration in India that it is not the object of the British Government to treat India with unfairness, and however unjust it may be in certain classes of Europeans to make much of the advantages that have accrued to India under the auspices of the British rule, Natives ought to be grateful for all they have received and ought to treat Europeans with affection. The loyalty of Natives towards the British Government has now been proved beyond doubt, and those that advocate the maintenance of the British Empire by the strength of the sword ought to remember that the edge of that instrument will remain keen only so long as the Government has the affections of the people on its side, but that no sooner are they estranged than the edge will become quite blunt. On the whole it is certain that Government intend to dispense impartial justice to Natives and that the latter are full of loyalty. It is, however, very objectionable that some Europeans should try to sow the seeds of disaffection by making unwarranted remarks. These Europeans may some day prove a source of danger to the British Government, and it is advisable that the latter should take timely notice of this caveat. The former should also try to consider the evil impressions that their remarks are likely to produce on the minds of twenty-five krors of the Indian people and thousands of Native princes.

Asks Government to prevent Christian writers from ridiculing the Hindu religion.

The Poona Vaibhav (49) of the 5th August refers to the remarks contained in the Dnyánodayá of the 2nd idem on the Hindu superstitions in connection with the month of Shárwan, and censures the writer for interfering with the religious feelings of the people. Such conduct on the part of Christian missionaries, instead of producing any good results, will lead to evil consequences. History shows how delicate are the feelings of all people with regard to their religions. Thousands of people have sacrificed their lives in such affairs and there are instances of countries devastated on the same account. The law directs that no writings meant to ridicule any particular religion shall be published, and who is responsible for the infringement of the law committed by the editor of the Dnyánodayá? Have Christians the privilege of ridiculing other religions with impunity? Government must attend to this matter.

Complaint against the alleged exercise of undue oppression by the police on the pilgrims at Pandharpur, and suggestions for the prevention of cholera in the future.

The Srishtidarpan (63) of the 6th August says:—What will be the future state of India? We cannot think over the question without tears in our eyes. Hitherto we supposed that our rulers were gifted with honesty and that they sympathized with their poor subjects. Their conduct towards us has, however, shown but too clearly that they have not even a particle of regard for us. All their professions are as delusive as theatrical acting and as false as the lamentations of mercenary weepers. Her Gracious Majesty the Queen assured us in 1857 that the British rulers would not interfere with our religious affairs, but our failing strength has made them forget the assurance. But in this respect European officers do not deserve all the blame. There are among us a few sycophants who are ever ready to say "aye" to the commands of their superiors without taking thought of the justice or otherwise of the same. The above thoughts owe their rise to the oppression execised by the police on the pilgrims at Pandharpur on the occasion of the recent fair. It was fortunate that Government allowed such oppression to be exercised on poor Hindus. Had Mahomedans anything to do with the affair they could not have been put down without the assistance of European troops. Poor Hindus! About a hundred policemen were enough to manage a lákh and a half of pilgrims. How painful is the thought that this land, which produced heroes whose valour has been sung in history, should have given birth to such a feeble race! To what state shall we be reduced? The English have been trumpeting themselves as just, but the mask is being taken off their so-called justice. It is said that the authorities have determined upon removing the idol of the god Vithoba from the present site to an adjoining plain in order that pilgrims may not suffer by insufficient ventilation. If there be any truth in this report it is the duty of every Hindu to leave no effort untried to prevent the measure from being carried out. If possible some windows may be cut in the walls of the present temple to admit light and air. [The Native Opinion (10) of the 5th August publishes a letter from a correspondent making a similar complaint, and suggests that with the view of preventing the appearance of cholera in the future Government should extend the municipal limits of the town of Pandharpur for two miles all round. All pilgrims should reside within this area and outside the town, and should not visit the town except for the purposes of worship and prayer. It will of course be necessary to provide quarters to the people and to furnish them with the conveniences of water-supply and latrines, and the municipality can certainly afford to make the necessary provision from the proceeds of the pilgrim tax.]

Advises Government not to interfere with the religious observances of the people.

The Shiváji (61) of the 3rd August observes that hitherto Government were determined upon following the policy of non-interference with the religious observances of the people of India; but of late some officials, elated with pride, have begun to treat the Hindus with contempt and to indulge in the perpetration of various misdeeds. Had there been no discreet officers at the head of the Government the British rule would ere long have suffered by the axe of a general rebellion. The foolish officials who interfere with the religious observances of the people perhaps labour under the impression that they can deceive the people by clothing their acts with the garb of sanitary measures, but they are mistaken. The religious devotion of the people is of such magnitude that they subordinate even the considerations of life and death to the worship of their gods, and they would not scruple to punish persons who interfere with the performance of their religious duties. The officials ought, therefore, to consider well before they create discontent by interfering with the religious beliefs of the people. The officials perhaps count upon the strength of their disciplined armies and depend on their physical strength. But these will not avail before the exasperated people. Government ought not to be elated by the idea that their doings have received the approval of the educated classes. The masses will not be ruled by these classes when their religious prejudices are offended. The writer then quotes instances in which the Collector of Poona prevented the annual processions from Alandi and Dehu from halting at Poona, and the authorities at Pandharpur locked the doors of the temple on the occasion of the recent fair, and says:—Even admitting that a fair encourages the epidemic of cholera, it has been proved on several occasions that good sanitary arrangements effectively prevent the outbreak. This year the epidemic appeared among the permanent residents and not among the pilgrims assembled at Pandharpur, and this proves the fact that the absence of good sanitary arrangements brings on the epidemic. There was no need of locking up the temple of Vithoba and forcibly driving away the pilgrims, and these acts on the part of the authorities were dictated more by the feeling of contempt they entertain for the Hindus than by a desire for the good of the people. This feeling of contempt is likely to weaken the foundations of the British rule, and hence it is to be hoped that similar conduct on the part of the authorities will not be repeated.

Prevalence of small-pox at Kaládgi.

The Hitechchhu (29) of the 5th August complains of the prevalence of small-pox in the town of Kaládgi. The vaccinator of the circle does not appear to have paid a visit to this place for a long time. It is very strange that such negligence should be allowed in the head-quarter station of a district. The Civil Surgeon of the place does not pay any attention to this matter on the supposition that the vaccinator does his work regularly. It is to be hoped that the Collector of the district will direct his attention to this matter.

Disapproves of the order issued by the Commissioner, S. D., compelling cultivators to join in the work of destroying locusts.

The Suryodayá (65) of the 6th August disapproves of the order issued by the Commissioner, S. D., ruling that cultivators neglecting to assist in the work of destroying locusts that have appeared in the Konkans will not be allowed remissions of the land-tax on account of the crops destroyed by these insects. If the cultivators are taken away from their work in the fields in these days when agricultural operations are going on, cultivation will be neglected, inflicting thereby heavy losses on the agriculturists. There is no certainty that the evil will be appreciably checked by the means suggested by Mr. Crawford.

Asks Government to try the experiment of destroying locusts by means of firearms.

The Mahárashtrá Mitrá (40) of the 9th August gives the proceedings of a meeting held at Wái for the purpose of taking measures for the destruction of locusts, and recommends Government to try the experiment of destroying locusts by means of guns and cannons fired with the aid of powder prepared from quicksilver.

Approves of the proposal of the Finance Minister to amalgamate the Postal and the Telegraph Departments.

The Bombay Samáchár (86) of the 10th August heartily approves of the proposal made by Major Baring to amalgamate the Postal and the Electric Telegraph Departments, and observes that the proposed arrangement will reduce the expenditure of the latter department and benefit the State to that extent. [The Jáme Jamshed (100) of the same date expresses similar sentiments.]

The Native Opinion (10) of the 5th August says:—Mr. Prescott, Post Master of Ratnágiri, has been acquitted of the charge of rape preferred against him. We have nothing to say against the judgment of the Court. We would only refer to the manner in which the case was gone into. According to the Jagan Mitrá, the case, so far as the prosecution went, was enquired into in the Court premises, while the evidence on behalf of the defendant was heard at the Magistrate's bungalow. Why this irregularity, we ask? The Hewett case has shaken the confidence of the people in our magisterial courts, and we think the Magistrate of Ratnágiri, before whom the case was tried, should not have given the people cause for complaint. By the way, we wish to know what steps the Postal Department is going to take in the case of Mr. Prescott, who is said to have proved himself a terror to the Native community of Ratnágiri. If nothing more, Mr. Prescott at least deserves to be transferred from Ratnágiri on a reduced salary. [The Kesari (35) of the 7th August expresses similar sentiments.]

Complains of the way in which the charge of rape preferred against Mr. Prescott, Post Master of Ratnágiri, was enquired into by the local Magistrate.

A correspondent of the Bakul (16) of the 5th August states that since the transformation of the sub-post office at Kelshi into a branch office, the people are put to great inconvenience as regards the savings' bank, stock notes, and money orders. Utambar, A'ndgaon and several other villages are in the charge of this office, and hence the post master does not find sufficient time to arrange for the delivery of letters after finishing the office work. The office earns a good income and a peon ought to be appointed to it.

Recommends an increase of establishment in the post office at Kelshi.

The Násik Vritt (43) of the 4th August complains that great inconvenience will be caused to the public by the newly started telephone office being stationed at the general post office outside the town, and requests the authorities concerned to remove the former to the city post office.

A prayer for the removal of the newly started telephone office at Násik to the city post office.

The Bombay Samáchár (86) of the 8th August observes that of late the police of Bombay have evinced unusual activity in apprehending and placing before the Magistrates persons who are alleged to have driven their carriages furiously and recklessly. The Magistrates have on the evidence given by the police fined several of the drivers. There appears to be no rule which can satisfactorily decide what is furious and reckless driving, and the Commissioner of Police, the Magistrates and Government ought to consider the matter and have a clear rule on the subject. This is particularly needed as several respectable Natives have been put to great annoyance by their being accused of furious driving, while no European has been similarly charged.

Says that there ought to be some authoritative rule for deciding what is furious and reckless driving.

A correspondent of the Bombay Samáchár (86) of the 6th August complains that the crime of gambling has revived in the town of Balsár. Several Pársi boys are to be seen gambling with money in Taláwdi Mohola and many Chhippa boys do the same in Chhipwád. The police is requested to put down the evil.

Complains of the revival of gambling at Balsár.

The Jagan Mitrá (32) of the 6th August complains of the want of uniformity in the crop and season reports submitted by the Mamlatdárs and Mahálkaris in the Ratnágiri District, and requests the attention of the district authorities to the matter. Some Mamlatdárs do not give the past rainfall, while others give it. Some give the rates of corn according to the measures prevalent in their charges without giving the calculations for a recognized ser, and it is therefore impossible to compare the rates given by them with those in other tálukas. In the opinion of the Jagan Mitrá every Mámlatdár should be directed to give the rates of corn according to the particular measure prevalent in his táluka as also the corresponding calculations in sers.

Complains of the want of uniformity in the crop and season reports submitted by officers of the Ratnágiri District.

A correspondent of the Bakul (16) of the 5th August states that the ferry at Kolamb near Málvan has been from of old a charitable institution and Government once refused to give a contract for this ferry. This ferry carries passengers free of charge to A'dári. Notwithstanding these facts the contract for the ferry has been recently given away. The attention of the Collector of Ratnágiri is requested to the subject.

Says that the contract for the ferry at Kolamb near Málvan ought not to have been given away.

The Gujarát Mitra (76) of the 5th August invites the attention of Government to the necessity of putting a stop to the slaughter of cows by butchers. A diminution in the number of these animals has led to a rise in the price of bullocks and thus crippled the agricultural operations of many a cultivator. The supply of milk, curds, butter and ghee has abated, and therefore these articles have risen in price to the great inconvenience of the people. The diminution in the supply has also led to various unwholesome adulterations, which have given rise to several minor diseases. It is reported that Svámi Dayánand Sarasvati pointed out the above and similar disadvantages in a petition addressed to the Government of India, and he received the reply that Government would consider the subject if the petition could be signed by at least five krors of people. If it be so, the demand of Government is not unreasonable; but the question is, who should procure so many signatures? It will be better, however, if the Viceroy enacts a law in this matter. If any restrictions are placed by law on the slaughter of cows, no cry will be raised against them, as they will contribute to the welfare of the people generally.

Requests Government to take measures for the prevention of the slaughter of cows.

The same says that Government have been misled by the false report made by the Surat Municipality in the commendations bestowed by them on undeserving persons in connection with the recent floods. Messrs. Whitworth, Nánábhái, Adarji, Hayne and Anderson were engaged in supplying food to the distressed and in exercising general supervision, and so were some non-official Hindu and Pársi gentlemen. It is, however, very surprising to see the name of Mir Masum Ali and that of another young Mahomedan in the Government resolution. It is not known what services these gentlemen rendered to their constituents on the occasion of the floods.

Does not approve of the commendations bestowed by Government on the two Mahomedan municipal commissioners of Surat in connection with the recent floods.

Local Self-Government.

The Indian Spectator (1) of the 5th August remarks:—Mr. Peile is no doubt an accomplished State official, and the diplomatic experience he acquired during his stay in Káthiáwár seems to have stood him in good stead in the preparation of the Bill, and especially that of the Statement of Objects and Reasons. That introductory paper is an evidence of his astuteness and autocratic instincts. When each paragraph is carefully analysed, it reveals but one principle, which is no other than what has been in vogue for years past, viz. "maximum of control and minimum of local civic liberty." Such being the state of matters, the watchword of the representatives of the people should be, "reasonable control and fair liberty." Let them fight for these privileges. We are to be accorded the image and superscription of local self-government, without that sacred fire which can warm that image and superscription into life. Of what use giving the forms when you check that free spirit by which alone self-government can become a reality? It is indeed disappointing that Government should still persist in meeting by old maxims the new emergencies which the progress of education has brought to the front. The time has come when, within reasonable limits, innovation in the spirit of local administration must be considered as best for the people and best for future security. The protective policy of Government must be modified. If the Bombay Government honestly means that in the new local organizations to be introduced the people in the various parts of the Presidency should acquire, however slowly, the habits and instincts of rude political action, and apply their own free conscience and free understanding to the management of their own affairs, then it must be prepared to remove the objectionable provisions of the two Bills on local self-government. The very first modification it will have to deal with is in reference to the constitution of local boards to be formed in tálukas more or less advanced. Let it be remembered that very much of the activity and public spirit of these boards will depend on the colour and composition of their members. Unless, therefore, the number of elected members in all advanced localities is, by law, raised to three-fourths, and unless the qualifying tests are so modified as to introduce a fair element of educated independent persons,—an element which, as the draft Bill goes, is glaringly wanting,—we do not expect anything like a reform. Whether we look at the constitution of boards, or at the nominations of Collectors as presidents, or at the absolute powers reserved to Government in the chapter devoted to "control," we cannot resist the conclusion that the present attempt at legislation is a dismal farce. And as if this farce were not complete, there is the chapter on "Rules"—a chapter of horrors—which will frighten the boldest spirit among the non-official members of Council. For we are convinced from experience that rules enacted under legislative Acts are like so many imperial ukases of the autocratic Czar, and that they are worse than the legislative provisions themselves. The power of making rules must be very limited and confined to the enactment of such matters only as are absolutely necessary and such as cannot be possibly passed by the Legislative Council. Rules, as far as practicable, must be passed by that Council simultaneously with the Bill. In that procedure alone lies in a great measure the future good working of the scheme. We therefore strongly appeal to the people's representatives in the Council to urge the necessity of the publication of the contemplated rules before the Bill comes on for second reading. [The Hitechchhu (77) of Ahmedabad of the 9th August expresses somewhat similar sentiments. The Lok Mitrá (78) of the 5th August also comments on the Local Self-government Bills in the same spirit, and says that the Bills have been framed in a diplomatic way simply with the view of soothing the susceptibilities of the Government of India but without any change in the original views of this Government. The Deshi Mitrá (91) of the 9th idem asks whether the Government of India will allow itself to be imposed upon in the way in which the Municipal Bill has been framed.]

Criticises the Bombay Local Boards Bill.

The Indu Prakásh (9) of the 6th August says:—In their resolution of the 19th September 1882 the Government of Bombay desired to confine the right of electing and being elected to táluka boards to only two classes: (1) landholders paying an assessment of not less than Rs. 48 per annum, and (2) officiating village or police pátils. The Government of India, however, made a different proposal in their celebrated resolution of the 18th May 1882, which was not only consistent with, but favourable to the desire of making local boards something more than official machines. Instead of confining the election to landholders and village and police pátils, the Government of India proposed to extend it to University graduates, pleaders, jurors, assessors, conciliators, Government pensioners in receipt of a pension of not less than Rs. 20 monthly, &c. Among these one would feel inclined to attach the greatest importance to pleaders, University graduates, and Government pensioners, but it so happens that under Section 10 of the Local Boards Bill these three classes will be practically excluded from the privilege of electing or being elected to táluka boards. Take the case of pleaders. They will come under clause (1), provided they own lands, but that is a very uncertain test in their case. The same observation applies, if we suppose that pleaders will come under the class of persons owning immovable property of not less than Rs. 5,000. They have, however, a greater chance of being included in the class of persons "whose annual net earnings from any occupation are estimated by the Collector to be not less than Rs. 500," but it is desirable, we think, that as in the case of "honorary magistrates residing within the táluka" so in the case of pleaders there ought to be a distinct clause enabling them to elect and be elected. In inserting the clause regarding honorary magistrates, Government have looked only to the capacity and intelligence of those filling those offices. In the same way why should not the intelligence and capacity of pleaders, apart from their professional incomes, entitle them to the privilege of electing and being elected to local boards? Why should any difference be observed between pleaders as a class and honorary magistrates as a class? Just as Fellows of the University can be elected and can elect members of the Municipal Corporation, so should pleaders in the mofussil have that right in the administration of the local funds. Then take the case of University graduates. There are some of these holding the degree of L.M., or L.C.E., or B.A., and following professions independent of Government service. If a táluka board could manage to have at least one or two persons belonging to this class, it would be able to congratulate itself upon possessing men, intelligent and able to understand the duties and recognize the responsibilities of local boards better than persons who do not possess that intelligence and that ability. The pursuit of science or literature, or the private practice of medicine in a táluka town is not calculated to bring a very large income to a person engaged in such pursuits; but an income of less than Rs. 500 a year generally enables one to live well in such places. Why should such persons be excluded from a voice in the administration of local funds? Lastly, take the case of Government pensioners. Section 10 seems to us to be so feebly framed as to exclude a class of persons whose co-operation is most desirable. We admit that a Government pensioner receiving a pension of less than Rs. 500 a year should not be held entitled to the privilege of electing and being elected to a táluka board, but the question is whether even those earning a pension of not less than Rs. 500 a year are given the privilege under Section 10. The only qualifying clause under which they can come is that relating to "persons residing within the táluka whose annual net earnings from any occupation are estimated by the Collector to be not less than five hundred rupees." But can it be said that a Government pensioner, however high be the amount of pension he receives, derives his earnings from an occupation? Retiring from Government service, a pensioner, generally speaking, does not betake himself to any occupation; the pension he receives is not derived from any occupation; and we see that in the Report of the Census operations for the year 1881 Government pensioners are classed among those not following any occupation. Under these circumstances it is difficult to hold that Government pensioners can come in the class of persons earning not less than Rs. 500 a year from any occupation. In their case a distinct qualifying clause is essential, and it is unjust to make the privilege so uncertain as Section 10 makes it in the case of this class. There is a difference, however, between Section 10 and Section 18, which declares what persons shall be entitled to vote at the elections of members qualified under the former section. These voters, says Section 18, shall consist of (1) persons qualified to be elected under Section 10, and (2) "all other persons, if any, to whom the Governor in Council shall by notification in the official Gazette from time to time deem fit to extend the franchise." This second clause supplies partially the defect we have pointed out in Section 10, i.e., it empowers Government to declare such pleaders, graduates, and Government pensioners as cannot be elected members of táluka boards by reason of not possessing the qualifications specified in Section 10 competent to vote at the elections. That, however, is only an empowering clause; Government in making such nominations shall have to be guided by the opinions of Collectors, and it is probable that the powers of patronage and favour which will thus be placed in the hands of district officers, will only go to swell the ranks of official representatives among the electors. Thus we find that Government will not only have a number of members of their own choice equal to the number of elected members in the táluka boards, but will be represented in the electing bodies also by persons owing directly their power of voting to Government. We cannot call such elections popular in the right sense of the term. It is enough, we think, if Government have their representatives in the boards, but why have Government representatives among the electors too? We allow that this objection can be met by the counter-objection that in the case of municipal elections in the town and island of Bombay some of the voters are, in a sense, but the nominees of Government, such as Justices of the Peace and Fellows of the University. But there is a difference between the mofussil and the Presidency town in this matter. The Government of Bombay can to a great extent undertake the responsibility of deciding whether certain persons in Bombay are competent to be Justices of the Peace or not. But in the case of the mofussil the Collectors will be the guiding authorities of Government. Moreover, even the empowering clause of Section 18 leaves it to the discretion of the Collectors to give the pleaders, graduates and Government pensioners who cannot otherwise be held to be qualified to take part in the elections, the powers of voting, and what is so left discretional is uncertain. Would it not be better, therefore, to amend Sections 10 and 18 of the Bill in such a way as to ensure the election of and by men of education and experience? In Section 25 it is provided that "if the validity of any election" or the legality of any order made by the Collector is questioned, the party aggrieved may, at any time within ten days after the date of the election, proceeding, or order, apply to the District Judge for redress. The limitation of ten days will be insufficient in the case of some tálukas situated at a comparatively long distance from their district towns. Twenty days will be a reasonable limitation to impose and will better meet all cases.

Criticises the Bombay Local Boards Bill.

The Mahrátta (2) of the 5th August observes :—The first disqualification of members of local boards, as mentioned in Section 11 of the Bill, is on the ground of minority. The limit of age fixed by it appears to be unnecessarily high. 21 years may be the age of majority in England, but it is certainly much less here. The fact has been recognized by the Legislature of the country, and we see no reason why it should not also be recognized in the present Bill. The limit of age should be reduced to 18 years as in other Acts of the Indian Council. While this change will establish an uniform age of majority there is no fear of young members being returned to the board, as the electors will, in all such cases, look to some other compensating qualifications of the candidate, as, for instance, education. We take exception to Section 25, which allows appeal from the decision of the Collector to the District Judge only. It will be often inconvenient for electors in the táluka to bring their cases to the notice of the District Court. It will cost much time and trouble to call up parties and witnesses from the táluka to the zilla town. It will be better, therefore, if an option be allowed to parties contesting an election to bring their case before the Subordinate or the District Judge, the decision of either of whom should be final. If such a course be adopted, Subordinate Judges will have to be excluded from becoming members of boards. If civil officers are to be excluded from boards on the ground of interest, we see no reason why the executive and the police officers should not be excluded also. It is but a fact that they have much to do with the administration of local funds. The clauses (e) and (f) of Section 11 are not explicit enough, and it is doubtful whether the executive officers come under it. It is desirable, therefore, that the question should be clearly settled and one principle should be applied to judicial as well as to executive officers. It is indeed strange to see why imprisonment of any kind should deprive one of the right of voting when he is not exempt from taxation. We fail to see why imprisonment should be made a test instead of conviction for an offence involving moral guilt. The provision is not only hard but also imperfect. It would have been far better if this part of the Bill had been framed on the model of the sections in the Criminal Procedure Code which specify the disqualifications of jurors and assessors. The provision should be so modified as to grant the right of voting to every person, whether sentenced to imprisonment or not, and to exclude from boards such persons only as have been convicted of offences involving moral guilt. The omission in this Bill of the proviso regarding proprietors of newspapers, which appears in the Bombay District Municipal Act Amendment Bill, is probably an oversight, and will, we feel sure, be supplied when the Bill is referred to the Select Committee. We do not see why Government should reserve to themselves the power of extending the franchise to anybody they deem fit. We know that Government will not abuse this privilege, but as long as they enjoy this power we do not think that the provisions of the Bill can be called sound ones. One principle should be followed throughout, and we hope that the Select Committee will see to this when the Bill is referred to it.

Bombay Local Boards Bill.

The Dnyán Prakásh (8) of the 6th August says:—We should like to make an observation in connection with Section 5 of the Local Boards Bill, which among other things provides that not more than half of the nominated members shall be salaried servants of Government. Section 32 of the Local Boards Bill provides for securing the attendance of the Executive Engineer and the Educational Inspector when they are not members, so that their advice may be available in the disposal of questions affecting their departments. Such being the case, it is not unreasonable to presume that as a rule Government will not include these officers among the nominated members. And then the risk is that the salaried section of the nominated members may all represent one department only, and that too the Revenue Department. It is not desirable that the officers of this department should monopolize to themselves the seats reserved for salaried servants of Government. The Executive Engineer and the Educational Inspector are as much capable as the District Collectors and their Assistants of forming an intelligent opinion on any question which does not affect their respective departments; and we would accordingly add a proviso to Section 5 laying down that the salaried section of the nominated members shall not represent one department only. Such a provision is absolutely necessary to secure varied official experience for the guidance of the new inexperienced boards. The scheme sketched out in the Bombay Government resolution of 19th September last leads us to fear that if such a provision be not made there is every likelihood of the salaried members being recruited from the Revenue Department only,—the very officers whose overshadowing influence is most dreaded, and who, according to the Government of India's resolution of 18th May 1882, should not even be members, if possible. It is needless to say that we fully approve of the substitution of salaried for ex-officio members. The provisions of Section 10 are all that could be desired, with the exception of two provisions, which require alteration. The holders of alienated villages have been expressly excluded on the ground that they have a separate representation provided for them. The proposed exclusion is very unjust for more reasons than one. There are many Inámdárs or holders of entire alienated villages who are at the same time occupancy-holders paying to Government Rs. 48 and above as assessment, and who will inevitably have a vote under the provisions of Section 18, but who under the provisions of Section 10 will be ineligible as members. This is really an anomaly which must be removed. Again if there be more than one Inámdár in a táluka who is both able and willing to serve his fellow-countrymen, the proposed exclusion will deny them that useful career. The Bombay Municipal Act of 1872 affords a precedent in support of our contention. Under Section 6 of that Act a Justice of the Peace is not prevented from being or offering himself as a candidate to a popular constituency simply on the ground that under the previous section Justices of the Peace have sixteen distinct seats provided for them in the Municipal Corporation. Section 13 empowers Government to fix in the case of each district the date from which the Local Boards Act will come into force. Instead of leaving such power to Government it would be much better if the date were fixed in the Act itself, say for instance the 1st of April 1884. It is frequently the practice of the Legislature to fix in the Acts themselves the dates from which the Acts are to come into force. This very remark applies also to Sections 10 and 12 of the Municipal Bill. Triennial general election referred to in Section 16 also should be fixed by the Act itself in the same way as the dates of general elections are fixed in Bombay by the Municipal Act of 1882. A similar section is wanting in the Municipal Bill and should be introduced there. As regards Section 20 we propose to substitute the Mámlatdar of the táluka for the Collector, because virtually the former officer will be the de facto preparer of the lists of voters. In the same way we think that in Section 22 the Mámlatdár of the táluka should be substituted for the Collector, and that the decision of the former should be appealable before a Subordinate Judge having jurisdiction in that táluka, the decision of this officer being final. Such an alteration will make the task of inquiry very easy. There are no sections in the Municipal Bill corresponding to Sections 20 and 22 of the Local Boards Bill, and the subject has been relegated to rules to be subsequently framed. It will be much better, however, to provide for the same in the body of the Act itself.

The same of the 9th August says :—The conditions of municipal and local fund administrations in this Presidency differ in so many essential respects from each other that a corresponding distinction ought to be necessarily maintained in this respect in the two Bills as regards the question of non-official presidents. What could be considered an adequate provision in this respect, at least for the present, so far as the local fund administration was concerned, would be far from adequate as regards the municipal administration. So far as the Local Boards Bill is concerned we approve of the provision contained in Section 27, but we cannot approve of the provisions of Section 23 of the Municipal Bill. In the Municipal Bill we wish to see a distinct section introduced allowing certain municipalities the right of electing their own president and allowing some others the advantage of a non-official president, who should be for the present nominated by Government. As a rough classification we would divide municipalities into three classes: the first class to consist of those municipal towns which have a population of 25,000 souls and upwards, and an annual revenue of Rs. 50,000 and upwards; the second class to consist of those municipal towns which have a population of 10,000 souls and above, and an annual revenue of Rs. 5,000 and above; and the third class to consist of the remaining municipalities. The municipalities of the first class should be allowed the right of electing their own president, and those of the second class should be allowed a non-official president who should be nominated by Government; while in the case of municipalities of the third class the present section would do well. Such a classification is not possible at all in respect of the local fund committees. It so happens that by far the most backward district in this Presidency has the largest population and the largest local fund revenue, viz., the district of Khándesh. Again during the last few years the local fund administration has been so much overshadowed by official influences that it was only a mock courtesy which could term such an administration local or popular administration. The result of all those centralizing influences has in the end proved to be an almost utter ignorance, on the part of the leaders of the rural population, of even the ordinary duties of members of local fund committees. The whole thing has, therefore, to be commenced ab initio. Such being the state of things, anything more definite than a permissive section is not possible as regards the local fund administration. As regards the vice-president, we should like to see it distinctly provided that in every case he should be elected from amongst the non-salaried members. When the president of a local board, whether municipal or rural, is elected, we do not see any necessity for a vice-president, even though the elected president may be a salaried servant of Government. As regards the removal of a president or vice-president by Government for misconduct, neglect or incapacity, we do not object to the provision, but a similar power should be vested in local boards also, both municipal and rural, by providing that if at a special meeting held for the purpose three-fourths of the whole body of members should pass a vote of want of confidence, the president or vice-president in respect of whom such a vote is passed should be forthwith removed. As regards the functions of the vice-president we think it would be much better to invest him by law with certain powers instead of placing him at the mere mercy of the president. We propose, therefore, that the functions mentioned in clauses (c) and (d) of Section 28 and Section 24 of the Local Boards and Municipal Bills respectively be by law vested in the vice-president. The evident object is to gradually train non-official gentlemen for the more responsible post of president.

Criticises the Bombay District Municipal Act Amendment Bill.

The Mahrátta (2) of the 5th August observes:—In the case of such municipalities as will be allowed to elect their president the provision of a vice-president is superfluous. We therefore suggest that Section 23 should be modified accordingly. The president, according to the section, is to be one of the commissioners, so that immediately the appointment is made the balance will be disturbed and the official side will overweigh the elected side or the latter the former. This inconvenience can be avoided by following the precedent of the North-Western Provinces Bill, which gives these bodies the right of choosing, if they so like, an outsider for their president, who then by virtue of his nomination becomes a commissioner. The 3rd paragraph of Section 23 gives Government the power of removing the president. In the case of an elected president this power is very large. Such a power ought to belong more to the body itself than to Government. We suggest that the president ought to be removable only on a representation of two-thirds of the number of total commissioners passing such a resolution at a special meeting held for the purpose. The writer then proceeds to suggest a division of the municipalities generally into three classes on a principle similar to that above advocated by the Dnyán Prakásh.

Disapproves of the petition of some inhabitants of Nadiád praying for the restoration of a town municipality.

A correspondent of the Hitechchhu (77) of Ahmedabad of the 9th August says that the municipality of Nadiád has been recently raised to the level of a city municipality and it is doing its work satisfactorily. At the last general meeting of the municipality a petition was presented to it asking for the re-establishment of a town municipality on the ground of a probable increase in taxation and especially in the house-tax. As the petition is in consonance with the views of the Collector, it has been referred for investigation to the Mámlatdár. The latter cannot naturally be pleased with the lift given to the municipality, for it has deprived him of much of his power. It is surprising that the petition should have been referred to the Mámlatdár for enquiry, for it has been got up by a grocer and has not been signed by any educated gentleman. Before proceeding with the enquiry it should first of all be ascertained whether the memorialists understand the difference between a town and a city municipality and whether they are educated and sensible men.

Railways.

Comments in connection with the Administration Report of Railways in India for 1882-83.

The Indian Spectator (1) of the 5th August praises the energy displayed by the department of the Director General of Railways in issuingthe preliminary Administration Report for 1882-83 so soon as on the 18th May last and the great care and ability bestowed on its preparation, and says:—On the whole, the report is creditable to the department issuing it. It is however to be regretted that only 373¾ miles of new railways were completed and opened for traffic during 1882-83. This can hardly be called progress. Despite the heavy drawbacks to railway construction in India and the financial difficulties of Government, we cannot help remarking that if the business is to be developed at this pace India's material prosperity will be much retarded. The increase during the year of 9 per cent. over the number of Natives employed on open lines of railway in India during the preceding year is highly satisfactory, but at the same time somewhat misleading. If a fair comparison was intended to be made as to the relative cost of European and Eurasian employés on the one side and Native employés on the other, then the report should have given the figures of salaries and wages. It is a matter for regret that the investment of Native capital in railways should be almost nil. Attempts ought to be actively made to popularize investments in Indian railways amongst Native capitalists. Mention should be made, in the part of the report treating of revenue, of the net earnings of the different descriptions of railways. The figures will then show whether State railways are really as paying as Government would have the public believe; whether certain metre-gauge railways earn anything at all; and whether, if one or two very paying metre-gauge railways are excluded from the calculation of average earnings, the State railways will show anything like appreciable net interest on capital. This clever grouping of general earnings on all railways in the report is often a puzzle and a blind.

Comments in connection with the reductions made by the G.I.P. Railway Company in its fares for passengers.

The Mahrátta (2) of the 5th August says:—The reduction made by the G. I. P. Railway Company in its fares for passengers is thorough and is very advantageous to passengers, for which they ought to be grateful to the Company. But in one or two cases the Company has tried to prove that it cannot be too good all at once. The Company had latterly third class carriages attached to the passenger and mixed trains, which proved of good service to the middle classes who will now be forced to travel with the lowest classes of people who are not known for their cleanliness. The discontinuance of the issue of return tickets to stations beyond Kalyán is not a change for the better. In this instance passengers will not find that the Company has been any way liberal. [The Subodh Patrika (11) of the same date suggests that third classes should be kept on and the fare reduced to 3 pies per mile, while that for fourth classes should be 2 pies. Several other Maráthi papers express their disapproval of the abolition of the hitherto existing intermediate class and of the non-reduction in the fares for fourth classes. The Indian Spectator (1) of the same date says that very general satisfaction is felt at the reduction of the rates of passenger traffic and the opening of a booking office at Pydhoni. Both concessions will doubtless add to the popularity of this important line.]

Points out the necessity of providing latrines on the railway station at Sholápur.

The Bhála (18) of the 9th August requests the attention of the railway authorities to the necessity of providing latrines on the Sholápur station for the use of passengers that halt at the place on their journey from Raichore to places north of Sholápur. The necessity is greatly felt in these days when cholera is prevalent.

Municipalities.

Comments on the refusal of the Bombay Government to supply the Bombay Town Council with a copy of the despatch of the Secretary of State for India on the subject of the working of the Contagious Diseases Act.

The Indu Prakásh (9) of the 6th August says:—The Government of Bombay has hit upon a very ingenious device indeed in refusing to comply with the very modest request of the Town Council that it should be supplied with a copy of the despatch in which the Secretary of State has directed the Government not to make the Bombay Municipality contribute towards the working of the Contagious Diseases Act. The Town Council was informed by Government only of what the Secretary of State directed them to do, but the members of the Town Council wished to know more. They probably wanted to see if any sharp censure had been administered to the Government in the despatch. The Bombay Government had already been made to look small in the eyes of its subjects by this reversal of their policy in connection with the Act, and the publication of the despatch would have made them look smaller still. So the Government seems to have thought that the better part of wisdom lay in rejecting the modestly expressed but ironical request of the Town Council. But a summary rejection without the assignment of any reason would have looked worse than a compliance with the request; and the Government of Bombay has found its reason in that word "precedent," which so often proves useful to "administrative convenience." The Town Council has accordingly been informed that Government cannot supply it with a copy of the despatch for fear of laying down a dangerous "precedent." The Town Council asked for the copy as if it had a right to it. The Bombay Government by its answer seems to imply that the Council has no such right. The Municipal Act does not indeed give any right of this kind to the municipality. But it is not a question of legal right but of administrative convenience and necessity. When on an important question Government and the municipality differ and the decision of the former is upset by a higher authority, is not the latter equally entitled with the former to know something more than that the decision has been upset? In the present case the municipality was entitled to a copy of the Secretary of State's despatch in order that it might be recorded among its proceedings for future guidance and for the simple reason that the question affected its interests as much as those of Government.

Requests Government to order Dr. Weir to return to his duties of Health Officer and to appoint a Civilian as Municipal Commissioner.

The Din Bandhu (5) of the 9th August says that it is a matter for regret that the present sanitary arrangements of Bombay with the increased water-supply should not be as satisfactory as those during the time Dr. Hewlett was the Health Officer of the municipality. Dr. Weir explains this anomaly on the ground that the present expenditure on sanitation is not as great as it was formerly. There is also another score on which the Bandhu has reason to find fault with Government as well as the Municipal Corporation. In order that the sanitary arrangements of a city may be perfect it is necessary that there should be a competent Health Officer, and such officer we had in Dr. Weir. But strangely enough this officer has been temporarily removed from this office and put in the Municipal Commissioner's chair. If it was intended to give a temporary increase of salary to Dr. Weir for his efficient services, surely the object could as well have been accomplished by allowing the doctor to draw the salary of the Municipal Commissioner while discharging the duties of his own office, in which he is specially required on account of the gradual increase of cholera in the city. In these circumstances the Din Bandhu earnestly requests Government to direct Dr. Weir to return to his original post and to appoint a Civilian as Municipal Commissioner.

Suggestions to the Bombay Municipality for checking cholera.

The Rást Goftár (111) of the 5th August says that no measures taken by the municipality for alleviating the distress caused by cholera will avail so long as the very roots of the disease are not extirpated. Everybody hails with joy the appointment of new doctors for treating the sufferers by this epidemic, but no appreciable relief can be afforded by these officers sitting in one place and waiting for patients. They ought to direct their attention to some other measures for checking the disease. At present there is necessity for a few more halálkhors, as it is to be regretted that privies in the affected parts of the town should be allowed to remain uncleaned for twenty-four hours. A correspondent suggests that a few sanitary inspectors should be appointed to look after the health of the town. But the Rást Goftár is of opinion that this work should be done by these newly appointed medical officers. It is also necessary that some sort of supervision should be exercised over the sale of fruits, vegetables, food provisions, fish and flesh in order to check the sale of rotten articles. The appointment of these new doctors should be promulgated by beat of drum and disinfectants should be distributed gratis to all poor people.

Comments in connection with the spread of cholera in Bombay.

The Indu Prakásh (9) of the 6th August says :—The considerable increase in the number of deaths from cholera in Bombay during the week which ended last Tuesday shows that the sanitary condition of the island is not what it ought to be. The epidemic is reported in the official returns to be of a mild form, and the measures adopted by the Municipal Commissioner with the sanction of the Town Council are likely to stamp it out of existence. But it appears that the larger number of the cases of cholera occurs amongst fresh arrivals in Bombay. The disease prevails in almost all the districts of the Presidency, but the immigrants from Pandharpur, where the disease appeared at the last fair in a very virulent form, appear to have diffused the contagion in this city. The authorities at Pandharpur acted very wisely in adopting very speedy though stringent measures to prevent its rapid progress amongst the pilgrims. But those measures were confined to the closing of the temple in Pandharpur and to compelling the pilgrims to return to their native places. When epidemics arise among the pilgrims at a certain place care should be taken against their carrying the germs of the disease with them to other places. But no care of this kind seems to have been taken in the case of the Pandharpur pilgrims.

A complaint against the Bombay Municipality.

The Indian Spectator (1) of the 5th August says:—No one will grudge the additional grant made by the municipality for the prevention of cholera in Bombay if the money is properly laid out. One long-standing complaint against the municipality is that it confines its attention to the outside of the town, to the main roads and so on, more or less to the neglect of the lanes and bye-lanes inhabited by the masses. A very respectable Hindu gentleman, writing to us about the Girgaum ward, says that the private alleys and passages which connect one oart with another are very irregularly looked after by the scavenger. The Halálkhor is sure that the eye of the superior officer is not likely to be directed to his work in these out-of-the-way places and so he takes things coolly. The sweeper does likewise. The result is an accumulation of filth and garbage, uncleaned privies and cesspools unemptied, which may breed the deadliest cholera. Let the superiors take care of the lanes and gullies, and the roads will take care of themselves.

Says that the Bombay Municipality should publish its accounts as is done by the municipalities in the mofussil.

The Maháráshtrá Hitechchhu (39) of the 6th August says that it is a disgrace to the Bombay Municipality that the people should have no means of knowing what is done with the taxes collected from them. All mofussil municipalities give regular publicity to their accounts through newspapers, and the Bombay Municipality should also do the same.

Asks the municipality of Surat to take measures for putting a stop to the delay that at present takes place in granting permits to persons desirous of erecting new buildings.

The Gujarát Mitrá (76) of the 5th August says that great inconvenience is caused to the people of Surat by the delay that is allowed by the municipality to take place in granting permits to persons intending to erect new buildings. If the secretary of the municipality cannot suggest any measures for putting a stop to this inconvenience the committee must adopt some special remedies. There should be no objection to empower municipal commissioners to grant the necessary permits within their own wards, but if this suggestion is not considered feasible an officer should be appointed for this duty especially.

Municipal affairs at Surat.

The Indian Spectator (1) of the 5th August, in commenting on the management of municipal affairs at Surat, remarks:—Altogether, the municipal affairs of Surat seem to be managed in a high-handed manner, which has exasperated even the mild Bania. Members tell the Collector-president to his face that they were better used by Mr. Hope and Mr. Pratt. Mr. White deceives himself if he thinks that he is master of the situation. The local papers and almost all non-official commissioners have entered a solemn protest against his conduct of affairs, and unless he aspires to immortalize himself as the greatest enemy of local self-government in India he had better yield to reason in time. We know his opposition is conscientious, but he must either do the duty he is paid for or resign. If the city fathers at Surat have done quarrelling over the extension of the People's Park, it is time they should take thought of a possible flood in September or October. Should a flood occur about that time, it will ruin Surat completely. Have the engineers ever thought of deepening the Varácha creek and dredging the Tápti to some extent? If this can be done we are told a large flood at Surat will be impossible. The dredging will be a tedious and expensive process, but it will afford certain protection. Another suggestion is a floating break-water on a large scale. We are further assured that breaking down the fort walls will be a fatal mistake; that the fort walls should be rebuilt wherever they have been destroyed and that the moat at the foot should be kept in good condition. Some of these suggestions, if carried out, and the works erected by Mr. Hope, if kept in order, might save the city from future visitations. [The Gujarát Mitrá (76) of the same date suggests that the municipality should undertake the repair of the Makkai Bridge before all other works. The Vartaman Sár (120) of the 7th August gives the proceedings of the special general meeting of the Surat Municipality, and asks whether Mr. White, the president, means to have everything done in his own away. Mr. Kálábhái deserves credit for his able and fearless opposition to the views of the president. The attention of Government ought to be drawn to the scene enacted at the time of the debate and the arbitrary conduct of official presidents. The Gujaráti (96) of the 5th August says that the Bombay Branch of the East India Association and other like bodies and the Native members of the Legislative Council should make the recent proceedings of the municipality of Surat their study as they clearly show how an official president can override the opposition of non-official members and carry everything before him.]

Requests the municipality of Surat to take preventive measures against the spread of cholera in the city.

The Surat Akhbár (79) of the 6th August says that in the city of Surat people die by hundreds every year of cholera or fever owing to their inability to procure medical assistance. The two Government dispensaries in the city are situated in quarters inhabited by well-to-do persons and are two miles distant from the suburbs. Sick men do not resort to them in sufficient numbers even on ordinary occasions, and to those who live at a distance from them they are very nearly useless. When fever or cholera rages in the suburbs of the city people die by hundreds owing to the want of medical aid. For some years cholera has raged in the suburbs every alternate year and no arrangements appear to have been made for the prevention of loss of life. When the creek is full of water in the monsoon the people living in the suburbs are cut off from the city, and being without assistance great mortality prevails. Owing to the moisture that has spread in the suburbs on account of the recent floods fever has made its appearance and fears are entertained of the bursting out of cholera. It is therefore necessary that one or two dispensaries should be opened by the local municipality for the benefit of the poor. [The Deshi Mitrá (91) of the 9th August refers to the appearance of cholera in the city, and advises the municipality to be on the alert to keep the city clean and to prevent the sale of articles unsuited for human consumption.]

Says that the trade of the town of Sholápur has suffered considerably by the enhancement of import duties.

The Kalpataru (33) of the 5th August says that the trade of the town of Sholápur has suffered considerably by the enhancement of import duties consequent on the strict orders of Government regarding the refund of the duties levied on exported articles. The Kalpataru quotes statistics to prove its assertion and requests Government to interfere in the matter. [The Bhála (18) of the 9th August expresses similar sentiments and also invites the attention of the president and the commissioners to the unsatisfactory nature of the present sanitary arrangements and the necessity of reforming them.]

Says that the assessments of house-tax at Vengurla should be made every year.

The Vengurla Vritt (71) of the 2nd August says that while at Chiplun, Ratnágiri and Rájápur municipal registers of house-tax are prepared every year it is unjust that the municipality of Vengurla should be levying its house-tax according to the assessments fixed in 1879-80. The Vritt considers that yearly assessments are calculated to prove beneficial both to the municipality and the people, and invites the attention of the authorities concerned to the matter.

Native States.

Says that Native princes should not be allowed to reside in British territories for a long time.

The Deshi Mitrá (91) of the 9th August complains of the inconvenience caused by Native potentates being allowed to reside in British territories for a long time. Some stay in Bombay and other places, while others go to the seat of the Government of India. Owing to their absence from their territories, Native rulers remain ignorant of the prevalence of maladministration in them and of the intrigues of their Kárbháris. Who then will look after the interests of the people? Does not the British Government know that it allows them to remain in British territories for a long time? People suspect that Native rulers, by residing in places where the Governor or the Viceroy may be, make friendship with the members of Government, exert their influence with them, and gain them over to their side. The cause of these princes is naturally espoused by Government, as was the case in the massacre of the Maiyás by the Junágad State. The suspicions of the people may be ill-founded, but still the British Government is blamed in the matter. It is advisable, therefore, that Native rulers should not be allowed to reside in British territories for a long time. Will Government issue an order to this effect ?

Comments in connection with the appointment of Colonel West as Political Agent, Káthiáwár.

The Indian Spectator (1) of the 5th August says :—Káthiáwár is lucky in having secured Colonel West for its Political Agent. Colonel West is a quiet but resolute worker, whom the A'ryan intriguer will not find so easy to get round as the present estimable incumbent. As we have often said, Káthiáwár has become a hot-bed of intrigues since Mr. Peile's withdrawal. It is distracted by a number of cliques, and the well-meaning officer often fails to see how he can reconcile the clashing interests. Colonel West's success, if he means to achieve it, does not lie across a bed of roses. It is a thorny path, and if he as a conscientious man walks straight on he must be prepared for a few scratches in the beginning. But if he perseveres with a steady eye, resolutely cutting and kicking wherever he sees a hidden viper, he will find himself master of the situation at the end of six months. Colonel Barton tried to do this, we believe, but his evil genius soon tempted him out of the right path. Káthiáwár is the land of intrigue, of spies and story-tellers, and of every corrupt practice that human ingenuity can devise. It is only an exceptionally able man that can manage Káthiáwár. The larger States have for years fattened upon the subordinate estates ; and still the former are not themselves really so well off as they were fifteen years ago. The masses are in a state of chronic destitution. Law and justice in many States exist only in name. Education and civilization are names used to dazzle the outsider. The municipality is a huge sham ; roads and bridges here and there, with a howling wilderness between—fair-weather roads for the Rájás and the Sáhebs only—the people having their own tracks to use. The Chiefs think they live for the Political Agents—'they are our mábáp'—and the subjects know they live for the Chiefs. The official go-between regulates the relations between the Chiefs and the subjects, as also between the Chiefs and the Agency. The three are seldom allowed to come face to face. Excepting half a dozen members, the royalty of Káthiáwár is a dumb show, manipulated from behind by the Kárbhári and the vakil. This may strike the reader as an overdrawn picture; but if a hundredth part of the accounts one receives from the interior of Káthiáwár be true, then the picture we give represents only a tenth part of the truth. Káthiáwár may be better off in this respect than some parts of India, where the young Chief is said to be made over to the European Superintendent to be utilized in every imaginable way. Besides the handsome salary, the master in charge has board and bed, horse and carriage, dance and ball, and more questionable luxuries at the ward's expense down to his zenána. It is difficult whom to reprobate most—the Rája who surrenders his all to the unscrupulous servant, or the officer who is mean enough to sponge upon a weak master to such an extent. Matters have not gone so far in Káthiáwár, but there must be something very wrong in the management of this "Protected Province" when people slyly compare a political officer with the Vaishnav Mahárájˌ We deny the justice of this vile comparison in the majority of cases. But this much is certain that the officer who restores confidence among the Chiefs of the province—the officer who restores confidence among the smaller feudatories and the people that as their friend and protector he is ready to listen to them without the intervention of licensed intriguers—that officer will be the saviour of Káthiáwár. May something like this be the privilege of the Political Agent elect ! [The Gujaráti (96) of the same date also approves of the appointment of Colonel West, but is sorry that the claims of Colonel Watson were not taken into consideration, probably on account of his attitude in the Maiya case, which did not meet with the approval of Government.]

The Gujaráti (96) of the 5th August says :—The Government of Bombay has not entertained the petition of the Maiyás protesting against the nomination of Messrs. Chunilál and Ratilál as members of the commission appointed to enquire into their rights. Though there is no reason to doubt the honesty of these officers, still the Maiyás have reason to be dissatisfied with their nomination on various grounds. If justice is to be done to the Maiyás as also to the Junágad Darbár, it is necessary that one-half of the commissioners should be elected by the Maiyás and the other half by the Darbár. It is now well known that Colonel Barton is not in favour of the Maiyás, and it is therefore very doubtful whether the members nominated by him will deal justly with the Maiyás. The Bombay Government is now practising great diplomacy, but it is a mistake that it should try to throw off all responsibility from its shoulders by merely appointing Native members on the commission. If the Maiyás have perfect faith in the justice of Mr. Hammick, where is the necessity of appointing any other commissioner? And if commissioners are at all to be appointed, where is the harm in appointing such persons as have no connection with Káthiáwár? If, however, it be urged that there will be no use in appointing persons who have no knowledge of the affairs in Káthiáwár, then we would suggest that men like Messrs. Krishnáji Lakshman and Vináyakráo Bhágwat, who have served in Káthiáwár and are known for their independence, and who being now pensioners have no concern with the interests of either of the parties to the dispute, should be appointed.

Does not approve of the nominations made by Government to the commission of enquiry into the rights of the Maiyás.

The Lok Mitrá (78) of the 5th August says:—From the accounts of high-handedness which have reached us for some time it would appear that the Government of His Highness the Nawáb of Cambay has not profited by past experience and that affairs in Cambay are once more drifting into confusion. It appears that warrants have been issued for the apprehension of a number of people, and altogether the city is panic-stricken. The treatment of a Pársi youth, who was a clerk to the ex-Diwán and who is now on trial for some charges laid against him, is said to have been as cruel as it was unjustifiable. Petitions have been made to the Political Agent, Kaira, and to the Nawáb against the ill-treatment of this man, and legal steps, it is said, are being taken in Bombay to bring the offenders to book. Dr. Shifudin, till now basking in the sunshine of the Nawáb's favour, is said to have been put in jail without any such ceremony as a formal complaint or a charge, and was with difficulty released only to find himself shorn of all his dignities and honours. The Pársi is still lingering in jail, where he was put hand-cuffed, after being severely beaten and before any primá facie case was made out or even before any formal charge was laid against him. The above statements are open to correction; but there seems to be little doubt that all is not well at Cambay. It is difficult to foresee the end of such extraordinary proceedings; but if there is any truth in these reports they bode no good to the Government of the Nawáb. It is said that the Government of Bombay has expressed its disapproval of the abrupt dismissal of Mr. Umedrám Anandrám, who was appointed Revenue Commissioner of Cambay some time ago, and it may be taken that Government will no longer allow the administration of Cambay to be conducted otherwise than in strict accordance with law, so as to nip the evil of maladministration in the bud. It behoves the new Diwán to put down with a strong hand all abuse of power, and to take measures to inspire the people with confidence in his administration.

Misrule in Cambay.

A correspondent of the Bombay Samáchár (86) of the 8th August observes that a civil suit is going on in Cambay about a certain house situated in that town. A portion of this house was in the possession of one Abdul Nabi, who was served with a notice calling upon him to vacate the portion he had in his possession within forty-eight hours, and threatening him with proceedings if he did not comply with the requisition. Abdul Nabi gave an explanation of his possession to Mr. Raghunáth, the Náib-Diwán, who is also Judge and Sessions Judge, but it was not accepted and a decision was passed against him. At this time the vakil of the opposite party came and informed the Náib-Diwán that Abdul Nabi had abused him (the Náib-Diwán); and upon his evidence alone the said Abdul was there and then sentenced to three months' imprisonment with hard labour.

Berár Affairs.

Recommends the removal of the market and school-house at Páturda from the bank of the river Ván to the plateau on the west of the town.

A correspondent of the Varhád Samáchár (68) of the 6th August states that on the 2nd instant the river Ván at Páturda was inundated and the Government and municipal buildings situated on the bank of the river fell down, thus causing a damage of Rs. 2,500. The town market is in the bed of the river and ought to be removed from thence to the plateau situated to the west of the town. The school-house, which has been damaged a good deal, should also be removed from the bank of the river to the western plateau. The townsmen are desirous that the public buildings should be removed as recommended above, while the kárbhári of the town is likely to oppose the project, but his opposition should not be listened to.

Notes.—A. The notices from the different Newspapers have been collected in the Report under different heads, which are printed in italics.

B. The names of Newspapers are printed in the body of the Report in italics, and the number of the Newspaper in the above list is printed in brackets after the name.

C. The proprietors of the Newspapers marked * have not given information as to the number of copies issued. In these cases an estimate has been made by the Reporter.

D. The system of spelling vernacular words followed by the Reporter is the same as that adopted in the Official Spelling List of the Bombay Presidency. One peculiar feature of this system is that when the long a (आ or ा) is the last letter of a word, the accent is left out, and the short a (अ = u in gun) is, to prevent confusion, never placed at the end of a word. This rule has been strictly followed, except that when the short a appears to be absolutely necessary to complete the pronunciation of a word, as in Arunodaya or the well known Mitra, it is printed with a mark over it to indicate that it is short, thus—अ.

E. Berár papers are received in this office for report under the Resolution of the Government of Bombay in the General Department, No. 1795, dated 8th June 1881.

Politics and the Public Administration.

Says that the best remedy to secure the stability of the British Empire in India is to keep the people contented.

The Indu Prakásh (9) of the 13th August, in an article headed "The best remedy for the stability of the kingdom," says:—Among the various political wonders of the present age stands foremost the acquisition of India by the British. The conquest of India by the Mahomedans was not so wonderful because they inhabited comparatively nearer countries and had easy access to this country. But the English belong to a distant island and had no connection of any sort with our people. They came here simply as merchants; from merchants they became petty rulers, and in the course of time they have become the paramount power in this land. Is this not a miracle? If Sir Thomas Munro, who in his days had to experience great difficulties and subject himself to the humiliation of taking off his shoes before he could secure an interview with the Emperor of Delhi—if that Sir Thomas had witnessed the grand assemblage of Delhi in which Lord Lytton was the prominent figure among the Native princes arranged in lines, what would have been his astonishment? And if he had asked the question how the English had secured such an ascendancy in this country, he would certainly have hung down his head through shame to hear of the manner in which the provinces of Bengal, Karnátik, Benares, Oudh, &c., were annexed to the British dominion. Can there be found a single Englishman who can impartially point to a single Native dependency the territories of which were annexed by the British Government without even a particle of injustice? As, however, political usage sanctions the exercise of diplomacy in the acquisition of territory, we will leave that point untouched. But the relations of Government with their subjects need not be regulated by the same principle, and it is therefore not proper that the rulers should not deal with the ruled in a straightforward manner and should treat them as conquered subjects. Indeed the British Government practised intrigues with the Native princes in the hope of usurping their territories, but what does it expect from the people? There is nothing left with us of which we can be deprived except our cowardice, and the best remedy to remove it is to oppress us to the last degree. Some Englishmen have begun to resort to this device, and they have also been advising others to follow their example. May God frustrate the object of these men! What does the absence of cowardice on the part of the people signify? It is a signal for the appearance of courage, impudence and immodesty, and when these are perfectly developed they produce a result which is too well known to thoughtful persons to need express mention. There is only one remedy by which the English can secure the stability of their Indian Empire. The utility of this remedy was recognized and appreciated by the Mahomedan rulers. The remedy is no other than the contentment of the people, to secure which the rulers must lay aside their prejudices and crotchets. When the fate of the British rule in India was trembling in the balance at the critical time of the Mutiny of 1857, whose assistance served to secure stability? Was there a sufficient number of British troops at that time in the country to protect the interests of the State? The British Empire was protected on that occasion and the almost inevitable crisis averted mainly by the loyalty of the people of India. These are plain facts and are admitted even by prejudiced Englishmen. In these circumstances it is the duty of Government to strive to gain the affections of the people and to keep them contented, and the policy initiated by Lord Ripon is fully calculated to gain the desired object.

Mr. Keay's article on "the spoliation of India."

The Gujaráti (96) of the 12th August refers to the contents of an article headed "The Spoliation of India" contributed to the Nineteenth Century by Mr. Keay, and says that the picture of the condition of the people of this country given by the writer is very frightful. Britannia, dost thou doubt the truth of the facts publicly stated in this article? Better put a stop to this course of spoliation even at this stage and then only canst thou achieve success. Beware this and act justly! [The Native Opinion (10) of the same date refers to the same article and says that the facts brought to light by Mr. Keay show that the principles on which the British Government in India was established were really sinful. Anybody that can judge impartially will not fail to see that the present administration is also carried on on much the same lines. There is no doubt that India has profited in some measure by her connection with England, but on the whole the good done is more than counterbalanced by the evils which have followed in the train of the British rule. The English are admittedly a foreign nation, their government in India is carried on simply for their own benefit, and no consideration is paid to the requirements of the people. Besides, the administration is so expensive that it is sure to bring on ruin in the long run. The extravagant administrative expenditure is carried on by oppressive means, and the result of this set of circumstances will be poverty, destruction and starvation, which mean a fatal blow to the Government itself.]

Wishes that the public should be taken into confidence as to the reasons of paying the liberal annual subsidy of twelve lákhs of rupees to the Amir of Afghanistan.

In noticing the explanation given by Lord Kimberley in reply to a question about the decision of the Government of India to pay to the Amir of Afghanistan an annual subsidy of twelve lákhs of rupees, the Bombay Samáchár (86) of the 13th August observes that the explanation is silent as to what recompense is expected from the Amir for this large annuity. It seems strange that the Government of India should have resolved to pay this large sum annually without entering into any political treaty with the Amir or making any arrangements for securing facilities to the Indian trade with Afghanistan. Lord Ripon's administration may have some ulterior object in giving this splendid annuity, but until it is declared the arrangement will be criticised by the public, who are very anxious to know the reasons for the revival of the old policy of subsidizing the Amir of Cabul. It is a notable fact that the present subsidy is double the amount of the one vouchsafed by Lord Lytton's Government to Yakub Khan, the late ruler of Cabul. It is to be hoped that Abdul Rahiman will be grateful and loyal to the British Government for the liberal pecuniary help thus given him and will give evidence of his gratitude when an opportunity offers. [The Bombay Chronicle (75) of the 12th August asks what guarantee there is that the Amir will continue loyal to the British Government.]

Disapproves of the proposed alterations in the Petroleum Act with a view to afford increased facilities to the importers of inflammable oils.

In alluding to the orders issued by the Secretary of State to the Government of India to make certain alterations in the Petroleum Act, the Bombay Samáchár (86) of the 18th August observes that the result of the proposed changes will be that kerosine, petroleum and other similar oils that are liable to take flame with less than 100 degrees of heat will be imported into India and the safety of the people will be endangered to that extent. The proposed reduction in the degree of the test is recommended to be made not on any scientific grounds, but by reason of the influence brought to bear by the dealers in those articles on the authorities. The Secretary of State has not convinced the public that oils satisfying the revised test are not so very inflammable as they are generally believed to be, nor has he explained that there is no danger from readily inflammable oils. He has simply guaranteed that the American exporters of the oils will export superior kinds, and has exempted them from the responsibility of those oils becoming inferior in quality on account of the Indian climate. But how can the importation of oils the quality of which deteriorates on arrival in this country be considered advisable when the danger from them increases with the deterioration? Will a merchant who exports good fruit or grain to India be allowed to sell them here if they are found on arrival to be rotten? By lowering the standard of the test for kerosine, petroleum and other inflammable oils the safety of the public will be considerably endangered, and hence it is desirable that the Supreme Government should desist from making the proposed alterations in the Petroleum Act.

The Gujarát Mitrá (76) of the 12th August says that the thanks of the whole Native population of India are due to the Viceroy and the Commander-in-Chief of India for the rules they have framed to regulate the hunting excursions of European soldiers, which have hitherto proved a source of much annoyance to the public. The provision regarding the trial by a court-martial of those who infringe the rules is indeed very satisfactory, considering the disrepute into which several European Judges have brought their names by treating European offenders with partiality and letting them off on ridiculous pretexts.

Approves of the rules recently framed to regulate the hunting excursions of European soldiers.

The Lokahitavádi (38) for the month of July, in continuation of its article on the subject of the defects of the present system of administration reported at page 4 of the Report on Native Papers for the week ending 28th July 1883, says:—At present the agriculturists have become impecunious and unable to earn their own livelihood. The poor cultivator finds it very difficult to pay the heavy taxes and dues of Government. He is obliged to work very hard on his soil, but as the Government and the sávkár enjoy the fruit of his labour, he is obliged to maintain himself for eight months during the year on the wages of his labour. His wife and children bring head-loads of grass, fuel, leaves, &c., to the town from a distance of forty miles, but they are not able to realize more than what barely repays their labour. But the doors of this source of livelihood have also been closed by the forest policy of Government. The poor are thus entangled in miseries from all sides. But what can they do? The husband ceases to care for his wife and the mother for her infant children simply on account of the want of means of livelihood. Who will not be moved to see a mother leaving her children in a hut and wending her way to a distant market to sell a head-load of leaves and fuel? All these miseries have been the outcome of maladministration and neglect of the interests of the people. Out of the produce of the soil Government must receive one-half, while from the other half the ryot has to meet other demands, such as the local fund cess and the stamp and registration fees. In fine, agriculture is no longer a thriving profession, nor are there chances of success in any other line. The trade of hackney-bullock carts is hampered by the establishment of toll-bars. There are no pasture grounds for the use of cattle. There are no money-lenders rich enough to be useful to the ryots. How then can the people prosper? Of all the rulers of India the Mussalmans were the most barbarous, cruel, proud, tyrannical, and what not? But during their administration of 700 years they effected no changes in the pristine state of revenue laws and customs, and it must have been a sad irony of fate that those whose administrative skill is trumpeted in the Old and the New World, and who are known as the most prudent and discreet, should have shown themselves capable of inhumanity and cruelty unprecedented in history. The circumstance that the revenue laws which were looked upon by the Mahomedan rulers as suitable to the Indian people for 700 years should have now been annulled points simply to the ill-luck of the people of this country. That the present system of revenue assessments without remissions does not allow of agriculture being solely depended upon as a means of livelihood has now become evident both to Government and the people. Formerly the agriculturists had various means of cultivating their lands in a satisfactory manner, and other circumstances served to stimulate them to exertion. The Government tax was very light and manure and materials for rábi were not as inaccessible as now. They could use their lands for purposes other than agriculture, such as gardening, &c., and could thus turn it to the best advantage. Besides, they used to be assisted on special occasions like marriages by rich people like sardárs, but that class of people has now disappeared. At present there is not a single spot where the cry of untimely rainfall and insufficient out-turn of crops is not heard, and the people look upon the money collected from them by Government as the gains of tyranny. It is therefore advisable that Government should regulate their demands by the out-turn of crops and should grant frequent remissions of revenue. It may be urged that such a system of revenue collections leaves a door open to fraud. But all possibility of fraud can be avoided by basing all calculations on the appraisement of crops, and even if a little fraud were practised by the ryots the consolation should be that after all the ryots would be profited. In the absence of a permanent settlement of land revenue assessments nobody cares to improve his soil, as he is not sure that with all the improvements effected in it it will remain in his possession for ever. In short, the easiest remedy for affording relief to the people and keeping them contented is to initiate a system of assessments calculated according to the out-turn of crops and to regulate taxation by the capacity of the payers. It may be argued that if the people are dissatisfied with the British rule they may emigrate to other countries. The prospect of emigration, however, is not very agreeable to the Hindu mind, nor is it likely that with other counteracting circumstances emigration will prove advantageous. The deterioration in the physique of the people has also its origin in the present system of administration. Physical strength generally depends on freedom from anxiety, free access to all means of livelihood and independence, which three are quite absent from the people at the present day. Abundance of cows and buffaloes in the country has also much to do with the physical strength of the people. People are unable to keep these cattle for domestic purposes inasmuch as the forests have been closed by Government and fodder has become very dear. There has been a diminution in the number of these cattle also on account of their being slaughtered for purposes of food.

Says that the only remedy for affording relief to the distressed cultivator is to introduce a system of land revenue collections based on the actual out-turn of crops.

Makes a few remarks upon the Deccan Agriculturists' Relief Act.

The Shiváji (61) of the 10th August observes that though the Deccan Agriculturists' Relief Act is calculated to lessen the liabilities of the cultivators, still it cannot give them absolute relief. Several hindrances stand in the way of the agriculturists receiving the advantages intended to be conferred by the Act. The defective mode of cultivation and the smallness of the holdings have mainly contributed to their poverty. The evil custom of equal divisions of an estate among the several sons of a landholder has brought things to such a pass as to make each holding insufficient to maintain its tenant. The abolition of this custom will contribute considerably to improve the condition of the cultivator. Some persons attribute the poverty of the ryot to the present system of levying the land revenue assessment, but they are wrong in their conjecture. The present system is no doubt defective to a certain extent and needs modification; but such modification will not ameliorate the condition of the ryots unless the custom of equal division of land among the heirs of a deceased landholder is totally abolished. The Relief Act does not make the decision given by arbitrators binding upon the litigants, and consequently the provision about arbitration has not proved as beneficial as it would otherwise have been.

Requests Government to start relief works for affording relief to the distressed people in the Khed Táluka of the Ratnágiri District.

The Satyá Shodhak (57) of the 12th August says that great distress prevails in the Khed Táluka of the Ratnágiri District on account of the ravages committed by locusts, and requests Government to start suitable relief works for affording relief to the sufferers.

Locusts in Khándesh.

A correspondent of the Gujarát Mitrá (76) of the 12th August, writing from Khándesh, says that notwithstanding that the jiráyat crops were destroyed this year, the dues of Government were collected with great rigidity and those that were not able to meet the demand made it good by selling their agricultural stock. Though Government have offered rewards for the destruction of locust eggs and locusts, the Mámlatdárs do not care to visit the parts affected by the plague to encourage the villagers to kill the insects. This work is therefore being done with great slackness. It is necessary that the Collector should keep a strict watch to see that active measures are taken in this matter.

A correspondent of the Arunodayá (14) of the 12th August complains that great hardship is caused to the agricultural classes in the Thána District by being compelled to come out for the purpose of taking measures for the destruction of locusts, while no appreciable alleviation of the distress caused by the plague is apparent. The measures at present taken are not at all effective and the precious time of the agriculturist is spent without any corresponding advantage, and it is therefore to be hoped that Government will either invent other measures or allow nature to have its course.

Complains of hardship caused to the people by being required to kill locusts at the sacrifice of agricultural operations.

The Arunodayá (14) of the 12th August thoroughly approves of the principle on which certain gentlemen of Dhárwár, Hubli and Gadag-Betigeri have been made to form themselves into benches and have been invested with magisterial powers to enable them to try cases within the municipal limits of the said towns, and says that it will be better if Government introduce this system into all the districts of this Presidency.

Approves of the principle on which certain gentlemen of Dhárwár, Hubli and Gadag-Betigeri have been made to form themselves into benches and invested with magisterial powers.

The Satyá Shodhak (57) of the 12th August hears that the Advocate General has given his opinion that it is necessary that receipt stamps should be applied to originals as well as duplicates of receipts. This will no doubt bring a few additional rupees into the Government treasury, but will cause great loss to the people. Hitherto it has not been considered necessary to affix stamps to duplicates, and Government should consider well whether a departure from that reasonable practice is desirable.

Says that it is not proper to make it necessary to have receipt stamps on duplicates of receipts.

The Dnyánodayá (7) of the 16th August approves of the efforts made by one Mr. Janárdan Rámchandraji to place before the President of the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals a history of the miseries of the mill-labourers in Bombay. These labourers are indeed overworked and are required to work in premises where they do not get wholesome air to breathe, and it is to be hoped that the authorities will think of legislating for the comfort of this class of people.

Points out the necessity of resorting to legislation for the comfort of the mill-labourers of Bombay.

The Vengurla Vritt (71) of the 9th August complains that the orders of Government prohibiting the impressment of labourers by Government officers and fixing the rates of wages to be paid to them have recently been disregarded by a certain officer in the Vengurla Táluka. A kárkun in the Mámlatdár's kacheri by name Moreshwar Krishna Ajgaonkar, bound for Ratnágiri, was in need of coolies. A police sepoy went to the neighbouring village of Dábholi and brought three coolies with the assistance of the police pátil of the village. Among them was one Vithu Raghshet, a pensioner and comparatively an old man. This man was made to sleep for the night at the kacheri. The next morning he was made to carry the baggage of the kárkun, and as soon as the party reached the village of Dábholi, the coolie requested the kárkun to take him to the police pátil as he was unable to carry the baggage, whereupon he received a sound beating at the hands of peon Ráma Ghátá, who accompanied the kárkun, and was taken to the village of Kelus situated at a distance of 8 miles from Vengurla. The coolie was then paid 1 anna 8 pies instead of his due according to the rates fixed by Government. The whole of this proceeding is opposed to the express orders of Government, and unless some notice is taken of it people will lose all confidence in the orders of Government.

Brings to notice a case of impressment of labour in the Vengurla Táluka.

The Gujarát Mitra (76) of the 12th August complains of the harsh treatment accorded by the toddy farmer of Surat to the owners of toddy and date trees and the licensed vendors of toddy. The farmer, Mr. Jagábhái, has exacted from several owners of toddy trees an agreement on stamped paper that they will not sell toddy to any person nor allow any persons to sit near their trees to drink toddy. Similar agreements have also been taken from the sellers of toddy outside the town of Surat and from the licensed vendors of the same. Mr. Jagábhái has been taking the farm of toddy for several years past, but he never before imposed such stringent conditions. It is said that the sufferers have laid their complaint before the Collector, but no reply has yet been received by them. It is to be hoped that the attention of the authorities will be directed to this matter.

Complains of the hardness of certain conditions imposed by the toddy farmer of Surat on toddy-drawers and licensed vendors of toddy.

Condemns the imposition of the punitive police on certain villages of the Thána District.

In noticing the notification in the last Government Gazette about the posting of punitive police for the next six months in certain villages of Sálsette, Panvel, Kalyán, Karjat, Sháhápur, Murbád, Váda and Bhiwndi tálukás of the Thána District, the Suryodayá (65) of the 13th August observes that this mode of punishing whole villages for the faults of a few persons is most unjust and ill becomes the just British rule.

Complains that cases of house-breaking have become frequent in Bombay.

The Din Bandhu (5) of the 12th August complains that cases of house-breaking have become frequent in Bombay and attributes them to the paucity of police officers. The Police Commissioner should take measures for increasing the numerical strength of the police.

Asks the police of Sholápur to be more vigilant than hitherto.

The Bhála (18) of the 16th August regrets to be under the necessity of asking the police to be more vigilant than hitherto in their duties on account of the prevalence of thieving and drinking to a large extent in the town of Sholápur, and expresses a hope that the proper authorities will direct their attention to this matter.

Asks the police of Surat to take measures for checking the evil of false weights and measures in Surat.

The Gujarát Mitrá (76) of the 12th August complains of the prevalence of false weights and measures in the Surat market, and requests the Police Superintendent and the Police Inspector to take proper measures for removing the evil. Traders generally keep two pairs of scales, one correct and one false, and thus deceive the poor customer. At present the only safeguard against fraud in this matter lies in the necessity under which all traders are to bring annually before the police their scales and weights. But this safeguard is insufficient inasmuch as there is nothing to prevent a trader from keeping a false set of weights and measures in his shop.

Requests Government to establish a branch post office in the city of Poona empowered to cash money orders.

The Dnyán Prakásh (8) of the 16th August complains that great inconvenience is caused to the public of Poona by being compelled to go to the general post office in the camp to cash money orders, and requests Government to remove the cause of complaint by establishing a branch office in the city empowered to cash money orders.

Necessity of having a postal letter-box attached to the mixed trains of the Rajputána-Málwa Railway.

The Hitechchhu (77) of Ahmedabad of the 16th August points out the inconvenience arising from there being no postal letter-box attached to the mixed trains running on the Rajputána-Málwa Railway line, and says that while all the trains of the B. B. & C. I., the G. I. P. and other railways carry a letter-box, it seems strange that the mixed trains of the Rajputána-Málwa Railway should not do so. It is to be hoped that the railway authorities and the travelling postal department will speedily supply the want.

The Indu Prakásh (9) of the 13th August says:—The Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal is nothing if not imprudent. He has yet to learn that, as a public servant charged with very serious official responsibilities, he should hold his tongue on questions the solution of which rests with authorities higher than himself. Lord Ripon, in spite of the taunts and misrepresentations to which wicked malice has endeavoured to expose him, has remained silent, and since his speech in the Legislative Council on the 8th of March last he has not said anything either in favour of or against the Bill. He has allowed the agitators on either side free play, although he could have, if he had wished, gone out of his way and encouraged the advocates of the Bill to push on their agitation vigorously. Had he done this, what a mad cry would the opponents of the Bill have got up? And yet here is a subordinate authority, Mr. Rivers Thompson, the Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal, acting the very objectionable part of an inciter of race-jealousies and taking advantage of his official position to say things which cannot but have an unfortunate effect at this moment. The municipal commissioners of a certain place give him an address, and his reply to them is all made up of comments on the Ilbert Bill. The Bill is bad and it should be withdrawn because it foments race feelings, and so long as it is before the public it will set the European community against Natives. This is the strain in which Mr. Thompson speaks in his reply to the address. The municipality has nothing to do with the Bill, and Mr. Thompson's allusion to it, and especially to the question of race feeling, was therefore quite irrelevant, and politically speaking, the allusion was both imprudent and silly. Mr. Thompson may personally oppose the Bill, but surely he is not paid out of the revenues of British India to encourage a community in its opposition to the Government of the land. Honest and at the same time firm administration will become impossible in this country if every shortsighted official be allowed to break the bonds of official discipline and to talk of things on which sound policy demands that he, as a servant of Government, should hold his tongue. [The Rást Goftár (111) of the 12th August also censures Mr. Rivers Thompson for his remarks and says that he ought to be recalled from his office of Lieutenant-Governor for having incited the opponents of the Ilbert Bill against Natives. Should not the Viceroy take a subordinate of his to task for the objectionable manner in which he has encouraged the Anglo-Indian agitators? In another article the writer quotes an extract from a speech recently delivered by Mr. Keswick in the Town Hall of Calcutta, and says that if the Viceroy quietly puts up with the threats given out in this speech the contagion of disloyalty will spread largely. It must be remembered that the Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal is at one with these Anglo-Indians, and therefore it is advisable that Government should take timely notice of this small beginning of a "white mutiny."]

Disapproves of the conduct of the Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal in expressing his views on the Native Magistrates' Jurisdiction Bill in his reply to an address presented to him by the municipal commissioners of a certain town.

Local Self-government.

The Indian Spectator (1) of the 12th August again expresses disapproval of the wide powers and the arbitrary and unreasonable control retained by Government in their own hands and those of the Collectors, and remarks:—The enlightened public think that the provisions, as they go, will defeat the object of the Bill and make local self-government a dismal farce. Infinitessimal concessions will not do. A generous policy is expedient, consistent with the present condition of progress in the Presidency generally. But Government say: "Thus far and no farther." It is to be hoped that the independent legislators in the Council will succeed in exploding the theory of extreme caution and in removing all fears on the subject. Though provision is made in Section 6 regarding the members who will be qualified to sit on the local boards, no mention whatever is made of the number of persons to be elected in each táluka or district board. We think the limit should be laid down in each case. Twenty-four elected members for a táluka local board and eighteen for a district board will give a very fair representation. Government may then have the choice of nominating their own members as they like. It will be a small matter whether one-fourth of the number which Government will have the power of appointing to táluka or district boards are wholly or partially Government servants. But we beg to protest against the power to fix the number of persons that should be elected for táluka or district boards which Government intend, as the Bill at present stands, to keep in their own hands. Of course, in the Statement of Objects and Reasons, they make a great show of the difficulty in fixing the limit in the body of the Act. This very plausible plea has been dinned into the ears of the people till they have grown sick of it. But after all, may we ask whether the public ought unhesitatingly to accept the ipse dixit of Government in such grave matters? Past experience does not warrant this course. The people declare that there are no insuperable difficulties in the way of the Governor in Council making tolerably hard and fast rules and embodying them in the Act instead of allowing them to be framed hereafter. The very fact of this astute reticence leaves an unpleasant suspicion in the minds of the public as to the ultimate action of Government. Promises have been made before simply to be written in water. Not to mention other instances, we will give only one in connection with the District Municipal Act, which was enacted fourteen years ago. It was therein declared that the Governor in Council would, from time to time, raise the status of municipalities in places where progress and civilization became visible. Yet not a single town had the privilege of election conferred on it till last year after the sharp controversy regarding the introduction of the scheme of local self-government in this Presidency. It is this experience of the past that suggests grave distrust as to what Government may declare in grave State documents. The less that power is reserved to it under "rules," the better for the public. Again, as regards Section 9, if local bodies are to be independent, why should they not have the power of entering into leases without the approval of the Commissioner? Why must his aid be invoked in even such a business matter as leasing properties? In every provision you are with one hand given the semblance of power and with the other hand virtually deprived of it. Government say that they have great fear of such bodies entering into improvident or even ruinous leases. Two questions may here be asked. First, how many have been the instances in which district municipalities have thus abused the powers conferred on them to lease properties? If there have been many, which we have doubts, then we are willing to own that some check by the Commissioner is required. The provision can scarcely preserve the independence which Government wish local boards to acquire. If, as good businessmen, local or district boards cannot even enter into leases without permission from the Commissioner, they do not deserve to be entrusted with the management of local affairs. Secondly, it may be asked whether Commissioners or Collectors have not been guilty of the same charge as Government have laid at the doors of district municipalities? Have there been no instances of such officials having disposed of State properties for a song, or entered into improvident leases? Let the independent representative associations in the Presidency hunt up instances of such irregularities and submit them to Government as a set-off against the allegations as to unbusiness-like procedure of district municipalities. [The Hitechchhu (77) of Ahmedabad of the 16th August disapproves of the wide powers retained by Government in their hands and expresses a hope that members of Council will take steps to curtail the powers so reserved.]

Criticises the Bombay Local Boards Bill.

The Indu Prakásh (9) of the 13th August says:—The Bill creates three divisions of electors:—(1) Municipal commissioners, (2) electors proper under Section 10, and (3) Inámdárs. To secure uniformity and give all táluka towns and villages a fair share in the administration of their local funds, it is desirable that these towns, like the villages, should themselves be grouped into a set of villages for the purposes of election. There ought to be no exclusion of any kind whatever. The municipalities as municipalities ought to have no representation allowed them in the boards. Where the interests of a municipality are identical with those of a táluka board they ought to be settled by them, and if they differ the Collector should have the right to finally settle the question. But there ought to be no confusion in the constitution of either, created by the representatives of the one being elected to sit and vote at the meetings of the other. It may be contended that a single member representing a municipality in a táluka board counts comparatively for nothing as far as his power to get the board to undertake some work that ought to be done by the municipality goes. But it should be remembered that municipal commissioners are generally men residing in towns, and, as a class, they are more intelligent and shrewd than village representatives. One member of this class sitting in a táluka board may, by using his influence or powers of persuasion at the meetings of the táluka board, get that body to spend its money on purposes the cost of which should properly be borne by the municipality which the said member represents. In a given táluka board the village representatives will numerically outnumber the municipal representatives, but it is necessary that the administration of local boards should be freed, as far as possible, from all disturbing or conflicting influences. By giving municipalities a share in the administration of local funds, however slight the extent of that share, the Legislature will be fostering the idea that municipalities have a right to expect assistance from those funds. If local funds are to be used more for the purposes of the village than of the town population, every precaution should be taken to minimize the influences of those interested in supplying the wants of towns having municipalities. Táluka boards will be represented in district boards by men selected from outside those boards. The reason of this provision disqualifying any member of a táluka board from sitting in the district board as the representative of the former seems to be that district boards being located in district towns, which are generally at a great distance from táluka towns where táluka boards will be located, no member of the latter class of boards will or can undertake to visit the district towns so as to attend the meetings of district boards. And on this score we have nothing to urge against the constitution of district boards. But the real defect of the constitution sketched above lies in the probable danger that the representatives of táluka boards will come in conflict with the representatives of municipalities as in the case of táluka boards. In fact, both in táluka local boards and in district local boards there is a chance of local funds being appropriated to purposes which are purely municipal. Moreover, we fail to understand why Inamdárs or owners of entire alienated villages should have the double set of rights given them of electing a representative to táluka as well as to district boards. Our proposal in fact stands thus:—(a) Táluka local boards should consist of elected and nominated members, the former to consist of members elected by groups of villages in the táluka, the táluka town being for this purpose divided into such groups, and one representative of the Inámdárs in the táluka where the number of Inámdárs is (say) 20, two representatives where the number is 40, and so on. (b) District local boards should consist of representatives of táluka boards only, selected by the elected and nominated members of táluka boards. In this way the táluka boards will be enabled to look more after the wants of the villages than of the táluka towns, and the district boards will be representative of the táluka boards only. It is hard to understand why Government should have the right to nominate members for district boards in addition to the right to nominate their members for táluka boards. Having nominated members for táluka boards, Government ought to let those members choose their men to represent them in district boards. This will familiarize the nominated members of táluka boards with the elective franchise.

Criticises the Bombay Local Boards Bill.

The Dnyán Prakásh (8) of the 13th August says:—As regards clause (b), Section 30, we suggest that hospitals expressly maintained for the benefit of civil and military officers, such for instance as the Sassoon Hospital at Poona, should be excluded from the operation of this clause. As regards clause (c), it should be distinctly stated that irrigation works are not to be included under the term "tanks and water-works." As regards clause (d), the wording should be more precise and accurate so as to include primary schools only. As regards clause (e), we object to it in toto, as the matters mentioned therein fall within the scope of the duties of the Provincial and Imperial Governments. Model farms are an expensive concern, and horse and cattle breeding operations have for their object the supply of remounts for cavalry and also for Commissariat purposes, objects of strictly Imperial military importance, and charges for which should in no case fall upon local revenues. As regards the last item mentioned in this clause, viz. the introduction and preservation of fish, we are surprised at the temerity of the Bombay Government in inserting such an item after its attempt to legislate upon such a subject two years ago was defeated by the Government of India vetoing Mr. Ashburner's pet child, the late ill-fated Game and Fish Preservation Bill. We object to this clause also on the ground that no precedent for it can be found in the Central Provinces Local Self-government Act or in any of the Bills for the other provinces which are now pending in the Viceregal Legislative Council. As regards clause (f), we cannot object to it if its operation is confined to road-side trees only. As regards clause (g), we object to it in toto. Famine expenditure is a Provincial and Imperial charge, and no portion of it should be thrown upon local revenues. The sad experience of the past ought to be a sufficient warning in this respect. With the exception of this clause there is nothing to be said against the amended section in question. One important addition is necessary in Section 31 like the corresponding provision in Section 26 of the Municipal Bill. Section 31 of the Local Boards Bill ought to provide for four ordinary quarterly meetings of local boards being held every year in January, April, July and October. Now that the sphere of the duties of local boards is going to be considerably enlarged, such a provision appears to us to be essentially necessary. Section 32 of the Local Boards Bill and Section 27 of the Municipal Bill render it obligatory upon the bodies concerned to give previous notice of their meetings to the Executive Engineer and the Educational Inspector of the district, so that if they deem it necessary they may attend the meetings. These very sections render it obligatory upon the two above-mentioned officers to attend the meetings of the said bodies when a special notice requiring their attendance is sent to them. These sections take effect only if the two officers are not members of those bodies. This is exactly as it should be. We propose, however, that Deputy Sanitary Commissioners and District Collectors also should be included in the operations of these sections when they are not members of these bodies. So far as questions regarding sanitation and medical charity are concerned, these bodies will require the advice of Deputy Sanitary Commissioners. Provision should therefore be made in the section itself for securing the attendance of these officers at the meetings of these bodies. As regards District Collectors their assistance too may at times prove very valuable.

The same of the 16th August says:—The reader is aware that it is proposed to transfer provincial and imperial roads and buildings to local management, and with a view to facilitate this transfer Section 40 has been inserted. But it is very strangely defective in one very important particular. The section makes no mention whatever of the necessity of securing the assent of a local board to any such prospective transfer. Such previous assent on the part of the local board concerned is in our opinion absolutely necessary before any transfer under the section in question is effected; otherwise there is no guarantee that justice will be done to local boards in effecting such transfers. A strong-minded and at the same time high-handed ruler like our late Governor, Sir Richard Temple, supported by an equally strong-minded Secretary like the late Secretary of the Public Works Department, General Sir Michael Kennedy, may at any time under financial pressure effect undesirable transfers under cover of the section as it stands at present. In times of financial exigency the temptation to deal unfairly with local boards will prove too strong to be resisted. It must therefore be distinctly provided in the section that except with the previous consent of the local board concerned no moveable or immoveable property shall be vested in that board by a mere notification in the Government Gazette.

Criticises the Bombay Local Boards Bill.

The Mahrátta (2) of the 12th August once more points out the necessity of early publication of the draft rules to be framed under the Local Self-government Bill, and remarks:—Unless Government intend to use the power reserved to them freely and liberally, we fail to see how the new constitution of local boards is better calculated than the old one to encourage local independence, which it is the main object of the local self-government scheme to promote. The appointment of a vice-president in case the president is a salaried officer is indeed a check; but his duties are left to be determined by the president, who can thus make him a non-entity if he please. Very little can also be expected of the managing committee and the chairman appointed by the commissioners, the majority of whom will be nominated. Things will therefore go on as before without any change, except that the position of the president will be more strengthened as he will then be supposed to have done everything with the consent of the majority of members, at least half of whom will be elected. Neither can the public be blamed for such a result, as the rules for electing members will be such as to preclude the possibility of local intelligence being utilized in the case of district boards. The danger is distinctly indicated in paragraph 10 of the first resolution of the Government of India on the subject, and we wonder how it should have been lost sight of in framing the constitution of district boards. We propose that the members of district boards should be residents of the place in which the committee will hold its sittings, or at any rate they should be residents of places in the vicinity. This can be secured by allowing the committees the option of electing their delegates from out of their body, just as the electors in the táluka and the Inámdárs have been allowed to do. The proportion of the elected to the nominated members should also be greater in the more advanced districts. The districts, the municipalities in the principal towns of which have been raised to the status of city municipalities, may be allowed to elect at least two-thirds of the members of their boards, a greater portion of which should be resident in or near the head-quarter station of the committee. This will ensure a respectable attendance of independent members. The presidents of the boards in these districts should be allowed to be elected, or in case Government persist in having nominated presidents, the proportion of the elected members should be further increased to three-fourths in order to counterbalance the official influence of the presidents. The duties of the vice-president and the managing committee should be clearly defined. The vice-president and the managing committee should be invested with greater powers of superintendence and control, the president, when nominated, having but a general power of supervision only. A greater portion of elected members resident in or near the place, a vice-president and a managing committee having real power, and a nominal supervision of the president, will thus call forth greater independence on the part of local bodies, which it is the aim of the local self-government scheme to promote. If Government do not wish to make a farce of the new committees some such changes as those above suggested must be adopted.

Makes certain suggestions for securing publicity to the provisions of the Local Boards Bill and finds fault with the Maráthi translation of the Bill published by Government.

The Bakul (16) of the 12th August recommends that Mámlatdárs and other officials should be charged with the work of explaining to the leading inhabitants in towns and villages the provisions of the Bombay Local Boards Bill, and that hand-bills explanatory of the different provisions of the Bill should be freely distributed. The Bakul then condemns the Maráthi translation of the Bill as incomprehensible in parts. After quoting a few instances in support of its assertion, the Bakul observes that many more examples may be given. The translation moreover contains too many Persian words, and is defective in grammar and phraseology.

Criticises the Bombay District Municipal Act Amendment Bill.

The Mahrátta (2) of the 12th August says:—Self-government appears to be an empty dream and the Bill really puzzles us most when we come to the third chapter of it. The ability of the pen that drafted the Bill here asserts itself to the fullest extent. Not a particle of real power is practically transferred to municipalities. These remain as they were, if their hands have not been more tightened. The same sad tale of a restless passion for centralization of power is to be heard. What we ask for is an open and honest declaration by Government as to what the standard is by which we are to be judged, and which should be determined once for all. As matters stand at present, we have to depend upon the pleasure and good will of District Collectors and Divisional Commissioners. So far as the third chapter goes we are sure Mr. Peile will have at once to admit that he has failed, inasmuch as these sections are hard and fast and as such do not appear of a piece with the first part. The sections regarding control are still more so. This chapter has made no alterations in regard to advanced towns, whereas some alterations were necessary. We urge that just as the power of making bye-laws is confined to municipalities having a population of over 10,000 souls, the power of not requiring the sanction of Government to the rules framed by these bodies may be given to first class municipalities. It must, however, be provided that copies of such rules as may be passed by them should be sent to Government, who may, for a few years to come, exercise the power of vetoing whenever they think fit. A corresponding extension of power should be made in the case of the ten more advanced towns recently raised to the level of cities. Before the municipalities finally pass any rules, they must publish them in the local papers and invite criticism from the people within a fortnight from the date of such publication.

We urge that just as the power of making bye-laws

Municipalities.

Advises the Bombay Municipality to again memorialize the Secretary of State for India on the subject of the appropriation by the Bombay Government of Rs. 15,000 out of the police grant towards the working of the Contagious Diseases Act.

The Indu Prakásh (9) of the 13th August says:—The enterprise of the Bombay Gazette has put the public in possession of the entire correspondence on the subject of the police grant, which the Government of Bombay has been chary in publishing, and the correspondence as published shows clearly the reason of the desire of the Bombay Government to withhold it from the public. This correspondence calls once more to mind the peculiarly narrow and illiberal temper which our Local Government showed last year in the discussion of the local self-government scheme. Seeing that our Local Government has been treated to some choice unpalatable bits of criticism, and that on the whole it has been worsted in the contest, we are not surprised that it should be so eager to burke the whole question and if possible avoid looking small in the eyes of its subjects. The more manly course for the Bombay Government would have been to publish the whole correspondence and acknowledge unreservedly its mistake. But the Government, in its wisdom, thought otherwise, and it has now the humiliation to see the whole portion of this unpleasant chapter of history laid bare, which it so particularly desired to cover over. It is very refreshing to find that the high-handed proceeding of the Local Government has met with its deserts. The despatches of the Government of India and the successive Secretaries of State are replete with salutary reproof and advice. The action of the Bombay Government is characterized by both as impolitic, not fair to the Corporation, in violation of a distinct understanding and in contravention of their wishes, and the peccant authorities of the Bombay Government are directed to withdraw their orders. That there was a fair precedent for the Bombay Government to follow cannot be denied. Lord Lytton realized a famine fund under solemn pledges and spent it upon a frivolous war as soon as he got the money fast in his grip. But Lord Hartington would have played false to the principles advocated by his party four years ago had he sanctioned the doing of the Bombay Government. This, we think, is a sufficiently wholesome lesson, which the Local Government will do well to learn. It will remind our local autocrats that, however much they may wish it, they cannot rule without a proper sense of responsibility. It teaches a good lesson to the people also. It proves the importance of constitutional agitation, and shows that if any wrong is done to them their efforts to obtain redress will not be fruitless. In the excellent system of British administration, wherein there is a graduated distribution of power and authority, one need never despair of securing justice and right due to him. There is a remedy given to the meanest of Her Majesty's subjects to obtain redress from the oppression of the lowest as well as the highest official. Occasionally the remedy is not as efficacious as the individual injured desires it to be, and we have known of many a wronged person pining hopelessly for justice. In fact, the see-no-cause-to-interfere form of reply has become quite proverbial. But in the majority of such cases we think the fault lies mostly in the manner of using the remedy and not in the remedy itself. In the despatch of Lord Hartington there is a direction to the Bombay Government to refund the sums hitherto retrenched. This order has been cancelled by the present Secretary of State on a request by the Local Government to reconsider the first decision. We venture to think this order is inconsistent with the first order and the Secretary of State may not unreasonably be asked to reconsider it. With the greatest respect to the Noble Lord who now rules the India Office, we think that to ask the Bombay Government to refund the money wrongly taken is not a strong measure, but one of bare justice to the wronged party. What consolation is it to the Bombay Municipality to be told that it was unjustly deprived of its money by Government, but that it cannot get it back now? Such an act of spoliation ought not, we venture to think, be condoned. We trust our energetic members of the Town Council and the Corporation will bestir themselves and again memorialize the Secretary of State. We think it not unlikely that their efforts will be crowned with success. It is not so much a matter of money as of principle that we should like our Corporation to fight and obtain a refund of the money appropriated by Government.

Cholera in Bombay.

The Káside Mumbai (104) of the 15th August says that it has become a habit with the local municipality to take measures to remove stinking refuse from the quarters inhabited by poor people when cholera actually appears. The carts conveying refuse from the city are a great nuisance, and the offensive stench emanating from the filthy matter removed from dust-bins is a fruitful source of cholera. No endeavours are made by the municipality to take preventive measures, but when cholera appears in the city, ineffective steps are taken for checking it. How far these measures succeed is a fact very well known to the people. [The same of the 6th August, but received on the 17th idem, complains that the municipality attends to the cleanliness of main roads and European quarters to the neglect of the quarters inhabited by Natives, and draws its attention to the filthy state of the Navgar street, Mázgaon. The road stands in want of repair and lighting. As filthy water and mud have accumulated in the street, fears are entertained of cholera raging there with great vehemence if the municipality neglects to attend to their removal.]

Comments on the conduct of Government towards the municipal commissioners of Nadiád in the matter of their opposition to the abandonment of the present system of underground privies.

The Gujarát Mitrá (76) of the 12th August says that the recent proceedings of the municipality of Nadiád in the matter of underground privies show how the authorities are opposed to the development of a feeling of independence among the people. It is said that a member of the municipality of Nadiád moved for the maintenance of the present system of underground privies in the town in accordance with the views of the general public, but when official influence was brought to bear upon him he withdrew his motion. The motion was then taken up by the elected commissioners and was passed by a majority of the committee. The Collector-president, being discomfited, was very much displeased, and wrote to Government complaining of the antagonistic attitude of the representatives of the people towards measures which were sanctioned by sanitary laws. Thereupon Government administered a severe reprimand to the municipality of Nadiád, and threatened the commissioners that if they persisted in such unreasonable opposition to reasonable measures the municipality would be reduced to the status of a town municipality and thus would lose its elective franchise. This was tantamount to saying that Government would act as they liked and would allow their officers to pursue their irresponsible course of action. What, are the scenes of Mr. Ashburner's career going to be re-enacted during the Honourable Mr. Peile's regime? Or is this the work of our Rája Báhádur Sheppard? It is to be hoped, though it does not appear to us to be so, that Government have proceeded in this matter after full consideration. Do the authorities intend to improve the sanitation of Nadiád? If so, there are other matters more important than underground privies which call for their attention. Let them first direct their attention to the present filthy condition of roads, to measures for draining the rain water from the surface of the town, and other minor sanitary improvements. If the municipal commissioners of Nadiád opposed the scheme for the abandonment of underground privies on those considerations we see no reason to find fault with them, but we think that the order of Government above alluded to was ill-advised and hasty. We hope Government will reconsider their order in the light of the circumstances above mentioned. Surely Government ought to have assisted the new commissioners by their counsel, considering that they are yet unaccustomed to the privileges conferred on them.

A complaint against the Surat Municipality.

The Vartamán Sár (121) of the 14th August says that though cholera has made its appearance in Surat, and though the sanitary committee has sanctioned certain expenditure for providing cholera mixture at police stations and for removing mud from the streets, the districts of Máchhlipit, Sháhpor and Wánkibordi continue to emit offensive odours. So much rotten mud has accumulated in these districts and so much nuisance prevails that it is difficult for the people to bear them. The municipality ought to remove the rotten mud and throw disinfecting powder over it.

Some suggestions to the municipality of Surat.

The Nyáyá Prakásh (109) of the 13th August complains that some milk-sellers of Surat adulterate their supply of fresh milk with water or stale milk, points out the injury which the use of such adulterated milk does to mankind, and requests the local municipality to bring the offenders to justice. If the municipality were to engage the services of an inspector for the purpose, it would know to what extent this practice prevails in the city. Adulteration in ghee is also on the increase. [The same expresses disapproval of the contemplated erection of a new distillery near the railway station at Surat, and expresses fears of the outbreak of some epidemic in the city owing to the stench emanating from it. Government should appoint a sanitary committee to report upon the project of this distillery and should then take further steps in the matter.]

Native States.

Says that the Rája of Rájpipla has ruined his State.

The Indian Spectator (1) of the 12th August says:—The days of the Rája of Rájpipla seem to be numbered. To judge by recent events, he must be incorrigible. It was about four years ago that the people were first driven to appeal to Government for protection from their own Chief. Government remonstrated with His Highness and suggested certain reforms. The grievances of Rájpipla, according to the petitions of the people, are the vicious system of farming the revenues, the selling of offices to the highest bidders, the compounding of crimes for nuzzurs, the imposition of illegal and unbearable burdens, the employment of unworthy servants, and the raising of transit and other duties at will. This makes a catalogue of crimes dark enough to be at once noticed. But when to them are added other sins of omission and commission referred to in the petitions, viz., an utter neglect of education, sanitation, &c., and a most rapacious and arbitrary dealing with the ryots, it will cause no small wonder to the public to consider how such a state of matters could have been allowed to continue. We blame no one. The Political Agents have done their duty. The Government of Bombay claims credit, which we cheerfully allow it, for the exercise of rare forbearance. Popular grievances have been referred to the Rája for redress, and he has been warned, time after time, to mend his ways. But the Rája has done nothing beyond recording these remonstrances. At last, when pressed hard, His Highness took to him an educated Diwán. The latter has tried his best, we are told by the petitioners themselves, to listen to their grievances and to raise the tone of the administration generally. But he is powerless. He cannot employ the best available officers, nor can he dismiss the worst already in service. The accounts we have received of late are disheartening. The ryots are pouring out into the Gáikwád's territories, despairing of all relief. The revenue has been reduced to half of what it was before. The Rája robs his people right and left! By this time he must have half a kror of rupees. He goes on adding to his hoards and to his already well-stocked zenána of half a dozen Ránis and besides many quasi-queens. He has squeezed his servants, they say, and the servants have squeezed the people till the latter have been driven to make one final appeal both to the Government of Bombay and the Government of India. From enquiries of our own we are satisfied that the Rája is incapable of improvement. As a trial Government may give him an English joint administrator; no Native can manage him. Perhaps the best plan will be to give the management to his son, if fit, with an experienced Native or European as his colleague and a trustworthy Diwán. Rája Gambhirsingji may be brought down to Bombay with as much money as he can carry with him, and he may play the Rája here to his heart's content with his favourite courtiers around. He has nearly been the ruin of a first class State; and though, in recommending his removal, a Native journalist must naturally feel the deepest regret, we cannot help saying that any further consideration or sympathy will be wasted on this misguided prince. Government may, however, appoint a commission of enquiry composed of a few independent Native gentlemen with an English president, and then see what they can do best. But the people must be protected and the State of Rájpipla saved from wholesale desertion.

Approves of the reported resolution of the Government of India in the matter of the massacre of the Maiyás by the Junágad police.

The Bombay Samáchár (86) of the 18th August observes that the reported resolution of the Government of India condemning the conduct of the Junágad Darbár in connection with the late massacre of the Maiyás and dismissing from their respective posts the Diwán, Náib-Diwán and the Superintendent of Police cannot but meet with the hearty approval of the public. The Darbár and its officials were condemned by the public and the resolution of the Government of India confirms that condemnation. They may be pitied for the treatment they have now received, but their ugly conduct fully deserves it. Native princes and chiefs ought to take a lesson from the Junágad incident that carelessness or improper conduct on their part towards their subjects will not pass unnoticed by the Native public, and will not fail to bring on their own heads the condemnation they deserve for the same, even if they be basking in the sunshine of the good graces of the political officers of the paramount Government. Native princes and chiefs should therefore ever exert themselves to please not only the British officials but their subjects also. [The Jáme Jamshed (100) and the Akhbáre Sodágar (82) of the same date express somewhat similar sentiments.]

Berár Affairs.

Suggests the publication of official cholera returns and season reports through the vernacular newspapers of the province.

The Pramod Sindhu (52) of the 13th August is thankful to the Berár Administration for communicating to the vernacular newspapers of the province civil, criminal and revenue circular orders, and requests the authorities to publish through the same medium other information which it is desirable the public should know. Cholera prevails now-a-days in numerous places in the province, and in the absence of any reliable information about it various rumours prevail about the mischief caused by it. The Civil Surgeons receive weekly reports about the prevalence of the epidemic, and if they are at once furnished to the newspapers much of the anxiety felt on the subject will be abated. Official season reports ought also to be communicated to newspapers as they are published very late in the Residency Orders, which have not such an extensive circulation as the provincial newspapers have. The absence of official information on this subject created great anxiety about the damage caused by the late heavy rains. The attention of the Berár authorities is requested to the above suggestions.

Disapproves of the order issued by the Berár authorities calling upon Tahsildárs and others to deposit cash in the place of the sureties at present furnished by them.

With reference to the order issued by the Berár authorities calling upon Tahsildárs, Deputy Tahsildárs, Treasurers, Potdárs, Názirs and kárkuns serving under the last-named officers to deposit cash in the place of the sureties at present furnished by them, the Pramod Sindhu (52) of the 13th August observes that this order will create great hardship. The salaries received by most of these subordinates are small and the sums they are called upon to deposit are in comparison to their salaries very large. They will not therefore be able to deposit any sums of their own, and will have to resort to loans from others. In the first place, these officials are prohibited from incurring debts, and even if Government give them permission to obtain loans they will find considerable difficulty in getting them, and even if they succeed they will have to pay heavy rates of interest. The system of receiving sureties is safe enough, provided due care is taken to see that the sureties are substantial. It is therefore to be hoped that the authorities will hold the new order in abeyance until they have truly judged of the difficulties likely to be experienced by the above-named officials in trying to comply with it.

Notes.—A. The notices from the different Newspapers have been collected in the Report under different heads, which are printed in italics.

B. The names of Newspapers are printed in the body of the Report in italics, and the number of the Newspaper in the above list is printed in brackets after the name.

C. The proprietors of the Newspapers marked * have not given information as to the number of copies issued. In these cases an estimate has been made by the Reporter.

D. The system of spelling vernacular words followed by the Reporter is the same as that adopted in the Official Spelling List of the Bombay Presidency. One peculiar feature of this system is that when the long a (आ or ा) is the last letter of a word, the accent is left out, and the short a (अ = u in gun) is, to prevent confusion, never placed at the end of a word. This rule has been strictly followed, except that when the short a appears to be absolutely necessary to complete the pronunciation of a word, as in Arunodaya or the well known Mitra, it is printed with a mark over it to indicate that it is short, thus—a.

Politics and the Public Administration.

Mentions the chief causes of discord between Europeans and Natives.

The Kaiser-i-Hind (103) of the 19th August observes that the chief causes of discord existing between Europeans and Natives in India may be stated as follows:—Every European, whether of high or low rank, on arriving in India considers himself to be of a race superior to that of Natives, and expects that Natives should be obedient to him. On the other hand, the Natives of all ranks are generally afraid of Europeans and try to secure the good graces of the latter. Instead of being thankful to Natives for their obedience to him, a European, getting vexed by the sultry weather and the manners and customs of the country, which he does not look upon with favour, loses his temper and not only abuses but sometimes assaults Natives. If the latter bear this sort of treatment mildly they are denounced as mean cowards; if they do not brook it and oppose the wrath of the European they are denounced as disloyal murderers and are punished. If a case of assault by a European on a Native is taken to a court of justice, the judge or magistrate, who is also a European, acquits the accused, and this creates dissatisfaction among Natives. In the few cases in which Europeans who commit assaults are punished, their countrymen raise loud complaints of injustice. The English law concedes but to the properly constituted courts of justice the right to punish an offender, but a hot-tempered European, and even a common Eurasian, takes the law into his own hands and punishes his servants in any way he likes. Again, Europeans who go on hunting excursions are a source of great annoyance to the people. The rural populations are ignorant and illiterate, and they are looked upon by some European sportsmen as brutes. The sportsmen injure the crops by walking through cultivated fields, forcibly enter the huts of the villagers to quench their thirst, take fruit from the trees to satisfy their hunger, shoot tame animals or even men when wild beasts are not found. If an injured cultivator confronts the sportsman with his sorrowful tale, he is beaten and sometimes even killed. Natives are naturally timid, but if by unbearable oppression they are driven to make an assault upon a sportsman or to detain him in custody, they are accused of and punished for an attempt to plunder or murder. European offenders are seldom convicted of assaulting or murdering Natives, and when the crime is proved against them, they are either allowed to go scot-free or are lightly punished. The Commander-in-Chief of India appears to have devised some measures to prevent sad occurrences happening from European soldiers going on hunting excursions, but they do not appear to be calculated to prevent soldiers from acting in a high-handed manner towards villagers. It is also necessary that the Legislature should think of enacting a law with the view of securing satisfactory relations between European masters and their Native servants.

Requests Government to publish detailed accounts of the income and liabilities of Mahárája Dhuleep Singh and to allow him to enjoy his contemplated visit to India freely.

The Indu Prakásh (9) of the 20th August alludes to the recent discussion in Parliament on the subject of the intention of Mahárája Dhuleep Singh to visit India, and says that nobody can avoid being surprised at the facts brought to light during the debate. What is most surprising is that the Under Secretary of State, when asked by Sir G. Balfour to place before the House a detailed account of the liabilities of the Mahárája, openly replied that Government had no desire to comply with the requisition. During the debate the Under Secretary intimated that Her Majesty's Government had from time to time advanced considerable sums of money to the Mahárája, and that very recently a loan of 6 lákhs of rupees was granted by a special Act of Parliament. The assertions of the Under Secretary may be true; but if there has been no underhand dealing in the matter of the moneys actually due to the Mahárája and those actually advanced, why should such a secret be made of those accounts? The circumstance that Her Majesty's Government is unwilling to place these accounts before the public will create a suspicion that there is something in them which Government wish should not see the light of the day. It is also said that the Mahárája has been receiving ever since 1859 an annual pension of 2½ lákhs of rupees, but it is not explained why the amount should have been so much short of the stipulated sum of 4 lákhs. On the whole it appears advisable that Government should publish all the details of the income and liabilities of the Mahárája. One of the conditions imposed on the Mahárája's visit to India is that his movements in this country shall be regulated by the directions of the Governor General. It is undeniable that Mahárája Dhuleep Singh's object in contemplating the present visit is to see his mother-country. It is plain that he intends to see with his own eyes the province ruled by his ancestors and himself, and the people inhabiting it. It is also true and natural that the present condition of the Mahárája and an account of his distressful plight will move the hearts of the Panjábis. But it is not known whether such a result will accord with the wishes of Government. Judging from the general tenor of Lord Ripon's administration, there is reason to believe that His Lordship will find nothing strange in such a result. It is, however, not unlikely that some member of the Viceregal Council will not countenance such a state of things, and as his opinion will carry some weight it is difficult to anticipate the Viceroy's decision in the matter. In these circumstances Mahárája Dhuleep Singh will do well to submit to the Government of India a programme of what he intends doing in India, and after it is properly scrutinized he should see whether the principal object of his visit is likely to be accomplished under the conditions imposed by Government. If the Mahárája's relegation to England is based on the same policy as that which actuated Government when they sent Bájiráo to Bithur, Malhár Ráo to Madras, and Arabi Pasha to Ceylon, then there is no chance of the Mahárája receiving permission to visit the Panjáb. Government should, however, take a note of the fact that there is no harm in allowing deposed Native princes like Dhuleep Singh to visit their mother-land. The British rule has taken a deep root in the Panjáb, the Mahárája has become a Christian and has no followers, and it is not likely that the people can be so impulsive as to create any disturbance on account of the visit of their former ruler. It is therefore to be hoped that Government will not come in the way of a free enjoyment of his visit by the Mahárája. [The Jáme Jamshed (100) of the 20th August says that there is no objection to Mahárája Dhuleep Singh being permitted to visit India if his object be simply that of visiting his mother-land. The Mahárája's claim to a higher allowance than that hitherto received by him is untenable and has been rightly refused by the British Government.]

Recommends a further reduction in the duty levied on salt.

The Lok Mitrá (78) of the 19th August observes:—As everyone qualified to pronounce an opinion on the subject confidently expected, the reduction of the salt duty has led to an increased consumption of that most useful and necessary commodity and to a corresponding increase in the revenue derived from that source. It was apprehended in some quarters that the reduction of the duty would unfavourably affect the revenue derived from that source, but the apprehensions have not been realised. Though the people are thankful for what has already been done to place the article within the reach of the poorest classes, there can be no doubt that the duty, such as it is, does not admit of a consumption which a further reduction will undoubtedly ensure; and now that the result of the first experiment has proved so satisfactory and encouraging, it may be hoped that Government will see their way to effecting a further reduction.

Says that Sir Louis Mallet ought to have been raised to a baronetcy.

The Bombay Chronicle (75) of the 19th August observes that Sir Louis Mallet has fully deserved by his high abilities and great usefulness the honour of being appointed a member of the Privy Council. It would certainly have looked more graceful if he had been raised to a baronetcy. This title, which is lavishly conferred on much less deserving individuals—the favourites of the court and the ministry of the day—year after year, would have been a well-deserved reward of long and meritorious services rendered by Sir Louis to the people of England and India.

Some suggestions for ensuring the success of agricultural banks.

The Shetakari (60) for the month of July, commenting on the discussion in the Viceregal Legislative Council on the subject of agricultural banks, says:—Sir Stuart Bayley says, and says rightly, that there is no provision in the new scheme for the advance of loans to agriculturists for purposes other than agricultural, and that their land, their only property, having been once mortgaged to the banks, they will not be able to get money from the sávkárs for the celebration of marriages and other religious rites and for the payment of Government dues. The ryots will thus be deterred from taking advantage of the banks. It not unfrequently occurs that the ryots are able to secure loans from the sávkárs without being under the necessity of mortgaging their land, and in such cases it is folly to expect that they will undergo all the trouble involved in the procedure of securing loans from the banks. It is only when the credit of the ryots is at a very low ebb that the sávkárs do not advance money without having some security. Besides, under the new scheme the claims of the banks are allowed the first place amongst those of mortgagees, and it is natural that the sávkárs should shrink from advancing loans on the security of lands on which they have only a secondary claim. If Government are in right earnest in the matter of affording pecuniary relief to the agricultural classes, they should organize the constitution of agricultural banks on the model of the ordinary transactions of sávkárs and should even make it more easy and convenient than the latter. Then only will the connecting link between the sávkár and the ryot disappear and the latter become familiarized with the new scheme.

Enjoins the observance of great care in enacting a pawnbrokers' law.

With reference to the approval expressed by the Municipal Corporation of Bombay of the intention of Government to pass a Pawnbrokers' Act for Bombay, the Bombay Samáchár (86) of the 20th August observes that great precautions are necessary to be taken that the proposed law shall not prove unfavourable to pawnbroking. The Márwádi pawnbroker has some virtues and some vices, and a law should be passed to remove the latter, if possible. The unsatisfactory state of the Deccan Agriculturists' Relief Act, even with its two amendments, ought to make Government very careful in such a matter. It is to be regretted that the Corporation did not adopt Messrs. Telang and Mehta's suggestion for the appointment of a select committee to report upon the draft of the Bill prepared by Government. If the proposed law does not regulate the interest chargeable on pawns, it will not be of much use; but if, on the other hand, it fixes the rate at a low figure, the pawnbrokers will evade the provisions of the law by stipulating for the repayment of a higher sum than that actually advanced. It will be very difficult, nay, almost impossible, to get over such difficulties by means of a legal enactment. If, however, a few capitalists resolve to carry on the business of pawnbroking in an honest manner, and enter into competition with the Márwádis, they will earn large profits for themselves and confer benefits on the poor people who resort to pawnbrokers. [The Jáme Jamshed (100) of the 21st August is glad that the Corporation have expressed their approval of the proposed enactment, as it believes that a legal enactment on the subject will prove more effectual than mere competition to check the trickeries of the Márwádi pawnbrokers. The Jáme Jamshed hopes that no unnecessary delay will be allowed to occur in enacting the law.]

Suggestions in connection with increasing the usefulness of stock notes.

The Indu Prakásh (9) of the 20th August says:—The resolution of the Government of India on the subject of stock notes need not surprise anyone who remembers that when this form of investment was devised it was doubted by many whether the experiment would succeed as well as the other forms of investment. The nature of the scheme was itself sufficient to justify the doubt. The idea originated out of a desire on the part of Government to draw the interests of the rural and urban classes more closely than before into union with the interests of the State, and to withdraw much of the capital employed by the people of India in jewellery or petty money-lending. The fact, however, was that Government tried to combat with very strong social influences at work among the Indian communities. These communities have each a certain standard of living, measured by the amount of ornaments on which they can lay out their savings. In social matters no people are more averse to change than the people of this country. When the Government of India consulted the local Governments upon the question of stock notes before they were put in circulation, the latter distinctly pointed out that the people were not likely to prefer stock notes to ornaments. But it was supposed at the time that if the notes should fail to attract the capital converted into jewellery, they could at least attract the money of the petty sávkárs in the interior of the country, who were accustomed to lend their savings to private individuals at high rates of interest, but without being able in the end to recover their loans on account of the depressed condition of their debtors. As long, however, as money-lending was by itself a profession, not all the risk and disadvantages attending it could be supposed to prevent people from pursuing it and to induce them to go in for stock notes. Those who invest their savings in Government paper are generally men who are prompted by a desire to save quite apart from any desire to make any profits; but money-lending is a profession, and money-lenders are a class notoriously speculative. If they lose their money and interest in one case, they know that they can make up the loss in other cases. The Government of India was not, therefore, justified in expecting that the stock notes would be welcomed by this class of people in the mofussil. These external difficulties of the scheme were also supplemented by the conditions subject to which the stock notes were put in circulation. The real defects of the scheme lay in the stock notes being transferable by delivery only, and in the fact that the investor could not get his money back from Government in any emergency, but had to sell his note in the market, and that at a discount. Those inclined to invest their modest earnings in such a way as to be able to draw their money when required can resort to the savings' banks, which are now opened in almost every village. The stock notes, on the other hand, not only do not offer to them any advantages above and beyond those offered by investment in the banks, but they expose the possessor to the risk of losing his money in the event of the notes being stolen. It is no wonder that, although the post office savings' banks were opened during the financial year which closed in April last only over a portion of India, they attracted a larger amount of capital than did the stock notes' scheme, which was introduced about the same time throughout India. From these facts it is clear that the desire to save is not altogether wanting among the masses of the people residing in the mofussil. The mode of investment they prefer is that which enables them to draw their money readily in any given emergency and without loss. The stock notes yield interest only as far as Government are concerned, and sell at a discount as far as their purchasing power goes. With these two main defects of the stock notes' scheme, we do not think that they are likely to become a popular investment, unless Government minimize the influence of those defects. The object of the scheme of stock notes is so commendable, however, that it would be bad policy to recommend that it should be given up because it has not become as popular as the other modes of investment provided by Government for the people. It was never intended, we believe, to enable Government to make a profit out of the stock notes. The prejudices of the mass of the population in favour of jewellery are so ingrained in them that a long time must elapse before they give up the habit of investing their capital in ornaments and prefer more profitable modes of saving. The Government must persevere and devise such measures as will slowly but surely popularize the stock notes. At present we are inclined to favour only two out of the several suggestions that have been made to Government on the subject of facilitating the circulation and sale of these notes. They must go through the hands of speculators before they can become popular with the people; and for this purpose it is essential that they should be introduced at the presidency towns, and that Government should create a market for them at the chief centres of business and trade by appointing special agents for their sale. There is less danger in the presidency towns of a real possessor of a stock note losing his money in the event of the note being stolen, for the people residing in such towns are generally more careful than those residing in the interior of the country. One defect of the stock notes will thus be removed, and they will slowly create a market for themselves. Then the other defect—that of the stock notes selling invariably at a discount—can be remedied for the present by restricting the annual supply of these notes, and this should be done till the people learn fully to appreciate the advantages of investing their money in some productive manner. The Government of India seems to think that this suggestion is of doubtful value; but it is difficult to see how otherwise the defect which renders stock notes almost useless as marketable papers can be removed. In the case of big loans also this is the very method which has so far been found to succeed well. If Government had the power of issuing an unlimited quantity of four per cent. paper each year, would four per cent. paper have become so easily convertible as it is now? No man is likely to buy stock notes from a private possessor as long as Government are ready to sell them to him in unlimited quantity on equal terms. Government should for a time cease to compete with the private possessor, so that the latter might thereby be enabled to sell his notes, when necessary, and get his money without difficulty, the main object of Government being not so much to make a profit as to teach people the advantage of investing their savings productively instead of allowing them to lie unproductive in the shape of ornaments. Government can well try the experiment of putting into the market only a limited number of notes. It is a plan which is well worth trying. Government need not fear that if they once adopt the policy of restricting the supply of notes they shall have to adopt the course for ever. The readiness with which people have utilized the post office savings' banks shows that the desire to invest money with Government is increasing among the masses; and ten or twenty years hence that desire will very probably show a marked improvement. The authorities must move according to the desire of the public, and inundating the market just now with the stock notes seems to us like going ahead of the people for whom they are meant.

Makes certain suggestions for encouraging the circulation of postal notes.

The Din Bandhu (5) of the 19th August says that it is a little surprising that the attention of the postal authorities should not have been directed to the reasons which retard the circulation of postal notes. In order that these notes may safely reach the desired parties it is necessary to send them in registered covers. This adds to the cost of securing the notes and drives people to resort to money orders. If, therefore, it is deemed advisable to give encouragement to the circulation of postal notes, they should be made transmissible on postal service from one post office to another and there deliverable to the parties to whom the notes are intended to be sent.

Approves of the appointment of the Honourable Mr. Justice Melvill to a seat in the Council of His Excellency the Governor of Bombay.

The Indian Spectator (1) of the 19th August says:—The appointment of Mr. Justice Melvill to the seat in the Governor's Council to be shortly vacated by Mr. Ravenscroft is unexceptionable. Mr. Melvill is believed to be probably the ablest man in the public service in India, and withal perhaps the quietest and most unassuming. Mr. Melvill is senior to Mr. Kemball as Judge of the High Court by about two months, though the latter gentleman is Mr. Melvill's senior in the service by some eight years. Mr. Kemball had a stronger claim, having also acted as a Councillor for some time. But we believe he refused a seat the second time on prudential grounds. There is an opportunity now for Mr. Nánábhái Haridás to be confirmed on the Bench, and we trust it will not be missed this time. Let us have our only Native Judge for good. [Several other Anglo-vernacular and vernacular papers express similar sentiments.]

Requests Government to start some famine works in the Ratnágiri District.

The Bakul (16) of the 19th August observes that a limited fall of rain has already injured the crops of the Ratnágiri District and if more rain does not fall within the next three or four days famine will surely make its appearance. Moreover innumerable young locusts have appeared in the Khed and Chiplun tálukas, and the people and the local officials say that it is impossible to destroy them completely. These insects will be on their wings after a month hence and will then cause wholesale destruction of the crops. A large number of the agriculturists in the Dápoli and Khed tálukas are starving and it will be well to start some famine works for their benefit.

The Gujarát Mitrá (76) of the 19th August, while expressing its approval of the rejection by the Government of India of the Bill drafted by the Bombay Government with the view of compelling agriculturists to assist in the destruction of locusts, says that there is no necessity for legislation in the matter and that mere encouragement in the shape of rewards is sufficient. The ryots can never be indifferent to their own distress, but if no effective measures for destroying locusts are suggested to them it is natural that they should remain idle. The rewards at present offered are very insignificant and cannot stimulate the ryots to exertion. It is therefore to be hoped that the Bombay Government will raise the amount of rewards. [Several other vernacular papers express their approval of the rejection by the Government of India of the Locusts Bill.]

Expresses approval of the rejection by the Government of India of the Locusts Bill, and suggests an enhancement in the amount of the rewards at present offered for the destruction of locusts.

The Din Bandhu (5) of the 19th August says that the agriculturists should not be taken away from their legitimate operations for the destruction of locusts, and advocates the formation of a special corps for the purpose.

Advocates the formation of a special corps for the destruction of locusts.

The Yajdán Parast (124) of the 19th August observes that last year Mr. Dosábhái Frámji was appointed Acting Collector of Bombay and thereupon the covenanted civilians raised a loud complaint that as this post is one of those exclusively reserved for them their claims to it were disregarded by the appointment of an uncovenanted civilian. But the Native press satisfactorily showed that the complaint was wrong and did not deserve to be considered, and the Native public expected that when the post would become permanently vacant it would be conferred upon an uncovenanted officer. However, in February last, Mr. Jacomb went on leave of absence and then Mr. J. H. Grant was appointed Acting Collector. The former gentleman recently resigned the service, and the latter has been confirmed in his place. Thus the claims of uncovenanted civilians to the post have been overlooked. The Parast has no objection to the appointment of Mr. Grant personally, but regrets that the post was not conferred upon Mr. Dosábhái Frámji and has been passed on to covenanted civilians, and observes that in the disposal of this place Government yielded to the loud complaints raised by the covenanted civilians. [The Bombay Samáchár (86) of the 24th August also expresses regret that Mr. Dosábhái Frámji did not get the post and that it has been conferred on a covenanted civilian.]

Is sorry that the post of the Collector of Bombay has not been conferred upon Mr. Dosábhái Frámji.

A correspondent of the Bombay Samáchár (86) of the 23rd August observes that the house-tax levied in the town of Bulsár is regulated by the number of windows to a house, and that consequently the house-owners have built up many of the windows of their respective houses in order to diminish their liability to the tax. The people are put to much inconvenience, which must last until the present mode of assessment is given up.

Complains that the house-tax is levied in Bulsár on the number of windows to a building.

The Bombay Chronicle (75) of the 19th August observes that the chief purpose for which the A'bkári Act of 1878 would appear to have been enacted was the realization of the largest amount of ábkári revenue without much concern for the morality, convenience or comfort of the people. The operation of the Act during the last four years has proved its strong tendency to deprive more or less the poor people of the harmless, cheap, exhilarating and nourishing article of luxury both in the way of drink and food, and to drive them to the use of irritating, strong and even poisonous drinks, increasing thereby crime, disease and death. The Act has thus proved a curse to the Native subjects of all classes for one reason or another. The people of Thána complained the other day against the operation of the Act, but the A'bkári officers could not be persuaded to believe in the mischief which their administration of the Act has occasioned to the people at large. Their reports in support of their foregone conclusions, based mostly on one-sided reasoning and arguments, met with better reception from Government than the complaints and representations of the people, the consequence being that the latter were discarded. The memorial of the Ahmedabad people complaining of an increase in the vice of drunkenness seems destined to share the same fate. Financially the Abkári Act may be deemed a desirable measure, but as shown above its tendency has been to encourage the vice of drunkenness. Government ought therefore to consider seriously whether the Act is capable of modification in the true interests of the people. [Several vernacular papers refer to the petition preferred to Government by the people of Ahmedabad complaining of an increase in the vice of drunkenness among the people, and make similar remarks.]

Observes that the A'bkári Act has encouraged drunkenness and needs modification.

Suggestions for checking the vice of drunkenness.

The Jáme Jamshed (100) of the 22nd August does not approve of the prayer made to Government by the Poona Sárvajanik Sabha to make over the ábkári revenue to municipalities in order that due steps may be taken to discourage the vice of drunkenness. The Jáme observes that there is no guarantee that municipal bodies will not try to increase the revenue from this source as Government have done, and thus cause a still greater increase in the vice. The best course seems to be that Government should notify every year how many liquor shops will be opened and in what localities, and should not license the opening of a shop in a locality the people of which may object to the opening of such a shop. Government should also keep in view the policy of lessening the number of these shops gradually. Ten years ago the Government of Bombay appointed a committee to consider the subject, and the committee made the abovementioned suggestion, but it is to be regretted that it was not adopted. It is however to be hoped that the suggestion will not be neglected ang longer.

Large purchases of mhowra flowers made at Bulsár by some residents of the Dharampur State.

A correspondent of the Jáme Jamshed (100) of the 21st August, writing from Bulsár, states that since liquor distilleries have been opened in several places this town has lost all trade in mhowra blossoms. Lately, however, several residents of the Dharampur State purchased very large quantities of the flowers at the warehouses near Mograwádi opposite to the railway station. The Rája of Dharampur ought to ascertain what use is made of these flowers.

Considers the sentence of imprisonment passed by the Senior Presidency Magistrate of Bombay on certain European lads convicted of collecting subscriptions on a false pretence as quite inadequate.

With reference to the sentence of two days' imprisonment passed by the Senior Presidency Magistrate of Bombay on three European lads who were convicted of having collected subscriptions on a false pretence, the Kaiser-i-Hind (103) of the 19th August observes that the accused were at once released because they had remained for two days in custody before the decision was given. The mercy shown by the magistrate is misapplied. It is feared that the very light punishment inflicted on the accused will have no deterrent effect on them, since having been brought up in an eleemosynary school they took to practising deception as soon as they found themselves enlisted in the Government service. They must also know that Native lads of their own age, when convicted of offences much lighter than that committed by themselves, are sent to the reformatory for a much longer period, and that they escaped the punishment they deserved on account of their being Europeans. It is therefore likely that they may become more dishonest hereafter.

Condemns the practice of gambling with dice and money on the Gokul Ashtami holiday prevailing among the Gujaráti Hindus in Bombay.

The Kaiser-i-Hind (103) of the 19th August severely censures the Gujaráti Hindu portion of the Bombay community for gambling with dice and money on the Gokul Ashtami holiday every year, and requests the police to put down the evil practice. In this illegal pastime men, women and even children are said to take part.

Necessity of a police station on the road from Dákor to Kapadvanj.

The Kaira Vartamán (102) of the 22nd August refers to a case of plunder on the road between Dákor and Kapadvanj, and says that it is necessary that a police station should be located on that road as it is much used by travellers.

The Rást Goftár (111) of the 19th August does not understand why the banks in Bombay were closed for two days on account of the Cocoanut holiday, which lasts for one day only. The circumstance that the banks in such a commercial town as Bombay can remain closed for a number of days shows either that the Bombay market is so dull as not to be inconvenienced by the closing of the banks, or that great inconvenience is actually caused to the mercantile community. In London such a thing would not be allowed. The public and Government have a right to ask the Bank of Bombay to explain the necessity of such a long holiday. These holidays have been sanctioned by Government, but in doing so they have showed greater regard to the comforts of the bankers than to the convenience of the public.

Does not understand why the banks should have been closed for two days on account of the Cocoanut holiday.

The same says that the present site of the annual Cocoanut-fair is rather inconvenient, and requests Khán Báhádur M. C. Murzbán to transfer it to the oval opposite to the High Court buildings.

Says that the Cocoanut-fair should be transferred from its present site to the oval opposite to the High Court buildings.

The Sharabh (59) of the 15th August reports the occurrence of a case of cholera among the passengers by the steam-ferry plying between Bombay and Dharamtar, and requests Government to provide cholera medicines on the steamer. It is also necessary that the principal police officers at Rewas and Dharamtar should keep a sufficient supply of the same medicines.

Requests Government to provide cholera medicines on the steam-ferry plying between Bombay and Dharamtar and also at the Rewas and Dharamtar stations.

The Chandrodayá (125) of the 18th August dwells on the inconvenience caused to passengers by country roads from Kannala to Morab in the Dhárwár District by the clayish nature of the soil and the thorny trees planted on road sides and shrubs used for fencing fields, and requests Government to cause the thorny trees to be removed and others to be planted in their place.

Requests Government to remove thorny trees from road sides in the Navalgund Táluka.

Local Self-government.

The Hitechchhu (77) of Ahmedabad of the 23rd August says:—The draft Bills have disappointed everybody and pleased nobody. It seems strange that the Bombay Government should always commit blunders and try tooth and nail to go against the general tendency of the people. The cause is not far to seek. The Governor is certainly in no way acquainted with the actual circumstances. He has no other alternative but to consult and be guided by the officers that surround him, who are the misguided depositories of Indian experience. It might be presumed that Sir J. Fergusson, being of the Conservative party, may consider it consistent with the policy of his party to oppose Lord Ripon. There may or may not be any truth in such an assumption, but we are confident that he is, at any rate, an English gentleman and an English statesman, and we are therefore far from believing that he will do wrong to the interests of the people of India for party purposes. Is it likely that Mr. Ashburner's spirit still breathes in the Bombay Council, or that Mr. Peile or somebody else now desires to gain a name for himself and be made a Knight or a Baronet? We do not blame Sir James Fergusson. The blame must rest with some one else. The Bills will cause a waste of intellectual power and of the people's money. With all the loud and liberal talk contained in the Bills, in their practical application they will prove no better than the old Acts. The effect of the elective franchise and of the enlarged powers conferred on local bodies will be nil with a Collector at the head and with half the members dupes of the Collector. Those who are pluming themselves on the principle that political freedom should be regulated according to the advancement of the people will do well to enshrine in their hearts the following words of Lord Macaulay :—"Many politicians of our time are in the habit of laying it down as a self-evident proposition that no people ought to be free till they are fit to use their freedom. The maxim is worthy of the fool in the old story who resolved not to go into water till he had learnt to swim. If men are to wait for liberty till they become wise and good in slavery, they may indeed wait for ever."

Disapproves of the Bombay Local Self-government Bills.

Criticises the Bombay Local Boards Bill.

The Indian Spectator (1) of the 19th August says:—Owing to the alleged backward condition of Sind, it has been treated throughout the Bill on a somewhat different footing from the rest of the divisions of the Presidency. Admitting the backward state of Sind, it is a question whether any harm can possibly arise from according to its people the same privileges of local self-government as are contemplated for the rest of the Presidency. As we take Government to be desirous of evoking a genuine spirit of independence and self-reliance among the people of Sind, we cannot refrain from expressing our disapproval of the different treatment it contemplates for them. We fear that practically the result of such a policy will be to keep Sind as it now stands. At this rate the Sindhis may not be enabled to manage their own local affairs even at the end of a century. How can they be so enabled when the effect of the present measures will be to almost wholly stereotype the system of paternal government with its outward show of freedom of action? We almost wish that Government should court failures in municipal administration for some years to come rather than keep it under the leading-strings of the overbearing Collectors; for we are convinced that failure will eventually lead to success. Our own inquiries lead us to believe that Sind can greatly improve in this direction if Government give it a less dependent and a more intelligent constituency than is prescribed in clause (a) of Section 10. It is notorious that the so-called jághirdárs, arbábs, wadheros, nekmards et hoc genus are an impecunious class of people, persons whose estates being encumbered are dependent on Government for their maintenance and almost wholly incapable of managing local affairs. Besides, they are in no way representative classes. Again, they are to be "declared eligible by the Collector." So that it may be confidently predicted that these men will simply be so many automata at local boards. They will do nothing save grunt or grin as the official magician may move his wand. Is it not a travesty of self-government to make a set of noodles eligible for seats at táluka boards in Sind? The cool audacity with which such a constituency has been offered to the people of Sind is matched by the proposal which introduces the element of "Honorary Magistrates." It is to be hoped that there will be enough public spirit and independence in that remote province to urge people either to remonstrate against so ridiculous a franchise or tell Government to make no attempts whatever at legislation for self-government there. The enlightened Sindhis ought to set their face against the mockery. We now come to clause (b), Section 10, which provides three tests: the property test, the residential test, and the official test. With regard to landholders who pay Rs. 48 per annum as land revenue we object to the test on principle. Mill has observed that inasmuch as the principal duty of local bodies consists of the imposition and expenditure of local taxation the electoral franchise should vest in all who contribute to the local rates to the exclusion of all who do not. We are fully aware that this principle cannot be easily followed in this country. Save the one-anna local fund cess and the octroi duties, local taxation is very limited. There are not as many varieties of it as there are in England. Still, a rough but sufficiently fair test may be prescribed on the basis of the payment of the local cess. It will be right on principle to do so. It will be urged that the cess is but an offshoot of the imperial revenues, so that it comes to one and the same thing in the end whether the test is based on the payment of imperial or local revenue. We admit that practically such is the case. But so long as our rural municipalities are in their infant stage there can be no other rough and ready test. It is better to recognize the principle pointed out by Mill. The second qualification will, we fear, prove impracticable unless the minimum value of immoveable property required is lower than at present. We do not think very many properties will be found in villages which can be valued at Rs. 5,000. Perhaps the most palatial building there does not cost beyond Rs. 2,000 or 3,000. If it be the object of the Legislature to practically shut out house-owners, then this qualifying test is admirable; but if it means to give a reasonable franchise to this class, the minimum should be reduced to Rs. 2,000. At the same time the words "estimated by the Collector" should be deleted. We cannot get over the suspicion that the Collector will to a certain extent be able to influence the elections of members for táluka local boards. If he knows that the house-owning class will not be pliable or dependent, he may do his best to shut it out. As he is the authority to estimate the value of a property, it is not at all improbable that he may value many a property at less than Rs. 2,000. We therefore suggest that before the Act comes into operation Government should nominate a committee of three independent experts in each táluka to assess the values of properties. In subsequent years three independent members of a táluka board should be a standing committee for the purposes of revising the valuations if needed and of fixing the values of new properties. Of course each new táluka local board will have to appoint a new standing committee entering on its functions at the end of every three years. The 3rd clause, which provides a qualification for persons earning Rs. 500 per annum and residing within the táluka, must also be modified. The test is pitched too high. We think the minimum should be Rs. 150 or Rs. 200. We are strongly against the introduction of the element of "Honorary Magistrates" and "revenue or police patels." They are worse than useless. With the known character of the former for their extreme servility to the Collector and of the latter for their corrupt practices, it will be a pure mockery to have these men at rural boards. They ought to be proscribed. The underlying object of the various qualifications seems to us to be very objectionable. Do Government think of having as elected members a larger number of persons who in one way or another are likely to subordinate their opinions to those of the Collector than that of those who can act on their own independent judgment? This is a very disagreeable suspicion, but we are constrained to observe we cannot get over it, especially when the census statistics show that in all districts, next to the illiterate agriculturists and industrial classes, who form 50 per cent. of the population, Government servants are most numerous, forming 32 per cent. !

Criticises the Bombay Local Boards Bill.

The Indu Prakásh (9) of the 20th August says:—In the Statement of Objects and Reasons appended to the Local Boards Bill, we find the following brief remark under the head of "Duties of Local Boards":—"The duties of local boards, as enumerated in general terms in Section 30 of the Bill, are much the same as those of the existing committees. The only object of setting them forth in the Bill is that they may be easily ascertainable and well understood." The sententious brevity of this explanation is apt to mislead those who are not acquainted with the past history and the existing constitution of local fund committees. It seems to us that it is not quite correct to say that all the duties which the Bill seeks to impose upon local boards are much the same as those now performed or ever performed by local fund committees. Most of the duties enumerated in clauses (a) to (d) of Section 30 are certainly of the description mentioned in the Statement of Objects and Reasons, and no one can urge anything against such duties, viz. those of constructing, repairing and maintaining roads, hospitals, markets, public wells and tanks, and providing suitable accommodation for schools, being entrusted solely and wholly to local boards. Anything beyond this cannot properly be said to fall within the sphere of the functions of local boards, and it is a satire on local self-government to say that these boards should take up duties which ought properly to be performed by Government alone. For instance, the inclusion of "water-works" in the same class with public wells and tanks is calculated to impose upon local boards duties which are within the peculiar province of the Irrigation Department. Under the Bombay Irrigation Act, Government levy a water-rate from each landholder who utilises the water of a canal, and since local boards will get no contribution from the water-rate, why should they be compelled to construct and repair water-works? The expression is very ambiguous and misleading. Again, famine relief is an imperial duty. "The establishment and maintenance of model farms, the acclimatization of exotics, the importation and distribution of superior kinds of seed the improvement of the breed of cattle, and the introduction and preservation of fish," and "the establishment and maintenance of relief and relief works in time of famine or scarcity,"—all which the Bill seeks to include among the functions of local boards could never have been meant as purposes for which local funds might be used without disturbing the recognized policy of Government. The imposition of these duties seems very much like giving us local self-government with a vengeance and betrays a sort of earnestness on the part of the framer of the present Bill to kill the boards by increasing their responsibilities. What does the Honourable Mr. Peile mean by proposing to throw on local boards the duty of providing famine relief hitherto discharged by Government with the help of the imperial revenues? There is the Famine Insurance Fund and there is also the authoritative statement made by the Government of India on several occasions that famine relief forms part of imperial duties. What was the license tax meant for, if not for the purpose of protecting people in times of drought and enabling them to tide over distressful crises brought on by famine? Can Government now contend with good-grace that they are right in ridding themselves of the serious responsibility which has hitherto rested on them and for the satisfactory fulfilment of which they imposed a special tax five years ago? We cannot imagine on what grounds Mr. Peile bases his statement that the existing committees have, as a part of their functions, to look after the provision of famine relief and the establishment of model farms, unless we suppose that he takes for his authority the fact that Sir Richard Temple attempted the very ingenious manœuvre of appropriating local funds for the construction of large works of an imperial character. But Sir Richard's policy cannot be pointed to as a precedent binding on the present administrators, when they have before them the fact solemnly recognized that the object of the one-anna cess was to provide for the wants of villages and not to meet charges that are even now admitted to be imperial. As for the establishment of model farms and the acclimatization of exotics, we think it impossible for Mr. Peile to ignore the fact that Government are going to have a new Department of Agriculture under Mr. Ozanne. What purpose will this department serve if agricultural improvements are to be looked after by local boards? Is Mr. Ozanne to draw his pay and give advice to local boards and do nothing else? Then that dreadful term "the introduction and preservation of fish" makes us shudder at what is in store for local boards in view of the new fisheries law which the Government of India are going to have within the next few months. Not only do these duties fall outside the scope of the proper functions of local fund committees, but it is certain that they will make the responsibility of these bodies more onerous than reasonably it ought to be. It is to be doubted whether the Government of India had these objects in view in sketching their scheme of local self-government. At any rate Mr. Peile cannot contend that the successful attempt of Sir Richard Temple to appropriate local funds to famine purposes was wholly without official protest. Mr. E. P. Robertson, the Revenue Commissioner of the Central Division, in answer to Question 26 of Chapter I. of the circular questions issued by the Famine Commission, was explicit in his opinion that local funds were wrongly burdened with famine charges, although the object of their collection was quite different. And as early as May last year, the Poona Sárvajanik Sabha submitted a memorial to the Government of Bombay drawing its attention to the mischievous principle which had been adopted by Sir Richard Temple, and submitting that "this diversion of local funds to defray famine charges" was "only one among many other similar instances of mismanagement which might be quoted." After this clear expression of official as well as non-official testimony, we think the Legislature will not be justified in setting upon Sir Richard Temple's policy the seal of legal sanction so as to perpetuate it for crushing local boards under the weight of duties which it was never intended they should perform. The addition of these duties will prove a source of great difficulty and vexation to the boards, and by bringing them in endless conflict with various departments and bureaucrats lead to friction and difficulties in the working of the local self-government scheme. No one can serve two masters, and the saying is in every way applicable to local boards. We do not certainly mean to contend that local boards should have nothing to do with the question of protecting the people within their districts or tálukas from starvation in times of great scarcity. If a local board has surplus funds on hand at any such crisis it must be left free to employ the money in relieving local distress. But it certainly looks very objectionable to make these boards responsible in law for the supervision and general management of relief and relief works. The danger that such a state of things is likely to give rise to consists in throwing the charges of famine relief on local bodies and freeing Government from their peculiar responsibilities, to which they have pledged themselves and for which they have levied special taxes. It is probable that in the case of local boards being bound to establish and maintain relief and relief works in times of famine or scarcity Government will find it easy to retire from the field and compel the boards to exhaust their revenues for the alleviation of distress before getting the imperial exchequer to bear its share of the charges from the Famine Insurance Fund. "The establishment and maintenance of model farms, the acclimatization of exotics, the importation and distribution of superior kinds of seeds" are duties that lie within the peculiar province of Government as the landlord of the country, and the satisfactory performance of them is undoubtedly calculated in the end to benefit Government by the introduction of improved methods of agriculture into the country and by an increase in the land revenue. According to Government Resolution No. 1802, dated April 20, 1870," no contributions from local funds are to be given to works executed with the object of increasing the land revenue." On what principle, then, can Government now recede from the position accepted by it many years ago, and saddle local boards with these foreign burdens? It seems to us that if the portions of Section 30 to which we have here drawn attention are not struck off, local boards shall have to fight against serious odds and become easily the victims of the displeasure of Government so as to be visited with the dreadful penalties provided in the Bill against such of the boards as may prove unfit to discharge their duties to the satisfaction of Government.

Criticises the Bombay Local Boards Bill.

The Dnyán Prakásh (8) of the 23rd August says:—As regards Section 59 we think the Collector should not exercise any powers in respect of a local board when he is a member of such board. Such a provision exists in the Central Provinces' Local Self-government Act, from which the provisions on this subject in the Bill have been admittedly borrowed, and we wonder how this one escaped the notice of the Bombay Government and its legal advisers. The other suggestion that occurs to us is that the Collector should be prevented from delegating his power under this section to any Assistant or Deputy Collector in charge of a táluka of less than five years' standing in respect of the local board of that táluka. The evident object of this suggestion is to prevent raw and inexperienced officers from exercising any of these powers, which it is likely may be abused by them. As regards Section 60 we have nothing to say, as we consider its provisions to be salutary and conceived in the interests of economy. As regards Section 61 we think it is absolutely necessary to make a provision therein that on every occasion on which the Collector exercises the power under this section he shall furnish a copy of the statement of his reasons for issuing the order of suspension to the local board concerned, which may, if it likes, appeal against the Collector's order to the Divisional Commissioner and to the Governor in Council also, if necessary. We would also further provide that the Divisional Commissioner shall not confirm the order of the Collector until after a fortnight from the date on which the order of suspension with the statement of reasons has been communicated to the board so as to allow the said board ample time to appeal against the order of the Collector. We would also further provide that the Collector shall not exercise any of the powers under this section in respect of any local board of which he is the president. Here we think it necessary to advert to Section 32 of the Local Boards Bill, in the course of our remarks upon which we suggested that the provisions thereof should be made applicable to the District Collectors. We feel convinced that if our suggestion with regard to Section 32 were accepted, it would facilitate the smooth working of the provisions contained in Sections 59 and 61. We can well conceive occasions when local boards will not be able to carry on a paper controversy, or when they will not be able to put their case on paper as well as it can be put, but when during the course of a conversation among the members of a board in meeting assembled they may be able to convince the Collector of the propriety and expediency of what they have done or resolved upon doing. The course we are recommending has this further advantage that it will give the procedure of the District Collector under these two sections the appearance and character of friendly advice rather than of dictation. To the most superficial reader of the Government of India's resolution on local self-government dated the 18th May 1882 it is known that the Government of India is very anxious that official interference with the doings of local boards should as far as possible be of the nature of friendly advice, and that an appearance at dictation should be avoided except as a last resort. A provision should also be inserted in Section 32 that Collectors may depute Assistant or Deputy Collectors to attend the meetings of táluka boards in compliance with a request from the said boards. Our principal concern is to minimize the occasions for friction between local boards and the district authorities as far as possible. With regard to Section 62 we would propose that the powers of the Collector under this section should be confined to what may be emergently necessary in the interests of public health and safety only, and that the Collector should not exercise his powers under the section except with the previous sanction of the Governor in Council. The Municipal Commissioner of Bombay has by law conferred upon him a power similar to that proposed to be conferred upon the District Collector by Section 62 of the Bill, but then in every case the previous sanction of the Governor in Council is necessary. We do not see any reason why the same restriction should be dispensed with in these two Bills. A regards Section 63 we would propose that the period to be allowed to a local board under this section for the performance of a duty should be not less than one month, and it should be also distinctly provided that the Governor in Council shall not appoint a person or persons for the performance of the said duty if the board gives a satisfactory explanation for not complying with the requisition under this section. It should also be provided that the expenses of and the remuneration for the performance of the said duty, if it is performed by persons appointed by the Governor in Council, shall be recovered by suing the local board in a civil court of competent jurisdiction in the event of the local board refusing to make the payment. Section 91 of the existing Bombay District Municipal Act of 1873 contains such a provision, and we fail to see why a more stringent process of recovery should be deemed necessary now than heretofore. Experience has not shown that that provision is practically inoperative, and in these circumstances we must protest against the proposed summary procedure for the recovery of the expenses and the remuneration in question. In Section 64 a distinct provision should be made to the effect that no local board shall be superseded under this section without allowing the local board an opportunity to show cause why it should not be superseded. Such a provision is absolutely necessary and it should be also further provided that along with the Government notification directing the supersession of any local board the explanation given by that local board shall also be published in the Government Gazette.

Requests Government to freely distribute the translations of the Local Self-government Bills among the vernacular newspapers.

The Satyá Shodhak (57) of the 19th August does not understand why the order of the Government of India regarding publicity in legislation should not have been followed by the Bombay Government in the case of the Local Self-government Bills. It was necessary that copies of the vernacular translations of the Bills should have been forwarded to all the vernacular newspapers without distinction. The circumstance that a couple of editors have received copies of vernacular translations gives colour to the supposition that a principle of distinction is recognized by which certain vernacular papers are favoured to the exclusion of others—a procedure not warranted by anything contained in the orders of the Government of India. It is therefore advisable that full effect should be given to the orders of the Supreme Government by freely distributing the translations of the Local Self-government Bills among the vernacular papers.

Education.

Suggests certain modifications in the nature of instruction imparted in Government schools.

The Belgaum Samáchár (17) of the 20th August complains that the instruction at present imparted in vernacular, Anglo-vernacular and English schools is neither of a technical nor of a practical nature. It only serves to inspire arrogance into the hearts of young students and to make them incapable of exertion and enterprise. Some alterations are necessary in the contents of the present school series, and some lessons treating of practical agriculture should be inserted in them. It is also necessary that a system of rewards for the manufacture of agricultural implements and for the introduction of reforms in the process of the cultivation of land should be initiated.

Complains that injustice has been done in the matter of the allowances granted to the vernacular school-masters of the Ratnágiri District.

A correspondent of the Bakul (16) of the 19th August complains that the allowances paid to the vernacular school-masters of the Ratnágiri District for the last year were not in proportion to the results of the last examination of their schools. Those who earned a larger allowance than the amount earned by them in the previous year have been paid the latter sum, while those who merited a smaller amount than the previous year's allowance have been paid what they earned this year. This is apparently an injustice which ought to be removed by paying each school-master the amount he has earned this year. The attention of the Educational Inspector is requested to the subject.

Railways.

Suggests a reduction in the tariff of rates for passengers and goods on the occasion of the coming international exhibition at Calcutta.

The Jáme Jamshed (100) of the 20th August observes that the reduction made by the G. I. P. and the B. B. & C. I. Railways in the tariff for the conveyance of exhibits for the coming international exhibition at Calcutta is not considerable. Besides, the railway companies have notified that they will not be responsible for the safe custody of the articles conveyed by them. In these circumstances few persons will be anxious to send their valuable articles to the exhibition: they will rather prefer that the companies should undertake the responsibility of safe delivery on payment of the usual rates. Since the success of the exhibition depends in a great measure on the facilities for the conveyance of the exhibits, it is desirable that the railway authorities should reduce the tariff to a half of the present rates and that they should undertake to deliver the articles safely. The Traffic Manager of the G. I. P. Railway has refused to lower the passenger fares on the occasion of the exhibition on the plea that they have been recently much lowered. But even the lowered rates are excessive considering the pecuniary abilities of Natives generally, and ought to be reduced still more on the occasion of the exhibition. If this is done a large number of persons from this part of the country will visit the exhibition.

Complaint against the railway officials at the Násik station.

A correspondent of the Jagadádarsh (31) of the 19th August, writing from Násik, complains of the irregularity of the railway officials at the Násik station in granting receipts for amounts received by them for goods delivered over to merchants and of the inconvenience caused to the mercantile public, and requests the attention of the railway authorities to the matter.

Municipalities.

Cholera in Bombay.

The Indian Spectator (1) of the 19th August says:—Subsoil water, putrid fish, stale meat and vegetable are at the bottom of 75 out of 100 cases of cholera. Is it not the duty of the municipal officers to give pure water to the poor, and thus keep them from using the wells? But just when the poor stand most in need of copious drinkable water they are supplied with draughts of a dirty-looking fluid with a strong flavour of the essence of dead rats. It is all very well to ask the people to make use of Vehár and Tulsi water. But the people have no filters at home, and they naturally prefer the sweet-smelling well-water to the stinking stuff from the lakes. Then as to fish and vegetables, the smaller markets, such as Chira Bazár, Nal Bazár and Bhuleshwar, show in what state the poor get those articles. The municipal subordinates are partly responsible for the cholera now raging in the city. They neither remove the causes nor neutralize the effects of the disease. The masses are not expected to know what is good for them in such matters; and servants of the municipality are not paid to drive about on thoroughfares and draw up reports purporting to treat of all Bombay.

Grievances of the people of Dongri.

The Din Bandhu (5) of the 29th August brings forward some of the grievances of the people residing in Dongri and requests the attention of the municipal authorities of Bombay to them. For the past six months the whole of this portion of the city has been undergoing excavation for purposes of drainage and the people find it difficult to pass by the streets. Water has accumulated in the pits dug in the streets and has begun to stink. This has given rise to cholera. The cry for water is very great, while the attempts that are made to pacify it are ridiculous.

Cholera in Ahmedabad.

The Hitechchhu (77) of Ahmedabad of the 23rd August says that cases of cholera in the city are increasing day by day, but owing to the fears excited in the minds of the people by the oppressive conduct of the authorities the cases are not duly reported. Whenever an attack of cholera proves fatal the authorities forcibly have the residence white-washed and cleaned. The people are tired of this practice, for they think it unbecoming to white-wash their houses when deaths occur in them. The result is that people do not resort to proper remedies, fall a prey to the disease, and attribute deaths to causes other than cholera. Though the municipality has provided cholera mixture at police stations and other places, ignorant people do not make use of it for this reason. There were 14 cases of cholera reported this week, of which 11 proved fatal. The municipality should disabuse the minds of the people by a proper explanation of its conduct and ask its servants to behave politely towards them. It does not appear that halálkhors and the supervisors of the Health Department perform their duties satisfactorily. Disinfecting powder does not appear to be used by halálkhors in the quarters occupied by poor people. It is to be regretted that measures are not taken to clean many of the lanes and streets from which offensive smells emanate. The Municipal Commissioners ought to go about their wards and inspect things. The municipality should attend to the purity of the water-supply and milk, and should prohibit the sale of articles unfit for human consumption. It should also have the public latrines and privies kept clean and should cause the filth that accumulates near public wells to be removed. [The Ahmedabad Samáchár (81) of the 15th August advises the municipality to see that rotten articles of food are not sold in the city.]

Condemns the action of the Surat Municipality in connection with the extension of the People's Park.

The Indian Spectator (1) of the 19th August says:—It baffles one to find words strong enough in which to condemn the action of the Surat municipal officials. They have a bit of a garden there, which appears to have been kept poorly enough. The officials have set their hearts upon extending this garden at an estimated cost of Rs. 25,000. The representatives of the people suspect that the estimate may be much exceeded, as several private houses, a temple, a mosque and other buildings have to be purchased. They further deny that the garden will do any good or that it will be kept in good order. They urge that more pressing improvements, necessitated by the recent floods, must be first attended to. They complain that the money has not even been formally sanctioned. But the officials argue that being one of the items on the budget statement, the amount of Rs. 25,000 is as good as sanctioned! There is an official majority of 12, with 2 elected members to swell the list, against the 8 non-officials. Motion after motion from the minority has been thrown out. One independent commissioner offers to read a letter from the Honourable Mr. Hope to prove that the proposed outlay will be a waste, but he is put down. Another commissioner, a leading member of the bar, we believe, appeals to the Collector at least to refer the technical matter to the Advocate General whether an item of the budget is to be taken as a grant sanctioned by the municipal body, and he offers to pay the Advocate General's fee for his opinion. How do the officials receive his appeal? The Collector-president walks out of the room, carrying others with him, and leaving the independent member to talk to those who care to listen to him! This is the way in which non-official members are treated. As to intelligence on the other side, here is an instance. One Musalmán gentleman proposes an amendment which he has not the power to word properly; so a Pársi friend comes to his rescue! Could anything be more irregular than this? Even as a farce, the thing has been carried too far. What thinks the Local Government? [The Deshi Mitrá (91) of the 23rd August expresses similar sentiments, and observes that it is the misfortune of the people of Surat that Government officers should even employ their subordinates to get such persons returned to the board as have no independent views of their own, with a view to defeat the public in their expectations.]

Native States.

Approves of the order issued by His Highness the Holkar prohibiting Christian missionaries from preaching in the streets of Indore.

The Jáme Jamshed (100) of the 22nd August approves of the order issued by His Highness the Holkar prohibiting Christian missionaries from preaching in the open air at Indore and of the refusal of Sir Lepel Griffin to interfere in the matter. Street preaching, observes the Jáme, hurts the feelings of the Native populace, and very often leads to serious assaults upon the preachers. Such scenes indicate the possibility of serious disturbances, and hence it is desirable that preachers of all religions and persuasions should be strictly prohibited from preaching in the public street. The Commissioner of Police in Bombay is also requested not to allow Christian missionaries or the followers of any other religion to preach in the public streets.

Comments in connection with the resolution of the Government of India on the subject of the massacre of the Maiyás by the Junágad police.

The Indian Spectator (1) of the 19th August says:—It is not certain if the Political Agent's action in the Maiya affair has been at all noticed. However that may be, the loss of the Maiyás, who are to have compensation presently and better treatment in future, has proved Junágad's gain. The appointment of Mr. Haridás is every way a gain to this unfortunate State. The Diwán-elect is an honest, straighforward man, full of zeal and energy. He is not a Nágar, and has therefore no party to serve. He has risen gradually, and goes to his new duties with varied and valuable experience. He has the confidence of the State as well as of the Political Agency. We trust it may be his good fortune to reform the administration of Junágad and to develop its neglected resources. He will have a hard fight with the obstructives in the beginning. Let us see how he comes out of it. If he divides and fixes responsibility fairly, he will do well. Junágad is the garden of Káthiáwár. Its Gir forest and Girnár, its splendid Verával Bandar, and its proposed railway must contribute twice as much to its revenues as they now do. It is a pity Junágad is not under a Political Agent like Major Stace; his presence would be a pillar of strength to the new Diwán and a standing menace to evil-doers. [The Hitechchhu (77) of Ahmedabad of the 23rd August expresses approval of the reported resolution of the Government of India on the subject of the Maiya massacre, and observes that truth has prevailed at last. It is to be regretted that Mr. Peile has belied the expectations formed of him by the people on his nomination to the Council of His Excellency the Governor of Bombay. He has disappointed the people by the draft Bills on local self-government, and the public have had no indication of his independent views on the Maiya massacre. Mr. Ravenscroft deserves thanks for his independent views in the matter. The Government of Sir James Fergusson has undoubtedly suffered a great defeat in this affair. His Excellency has frequently committed mistakes by not listening to the cry of the people, by relying upon the inconsiderate members of his Council, and by being guided by others. If His Excellency does not give up this inconsiderateness, he will not be able to acquire a good name when he leaves the country. Not only Junágad, but those other Native States also who oppress their subjects, should take an example from this resolution of the Government of India. The States of Bhávnagar, Navánagar, Porbandar and Dhrángadra ought especially to study it. No hopes can be entertained for the prosperity of the Junágad State as long as Messrs. Sálehindi, Bávdin, Bápálál and the leading members of the Bhutnáth party are not removed from Junágad. By their residence in Junágad they will resort to intrigues and frequently mislead the Nawáb. The Deshi Mitrá (91) of the 23rd August makes a similar recommendation to the Government of India regarding the removal of the dismissed officials from Junágad. The new Nawáb should not be punished, as he was guided by the advice of his Kárbháris, but if he misbehaves himself hereafter he should be degraded. Several other vernacular papers approve of the resolution of the Government of India in the matter of the massacre of the Maiyás by the Junágad Darbár.]

Comments in connection with the appointment of a new Diwán to the State of Junágad.

The Indu Prakásh (9) of the 20th August says:—We know of two names mentioned in connection with the Diwánship of Junágad—that of Ráo Báhádur Nandashankar Tuljáshankar, late Diwán of Cutch, and that Mr. Haridás Viháridás. We are not sure if Ráo Báhádur Nandashankar will care to take up the appointment, unless Government give some assurance of their support to the measures of reform he may be called upon by the state of the circumstances around him to adopt. There is an Augean stable to be cleared in the administration of Junágad, and it will be a Herculean task to the Diwán who undertakes to clear the State of the abuses which two generations of incompetent administrators have brought about. What is needed is a Native gentleman of education and tried ability, one possessed of the requisite tact and firmness to cope with the contending forces set in motion by court intriguers. Mr. Haridás Viháridás may be a good man, but we have not seen much solid or good work done by him. Neither at Wadhwán nor at Vánkáner nor yet at Idar, does he appear to have shown any sparkling administrative talents or abilities. In point of culture and education he certainly, we think, ranks low in comparison to Mr. Nandashankar. Affairs in Junágad have at present culminated in a crisis, and to deal with a crisis it is on all accounts desirable to have a strong man at the head of affairs. It is true Mr. Nandashankar is a Nágar, but he is a Nágar of a far higher and better type than other Native officials to be met with in Káthiáwár or Gujarát. He has, we believe, no party to serve at Junágad, as he had none to favour in Cutch. He has seen hard service in Cutch. Mr. Haridás, on the other hand, has yet a great deal to learn to fit him for holding the helm of a State at a critical juncture. The great object to be kept in view in the selection of a Diwán for a Native State is how best to consult the interests of the people committed to his charge. No consideration for the welfare of the State should be subordinated to the interests of favourites. Colonel Barton is now on the eve of retirement from India, and a man in his position will naturally desire to scatter the last crumbs of patronage he may hold in his hand among those who may have cringed and worshipped him. This is a weakness common to human nature and may be readily excused, were it not for the fact that the future of the millions in a Native State is bound up with the selection of a really able person to the position of a Diwán. We feel bound to raise our humble voice against what will be looked upon as little short of a 'job' and as the result of the efforts of active political wire-pullers who are said to be hard at work. But so wild are the freaks of the Political Department of the Government of Bombay that we should be surprised if they lead us to expect much wisdom in the selection. Let us hope that the Bombay Government will not add one more to the series of failures which have of late characterized its Political Department, and that sterling merit and independence of character will meet with better recognition from it than submissive mediocrity. All we wish to see is that the new Diwán is one whose character will inspire confidence in the public mind, and will afford no scope for interested parties to work out their ways.

Porbandar affairs.

The Gujaráti (96) of the 19th August hears that the Rána of Porbandar has received an intimation that if he did not effect the necessary reforms in his administration within one month the Government of Bombay would be under the necessity to interfere in the management of the State. If this be true the days of the Rána appear to be numbered. Had the Rana been as wise as he is obstinate he would not have been reduced to such a plight. He is quite devoid of administrative skill and therefore he will have to taste the bitter fruits of his obstinacy. In the State the administration of justice is high-handed, the revenues are in a straitened condition, taxation has risen to the highest pitch, and the officers are untrustworthy and unsalaried. There is therefore nothing strange in matters having come to such a pass. For nearly 16 years successive Political Agents have been advising the Rána to reform his administration. They have done their duty to the State, but the Rána stands firm. It is reported that the Political Agent has now remonstrated against the persistent contempt with which the Rána has been treating all Government orders and that Government have permitted the Political Agent to take final measures. The Political Agent is thus waiting for an opportunity to deprive the Rána of his powers. Of course, neither the Political Agent nor Government are in favour of unnecessary interference with the management of the State, and there is every reason to suppose that if the Rána evinces his earnestness to introduce reforms into his territories his proposals will meet with cordial support from Government. But where remonstrance fails coercion is necessary. Now there is no hope for the Rána unless he takes a competent Diwán. [The Deshi Mitrá (91) of the 23rd August refers to the intimation given by the Political Agent to the Rána, and while remarking that a similar intimation was conveyed to the poor Rána at the time of the dispute regarding the dismissal of his Diwán asks why it has been repeated now. No cry of mismanagement appears to have been raised from Porbandar. How is it then that Colonel Barton finds mismanagement prevailing in Porbandar only and not in other States of Káthiáwár?]

A defence of Mr. Premchandbhái, the Diwán of Vádásinor, from the attacks made on him by a correspondent of the Hitechchhu newspaper.

A correspondent of the Hitechchhu (77) of Ahmedabad of the 23rd August signing himself as a resident of Vádásinor, tries to refute at some length the charges of mismanagement and oppression brought against Mr. Premchandbhái, the Diwán of Vádásinor, by a correspondent of that paper and reported at pages 14 and 18 of the Reports on Native Papers for the weeks ending 7th and 21st July 1883 respectively. The correspondent who wrote against the present Diwán and who appears to be unacquainted with the previous regime failed to secure an appointment in the State and has thence raised this complaint. The writer then gives several instances of the oppression exercised on the people by the State authorities prior to the advent of Mr. Premchandbhái, shows the non-existence of any such complaints at the present time, mentions the various reforms and improvements effected in the State by the present Diwán, and observes that the people have become happy in all respects under his administration.

Berár Affairs.

Says that the special magistrates in Berár should be required to pass Deparmental Examinations.

The Pramod Sindhu (52) of the 20th August observes that special magistrates in Berár should be required to pass the usual examinations. Third class magistrates should be called upon to pass the lower standard examination and second class magistrates the higher standard, and no persons should hereafter be appointed to the posts of special magistrates who have not passed either of these examinations. It will be better also to appoint benches of two or more honorary magistrates to decide cases, as has recently been done at Dhárwár, Hubli, Gadag and Pandharpur.

Notes.—A. The notices from the different Newspapers have been collected in the Report under different heads, which are printed in italics.

B. The names of Newspapers are printed in the body of the Report in italics, and the number of the Newspaper in the above list is printed in brackets after the name.

C. The proprietors of the Newspapers marked * have not given information as to the number of copies issued. In these cases an estimate has been made by the Reporter.

D. The system of spelling vernacular words followed by the Reporter is the same as that adopted in the Official Spelling List of the Bombay Presidency. One peculiar feature of this system is that when the long a (आ or á) is the last letter of a word, the accent is left out, and the short a (अ = u in gun) is, to prevent confusion, never placed at the end of a word. This rule has been strictly followed, except that when the short a appears to be absolutely necessary to complete the pronunciation of a word, as in Arunodaya or the well known Mitra, it is printed with a mark over it to indicate that it is short, thus—ă.

E. Berár papers are received in this office for report under the Resolution of the Government of Bombay in the General Department, No. 1795, dated 8th June 1881.

Politics and the Public Administration.

In noticing the remark made by the Under Secretary of State for India when submitting the Indian budget to the House of Commons that the extension of railways in India was much needed to allow of surplus crops reaching the market, the Bombay Chronicle (75) of the 26th August observes that the recommendation was important and well-timed. It is admitted by all well-informed persons that nothing can conduce to render the relations between England and India agreeable to the people of the two empires so well as the increasing material prosperity and contentment of the natives of this country. Under the present circumstances England expects India to be able to meet her engagements, to maintain her public credit without any assistance from the ruling country, and to feed her increasing population in such a manner as to avoid its being driven by starvation to lawlessness. This can only be vouchsafed by the development of the material resources of the country. Steady progress in agriculture, manufactures and commerce, is the chief index of the advancement of national prosperity; and since this progress depends greatly on the means of cheap, easy and rapid transit or intercommunication, the extension of railways must be fairly held to be amongst the chief contributories to the much-desired progress. Owing to the extraordinary ignorance of the true necessities of India and of her undoubted capability to provide for them if left to herself, a check was imposed by Parliament on the action of the Indian Government in the matter of the construction of railways and other public works of importance; and subsequently the little latitude that was left to that Government was generally interfered with by the officious, over-cautious and obstructive bureaucrats of the India Office. Thus the prosecution of most important public works, especially railways, was brought to a deadlock in a manner at once alarming and disgusting. Some of these railways, if constructed speedily, cannot fail to be so many veritable gold mines to the country. The line from Bhopal to Jhánsi and Cawnpore, proposed to be undertaken by the G. I. P. Railway Company, or the rival line from Godhra to Ratlam projected by the B. B. & C. I. Railway Company, and the line from Rajpur to Burrakpur, opening up the country between Bombay and Central India and Calcutta and Central India, and helping the formation of direct and easy means of communication between the two capital cities, are projects of that description. It is therefore to be hoped that the urgency pleaded by Mr. Cross in the House of Commons will induce all concerned to resume some of the former activity in the prosecution of public works of the description above referred to.

Is glad that the Under Secretary of State for India recently urged in the House of Commons the necessity for the extension of railways in India.

The Poona Vaibhav (49) of the 26th August says:—It has been recently reported that the British Government has refused permission to Mahárája Dhuleep Singh to visit his motherland. The only reason for such refusal would appear to be the apprehension that the minds of the people of the Panjáb would be unsettled by the visit of their former ruler. In our opinion, however, such a policy is not wise, because if the people are convinced of the morality, justice and liberality of the British Government, why should they wish for a revival of their past miseries by the advent of a descendant of their former rulers? If the British hold that their dominion in India is simply for the good of the country, then it is very disgraceful that they should check the exercise of his free will by an individual on grounds of false suspicions.

Does not approve of the reported refusal by the British Government to accord permission to Mahárája Dhuleep Singh to visit India.

The Bombay Chronicle (75) of the 26th August observes that the British Government have done well in inducing Mahárája Dhuleep Singh to continue to stay in England. Neither the loyalty of the prince nor the stability of the Indian Government would have been affected by the Mahárája's resolution to pass the remainder of his life in the quiet solitude of his native land after the despoilers of his birthright had rendered his further stay in England almost impossible by their shabby treatment of him. The knowledge gained and the experience obtained by him after his long residence in England of the great power and firm resolution of the British nation to retain possession of India at any cost are sufficient not to mislead a person of his intelligence and mature age to entertain any mad idea of proving troublesome to Government. But in the event of his actual return to his country, disheartened and disconsolate, the narrative of his shabby treatment and the injudicious disregard of his claims to better or more liberal consideration at the hands of the authorities in England would doubtless create an impression in his favour amongst Sikhs and others in India, and rouse amongst the less thoughtful Natives feelings disagreeable to the British people. Indeed, the reports that the Mahárája was selling his effects to pay off his debts and that he had resolved to return to India in order to escape the miseries of straitened circumstances, the result of no fault of his own, had begun to create sentiments in his favour, the growth of which on his actual return to this country might have proved a little inconvenient to the authorities on the spot. By reason of the circumstances under which he happened to be despoiled of his great birthright and his admirable behaviour towards the nation which tamely suffered the act of spoliation to take place, Dhuleep Singh may be fairly held to be deserving of the most generous treatment that the British Government can accord to him. It is therefore to be hoped that British statesmen will see that the Mahárája is properly treated and that his claims are fully and generously considered by the Government of India.

Observes that the British Government has done well in inducing Mahárája Dhuleep Singh to continue to stay in England, and suggests that the claims of the Mahárája to an increased pension should be generously considered.

Complains that the interference of the British Government in the affairs of Portuguese India has proved a source of evil.

The Poona Vaibhav (49) of the 26th August quotes an extract from a Portuguese paper describing the effects of the treaty recently ratified between the Governments of British and Portuguese India, and says:—Time has familiarized us to all the iniquities of the British rule, such as heavy taxes, the drainage of Indian wealth to Europe, and the distinctions observed between the white and black races. But when the British Government steps into a foreign dominion the people there find their advent unbearable. By a recent treaty the British Government have been placed in a position to interfere with the salt administration of Portuguese India, and we learn from several Portuguese papers that the people there have been reduced by the British Government to a very miserable condition. Salt, which was as cheap as earth, has become dearer than wheat and rice. Moreover, the policy of the British Government regarding the manufacture of salt has proved so oppressive that many people have begun to find their position untenable. The Portuguese Government connives at the distress of its subjects on the consideration of receiving four lákhs of rupees from the British Government. Hitherto the British Government had achieved a name in the British Indian dominions only, but now their fame has begun to spread in foreign territories!

Comments on the Indian financial statement for 1883-84.

The Quarterly Journal of the Poona Sárvajanik Sabhá (4) for the month of July 1883 but received on the 16th August discusses the Indian financial statement for 1883-84. Speaking of the effects of the abolition of import duties on European piece-goods the Journal arrives at the following conclusions:—(1) That the abolition of import duties by the Government of India has not been followed by any decidedly increased trade in imports, and that such increase in imported goods as has taken place is not beyond the normal increase due to a good year in India—in fact, it is less than such normal increase. (2) The fact that the levy of import duties on cotton goods had hitherto no protective effect has been placed beyond all question by the repeal of the duties not having injuriously affected the cotton industry of India. On the contrary, the vitality inherent in the Indian industry has been made manifest by the fact of new mills having been started in the Bombay Presidency. (3) That the strong pressure put by Manchester on the Indian Government, which has resulted in the abolition of the cotton and other duties on imported goods, has so far neither benefited herself nor placed the Indian consumer upon any more satisfactory basis as regards the cheapness of goods, but that the only result of the measure so far has been that a most valuable resource of revenue, raised without the least trouble to

Politics and the Public Administration.

Is glad that the Under Secretary of State for India recently urged in the House of Commons the necessity for the extension of railways in India.

In noticing the remark made by the Under Secretary of State for India when submitting the Indian budget to the House of Commons that the extension of railways in India was much needed to allow of surplus crops reaching the market, the Bombay Chronicle (75) of the 26th August observes that the recommendation was important and well-timed. It is admitted by all well-informed persons that nothing can conduce to render the relations between England and India agreeable to the people of the two empires so well as the increasing material prosperity and contentment of the natives of this country. Under the present circumstances England expects India to be able to meet her engagements, to maintain her public credit without any assistance from the ruling country, and to feed her increasing population in such a manner as to avoid its being driven by starvation to lawlessness. This can only be vouchsafed by the development of the material resources of the country. Steady progress in agriculture, manufactures and commerce, is the chief index of the advancement of national prosperity; and since this progress depends greatly on the means of cheap, easy and rapid transit or intercommunication, the extension of railways must be fairly held to be amongst the chief contributories to the much-desired progress. Owing to the extraordinary ignorance of the true necessities of India and of her undoubted capability to provide for them if left to herself, a check was imposed by Parliament on the action of the Indian Government in the matter of the construction of railways and other public works of importance; and subsequently the little latitude that was left to that Government was generally interfered with by the officious, over-cautious and obstructive bureaucrats of the India Office. Thus the prosecution of most important public works, especially railways, was brought to a deadlock in a manner at once alarming and disgusting. Some of these railways, if constructed speedily, cannot fail to be so many veritable gold mines to the country. The line from Bhopal to Jhánsi and Cawnpore, proposed to be undertaken by the G. I. P. Railway Company, or the rival line from Godhra to Ratlam projected by the B. B. & C. I. Railway Company, and the line from Rajpur to Burrakpur, opening up the country between Bombay and Central India and Calcutta and Central India, and helping the formation of direct and easy means of communication between the two capital cities, are projects of that description. It is therefore to be hoped that the urgency pleaded by Mr. Cross in the House of Commons will induce all concerned to resume some of the former activity in the prosecution of public works of the description above referred to.

Does not approve of the reported refusal by the British Government to accord permission to Mahárája Dhuleep Singh to visit India.

The Poona Vaibhav (49) of the 26th August says:—It has been recently reported that the British Government has refused permission to Mahárája Dhuleep Singh to visit his motherland. The only reason for such refusal would appear to be the apprehension that the minds of the people of the Panjáb would be unsettled by the visit of their former ruler. In our opinion, however, such a policy is not wise, because if the people are convinced of the morality, justice and liberality of the British Government, why should they wish for a revival of their past miseries by the advent of a descendant of their former rulers? If the British hold that their dominion in India is simply for the good of the country, then it is very disgraceful that they should check the exercise of his free will by an individual on grounds of false suspicions.

Observes that the British Government has done well in inducing Mahárája Dhuleep Singh to continue to stay in England, and suggests that the claims of the Mahárája to an increased pension should be generously considered.

The Bombay Chronicle (75) of the 26th August observes that the British Government have done well in inducing Mahárája Dhuleep Singh to continue to stay in England. Neither the loyalty of the prince nor the stability of the Indian Government would have been affected by the Mahárája's resolution to pass the remainder of his life in the quiet solitude of his native land after the despoilers of his birthright had rendered his further stay in England almost impossible by their shabby treatment of him. The knowledge gained and the experience obtained by him after his long residence in England of the great power and firm resolution of the British nation to retain possession of India at any cost are sufficient not to mislead a person of his intelligence and mature age to entertain any mad idea of proving troublesome to Government. But in the event of his actual return to his country, disheartened and disconsolate, the narrative of his shabby treatment and the injudicious disregard of his claims to better or more liberal consideration at the hands of the authorities in England would doubtless create an impression in his favour amongst Sikhs and others in India, and rouse amongst the less thoughtful Natives feelings disagreeable to the British people. Indeed, the reports that the Mahárája was selling his effects to pay off his debts and that he had resolved to return to India in order to escape the miseries of straitened circumstances, the result of no fault of his own, had begun to create sentiments in his favour, the growth of which on his actual return to this country might have proved a little inconvenient to the authorities on the spot. By reason of the circumstances under which he happened to be despoiled of his great birthright and his admirable behaviour towards the nation which tamely suffered the act of spoliation to take place, Dhuleep Singh may be fairly held to be deserving of the most generous treatment that the British Government can accord to him. It is therefore to be hoped that British statesmen will see that the Mahárája is properly treated and that his claims are fully and generously considered by the Government of India.

Complains that the interference of the British Government in the affairs of Portuguese India has proved a source of evil.

The Poona Vaibhav (49) of the 26th August quotes an extract from a Portuguese paper describing the effects of the treaty recently ratified between the Governments of British and Portuguese India, and says:—Time has familiarized us to all the iniquities of the British rule, such as heavy taxes, the drainage of Indian wealth to Europe, and the distinctions observed between the white and black races. But when the British Government steps into a foreign dominion the people there find their advent unbearable. By a recent treaty the British Government have been placed in a position to interfere with the salt administration of Portuguese India, and we learn from several Portuguese papers that the people there have been reduced by the British Government to a very miserable condition. Salt, which was as cheap as earth, has become dearer than wheat and rice. Moreover, the policy of the British Government regarding the manufacture of salt has proved so oppressive that many people have begun to find their position untenable. The Portuguese Government connives at the distress of its subjects on the consideration of receiving four lákhs of rupees from the British Government. Hitherto the British Government had achieved a name in the British Indian dominions only, but now their fame has begun to spread in foreign territories!

Comments on the Indian financial statement for 1883-84.

The Quarterly Journal of the Poona Sárvajanik Sabhá (4) for the month of July 1883 but received on the 16th August discusses the Indian financial statement for 1883-84. Speaking of the effects of the abolition of import duties on European piece-goods the Journal arrives at the following conclusions:—(1) That the abolition of import duties by the Government of India has not been followed by any decidedly increased trade in imports, and that such increase in imported goods as has taken place is not beyond the normal increase due to a good year in India—in fact, it is less than such normal increase. (2) The fact that the levy of import duties on cotton goods had hitherto no protective effect has been placed beyond all question by the repeal of the duties not having injuriously affected the cotton industry of India. On the contrary, the vitality inherent in the Indian industry has been made manifest by the fact of new mills having been started in the Bombay Presidency. (3) That the strong pressure put by Manchester on the Indian Government, which has resulted in the abolition of the cotton and other duties on imported goods, has so far neither benefited herself nor placed the Indian consumer upon any more satisfactory basis as regards the cheapness of goods, but that the only result of the measure so far has been that a most valuable resource of revenue, raised without the least trouble to Government on the one hand and the Indian tax-payer on the other, has been sacrificed by the ministry of Mr. Gladstone to the selfish cry of a powerful manufacturing English interest. (4) That in the neutral markets of China and Japan, Indian cotton industry has been able to compete successfully with Manchester by the more honest and superior character of the goods it has been able to supply. (5) That the levy of duties on imported goods solely for revenue purposes not being at all in conflict with free-trade principles, the past year has shown, what every succeeding year may be expected to bring out with ever-increasing prominence, that in giving up this source of revenue the Government of India has set aside the principle which lies at the root of Mr. Gladstone's dictum in regard to free trade, namely, that the state of revenue is an essential element in the consideration of the application of the principles of free trade. On the whole, then, it may be confidently asserted that so far the abolition of the import duty has benefited neither Manchester nor the Indian consumer, while it has involved a needless permanent sacrifice of a million and a quarter sterling to a country which in the long run must find it difficult to fill up this void in its exchequer. Referring to the reduction in the duty on salt the writer says:—While therefore, as shown above, we cannot conscientiously congratulate the Government of India on the repeal of duties on imported goods, we cannot too sufficiently convey our sense of gratefulness to Lord Ripon and Major Baring for the reduction of salt duties. This reduction means that Bombay and Madras have at last succeeded in making their voices heard in the Imperial Council. Everywhere in India the pressure of the salt duty has been felt with more or less severity by the poorer classes, but there is perhaps no part of this country where the people have to complain more in the matter of salt than in the Presidency of Bombay. The grievances of the people may be briefly summed up under three main heads:—(1) Enhancements of duty; (2) rigorous administration of the salt law, as evidenced in a wholesale suppression of private salt-works without compensating their owners, in the throwing out of employment of hundreds who depended directly or indirectly upon the salt industry for their means of living, and the overstocking of the labour and agricultural markets by those who were thus let loose upon society; (3) reduced consumption of salt among the poor, and in the feeding of cattle, in fish-curing, tree-manuring,—all resulting more or less in unhealthiness to animal life and preventing the growth of tree-planting. The Salt Department in Bombay was organised as a separate charge in 1872-73 under an officer called the Collector of Salt Revenue. There is little doubt that from a financial point of view the new department has justified the need of its existence in the eyes of Government; but its rigorous and crushing administration has been keenly felt by the people. One of the principal results of this administration has been a wholesale suppression of private salt-works existing in the different parts of the Bombay Presidency. It is worthy of note that this work of systematic suppression of salt-works throughout the Bombay Presidency has been carried on for a number of years in spite of the loud protests and complaints of the people, and without giving the owners of salt-works a farthing of compensation. In many cases the salt-works were private properties; in others, the works were leased from Government. Surely in both cases the proprietors were entitled to compensation, the amount of it being regulated by the nature of their rights. This is a cruel and serious wrong done by the department to those whose salt-works were suppresed. That the consumption of salt among the poorer classes in the Bombay Presidency has been reduced in consequence of its dearness is a well-grounded belief of those who move among them. Salt, however, before it became dear, was put to uses other than that of human consumption. It was mixed with baked or parched grain and given to cattle and horses. In this respect its use has become contracted ever since the rise in its price. It is also in request as manure for trees and in fish-curing. Mango trees, which abound in parts of India, especially require salt as a manure for their rapid and healthy growth. The reduction in the salt duty already made leads us to enquire whether it has not resulted in increased consumption of salt either for human food or for other purposes. Now, it is undeniable that the reduction of duty has to a certain extent cheapened salt. Speaking with regard to the Bombay Presidency, we are of opinion that there has not only been a reduction in the price of salt already, but that there is a possibility of this reduction in duty cheapening the retail salt still further but for the hindrances now caused by the policy which has been acted upon for some years past of steady and systematic suppression of Government and private salt-works conveniently situated as regards their proximity to the consumers in each district of the Presidency and capable of supplying cheaper salt. The object of this policy appears to be no other than to benefit the central salt-works at Khárághoda at the expense of local salt-works. To the consumer, however, the result of the policy has been to considerably neutralize the effect of the reduction in duty, since as matters stand at present the consumer has to pay in the retail price of salt all the charge for railway fare from the Khárághoda central depôt to his town or village, which he could easily save if the salt-works situated in his district were not suppressed by Government. To the wholesale dealer the heaviest item of cost is railway fare for conveyance of salt from the central depôt like that of Khárághoda to the district or the railway station in the district which formerly possessed salt-works but which have been recently suppressed. This cost would be considerably reduced, if not altogether saved, were the policy of suppressing local salt-works made to give way to the old but fairer and more liberal policy of opening local salt-works in the vicinity of groups of villages where they were in existence before. We are of opinion that, small as the present reduction of salt duty has been, it would tell more effectively on the cheapening of salt were this policy acted upon. Another suggestion we have to offer concerns the desirability of making concessions in duty in the case of salt required for cattle, fish-curing, tree-culture, soap-making and other manufacturing purposes, and, last but not least, in the case of salt required for food by the aboriginal classes. It has been found in this Presidency that of late cattle have suffered much from want of salted food. They are known to have become stunted in growth and stature. Again, agriculture will vastly improve by the use of salt. Mango and other trees, flowering as well as fruit-bearing, will thrive luxuriantly with salt manure. And it is hardly necessary to say that the greater the number of trees, the greater are the chances of a plentiful rainfall. In the fish-curing industry, moreover, salt is very much wanted. At present fishermen on the whole sea-coast of this Presidency find it very costly to use pure salt in any large quantity for their purposes, and it is not a matter for surprise that they often have recourse to inferior salt, and the result is that the fish supplied by them is often unwholesome if not quite putrid, and injurious to the health of those who use salted fish for food. It may be urged against these recommendations that the result of concessions in duty for any of the above purposes will encourage smuggling to the detriment of legitimate revenue. To this we say that a few simple precautions are all that are needed to make unmerchantable the quantity of salt required for cattle, trees and fish-curing. For instance, salt required for tree-manure must not be permitted to be delivered pure but should before delivery be mixed in the presence of an officer of the Salt Department with cow-dung, as when once mixed with cow-dung it can hardly be separated from it. In like manner, salt required for the use of cattle may be given mixed with powdered husk, either of rice, bájri or any other food-grain. No doubt devices will suggest themselves to the ingenuity of the Salt Department whereby the consumption of salt for the purposes we have indicated above will be facilitated without the least detriment to revenue. We trust the suggestions we have ventured to offer will commend themselves to the good sense of the Finance Minister, and that we shall be able to see in the next year's financial statement that steps are taken by the Government of India, on the lines of the proposals we have here made, to secure a larger consumption of salt for the legitimate purposes of encouraging industrial enterprise, for preventing the stunted growth of cattle, and providing for the consumption of the vast aboriginal classes that people many of the jungly parts of India.

Comments on the new rules for the raising of loans by Local Governments.

The Mahrátta (2) of the 26th August, in referring to the new rules published in the Gazette of India for the raising of loans by local authorities, remarks:—On the whole the aim of the new rules appears to be to minimize to the greatest extent the misapplication of any funds. We think that the Local Government ought also to consult Native gentlemen of authority in the province about the necessity or otherwise of a new loan. Their opinions ought to be solicited; for we have not yet reached that stage when opinions are voluntarily given by persons who think it their duty, from the position they hold, to do so. Some provision ought to be made for the immediate sanctioning of a sum above Rs. 5,000 when it is required urgently for relief works in exceptional cases.

Comments in connection with the appointment of a committee by the Government of India to consider the question of reorganizing the Public Works Department.

The Native Opinion (10) of the 26th August says:—It seems that the Supreme Government has appointed a committee to consider the question of reorganizing the Public Works Department. But what is it that compels Government to be always on the tip-toe for the consideration of such questions? It is, if we mistake not, the overflooding of this highly-paid service. In the first place a cry is sent forth that the department, not being sufficiently equipped, cannot work efficiently. This cry has to be met by the importation of a number of engineers from England. At the end of another cycle another cry is raised that owing to a great block in the service dissatisfaction prevails on account of want of promotion. The result is the appointment of a committee to consider the never-ending reorganization, which means the retirement of certain members on pensions and fat bonuses. It is thus that the home charges annually increase, and the Indian tax-payer has at his own personal risk to pay his hard-earned penny towards satisfying the ever-increasing demand from England. We hope the committee now appointed will be asked to consider particularly this phase of the question, and to devise some plan whereby the much complained of block may be checked. We also hope the committee will pay due attention to the claims of students from the Indian Engineering Colleges.

Suggests the appointment of a commission to enquire into the causes of unequal fall of rain in this country.

The Mahrátta (2) of the 26th August says:—The unequal fall of rain during this and past seasons suggests the necessity of appointing a commission to enquire into the causes of these phenomena and to devise means, if possible, to avoid them. This unequal rainfall has caused much damage hitherto both to life and property, and as it has become almost chronic it becomes a real danger which ought to be faced and minutely scrutinized. If it be found impossible to avoid it, then some means ought to be devised to withstand its worst effects, or, if possible, to utilize them to the best advantage. As the bulk of the population depends upon agricultural industry, and as this irregular rainfall affects agricultural prospects seriously, we can no longer shut our eyes to it. The Meteorological Department will render valuable service in this matter.

Comments in connection with the re-appointment of the Honourable Sir Jamsetji Jijibhái, Bart., as a member of the Bombay Legislative Council.

The same says:—We are glad to see that the Honourable Sir Jamsetji Jijibhái, Bart., has been re-appointed for the third time a member of the Bombay Legislative Council. But we must observe that a new man ought to have been chosen to fill his place. It is not a good practice to confine such appointments to a few select persons, re-electing them each time. New element ought to be introduced into the Council. There are a few more persons, we think, who can fill the office with dignity and honour. However, the re-election of Sir Jamsetji will give universal satisfaction, as the honourable gentleman has shown on more than one occasion that he is made of the right stuff. [The Yajdán Parast (124) of the same date expresses similar sentiments.]

Offers certain suggestions in the matter of the disposal of license tax appeals.

The Jagaddárarsh (31) of the 26th August says that it is very unjust that license tax assessments at Ahmednagar should be revised and enhanced every year when the very imposition of the tax has been based on principles of injustice. It is, however, a matter of satisfaction that the power of hearing appeals has been conferred on Mr. Hamilton, who can never be too much praised for the trouble he takes in doing justice to the parties coming before him. Mr. Hamilton generally seeks the assistance of Native assessors in disposing of appeals, but it is to be suggested that he will do well (1) to select competent and impartial men for the duty, (2) to appoint new assessors every year, and (3) to direct the examination of account books in cases where the assessors recommend an extraordinary enhancement or reduction of the amount of original assessment. The chairman of the local municipality has this year been selected as an assessor, but the selection of Khán Báhádur Nasarwánji Kharsetji would have been far preferable.

Does not approve of the order directing school-masters to assist in the destruction of locusts.

The Satyá Shodhak (57) of the 26th August does not approve of the order directing school-masters to assist in the destruction of locusts. Such an order is calculated to create a temporary break in the education of children and thus to prove detrimental to their interests. Government should therefore duly consider this subject and remand the order already issued. [The Nyáyá Prakásh (109) of the 27th August expresses somewhat similar sentiments.]

Complaint against certain act of religious oppression.

The Jagan Mitrá (32) of the 27th August says:—We hear that the Magistrate and Chief Constable did not entertain the complaint preferred by the people of the village of Harkul in the Devgad Táluka of the Ratnágiri District that certain Mussalmáns threw bones of cattle into a Hindu temple and demolished the images in the shrine. If true, is this not very astonishing? What complaints will the officers entertain if not such as relate to acts of religious tyranny? If the Hindu religion has been offended as mentioned above, the people should secure redress by appealing to higher authorities.

Brings to notice a certain case of unjust prosecution by a municipal darogha and unjust decision by an honorary magistrate.

The Gujarát Mitrá (76) of the 26th August gives the particulars of a case in which one Utamchand Devchand was prosecuted by a municipal darogha before the honorary magistrate Mr. Zulficar Ali, when the offence for which the prosecution was brought related to the property of one Sobhágchand Meghráj who was deceased and who had no connection with the person actually prosecuted. When summoned to attend before the magistrate, Uttamchand explained that he was not Sobhágchand Meghráj and therefore could not be prosecuted. The honorary magistrate, however, fined Uttamchand Rs. 2 on the statement of the darogha. Uttamchand therefore appealed against this decision to the District Magistrate and requested permission to prosecute the municipal darogha for having taken a false oath. The District Magistrate, however, simply remitted the fine unlawfully levied by the honorary magistrate. It is, however, very surprising that no steps should have been taken against the darogha who deposed to a false statement against an innocent person, and who is expected to know all the residents in his ward. The Mitrá has nothing to say against Mr. Zulficar Ali, considering that this is the first serious mistake on his part; but the writer nevertheless warns him that he should be very cautious in the discharge of his responsible duties.

Comments on the present system of conducting the Public Service Examination.

The Indian Spectator (1) of the 26th August says:—It seems to be forgotten that the Public Service Examination is intended to test the efficiency and qualifications of clerks entering the public service on small salaries, and that the object of the examination is defeated by asking recondite questions which it is easy for examiners with text-books to set but which it is ridiculous to expect anybody to answer except by a reference to authorities. In instituting the examination Government could hardly have intended that clerks with a fifth standard limit of education should be asked to draw a map of the Chinese Empire and to answer equally profound questions in geography. The question is one that affects not only a large class of public servants but also the public service itself, the standard of efficiency of which must certainly deteriorate if examiners, instead of asking questions likely to test the candidates' intelligence and abilities, encourage cramming by setting abstruse questions which nobody out of the line of a specialist ever studies, least of all students who have not advanced half way towards the Matriculation standard. We are convinced that it is only snobs and pedants who put such staggering questions to show themselves off. We earnestly ask Government to alter a system which is not likely to promote the efficiency of the subordinate public service or to attract intelligent and qualified men to its ranks.

Does not approve of the order of the Commissioner of Police prohibiting the use of musical instruments in Ganpati processions.

The Prabhákar (50) of the 28th August says that the order of the Commissioner of Police, Bombay, prohibiting the use of musical instruments without license on the occasion of the Ganpati processions is without a precedent and will therefore be felt by the public of Bombay as rather hard. Perhaps the Police Commissioner has been led to issue this order by the circumstance that Major Tucker of the Salvation Army, when recently prosecuted for using musical instruments without license in public streets, quoted the precedent of the Ganpati processions as a justification for the exemption of the Salvation Army from the necessity of having a license for using musical instruments and being allowed to go in processions. There is, however, a great difference between the processions on account of Ganpati and those of the Salvation Army, and the Commissioner will see his error on a fuller consideration of the order he has issued. It is therefore to be hoped that the Commissioner will retract his order and thus please the Hindu public. [The Din Bandhu (5) of the 20th, the Káside Mumbai (104) of the 29th, and the Dátardun (90) of the 30th August express similar sentiments.]

Complains that several Pársi males, females and children gamble with money on the Muktád holidays.

The Kaiser-i-Hind (103) of the 26th August states that several Pársis, men, women and children, gamble with money on the Muktád holidays that fall about the time of the Hindu month of A'shádh. This vice prevailed extensively in former days but has decreased of late. It still prevails to some extent and ought to disappear totally.

Complains of the inconvenience caused by the absence of a metalled road from Kolamb to Málvan.

A correspondent of the Poona Vaibhav (49) of the 26th August complains of the inconvenience caused to the public by the absence of a metalled road from Kolamb to the bazár at Málvan, and requests the attention of the Mámlatdár to the matter.

Recommends the erection of a bridge over a rivulet at Ratnágiri.

A correspondent of the Bakul (16) of the 26th August states that a rivulet crosses the public road which passes from the tank near Teli-vathára to the sea-shore at Ratnágiri. Fishermen and children pass by this road frequently, and it is feared that they may meet with serious accidents while crossing the streamlet. It is therefore to be hoped that the authorities concerned will erect a bridge over this rivulet.

Complaint of there being very few vakils in the Subordinate Judge's Court at Rájápur.

A correspondent of the Bakul (16) of the 26th August states that there are very few vakils in the Subordinate Judge's Court at Rájápur and consequently suitors and defendants are sometimes put to great inconvenience. English-knowing vakils are still fewer. The attention of the District Judge of Ratnágiri is requested to the complaint.

Condemns the career of Colonel Barton as Political Agent of Káthiáwár.

In a leader headed "The Career of Colonel Barton as Political Agent in Káthiáwár," the Yajdán Parast (124) of the 26th August observes that the Colonel's career has belied the expectations formed of him when he assumed the charge of the Agency. He did not adopt any measures to improve the province made over to his charge, but exercised most wilful authority over those under him. He followed the policy of pleasing the larger Native States at the cost of the smaller ones, and overlooked the encroachments of the former on the rights of the latter. He ruled the province in such a high-handed manner as to assume to himself the authority of a supreme ruler over the Chiefs of the province. He exercised his authority so wilfully that he sometimes disgraced the vakils in open court and threatened to deprive them of their sanads. He put blind faith in the reports of servile and obsequious kárbháris and wahiwátdárs, and thus he failed to dispense justice to persons claiming redress against the wrongs done by the Native States. Corruption is said to be extensively prevalent in Káthiáwár. However unimpeachable may be the honesty of the British officers it is commonly reported in the province that bribes are received in the names of the high officials; and some rascally shirastedárs, kárbháris and kámdárs do not hesitate to ask for bribes in the name of European officials to line their own pockets. Colonel Barton has shown himself incompetent to destroy the nest of such men. He highly extolled several important Chiefs for their works of small merit, and the result was that they succeeded in deluding him with outward improvements, while in fact the administration of their States was inwardly rotten. Colonel Barton leaves Káthiáwár in such a bad state that the work of his successor will be very heavy. The whole province is rejoiced at the approaching departure of the Colonel.

Local Self-government.

Comments on the debate in the Bombay Legislative Council on the occasion of the introduction of the Local Self-government Bills.

The Dnyán Prakásh (8) of the 30th August refers to the debate in the Bombay Legislative Council on the occasion of the introduction of the Local Self-government Bills, and after quoting some extracts from the Honourable Mr. Peile's speech regarding the general principles of local self-government, says:—It would appear that the Government of Bombay has now completely abandoned the position it had assumed in the now notorious and ill-starred second paragraph of the September resolution. It is a great relief to find that such is the case. That position was from the first quite untenable, and the experience of the municipal elections in March and April last must have convinced the Government of Sir James Fergusson of the utterly untenable character of that position. It is true that the original framers of our existing Local Funds and Municipal Acts had in view the eventual introduction of the elective principle into the constitution of our local committees, but this original intention was altogether lost sight of by Sir James Fergusson's Government last year, when it was overshadowed by the narrow spirit then in the ascendant but since removed. Briefly then we must welcome this return to the proper mood and temper of mind.

Criticises the Bombay Local Boards Bill.

The Indian Spectator (1) of the 26th August says:—We cannot refrain from observing how studiously Government have avoided introducing a professional and an educational test. No doubt it will be urged that sub-clause (5) of clause (b) of Section 10 will enable men of ability and education to offer themselves as candidates for a táluka local board. But bearing in mind the poor income of the fairly educated who permanently reside in villages and tálukas, it is quite possible that the more intelligent persons may be shut out. Anyhow it is expedient that the Bill should recognize the principle of introducing this additional test and provide for it accordingly. We are strongly of opinion that graduates, pleaders, engineers and editors of newspapers should be declared eligible for seats on táluka boards. It is in the very nature of things essential, if local self-government in tálukas is to be a reality and not a sham, that all the available educated intelligence of the locality must be recognized in the constitution of the boards. As Mill has properly observed, we require "general cultivation, which will stimulate not only thinking but action." And we are convinced that an educational test will give local board elections the chance wanted for so desirable a purpose. Both mental activity and action are needed. It will be the man of fair intelligence and education who will stimulate thinking, and it will be the man of business, the landed proprietor or shopkeeper, who will come forward to put that thinking into action. Thus with the combined assistance of such men local boards will be sufficiently educated in a short time to manage their own affairs. The educational test must be insisted upon. When it is granted and when the other qualifications are modified, the local board election will stand on a reasonably democratic basis that will satisfy the most sanguine reformer of local municipal government. At present it seems that the infallibles are intent upon shutting out all light from local boards. This can never be. They must be compelled by the people's representatives in the Legislative Council to adopt a fair educational test. It must be remembered that in England one-third of the educated classes have the franchise for local boards. We now proceed with Section 11. We are glad to observe that Subordinate Judges are not exempted from sitting at táluka boards. This is as it should be. We regret that the Poona Sárvajanik Sabha has very strongly and somewhat inconsistently recommended their exemption, and that too on a ground which to us seems untenable. The Sabha recommends exemption on the ground on which District Judges are exempted. But the two cases are widely different. It will only be in rare instances that an election dispute or a suit touching a local board will be heard before a Subordinate Judge. Hence it will be a great disadvantage to forego the valuable services of so independent and intelligent an official at the board. We want men of intelligence, and the more we have of such, the greater the likelihood of people in the mofussil managing their own affairs according to their own free will and conscience. There will not be at the táluka board a more valuable member than the Subordinate Judge. He should be retained at any cost. Clause (c) disqualifies any person who has been sentenced to imprisonment from becoming a member. This is rather a sweeping disqualification. Sometimes persons are unjustly sentenced; sometimes sentences inflicted are for offences involving no moral turpitude. Why then should all persons once convicted, whatever the offence, be excluded? The object of the Bill will be fairly met by stating that persons convicted of compoundable offences should not be disqualified. The disqualification touching insolvents needs to be restricted also. In fact the word as it now stands is very indefinite and must be qualified. There may be insolvents who have received their final discharges years ago. They may be very intelligent and honest men. Are they to be debarred from membership simply because they had the misfortune to take the benefit of the Insolvency Act? The proprietor of a newspaper need not be disqualified from membership simply because he does the printing job of a local municipality. It is enacted in the 14th section that the local board's election shall be held every three years. We are of opinion that in the early stage of self-government the more the people become familiarized with the system of elections the greater will be their progress in that art. Hence a biennial election is much to be preferred. We must strongly object to the latter part of the 1st paragraph of Section 17. It may happen that the Collector may willingly or unwillingly omit a qualified person from his list. That would be grievous injustice. Is such a person to have no right of appeal? Past experience of the conduct of Collectors in general strongly suggests that the right of appeal should be reserved. His decision ought, under no circumstances, to be considered final. Objection must also be taken to sub-clause (3) of Section 18. Under no circumstances ought salaried persons in the service of Government to be enfranchised for purposes of táluka local boards. There is enough power conferred by the Act to enable Government to nominate their own members who in all probability will be their servants. Again, even from among the persons to be elected some will turn out to be Government servants; and if it be the intention of our rulers to by-and-bye further increase the non-official element by an extension of the franchise, then this danger, already existent, ought to be avoided at all hazards. No Government servant should be a voter. This must be insisted upon. We believe it is the case in England that Government servants cannot vote.

Criticises the Bombay Local Boards Bill.

The Mahrátta (2) of the 26th August says:—The duties of local boards are enumerated in Section 30, and it is stated in the Statement of Objects and Reasons that they are much the same as those of existing committees, and that the only object of setting them forth in the Bill is that they may be easily ascertainable and well understood. It is apparent from this statement that Government are not prepared to entrust to these boards matters not hitherto administered by them, and the perusal of the sections that follow makes it plain that even in matters which are declared fit to be administered by them their authority is limited to a very great extent. Public works of local utility and education have been declared to be the two objects for which local funds are raised and boards formed. But if we look to what actual authority local boards have at present in these respects, we find that they have hardly anything to do except to transfer a large amount of their income to the Public Works and Educational Departments. A great portion of the funds being thus shared between the two departments, the principal business left for the boards is the preparation of budgets and the supervision of minor works. For example, in matters of education the authority of local boards is confined to the maintenance and repairs of school-buildings, &c., and they are not allowed the least voice in the management of the standards of instruction followed in those schools. Now if the position of the new boards is to be the same as that of the old ones, we may safely ask what is the good of all this labour? The object of the local self-government scheme is to give real power and authority to these local bodies and at the same time to create and utilize independent popular opinion by allowing the tax-payers a voice in the management of local funds, and to secure both these ends the new Bill ought to have provided for placing real power in the hands of these boards. Our idea of these boards is that in matters of primary education and public works of local use they should have every authority to appoint their officers to carry on the administration independently of the Educational and Public Works Departments. In short, we should like to see local boards developed into independent district committees for the spread of education and construction of public works, &c. That alone is calculated to place real power in their hands and to make them feel the responsibility of their position. We are quite sure that under the management of the boards primary schools will show more life than under the present centralized system, and will better adapt themselves to local wants. We are aware that this cannot be done at once and that it is undesirable to transfer the whole work from a highly organized department to these newly formed bodies. But there can be no harm in making officers under the grade of Educational Inspector subordinates to these committees in some of the advanced districts. The bodies may be directed, or rather they will do it without direction, to keep up departmental uniformity for some time, and when they become used to the work Government can safely leave it entirely to their management. If the experiment proves successful in the advanced districts, and we have no doubt it will, other committees may then be gradually invested with similar powers, until primary education throughout the whole Presidency comes to be looked after by these committees instead of by the Educational Department as at present. The question of the transfer of higher education to these bodies may then be taken up. As regards public works we propose a similar arrangement. Instead of making the boards pay a certain portion of the expenses of maintaining the Public Works Departments in the districts, the boards may be allowed to appoint their own officers and to get all their works done by them. They should appoint their own engineers and overseers, the district engineer giving only such help and advice as may be deemed necessary by the boards or as he deems fit. The same remarks apply to the management of hospitals and dispensaries. In short, if Government intend to place real power in the hands of these bodies, they ought to hand over to them the management of such portions of the several departments for which the boards are made to pay as may be deemed advisable. Nothing short of it will interest the public in the work, and what is still more important, will teach them to manage their own affairs. As to the argument that it is inexpedient to transfer to the management of local bodies such professional departments as the Public Works and Medical, we think it quite worthless in so far as local bodies can command the services of persons equally qualified with those in the departments or even of these latter themselves. We should therefore recommend that if Government are not prepared to transfer other matters to the boards, they should at least so modify the provisions in the Bill or so frame the rules, which should be published with the Bill, as to allow real power to the new boards in matters of primary education and local public works. The enumeration of the duties of local boards in Section 30 is not definite, and to one of them we have special objection. Clause (9) provides that the boards shall keep up, as far as the local funds at their disposal will allow, relief works in times of famine. This appears to be an additional burden on local funds which were never intended to meet this want. We are aware that local bodies can do these things better than Government; but there ought to be a clear distinction between what local bodies have to do for purely local purposes and what they have to do because they can exercise better supervision than Government. It is reasonable that these bodies should pay for the former ; but Government ought to defray the expenses of the latter. The vague provision that "local funds include grants made by Government" is of no avail. It leaves the committees in perfect ignorance as to what contribution they will receive from Government and exposes them to the risk of financial embarrassment in case of sudden necessities like famine. This course has been adopted by the Supreme Government in the matter of the settlement of the financial relations of the several Provincial Governments with itself under the designation of the decentralization scheme. When the local Governments have their financial relations with the Supreme Government thus defined, we see no reason why the same privilege should be withheld from local boards inasmuch as local self-government is but an extension of the same scheme.

Criticises the Bombay Local Boards Bill.

The Indu Prakásh (9) of the 27th August says :—It may be remembered that there is a clause in Act III. of 1869 which empowers local fund committees to employ their officers "in accordance with such rules as may from time to time be prescribed in that behalf by Government." These words were taken advantage of by Goverement in two ways. At first, and until nearly the close of the year 1874, Government contented themselves with laying down very general rules, which simply directed from what class the committees were to select their officers. The result was that the general directions laid down by Government helped the committees in getting their local works constructed by engineering officers selected by and responsible to them. In 1874 a change came about. Government by their Public Works Department Resolution No. 12 E.—508, dated 30th November 1874, ordered that local fund committees should give up their engineering departments, that the engineering officers employed by the committees should be ranked as officers of the Public Works Department, and this department should thenceforth supervise the construction of the more important class of the local works of the committees. It was supposed that economy would be the result of this amalgamation of the Public Works Department of the committees with that of Government. But directly the latter department got the local works of the committees fast in its grip by virtue of this resolution, it did not scruple to make the best of the bargain in its own interests. High rates were charged to the committees for works that would have cost less if they had been constructed under the direct supervision of the committees themselves, and large works supplanted minor works of local importance. Such was the part played by the power which Act III. of 1869 left to Government of framing rules for the employment of officers by local fund committees. The system has been at work under the seven years' budget rules which were introduced by the Government of Bombay on the 18th of July 1881. Under these rules it is provided that "as a rule, all public works shall be undertaken by the Public Works Department, and Superintending Engineers and Executive Engineers shall superintend and construct such works with the same care that they are required to bestow on works from provincial funds." The only works that local fund committees are authorized to construct on their own responsibility and independently of the Public Works Department are (a) "original works and repairs, the cost of each of which shall not exceed Rs. 2,500, and which do not require professional skill," and (b) "lines of road the mileage cost of which shall not exceed Rs. 500." Moreover, under Section 20 of the seven years' budget rules now in force "the local funds shall be debited with a share of expenses of the regular public works establishment at a uniform rate of 15 per cent. on the amount actually expended in the year by the Executive Engineer, Public Works Department." Now, is there any chance that these rules will not bind the boards which the Bill proposes to constitute? No. The boards are to be saddled with the liabilities of the present committees. The only change that the Bill proposes to make is that the Executive Engineer of a district shall not be an ex-officio member of its local board. But he shall be present at the meetings of the board; the board shall consult him; and he shall frame the estimates of the works to be constructed. These provisions, taken together with clause (c) of Section 66, which reserves to Government the right of framing general rules for the appointment of officers by the boards, indicate very clearly that it is the intention of Government to make the new boards dependent upon the Public Works Department as the committees now are under the seven years' budget rules. At the first sight it may seem an advantage on the side of economy to the local boards to have their works constructed by the Public Works Department, since it dispenses with the necessity of their entertaining and paying for a separate public works establishment. But experience has shown that the advantage is only nominal and that the estimates of the Public Works Department are generally, and indeed notoriously, excessive. We are unable to see why it should be difficult to allow local boards to construct their works under their own supervision by employing competent contractors or capable engineers. Government have of late been saying a good deal about the encouragement of private enterprise, and here is immense scope for the extension of that encouragement. Local boards are not likely to have to pay high rates for the construction of their works if the task be entrusted to engineers or contractors selected by themselves. Private engineers, of whom the country has many, are sure to compete with one another for securing such works from local boards, and under such competition there is no chance of local boards having to spend more money than they have to give now to the Public Works Department. Except the desire of Government to find some work for their Public Works Department and to lighten the charges which they have to pay for the maintenance of that department, we are unable to see any other justification for the course which has been adopted till now much to the detriment of local fund committees and which it is proposed to legalize by means of the present Bill. We may generally observe that the powers of "control" proposed to be given to the Collector and the Revenue Commissioner seem to us both well conceived and essential for securing the performance of their duties by the boards. Even in England Government have reserved to themselves such powers and we cannot be blind to the fact that, however formidable these powers may look on paper and however liable they may be to abuse in the hands of unsympathetic and high-handed officials, yet they are necessary in a country where apathy and indifference more or less prevent people from interesting themselves in public affairs. Should those powers be abused in any case there is public opinion to expose the abuse, and we may hope that once the local boards are set agoing they will grow familiar with their duties and the present necessity of holding over them in terrorem the threats of supersession will be removed.

Criticises the Bombay District Municipal Act Amendment Bill.

The Dnyán Prakásh (8) of the 27th August says :—Section 38 in the Control chapter of the Bombay District Municipal Act Amendment Bill is on the face of it the most objectionable section in the Municipal Bill. It is well known that under the provisions of Section 21 of the District Municipal Act of 1873, which section is not repealed by the present Bill but is only amended in one particular, no municipality can levy any toll, cess, tax, fee, or other impost without the previous sanction of the Governor in Council, and under these circumstances it appears in the highest degree preposterous and absurd that any toll, cess, tax, fee, or other impost levied by a municipality with such previous sanction should be repealable by a simple executive order of the Governor in Council published in the Bombay Government Gazette. And yet we are told in the Statement of Objects and Reasons (paragraph 26) appended to the Local Boards Bill, which is applicable to the Municipal Bill also, that "whilst adequate provision is made for this purpose (for correcting any abuses or errors), care has been taken to avoid undue interference with the independence and self-respect of the boards." The financial independence of our mofussil municipalities will be hardly anything more than a name when such restrictions are imposed upon it as those contemplated in the section under notice. Again, there is no provision in the existing District Municipal Act corresponding to the contemplated provision, and no case has been made out in support of the new departure proposed to be introduced. Neither is there any such corresponding provision in the Bombay Municipal Act of 1872, nor in any of the legislative measures for any of the other provinces of India. The question therefore naturally arises why has the Bombay Government deemed it fit to introduce such an unprecedented provision in the new Municipal Bill? The Statement of Objects and Reasons appended to the Municipal Bill is altogether silent upon the point.

In short, no evidence has been adduced in support of it. On the contrary, the evidence, so far as it has been made public, points in the contrary direction. Paragraph 55 of the resolution of the Bombay Government on local self-government dated the 19th September 1882 conclusively shows that the apprehensions of the Bombay Government about a year ago were all in the opposite direction. This paragraph makes it very clear that if there be any apprehension at all it is all the other way, though for our part we are not willing to admit that there is any apprehension whatever. And we may rest assured that when any particular taxation is felt as obnoxious and oppressive by the public, municipalities will be the last bodies on earth to continue such taxation for one moment longer than is absolutely necessary. What is then the object of this apparently aimless provision? If we may be allowed to form any conjecture regarding its object, we suspect that it is directed against the municipal octroi, which form of taxation forms in the majority of cases the very back-bone of our municipal revenue. The importance of this branch of municipal revenue may be judged from the fact that if the octroi were removed altogether or very considerably reduced to-morrow, nearly three-fourths of the number of our existing municipalities would have to be at once closed, notably so in the case of the municipalities in the province of Sind. It will be remembered that in 1879 during the administration of Lord Lytton, Sir John Strachey, the then Finance Minister, introduced into the Viceregal Legislative Council a Bill having the same object in view as that of the section under notice, but before it was further proceeded with the then Secretary of State for India disallowed the Bill on precisely the same considerations as those we have stated above. Viewed in this light the insertion of the section under notice appears to be a very disingenuous and back-door attempt to deal a blow to the municipal octroi and thus force direct taxation upon the people. We are astonished that the Bombay Government, which resented the imposition upon its freedom of action of any undue check by the Government of India, should wish to arrogate to itself a power which it would not submit to if exercised by its superior authority. We trust that the Select Committee will throw out this section altogether.

Says that medical officers should not be excluded from the municipal boards.

The Din Bandhu (5) of the 26th August understands that Government have issued a resolution declaring medical officers in the mofussil, such as Civil Surgeons, Assistant Surgeons and Hospital Assistants, ineligible for the office of municipal commissioner. It is said that this order has already been brought into operation by the substitution of other names for those of the medical officers in Pandharpur, Karmála and other places in the Sholápur Collectorate. If this order is based on the argument that the salaries of these officers are paid from municipal funds, then indeed it stands on erroneous grounds. The emoluments of these officers are regulated on the same principle as that obtaining in the case of Government servants, and they are moreover frequently transferred from one place to another. Their admission to the municipal boards is therefore not only unobjectionable but is, on the contrary, calculated to prove beneficial in the discussion of sanitary measures. It may again be urged that as these officers have more than enough to do in the way of their legitimate duties it will not be proper to saddle them with any additional work. Such an argument may hold good in the case of city municipalities, but in town municipalities the medical officers will not find it inconvenient to assist the municipal boards. It is therefore advisable that the authorities of the districts in which the above-mentioned order has already been put into operation should pay due consideration to the fact that medical officers are a great help to a municipality in the discharge of its principal duty.

Finds fault with the translations published by Government.

The Poona Vaibhav (49) of the 26th August quotes some extracts from the Maráthi translations published by Government of the Local Self-Government Bills and the resolution of the Government of India regarding stock notes, and says:—A perusal of these and similar Government translations creates an impression that one can do better to learn English and read the original in English than peruse these translations. The language in which these translations are couched and the mode of expression adopted make them very abstruse and difficult to comprehend without the aid of the original.

It is very astonishing that Government translations should be so poor, considering that they are generally the productions of educated Natives whose vernacular is Maráthi. It is to be hoped that in future at least the Government translators will be good enough to follow the spirit of the original in their translations without attempting to make them literal.

Complains of the irregularity of certain election at Ratnágiri.

The Satyá Shodhak (57) of the 26th August dwells at considerable length on the irregularity of the election of Mr. Vishnu Bábji Godbole for ward No. 5 of the town of Ratnágiri in the place of Ráo Báhádur Nilkanth Anant Joshi deceased, and expresses a hope that the Collector will give due consideration to the matter and pass a decision which will remove all difficulties in similar cases in the future.

Railways.

Complains of the distinction observed in the remuneration of European and Native guards employed on the Rájputána Railway.

The Hitechchhu (77) of Ahmedabad of the 30th August cannot understand why the European guards employed on the Rájputána Railway should be paid Rs. 50 per month with proportionate batta while the Native guards employed on the same railway only get Rs. 15 per month with a proportionately small batta. The duties of European and Native guards are the same and the difference in their remuneration is only owing to race distinctions. The services of old servants do not appear to be appreciated. The railway authorities ought to attend to this complaint.

Municipalities.

Cholera in Bombay.

The Lok Mitrá (78) of the 26th August observes that mortality from cholera continues unabated, and it is no use disguising the fact that the authorities have hitherto failed to successfully meet the epidemic. The temporary appointment of a few extra medical men to "trot after cases of cholera" and the establishment of a cholera hospital have failed to realize the expectations formed of the scheme, and it is evident that such tinkering will result in no permanent or satisfactory improvement of the health of the city. It is discreditable to the public spirit of the city that the mortality should continue practically unabated week after week; and it is obvious that more stringent and comprehensive measures are required to grapple with the difficulty than the tentative scheme set on foot by the Acting Municipal Commissioner. There are absolutely no data from which to judge how far, if at all, the Health Department has been urged to increased and sustained exertion at a time like the present in the direction of removing completely and effectually the main causes which give rise to and favour the development of sickness in the city. Nothing is known as to what the Health Department has done towards removing once and for all the numerous plague-spots in the city. No instructions appear to have been given for dealing with the difficulties arising from the ignorance or prejudices of the poorer and more ignorant classes of the people, and matters are obviously allowed to drift in this manner until some member of the Corporation, more earnest and independent than the others, draws attention to the existence of a nuisance like the Bombay dust-bins, when the danger is recognised and promises of remedying it are held out. The medical men appointed to the various districts have not apparently made any report as to the sanitary condition of the several districts and the general results of their work, and the public are as much in the dark now as they were before their appointment as to the causes which render such a district as Dhobi Talávy, for instance, one of the most unhealthy in the city. And this in the days of boasted local self-government and municipal administration conducted on a scale as costly as it well can be! It is idle to expect any improvement of this state of things unless the members of the Corporation and the Town Council sufficiently bestir themselves to take interest in their duties and recognise the magnitude of their responsibilities; but when that happy consummation will be brought about, it is hard to predict. In the meantime, the public must allow themselves to be deluded by the complacent and grandiloquent reiterations of the late Health Officer that this city would compare favourably, and more than favourably, with any city in Europe, with the most glaring and tangible evidences of its insanitary condition, and with the growing virulence of an epidemic of cholera at least in certain parts of the city. It may not perhaps be asking too much to require that, pending the receipt of the Municipal Commissioner's report on the dust-bins, some steps should immediately be taken to minimize the effects of the existing evil by removing their contents oftener in the day than is done now and by carefully cleaning and disinfecting them every time they are emptied, or at least once a day.

Municipal dust-bins in Bombay.

The Native Opinion (10) of the 26th August says:—Our municipal dust-bins have been the eye-sore of some of our civic fathers, and it is likely that they may be supplanted by movable dust-bins. The proposal is not bad, but we object to the manner in which it is to be worked. It is proposed that the dust-bins should move through the town three or four times a day and the people should throw into them their sweepings whenever they come to their doors. In Bombay the majority of the people live in large oarts, and consequently the carts must stand at the outer gate of the oart or wádi only. Hence it is impossible for the people inside the wádi to know exactly when these bins come and go, and as a result of this the sweepings which may exhale nasty odours will remain in houses for a longer time under the new system. We do gladly accept movable dust-bins, but they must be located permanently in the place of the fixed dust-bins; so that whenever they are full they may be moved away to the flats for depositing their contents. [The Prabhákar (50) of the 25th August does not approve of the scheme of movable dust-bins lately proposed for adoption by the municipality, but says that if the Corporation at all advocate their introduction they should direct (1) that the dust-bins should be covered, (2) that they should be cleanly washed after they are emptied, and (3) that they should be emptied thrice during the course of a day.]

Complains of the insanitary condition of the locality in the vicinity of the Northbrook Gardens.

The Satyavádi (58) of the 1st September dwells on the insanitary condition of the locality in the vicinity of the Northbrook Gardens, and requests the attention of the authorities concerned to the matter. The writer also enquires when the Mussalmán burial grounds near Kámáthipura, which breed cholera, will be closed.

Suggestion for the repair of a well at Belgaum.

A correspondent of the Dnyán Bodhak (25) of the 26th August says that there is great likelihood of accidents to life occurring from the dilapidated well in Rawiwár Peth in the town of Belgaum, and requests the municipal commissioners to visit the site and arrange for the speedy repair of the well and for the posting of a lamp-post near it.

Cholera in Broach.

The Broach Samáchár (87) of the 30th August refers to the appearance of cholera in the city, and says that as long as the small mango-fish is sold fresh in the market no objection can be taken to its sale; but when it is salted, it becomes rotten. Fears are entertained that the use of this salted fish by the poor and labouring classes will lead to an increase of cholera. The streets and privies ought to be kept clean and disinfecting powder freely used. The local municipality ought to have the places infected with cholera fumigated and should take other necessary precautions for the prevention of clolera. [The Broach Vartamán (88) of the 27th idem also points out the necessity of attending to the cleanliness of the city.]

Cholera in Ahmedabad.

The Hitechchhu (77) of Ahmedabad of the 30th August, in writing on the appearance of cholera in the city, points out the necessity of having a graduate of the Medical College for the post of a health officer in the place of the present supervisors. The Hitechchhu is informed that the chairman of the municipal board is in search of a first class hospital assistant for the post. As hygiene is not taught to this class of medical students, what advantage can there be in having such an officer? Does the chairman think of making a return in this way for the obligations he may be under to one of this class of hospital assistants? The chairman ought to give up the idea of nominating such an individual to this post in the interests of 1¼ lákhs of people and should immediately appoint a worthy graduate at this juncture. [The Ahmedabad Samáchár (81) of the 29th idem advises the municipality to attend to the cleanliness of streets, urinals, privies and drains, and suggests that cleanliness should be insisted upon in the Swámi Náráyan's temple.]

Native States.

Comments in connection with the attitude of His Highness the Mahárája Holkar towards Christian missionaries in his territories.

The Indu Prakásh (9) of the 27th August says:—We confess to a feeling of painful surprise at the report which has gained rapid circulation that His Highness the Holkar does not tolerate the presence of Christian missionaries in his State. The statement is made by the Christian organs in such an affirmative tone that we can hardly persuade ourselves to hope that it may be exaggerated. It is difficult to conceive the grounds on which His Highness is able to vindicate his policy, though it is just possible that the strong measures which Sir Lepel Griffin adopted some months ago in prohibiting the members of the Salvation Army from entering His Highness's territories have encouraged the latter in applying the same rule to all Christian missionaries alike. But His Highness bears a fair reputation as an enlightened ruler and he is said to be possessed of wisdom and shrewdness enough to enable him to move with the times and appreciate the advantages of knowledge and progress. He then can hardly afford to lag behind in his attitude towards the ministers of Christ. On the other hand, he ought to be the first to see that the interests of a Native State, or of any government in fact, are never better promoted than when it observes an impartial attitude towards all religions alike. The policy of "let alone" in religious matters has succeeded remarkably well in bringing about peace and good will among men, and we do not see why any prince in India should not care to adopt it. Nor should the Native princes shut their eyes to the fact that Christian missionaries have in their own way done much good to the country, and deserve well of its people for the sympathy which they have often shown to them. At any rate it is but just that they should not be placed at a disadvantage by reason of any special disability arbitrarily imposed upon them. We have hopes that if the Christian missionaries who think they have been wronged by His Highness the Holkar put their case before him in an appropriate form, they will have all reasonable grounds for complaint removed. [The Poona Vaibhav (49) of the 26th August approves of the conduct of the Mahárája Holkar in prohibiting Christian missionaries from preaching their doctrines at Indore, and advises him to persistently maintain his present attitude. Several other vernacular papers express their approval of the conduct of the Mahárája.]

A complaint against the Nawáb of Tonk.

The Mahrátta (2) of the 26th August says:—The Nawáb of Tonk appears to be as bad as the Rája of Rájpipla. The complainant this time is the Nawáb's minister, who now lays his complaint directly before the Viceroy. Matters are carried on by the Nawáb's check in direct defiance of the prime minister's power. The Wahábis and other tribes are making themselves a terror to the Hindus. The surrounding Hindu States are in constant dread of invasion by these marauders. A paper is said to have been found, purporting to be a circular written in Persian, inciting all good Mahomedans to wage a jehád against all infidels. The revenue is going down. Every possible zulum appears to be used in the State. This is a sad case and past all reparation. Government ought to strengthen the hands of the prime minister. Really some of these Rájás appear to think that these are the jolly old times of the Mogul empire or the anarchy following it.

Offers some advice to the Mahárája of Baroda.

The Poona Vaibhav (49) of the 26th August says:—Recent reports show that the Mahárája of Baroda has begun to swerve from the line of policy originally laid down by him So long as the strings of the administration were in the hands of Sir T. Mádhav Ráo, Mr. Elliot, the tutor of the Mahárája, evinced a turn of mind that was liked by the public, but since the administration has passed into the hands of the Mahárája himself a change is perceptible in the original state of things. It is reported by the correspondents of several newspapers that the Gáikwád's Government is bent upon bestowing all the higher posts in the service of the State on Europeans. If this be true it is indeed very discreditable to the Baroda Administration. The subjects of the Baroda State are not European, nor has the Gáikwád, like the British Government, any interest in transmitting the wealth of this country to England in the shape of the handsome salaries of European officers. The money that is collected from the subjects ought to be spent for their good, and what is the meaning of the policy of enriching Europeans at the sacrifice of Natives? It is also reported that the Mahárája has thought of excluding Bráhmans from all power in the Darbár. This certainly appears to be the result of instruction imparted by the royal preceptor. It is all well enough in the officers of the British Government like Mr. Moore to cherish such feelings, because they think it desirable to create differences among the Native populations. But the Gáikwád is a Native ruler and he must strive to avoid all invidious distinctions between the different classes of his subjects. The Mahárája is an educated and a discreet ruler and he must understand these things. Unfortunately for the people, however, the poisonous breeze of the West blowing in the Gáikwád's dominion has contaminated the mind of the Mahárája. It is further reported that the Mahárája entertains very little regard for the religion of the Vedas, which is not very complimentary to the ruler of a Hindu State. On the whole it is to be suggested that the Mahárája should not allow himself to be led by others and should court popularity by keeping his subjects pleased.

Does not approve of the nomination of Mr. Haridás to the Diwánship of Junágad and recommends Mr. Narsinhaprasád Hariprasád for the post.

A correspondent of the Gujaráti (96) of the 26th August, writing from Junágad, says that all are astonished at the resignation of Khán Báhádur Sále Hindi and the appointment of an outsider like Mr. Haridás to the post of Diwán. For many years past the post of Diwán has been creditably held by residents of Junágad, and it is very distressing that now an outsider should have been brought on an enormous salary. Many persons are of opinion that this appointment has taken place at the instance of several Nágars who still intend to hold their own in Junágad. Many years ago Mr. Haridás served the Junágad State in the capacity of Chief Justice, and even at that time he was not known for dealing impartial justice. Even during his administration of Wadhwán, Vánkáner and Idar, Mr. Haridás has not shown his abilities by bringing those States to a prosperous condition. However, this is not the grievance of the people. They have no concern with the question whether Mr. Haridás is competent or incompetent. What they urge is that an outsider should not be brought into the State when there are men available in the State itself who have faithfully served the State for a number of years, who on many occasions have pacified the cries of the people to the satisfaction of both the subjects and their ruler, who have gained the affections of the Maiyás who are styled by the Bombay Government as cruel and obstinate, and who, if they had been in the administration, would not have allowed 74 innocent subjects to die a cruel death. The man to whom the public finger points on this occasion is Mr. Narsinhprasád Hariprasád. Two-thirds of the people of Junágad expected that this gentleman would succeed Mr. Sále Hindi, and the circumstance that this expectation has not been realized points to the conclusion that the party which made Mr. Narsinhprasád sever his connection with the Darbár has not yet lost its power. [The Gujarát Mitrá (76) of the 26th August, however, expresses its approval of the appointment of Mr. Haridás.]

Cambay affairs.

The Indian Spectator (1) of the 26th August says:—A change of ministry has brought no relief to little Cambay. If anything, the State appears to be more distracted than before, and the change for the people appears to have been one from King Log to King Stork. It is very much to be wished that differences between the Nawáb and his subjects should once for all be adjusted on an equitable basis. Is there no English official available to do this? [The Gujaráti (96) of the same date expresses somewhat similar sentiments.]

Affairs at Chhota Udepur.

A correspondent of the Gujarát Mitrá (76) of the 26th August complains that plunder and rapine are rampant at Chhota Udepur. After 10 o'clock at night robbers jump from the top of one house to another even in the thick of the town. On the nights of the 26th, 27th and 28th July there was uproar in all the streets and lanes. The police are unable to remedy this state of things. Between the hours of 9 and 10 on the night of the 27th some scoundrel wounded by means of a sword the pregnant wife of a gentleman seated in the front of her house. Fortunately, however, the life of the lady wounded is beyond danger. The offender was kept in custody for some time and then allowed to be at large on bail. On account of the I'd festival the police officers, instead of going in the districts, have begun to carve out work for themselves in the capital by arresting several servants of the palace and others connected with them on the charge of complicity in the theft of the jewels and furniture of the late Mahárája. But nothing will come out of this investigation. It is better that this affair should be allowed to rest for ever. In one instance a wrong person was arrested and kept in custody for 15 days and was subsequently released by the magistrate. It was expected that with the advent of the new joint-administrator the affairs of the State would be brought on the right track, but those expectations have been falsified. There is a grievance graver than the above to be yet mentioned, which is no other than that nothing has yet been done in the matter of settling an allowance on the family of the late Mahárája. The Bombay Government decided that the princes should each receive villages yielding an annual income of 2,000 rupees, while the Ránis should be granted villages yielding an income of Rs. 1,200. The parties concerned were unwilling to accept this decision, but as the Government of Bombay turned a deaf ear to their remonstrances they have been driven to agree to it. Some intriguing Kárbháris are, however, again at work. In the selection of villages according to their average income during the last 10 years, they have shown apparent ill-will. They are offering villages yielding a present income of Rs. 600 to those who are promised an allowance of Rs. 1,200 a year, and villages yielding an income of Rs. 1,600 to those who are promised an allowance of Rs. 2,000. They have granted a village yielding a revenue of Rs. 1,800 to the mother of the present Mahárája instead of one yielding an income of Rs. 1,500. They have thus devised a plan of propitiating the partisans of the Darbár. None are willing to accept the villages thus offered to them. If the terms of the last resolution of Government are not thoroughly satisfied, the Ránis and the princes are determined upon passing their days in poverty. They are pining away in this state of anxiety. The Bombay Government will not listen to anybody. It will only suggest a settlement with the Political Agent as its position is very critical.

Complaint regarding the prevalence of dacoities on the road between A'nand and Cambay.

The Gujarát Mitrá (76) of the 26th August says that it is creditable neither to the British Government nor to the administrations of Baroda and Cambay that dacoities should prevail to a large extent on the road from A'nand to Cambay. It is therefore necessary that proper measures should be devised with the view of keeping travellers by this road free from all danger. Recently some travellers from Cambay were plundered by dacoits near the village of Jhákla situated within the jurisdiction of Petlad and many of them were severely wounded. As the British territories and those of the Baroda and Cambay Administrations meet each other between Petlad and Cambay, it is advisable that a body of mounted police should be stationed on this road, the expenditure entailed by this measure being either proportionately met by the three administrations concerned or realized by the imposition of a tax on travellers. Mr. Spry, the Political Agent of Cambay, should therefore take prompt measures in this matter. [A correspondent of the Rást Goftár (111) of the 26th August and the Deshi Mitrá (91) of the same date make a similar complaint.]

Does not approve of the policy of changing Kárbháris every year followed by the Chief of Jamkhandi.

A correspondent of the Dnyán Ságar (26) of the 27th August complains that the policy of bringing in new Kárbháris every year followed by the Chief of Jamkhandi is alike detrimental to the interests of the State and those of its subjects. Each Kárbhári has a very temporary interest in the State, the period of his tenure being limited to one year. If a Kárbhári is kept for five years much good can be expected of him. The Political Agent should refuse permission to the entertainment of a new Kárbhári every year. The Chief should also abandon the policy of importing British officers for the office of Kárbhári, and should confer the post on a competent officer in the service of his State.

Appearance of locusts in the Dharampur State.

A correspondent of the Bombay Samáchár (86) of the 28th August, writing from Dharampur under date the 22nd idem, states that in June last locusts made their appearance in several parts of the State in large numbers. Afterwards they seemed to have left the State altogether, but now numerous young locusts have put in their appearance and are causing extensive damage to the crops.

Notes.—A. The notices from the different Newspapers have been collected in the Report under different heads, which are printed in italics.

B. The names of Newspapers are printed in the body of the Report in italics, and the number of the Newspaper in the above list is printed in brackets after the name.

C. The proprietors of the Newspapers marked * have not given information as to the number of copies issued. In these cases an estimate has been made by the Reporter.

D. The system of spelling vernacular words followed by the Reporter is the same as that adopted in the Official Spelling List of the Bombay Presidency. One peculiar feature of this system is that when the long a (आ or á) is the last letter of a word, the accent is left out, and the short a (अ = u in gun) is, to prevent confusion never placed at the end of a word. This rule has been strictly followed, except that when the short a appears to be absolutely necessary to complete the pronunciation of a word, as in Arunodaya or the well known Mitra, it is printed with a mark over it to indicate that it is short, thus—ă.

E. Berár papers are received in this office for report under the Resolution of the Government of Bombay in the General Department, No. 1795, dated 8th June 1881.

Politics and the Public Administration.

Suggests what Government and the people should do for remedying the present miserable condition of the country.

The Lokahitavádi (38) for the months of August and September, in continuation of its article on the subject of the defects of the present system of administration, reported at pages 5 and 6 of the Report on Native Papers for the week ending 18th August 1883, says :—It is a matter for regret that the present Government, who are hatching several new scientific inventions and who have carried the science of agriculture to perfection, should not be able to judge of the evils of cow-slaughter and to appreciate the advantages of rearing that species of cattle, or, being able, should not devise measures in that behalf. It is said that cow-slaughter has by a succession of effects resulted in the present deteriorated physique of the people. They say that the physical strength exhibited by old men fifty years ago is not found in youths of thirty years in the present day. The English Government has been generally so benevolent that it has striven to remove the defects in the administrations of foreign countries, and the abolition of slave trade in Africa and America is an instance in point. It has also restored tranquillity in many Native States by espousing the cause of their subjects and remonstrating with their rulers. But what means this policy of feeding a guest at the sacrifice of the household? Certainly, the resolution and firmness with which the English Government suppressed the slave trade in Zanzibar and other countries of Africa would redound more to the credit of that Government if applied towards the amelioration of the condition of the people of India. The account of the condition of the people hitherto given shows that they are little better than slaves, and the Government ought not to be indifferent to this state of things. The nobility of India has altogether disappeared and the several indigenous industries and manufactures have died out. Weaving, paper-making, oil-pressing, ore-smelting and iron-founding occupations have been monopolized by foreigners, and thus the wealth of the country is being drained towards the West. In these circumstances Government ought with a generous heart to regulate their demands in such a manner as to allow of the people saving something after satisfying those demands. The enormous increase in the demands of Government has driven the people to the brink of ruin and is the origin of their increasing poverty. Cries of over-assessments are also heard from Native States, and it is also true that the Native rulers do not mind such complaints. But this evil has not rendered, and will not render, the subjects of these States penniless, because the exactions of their Governments are not carried away to foreign countries but remain in the States and return to the subjects in some form or other. But this is not the case with the British territories. Nearly a half of the revenue collected from the people is diverted to foreign countries in the shape of salaries, allowances and pensions of officers, and for the payment of charges on account of civil and military stores and the interest on the public debt. It is, however, not meant to be inferred from what has been said above that Government alone are responsible for the present miserable and impecunious condition of the people and that the latter are free from all blame in the matter. Both have their proper share in bringing about this state of things, and the following is our opinion as to how both should act under the present circumstances. Government should confer high posts on Natives, should encourage native arts and industries, should either reduce the rates of land revenue assessment and settle them permanently or make them leviable in kind, should abolish the heavy taxes which make justice dear, should direct a lenient administration of the Revenue Department, and should organize agricultural banks with the view of enabling the ryots to secure loans from them. The people on the other hand should qualify themselves for high posts under Government, should unite for the organization of different industries and compete with foreign merchants, should carry their complaints to Government and repeat their demands for redress, should try to keep themselves from litigation, should exercise economy in all their dealings, should inspire in their progeny a taste for knowledge, and should entertain reasonable ambition for satisfying the calls of duty. If Government and the people respectively act up to this advice all complaints of poverty will cease at once. The question of the happiness and opulence of the ryots has begun to engage the attention of the just councillors of the present Government, and may God speedily consummate their projects. We are convinced that the present state of misery will not continue long, and we wish that the administration of Lord Ripon may continue for ever.

Expression of regret at the omission of the mention of India in the Queen's speech.

The Mahrátta (2) of the 2nd September says:—The Parliament was prorogued on August 25th. The Queen's speech contained no allusion to India. Some encouraging word for Lord Ripon, and an expression of hope that his beneficent measures would soon receive the approval of all Her Majesty's loyal subjects in India, would have been graceful. But it was not to be. On the whole the speech was completely uninteresting, at least to us in India. [The Subodh Patrika (11) and the Gujaráti (96) of the same date and the Suryodayá (65) of the 3rd September express somewhat similar sentiments.]

Disapproves of the policy of subsidizing the Amir of Afghanistan.

The same says:—The report about the death of Amir Abdul Rahman turns out to be false. We are glad that it is so. Government had just given the subsidy, and it would have been very unfortunate if all the arrangements had to be set aside and a new Amir placed on the throne, who would have had to be subsidized over again. The present instance has clearly shown how very risky the policy of subsidizing the Amir is. A secret blow may take away the paid Amir, and where will the subsidy go? It will have to be paid over again. This is too venturesome a game for the Indian finances to play with. We hope that some better preventive remedy will be found out. The good-will of the Indians themselves would not be a bad remedy if it were possible to secure it entirely in the presence of the "party of ascendency."

Says that the abolition of the import duties by Sir Evelyn Baring was politically a prudent step.

The same, in writing on the farewell addresses presented to Sir Evelyn Baring at Bombay, says:—The only question on which the public seems generally to be at variance with the views of the late Finance Minister is that of the almost entire abolition of the import duties. We have often remarked that from a strictly economic point of view this must be considered as a mere blunder, but as involving a consideration of policy it was a step not altogether to be condemned. The selfish merchants of Manchester could never have been satisfied except with an entire abolition of the import duties; and Government would have some day or other found it absolutely necessary to yield to Manchestrian demagogues, not only from party exigencies, but also for the sake of good government in India; for the influential, though obviously interested, clamours of the merchants of Manchester would have ever proved a source of daily trouble to Government, and might have often thwarted even the most well-intentioned measures of Government. Thus, there being so little chance of the import duties continuing for a very long time, as a question of policy, we think, the sooner they were abolished the better. Think of the opposition which Manchester would have stirred up against the measures of local self-government and of encouraging local industries, if the import duties had still continued to be levied. What chance could there have been for the Native Magistrates' Jurisdiction Bill to be passed into law in that case, which it now has in spite of the monster opposition of the self-conceited and selfish Anglo-Indians? We think it was prudent on the part of Government to have given way to what was as a matter of fact inevitable, and thus to have banished once for all a great element of opposition to the good work they had in contemplation. Howsoever, therefore, Sir Evelyn Baring may try to conceal the real motives of Government on this important question, we cannot but think that they have been prudent on the whole. There are two other points on which the public do not altogether approve of the conduct of the late Finance Minister. From the views which Sir Evelyn from time to time expressed and from the promises which were made, it appeared to the public that the license tax would either be abolished or at least would be so modified as to affect impartially all the classes of society. It was also expected that the export duty on rice would be abolished. But these still continue unaffected, and the only excuse of Sir Evelyn for their continuance is that the financial situation of Government does not permit of any change in those directions at the present time. We have shown above that the abolition of the import duties was politically a prudent step, and it was not in the power of Government to cause any further loss to the revenues of the country by abolishing the export duties at the same time. We therefore think that the excuse of Sir Evelyn is good enough, and we have sufficient faith in the Government of Lord Ripon that it will not allow the above obnoxious taxes to remain in the next budget.

The grievances of Indian Military Surgeons.

The Rást Goftár (11) of the 2nd September says:—For some time past questions have been asked in Parliament on the subject of the grievances of Military Surgeons in India, but no satisfactory replies have hitherto been given to such questions and the grievances are yet unredressed. It is a mistake to suppose that this question does not concern Natives, since Native Surgeons are likely to suffer more than European by the changes complained of. The principal grievance is that Indian Military Surgeons have been excluded from certain high offices in the three Presidencies. Every one of these high offices carries with it a handsome salary and is calculated to pay in the end an annual increase of from £250 to £300 in the pension, besides conferring a high rank on its recipient. These offices have been reserved for the Imperial Military Surgeons of England and the Indian officers have naturally felt aggrieved. They have shown in their representations to Government that when they joined the service they had taken into calculation the advantages of the posts from which they have now been excluded, and that they were led to enter the service by the temptations presented by these posts. They have proved the injustice of depriving them of the rewards first held out, and it behoves the Government of India to give them redress. These officers are willing to retire from the service on receiving some compensation from Government, and they point out that their retirement will give an opportunity to the officers in lower grades to rise in the service. In conclusion, the Rást Goftár dwells on the question of the block in promotion caused by the extension of the limit of superannuation from 55 years to 60 years in the case of Military Surgeons, and says that some measures are necessary to be taken in order to induce senior officers to retire and thus make way for their juniors.

Comments on the increased consumption of liquor in the Bombay Presidency.

The Mahrátta (2) of the 2nd September, in an article headed "Liquor Intemperance in the Bombay Presidency," remarks:—We must express our regret that, while Government have been collecting at a great annual expense statistics of every sort in connection with their various departments, they do not place them within the reach of the public. This is especially the case with regard to the A'bkári Reports made by the Commissioner to Government every year. We are informed that these reports are not for sale. When the sources of information are thus shut out, it is impossible to supply it when required. Will Government be pleased to adopt the recommendation of Sir T. Mádhav Ráo to be more open with the press and the public? As the increased consumption of liquor is admitted, the only question is whether the urban and suburban boards can or cannot effectively check the traffic in liquor without prejudicially affecting the revenue of the A'bkári Department. The Bombay Gazette does not believe that the population of this Presidency is sufficiently enlightened to undertake such a task, nor does it approve of the proposal for the introduction of a Local Option Bill. We do not subscribe to the validity of the argument that because the idea of local option is western and because the people of this country have not the voting powers of the western people, local option will fail, or that the transfer of the A'bkári Department to municipalities and to district boards will not contribute to the reduction of the growing evil. The present Government is nothing if not regulative; every department has its own laws and rules. We believe in the efficacy of good and sound rules when there is the power determined to insist on their observance. If Government enact a law to-morrow that the munufacture, sale, import and export of liquors shall be limited to the wants of the European population of India, and that every excess will be held criminal and punishable by law, we think the evil will be greatly arrested, the cries of interested persons notwithstanding. Heroic remedies and courageous treatment are sometimes required for dangerous diseases. We ask Government to be our body of doctors. We ask for their co-operation and powerful support, which if their declarations are worth anything they will do well to give. The hollow plea of illicit traffic is the only justification for the existence of the A'bkári Depar tment. Whenever an hungry applicant for license comes up, the authorities begin to smell illicit traffic. The ignorance of the population inhabiting the villages and many towns assists the extension of the jurisdiction of the department which is so strong as to set at naught even the resistance of the people to the opening of any shops.

Comments on the increase in the liquor traffic in the Bombay Presidency.

The Native Opinion (10) of the 2nd September says:—On the subject of the controversy recently raised in connection with the question of liquor traffic in our Presidency, Mr. Pritchard, the Commissioner of Customs, has written a letter to the Bombay Gazette showing from statistics that the traffic in native spirits has considerably decreased while it has increased the Government revenue, and thus passing at a tangent the main question at issue, namely, that of traffic in imported liquors, which is the main cause of increased drunkenness amongst us. We wish the Customs Commissioner had told us what the increase in the importation of foreign liquors and spirits, the amount of increase in the number of licenses in connection therewith, and the increase of revenue therefrom have been. An exposition of these facts would, we have no doubt, have proved to a certainty what the Ahmedabad petitioners have said in their memorial. Mr. Pritchard says that the tax on country liquors is to be raised so as to put them on the same level with European liquors. This is a sure way, we think, of tempting our lower classes, who are now content with country-made drinks, to stronger and more ardent spirits. The duty of superintending Government revenue is not inconsistent with a regard to the higher duties which our rulers owe to their subjects and which enjoin a foregoing of that revenue which cannot be recovered except at the expense of the morals of the people. [The Dnyán Prakásh (18) of the 6th September and the Arunodayá (14) of the 2nd idem express somewhat similar sentiments.]

Recommends the construction of tanks as a protection from droughts in the Ratnágiri District.

The Bakul (16) of the 2nd September observes that there is generally a heavy rainfall in the Ratnágiri District, but the country being hilly and its soil of an inferior kind, the soil cannot retain much moisture. Hence whenever there is a long break in the monsoon the crops are soon injured. It would, therefore, be highly beneficial to economize the superabundant rainfall by collecting the excess water in tanks. Dams may be raised at convenient spots to hold water and thus a tank may be provided for two or three villages together. The officers of the Revenue Survey Department have now been sent into the district to assist in the work of the destruction of locusts, and they may be charged with the work of discovering convenient sites for the tanks to be constructed with the funds provided for relief works in the district. These tanks would be of great service in protecting crops from the droughts which now and then occur. The attention of the Collector of the district and the Commissioner, S. D., is requested to the subject.

Does not understand why Government are not devising any measures for checking the spread of cholera in the mofussil.

The Subodh Patrika (11) of the 2nd September says that it is very surprising that while prompt measures have been taken in Bombay for preventing the spread of cholera, no steps have been adopted for affording relief to the thousands of sufferers in the mofussil. No report has yet been received regarding the measures devised by Government in this behalf beyond the despatch of a European doctor to Ahmednagar. Why are Government indifferent to their duty of assisting the sufferers by means of medicines and medical advice? Is it owing to the circumstance that the people in the mofussil are too poor to lay their grievances before Government? Those that are able will take care of themselves. But Government ought to direct their attention to the poor especially. There is no time to be lost and speedy action is necessary. It is to be hoped that even now Government will bestir themselves in this affair.

The Hitechchhu (29) of Kaládgi of the 2nd September says that the proposal of the Government of Bombay for the abolition of the Senior Assistant Judgeships at Sholápur and Kaládgi and the establishment of a Second Grade Judgeship at Sholápur is calculated to prove very prejudicial to the people of the Kaládgi District. The sufferers by this change will be the Native employés in the Court of the Assistant Session Judge at Kaládgi, who will be thrown adrift under the new scheme, and the people, who will have to travel long distances for attending the Session Court. As the scheme is not calculated to cause any saving of money, it is to be hoped that the Government of India, to which this proposal has been submitted by the Local Government, will give their decision after duly considering the subject.

Does not approve of the proposed abolition of the Senior Assistant Judgeships at Sholápur and Kaládgi and the establishment of a Judgeship at Sholápur.

A correspondent of the Indu Prakásh (9) of the 3rd September says:—It is believed that the Political Agent of Káthiáwár has proposed to Government to abolish the office of his Judicial Assistant on the ground that there is not enough work for the latter. There are some philosophers who do not believe in the reign of law, and our present Political Agent is one of them. Absolutism cannot bear restraint, and all law is a restraint upon the despotic power of the Political Agent. It is no wonder then that the Political Agent should try to do away with an officer who represents the reign of law and acts as a restraint upon his despotic power. Had the Bombay Government not given indications that it is led by the nose by our Political Agent, we might have remained assured that the present attempt of the latter to abolish the Judicial Assistantship would never succeed. But we know to our cost that the Government sees with the eyes, hears with the ears, and thinks with the mind of the Political Agent. It would be no exaggeration to say that the abolition of the Judicial Assistant's office would be equivalent to the abolition of all law in the province and the substitution for it of arbitrary power unrestrained by any law. If the Judicial Assistant has not enough work, the reason is that the Political Agent retains in his own hands the greater and the more important portion of the judicial work of the province. Most of the girás disputes, that is, disputes concerning landed property, are decided by the Political Agent, although he is but indifferently trained for such work. Whoever wishes to get simple justice generally tries to take his case to the civil side on which an appeal is heard by the Judicial Assistant, notwithstanding that he has to pay heavy court fees. On the political side no court fees need be paid, and yet none but those who wish to get more than their due resort to it. The obvious remedy then for the plea put forward for abolishing the Judicial Assistant's office is to transfer all the judicial work of the province to the Judicial Assistant. The Political Agent has quite enough to do with his political, administrative and executive duties. These are quite sufficient to occupy the time of one man, if they are properly discharged. The public, on the other hand, will be a vast gainer by all the judicial work of the Agency being transferred to the Judicial Assistant. The Judicial Assistant is especially necessary in the administration of criminal justice. Last year we had a few illustrations of the way in which criminal justice is likely to be administered if it is left in the hands of the Political Agent. Had there been no Judicial Assistant at the time, and had Government not interposed, a reign of terror would have been quickly established in the province. The existence of the Judicial Assistant and his power in criminal cases affords the only security against possible persecutions. Nor must it be forgotten that the Judicial Assistant acts as a check upon the vagaries of untrained assistants in their judicial work. He alone knows what the law is and can authoritatively point it out to the assistants. If it were not for his controlling power, we should soon be at the mercy of pure despotism. Referring to this letter the editor says:—We hope Government will pause before adopting a step that is sure to dissatisfy the people in Káthiáwár. They have come to look upon the Court as the protector of their rights, and as a proof of this we have only to refer to the feeling of deep regret expressed by them in unmistakable terms at the transfer of Mr. E. T. Candy, who for a long time held the post of Judicial Assistant. It will intensify the impression produced by recent events in Káthiáwár to abolish a court that is liked by the people.

Disapproval of the proposal made to Government by the Political Agent, Káthiáwár, for the abolition of the Judicial Assistant's Court.

Complains that the employés of the Forest Department at Sholápur do not receive their salaries for two or three months at a time.

The Kalpataru (33) of the 2nd September says that complaints are rife that the employés of the Forest Department at Sholápur do not receive their pay for two or three months at a time. If there be any truth in the complaints the authorities concerned will do well to arrange for the regular payment of the salaries of those officers.

Asks the Collector of Ratnágiri to pay to the officers of the Survey and Educational Departments deputed for the work of destroying locusts their actual travelling expenses and batta.

The Satyá Shodhak (57) of the 2nd September says that the officers of the Survey and Educational Departments at Ratnágiri, who draw low salaries and who have been deputed for the work of destroying locusts, are in a great fix for want of money, and requests the Collector to arrange for paying them their actual travelling expenses and batta.

Does not approve of the policy of withdrawing Government aid from certain dispensaries.

The Kalpataru (33) of the 2nd September says that the Government of Bombay has not done well in transferring the management of certain dispensaries to municipal and local boards at this early stage of local self-government. There are in all 125 dispensaries in the Presidency, and they are maintained at an annual expenditure of Rs. 1,92,351. Out of this sum Rs. 1,04,443 are contributed by Government from provincial revenues, the balance being met by municipal and local fund committees. It is the intention of the Bombay Government eventually to transfer the whole of this department to the charge of local committees, and it has already given an earnest of its policy by directing the discontinuance of Government grants to certain dispensaries from 1884-85, and has thus effected an annual saving of Rs. 24,169. It is undoubtedly the duty of local committees to care for the health of the people in their charges, and they should therefore bear the charges for the maintenance of dispensaries. But it is not proper to burden them so heavily in their present infant condition. Such a measure is calculated to damp the energies of the people; nay, it is likely to superinduce a belief that under the pretence of introducing local self-government the authorities are devising plans of relieving Government at the sacrifice of local committees. The revenues of municipal and local funds are generally limited and uncertain, and there is no easy remedy for developing them. If, in these circumstances, Government throw additional burdens on these funds by withdrawing their aid, the committees will have no recourse but to meet new demands by additional local taxation, and the people will undoubtedly become disgusted with local self-government. Whatever the good that may result from the new scheme in the long run, Government have not done well in profiting for the present to the extent of Rs. 24,169.

Does not approve of the order directing that documents concerning securities furnished by khots for payment of Government dues should bear an eight-anna stamp.

The Satyá Shodhak (57) of the 2nd September understands that an order has been issued directing that all documents concerning the security given by a khot for the payment of the revenues of his village must bear an eight-anna stamp. It is true that this order will increase the Government revenue from stamps, but nobody seems to have taken thought of the loss it is likely to cause to khots and ryots. If Government dues were paid without objection before this order was issued, what convenience is this additional burden on the people meant to satisfy? It is to be hoped that this matter will engage the early attention of Government.

A suggestion to Mr. Reid, the District Magistrate of Ahmedabad.

The Hitechchhu (77) of Ahmedabad of the 6th September says that as the Vaishnav Mahárájs has removed with his idols outside the city many people go to visit the idols. The modesty of females visiting the idols is outraged on their way thither and in the place of worship. A great crowd of worshipers collects there, as was the case when the idols were in the city, and some of the worshipers are beaten with scourges. About five persons were crushed in the crowd last Monday, out of whom two are very near death. The people suspect that the authorities will not investigate the matter. It is the duty of Mr. Reid, the District Magistrate, to enquire into it. He should one day go to the place of worship before 8 A.M. and see the sight for himself. Mr. Jehángirsháh should also be deputed to enquire into the matter.

Complains of the prevalence of thefts and house-breaking in the sadar bazár at Sholápur.

A correspondent of the Kalpataru (33) of the 2nd September complains of the prevalence of thefts and house-breaking in the sadar bazár of the camp at Sholápur, and after quoting specific instances of thefts requests the Superintendent of Police to take effective measures for punishing the perpetrators of these crimes. [A correspondent of the Gujarát Mitrá (76) of the same date makes a similar complaint.]

Complains of the prevalence of gambling in Balsár and of the use of false scales by butchers.

A correspondent of the Gujarát Mitrá (76) of the 2nd September complains of the extensive prevalence of gambling in the town of Balsár, and advises the police to secretly trace the haunts of gamblers. He also complains that false scales are used by butchers for selling meat, whereby they are enabled to cheat their poor customers. It is to be regretted that the authorities take no measures for checking the evil.

Local Self-government.

Comments on the debate on the Local Self-government Bills in the Bombay Legislative Council.

The Indian Spectator (1) of the 2nd September says :—To those who have been anxious to see a system of genuine self-government introduced into this Presidency it will be a sore disappointment to find from the speeches made at the first reading of the Bills in the Legislative Council by the Right Honourable the President and the Honourable Mr. Peile, in what grudging spirit the Government of Bombay is prepared to give liberties to the people for managing their local affairs. We have shown that as the Bills are at present framed they are nothing more than an attempt to conciliate the Supreme Government. They offer the semblance of a rude popular government. In the Statement of Objects and Reasons the author leads the public to infer that the administration of local funds, which are known as having been shamefully mismanaged, has been "highly successful," and that the preparation of the two Bills is to be attributed not to any willingness or readiness on the part of the Bombay Government but to the "wishes and orders" of the Supreme Government. Both His Excellency the President and Mr. Peile have not been slow to express that opinion in their respective speeches. With so decided a determination to give the people the minimum of local liberties and to reserve to the central authority the maximum of arbitrary interference and absolute control, it may be safely asserted that the cause of genuine local self-government in this Presidency has but few chances of success. When Mr. Peile succeeded Mr. Ashburner it was believed that he would give us a more liberal measure of self-government. Let us see from an examination of his speech how far that gentleman has answered public expectations. What policy it is intended to adopt in finally passing the two Bills is discernible from the speeches of Sir James Fergusson and his chief Councillor. Analysing these speeches we come to two main conclusions from them : 1st, that Government rely more on the opinions of their own district officers than on any outside independent opinion ; 2nd, that guided by those opinions they say that the time has not come to give to local bodies anything like a liberal measure of self-government. Twist and turn the speeches as you may, these are the fixed ideas which lie at their bottom. The whole superstructure is raised thereon. But inasmuch as the Bombay Government has been compelled against its own will to submit to "the wishes and orders" of His Excellency the Governor General in Council, it has no alternative but to accord to the people such a measure as shall outwardly satisfy the Imperial authority. A few concessions are made here and there, but care is taken that they shall beso hedged in by the controlling clauses as almost invariably to neutralize their value. In this clever attempt, we must say, the Honourable Mr. Peile, a master of diplomacy, has succeeded admirably. We have said that neither Mr. Peile nor His Excellency the Governor is willing to give us real self-government. Let the reader study this sentence from His Excellency's speech: "We endeavoured to meet the views of the Government of India and virtually re-cast our measures for the purpose." Here is another sentence that reveals the intentions of the Bombay Government: "But at the same time the Executive Government, with a full sense of responsibility and with a full desire to give effect to the impulses of the Government of India, must take care not to put its foot firmly down till we know the ground is firm under our tread." Mark the meaning of the word "impulse." Knowing as we all do the opinion of His Excellency, as given in the September resolution, that there is no necessity for further advance in self-government, this sentence signifies that Sir James only retorts on the Government of India by saying in so many words that it is a Government of impulses! Mr. Peile says in his speech: "Much useful work has been accomplished.....and it may be contended that an application of local funds which opens up remote and isolated localities by roads may well take precedence for a time of an application which promotes their political knowledge." No doubt this contention is valid, but with important qualifications. In the first place it may be borne in mind that this sentence has reference to Mr. Peile's defence of the way in which local funds came to be managed during the regime of the arbitrary Sir Richard Temple. Roads and communications were no doubt opened. But the question is whether local funds were the proper funds for such a purpose in the majority of instances. Ought not provincial or imperial funds to have been employed for the purpose? Was there not a disingenuousness, if nothing worse, on the part of the Local Government in diverting local funds for other than their legitimate purposes? Political education, we admit, might have been left alone awhile, provided local funds had been applied to local wants. That is the point. The maladministration of these funds is rankling in the hearts of local bodies. Yet Mr. Peile coolly informs the public that the administration of local funds has been "highly successful," and on this he founds his conclusion that so far local funds are better managed by district officers than by local bodies. The following sentence, when properly conned, will show the real drift of Mr. Peile's contention and his implied sneer at the Government of India: "But this at least is clear that if local self-government is chiefly desirable as an instrument of political and popular education, then the administration of our local funds in the past few years has certainly not fulfilled that object." Read with the context, what does this sentence signify? It signifies simply that local funds have been successfully administered by district officers, that it is of no use entrusting these to local bodies, but that if it is now considered by the Government of India expedient that only for the political education of the people local funds should be administered by local bodies, then we must, in obedience to these orders, admit the necessity, but in a way to nullify the value of the concessions to be made. That is the hidden meaning of Mr. Peile's observation. The following remarks clearly show the speaker's mind: "It is a matter for speculation how these concessions will be used, but in the circumstances of India it is necessary for the Government to hazard experiments and to apply to the people a pressure in favour of popular institutions which in other countries more commonly apply to the Government." Here our bureaucrat relieves his soul! He has ill-disguised his meaning. It may now be asked whether the observation is just and based on facts. We say it is specious. The practical working of the concessions need not be a matter of speculation, if the Government honestly means what it says. Despite His Excellency's assurance, we must frankly confess that past experience has proved the fact that the Government seldom fulfils its promises. If the concessions are carried out in an honest spirit, they will prove a boon. The experiment of self-government is not at all hazardous, let district officers say what they like. There is nothing new about it. The germs of self-government are from time immemorial to be found in the Indian village. And if the people have not applied to Government for it, as people do apply in countries not governed so autocratically as the various districts in India are, it is simply owing to the consciousness that their applications will be ridiculed or ignored. Hitherto the voice of the Collector has been omnipotent. The local bodies have had no voice. For years past the policy has been to extinguish the least spark of public spirit and independence in the rural communities. Is it a wonder if the embers are allowed to burn within, but so that their glow may not appear on the outside? This state of things is the direct outcome of that despotism which has for years past petrified all public spirit and independence,—a despotism which the far-sighted statesman now at the helm of affairs is so anxious to remove, and who thus wishes to revivify that spirit of independence which alone can make his scheme fairly successful. [The Hitechchhu (77) of Ahmedabad of the 6th idem thanks Messrs. Badrudin, Mandlik and Macaulay for boldly expressing their views, and regrets that Sir Jamsetji Jijibhái and Mr. Ráste should have agreed to retain the control sections in the Bills and supported the nomination by Government of half the number of members of local boards. The reply of Sir James is very surprising. It is the misfortune of the people if their Governor should not care for their feelings, be guided by the opinions of his subordinate officers, and listen to only one side of the question of the aptitude of the people for self-government. Such an officer is dangerous to the authorities that may have nominated him to the post, and deserves nothing but the dislike and contempt of the people. It is to be regretted that the Government of Sir James Fergusson should have been opposed to the scheme of local self-government from the very beginning. It is also to be regretted that Government should have played a trick in the nomination of the members of the Select Committee appointed to report upon the Bills. By the nomination of Mr. Ráste as a member of the Committee instead of Mr. Macaulay, Government will have secured a majority of votes. Messrs. Mandlik and Badrudin ought to quote the instances of the municipalities of Ahmedabad, Karáchi, Dholka, Dákor, Modása, Surat and other places as enabling them to oppose the views expressed by Mr. Peile regarding the successful management of local funds by district municipalities. The Gujarát Mitrá (76) of the 2nd September also expresses similar sentiments in commenting on the speeches of the different members of the Legislative Council. The Lok Mitrá (78) of the 2nd September also comments on the speeches of the Honourable Mr. Peile and His Excellency the Governor in a spirit similar to that of the Indian Spectator, and concludes as follows:—Was it not very childish of His Excellency to have held out that mild threat in the Council that he would rather retire an unpopular Governor than abate a jot in yielding any further concessions than what appear on the face of the Bills for stimulating real self-government? That was indeed a most unhappy expression, and every enlightened Native is afraid that His Excellency will retire with the stigma of unpopularity if he fails to grant further concessions and leaves the Bills a "sham."]

Disapproves of the remarks of the Honourable Ráo Sáheb V. N. Mandlik against the members of the Civil Service.

The Indu Prakásh (9) of the 3rd September says:—It is a pity there was some little sparring between His Excellency the Governor and the Honourable Ráo Sáheb Mandlik in the course of the preliminary debate on the Local Self-government Bills at the last meeting of the Bombay Legislative Council. The Ráo Sáheb in the course of an instructive but rather cutting speech made no secret of his distrust of the district officers, and condemned the Bills outright for conceding to the people with one hand the boon of self-government and taking it back with the other by silently letting in the Collectors to ride roughshod over the local bodies. This was more than Sir James could bear with equanimity, and he had a fling at the Ráo Sáheb for his unqualified condemnation of the Civilians. It seems to us that it would have been better if this sparring had been avoided. There may be, and indeed is, ample room for modifications in the "control" provisions of the Bills now referred to a Select Committee of the Council, but this is a question of detail, to which it was not necessary to allude even in general terms at what was merely a preliminary, if not a formal, debate. We must confess that it does not improve the public cause to condemn the district officers wholesale. We share to a great extent the opinion of the Poona Sárvajanik Sabha that the country cannot dispense with official control. The supervision of the district officers is necessary, but it should not be a supervision amounting to despotic control. The Collector should remain as the controller of local bodies, and the Bills are wrongly framed so far as they give him the chance of being both controller and president at one and the same time. With the advance of education and popular progress, official high-handedness will decrease. It is a mistake to suppose that it is the district officers who are responsible for the manner in which local funds have been from time to time mis-spent or misapplied. The misapplication was due to those at the head of the Government. It was they who by issuing orders, resolutions and circulars quite contrary to the objects for which local funds were collected, influenced the Collectors to mis-spend and misapply the funds. What our non-official representatives in the Council have now to see is that those provisions of the Bills which define the duties of the boards and which lay down the extent of their power and the purposes for which they are to spend their money, are properly framed so as to prevent the misapplication of the funds to purposes not contemplated by the original authors of the scheme. If this is done the district officers will be free from the temptation to be high-handed, and above all from the pressure so often exercised on them from above. We feel bound to put this our opinion distinctly on record for the reason that in some ill-informed quarters it is the fashion to decry the district officers, as if the people had reached to that ethereal order of things when they could do everything without being watched and guided. It is the hobby of some people to ask for everything and to divest themselves in the bargain of the sympathy of the very classes whose assistance and co-operation are extremely necessary if local bodies are to be successful. The Poona Sárvajanik Sabha has done well to lay emphasis on the fact that it is not prepared to run with the enthusiastic theorists who think that every Civilian is made to oppress the people and that honest patriotism consists in putting one's self forward as an advocate of everything that is non-official. It matters very little to them if their theory cannot be reduced to practice. Now it seems to us that very little is gained by this policy. The time has arrived when in laying down what form of local self-government people shall have, Government and the public should try to understand each other thoroughly, and when above all there should be no mutual distrust between the officials and the non-officials. The people and the officials must co-operate, as it is as absurd to condemn the latter as it is to deprecate the former. Bodies like the Sárvajanik Sabha cannot afford to sacrifice principles to sentiment without sacrificing at the same time the serious responsibility which rests upon them of putting their suggestions before Government in a moderate tone and with an eye to the actual condition of things before them. The same responsibility rests upon Native journalists, and it is a pity some of them will not see that at a time when Government and the people are trying to arrive at a settlement of the local self-government question, it is unwise and impolitic to pitch into the district officers as if no good can be done by them. Those are the real enemies of the local self-government scheme who would put the new boards into a mess by depriving them of all responsibility to Government, and who think that the people in the mofussil can do without the guidance and control of the Collectors. Sensible and moderate politicians among us have outgrown this hobby and we hope we shall hear no more of it. Now, what is the sort of control which the Local Boards Bill proposes to give to the Collector, and which the Sárvajanik Sabha is blamed for approving? Section 59 gives him "the power of inspection and supervision"; Section 60 gives the Revenue Commissioner the power "to prevent extravagance in the employment of establishment"; Section 61 gives the Collector power to suspend the execution of works likely to annoy the public or cause a breach of the public peace. Can anybody urge with reason that these powers are superfluous or unnecessary? Theory may find fault with them; but as theory has to be reduced to practice in the present case, it is, we repeat, essential that the control and co-operation of the district officials should be secured for the beneficial working of the local self-government scheme. As we have said over and over again, the Collector's position should by no means be rendered anomalous by giving him the chance of being both president and controller at one and the same time. It is far better that he should be controller alone, and let some one else be president. The Sárvajanik Sabha thinks that there should be official presidents, and here we slightly differ from it. But it should be borne in mind that when we confine our objection to the appointment of official presidents and make much of it, we lose sight of the fact that if the other provisions of the Bill are properly framed the boards shall have little to fear from the presidents being Government representatives. Define the limits within which the funds are to be spent, give the powers of deciding all important questions to the boards, and no harm will result from the presidents being official men. But we say that the presidents should be non-official for two reasons: 1stly, because the non-officials will thereby be enabled to learn the management of the boards, and 2ndly, because the Collectors will in that case be controllers only and thus better fitted to discharge the duties of supervision.

Criticises the Bombay Local Boards Bill.

Referring to the provisions in the Local Boards Bill regarding "control," the Native Opinion (10) of the 2nd September says:—They are in our opinion too heavy. Indeed some effective control from outside is in certain matters quite necessary, in order that the working of the boards may not create complications. But it must not be so much as will stifle their action. The sections leave much to the Collectors of districts, and it will always depend upon their temper how those sections are worked. Now, far be it from us to cast any aspersion on our Civil Service or to say that the members of it will intentionally hamper the working of the boards. We yield to none in our respect for the members of that service. They are on the whole an active, intelligent and able class of public servants. But we are bound to say that they are at times over-zealous. They always have good intentions but are at the same time patronizing, and seem to entertain a strong belief that they in their own way can do more for the Natives than the Natives can do for themselves. This belief makes them impatient of any self-assertion by their protéges. They expect an entire dependence upon themselves from their wards. In fact they would like to see the Natives remaining always in a state of tutelage. This disposition of a section of the Civil Service makes them at times very inconvenient masters, and it is their over-confidence in their own wisdom which makes us a little afraid of their control. Nor is this fear utterly unfounded. We all know that the Local Funds Act of 1869 has all along been worked under the control or the patronage of Civilians; and what do we find has been done under that Act? No doubt boards have been established to manage local funds, but they have existed only in name, while their activity has been completely merged in that of the Collectors and the latter have virtually done what they liked with the local funds. The original intention of that Act was to appropriate local funds to works of local utility, and anybody who ventured to call into question the wisdom of the Collector's control under it was as a matter of fact blamed as a false alarmist and a detractor of the Civil Service. But the result has justified our worst fears, and an overwhelmingly large amount of the local funds money has been diverted from its proper course of application and devoted to purposes which were strictly imperial. If a commission of enquiry were appointed strange matters would come to light. We wish such a commission were appointed. It would overhaul the accounts of the previous years and dispel many strange delusions which still exist with regard to the subject. [The Mahrátta (2) of the same date, writing on the same subject, remarks:—The chapter on control does not consistently and adequately meet the requirements of the advanced towns in this Presidency. The chapter on constitution is elastic, and hence it may, if Government really so desire, meet the requirements of even the most advanced town; but the control sections are hard and fast, making no distinction and having no elasticity. On the authority of the published reports and on the much-made-of theory of the utility of Civilians, we are inclined to suggest that the control sections should be modified so as to be elastic. In the municipalities where the greatest powers conferrable by the Act have been given, the control should be the highest; whereas in the municipalities that will have the least number of elected seats and an official president there should be the least control. Government cannot throw out our suggestion on the ground that it has no precedent; for it is evident from some provisions of the principal Act that Government do make distinctions. We have suggested that municipalities should be grouped into three classes according as they are more or less advanced, and that the number of elected seats should differ with the class and so should the enjoyment of the privilege of appointing the president, and we now suggest that the same arrangement should be made with regard to control. If our suggestions are approved by Government, the system of local self-government will be working in three modified forms. The first class municipalities will have the greatest independence so far as executive administration is concerned; the second class will have less, and the third class the least; so that if by the end of the next few years we find that a particular arrangement succeeds well, we shall be in a better position than at present to decide what system ought to be followed and what ought to be thrown out.]

A correspondent of the Indian Spectator (1) of the 2nd September writes:—

Local self-government in Sind.

What can be the object of Government in proposing that in Sind the electors as well as the members of local boards should be headmen and elders only? For there is not a single honorary magistrate yet in Sind! Do they think of reviving the village communities among the Hindus, and the tribal system among the Mahomedans? I altogether discard the theory that Government could have intended to regenerate the defunct village communities in Sind by confining the franchise among the Hindus to Mukhis, &c. No one questions the right of Jághirdárs, Arbábs, Wáderos, &c., to be represented on local boards and municipalities; but no sane man doubts at the same time that they alone are not exclusively entitled to be so represented. Some of the Jághirdárs, Arbábs and Wáderos are assuredly a credit to their country, but many will be found in the Manager's books, with their estates heavily encumbered and their status extremely lowered. They have but little education and are sorely afraid of the "Burra Sáheb." To oppose the Collector is to most of them rank blasphemy, and to oppose the Commissioner is something worse. These gentlemen are all very well in their own way. A few of them may form a good leaven in local and municipal boards, but to swamp the boards with them will surely be not only unjust to several important classes of tax-payers who have a right to be represented, but extremely impolitic and unwise. Government will be creating a new bureau, so to say, composed not of the representatives of the people or even of the tax-payers, but of persons whose sole qualification is that they enjoy a certain title, deservedly or undeservedly obtained. As a matter of fact, for every ten genuine Arbábs and Wáderos there are at least 20, if not more, spurious ones. The constitution of local boards admitting these Arbábs and Wáderos will not in the very least be conducive to popular and political education. It is really difficult to see why the qualifications prescribed for the rest of the Presidency should not be prescribed for Sind, and it is to be hoped that the Bombay Government will not make an exception of Sind in this most important particular. Otherwise one thing is certain enough, viz. that a new oligarchy will come into existence, but local self-government there will be none.

Education.

The Jagaddárs'h (31) of the 2nd September, in a communicated article,

Does not approve of the appointment of school-mistress Yashodábái to the post of the head mistress of Government girls' school No. 6 at Ahmednagar.

expresses its disapproval of the appointment of school-mistress Yashodábái as head mistress of the Government girls' school No. 6 at Ahmednagar vice Vináyak Sávlárám Pundlik transferred to the Khándesh District. Yashodábái is at present the head mistress of Government school No. 7, but in spite of her education and regularity the school does not appear to be in a good condition. The transfer of the mistress is calculated to prove injurious to the interests of school No. 6, and it is to be hoped that the authorities will cancel the changes ordered by them.

Railways.

A correspondent of the Jáme Jamshed (100) of the 4th September com-

Mentions some of the inconveniences suffered by third class passengers on the G. I. P. Railway, and points out the advisability of attaching two brakes to the mail trains of the B. B. & C. I. Railway.

plains that the iron bars attached to the windows of the third class carriages of the new pattern on the G. I. P. Railway are so closely set that passengers travelling in these vehicles experience many inconveniences. While in the carriages, passengers cannot take even small pots of water through the windows. As male and female passengers are seated in different carriages and as the latter are generally ignorant of the names of the stations where they have to get down, while the male passengers cannot put their heads out of the carriage windows to tell their female companions not to get out at particular stations, it so happens that female passengers get down at some intermediate station and their male companions are carried to their proper destination. This temporary separation causes great hardship to the unlucky passengers. Third class passengers not being able to put out their heads through the barred windows to spit, they either spoil the bars or the carriages themselves by spitting. The correspondent also complains that no urinaries are provided to the new third class carriages, and consequently passengers bound to long distances suffer great inconvenience. The Jáme Jamshed of the 8th September, in noticing this letter observes that the overcrowding of third class carriages and the absence of urinaries in those vehicles cause great distress to passengers, who are often not allowed to get down at the stations to answer the calls of nature. There is very little difference between the third and second class vehicles on this railway, and the conveniences in the second class carriages are far inferior to those to be met with in similar vehicles on the East India, the Bombay, Baroda & Central India, the Sind and Panjáb, the Rájputána, the Bhávnagar and other railways. The Jáme takes this opportunity to remark that a single brake is attached to the passenger train of the B. B. & C. I. Railway, which runs between Bombay and Ahmedabad with nearly twenty carriages. This practice is dangerous, inasmuch as one brake cannot efficiently check and stop the speed of the train in emergent cases. There ought to be two brakes, one of which should be placed immediately behind the engine and the other at the end of the train. When this is done the possibility of accidents will be considerably lessened.

Municipalities.

Recommends the use of meters by the municipality of Bombay for making the water-supply meet the requirements of the people.

The Rást Goftár (111) of the 2nd September, while discussing the question of the water-supply of the city of Bombay, advises the municipality to properly appreciate the use of meters for the regulation of water-supply. The chief use of this instrument is not the realization of additional revenue by checking the consumption of water, but the measurement of the quantity of water consumed and thus checking the waste of it. If this instrument serves the purpose of checking the waste of pipe water on its way from the reservoir to the city, then the residents on third and fourth floors will thank the municipality for the copious supply that will be received by them. Whatever the amount spent by the municipality for the supply of such meters it must be considered as contributing to the saving of so much water, and will be more or less repaid in that manner.

Comments on the debate in the Bombay Town Council on the subject of the damages awarded by the High Court to one Mulibái in a suit brought by her against the municipality.

Referring to the discussion that recently took place in the Bombay Town Council on the subject of the responsibility of the Municipal Commissioner in the matter of the demolition of a building belonging to Mulibái, who was awarded damages by the High Court in a suit against the municipality, the Native Opinion (10) of the 2nd September says:--Mr. Navroji Fardunji moved for a vote of censure on those concerned in the demolition of the building of the aforesaid Mulibái because the municipality has had to pay about Rs. 20,000 in the shape of costs and damages. This was all very well, but Mr. Navroji's motion was only confined to one single case, and if he refers to the records of the Town Council he will find that this work of demolition often receives sanction in an almost haphazard way. Sometimes the Council, instead of looking at each case and deciding it as the responsible administrators of the city, delegate to the Municipal Commissioner their power of seeing that the law has been obeyed before each work of demolition is carried out. Why should not the Commissioner imitate the Town Council and delegate his power to another officer? It is said that the Commissioner has plenty of work to do, but we presume that he has enough of assistance, and with a proper division of labour and responsibility he must reserve certain functions for himself. In like manner the Town Council cannot pretend to make light of their own functions when they delegate their own power to somebody else. If the members cannot spare time to do their work properly, the best thing they can do is to retire and make room for other persons. Dr. Weir was quite right when he turned the tables upon the Council. It is the comfortable habit of passing things in the manner they are often passed that makes municipal government in this city a farce. The Commissioner may urge and bring all his eloquence to his help, but it is for the Council to decide what they are to do and what they are not to do, and it is unpardonable weakness in them, to use the mildest term, to say or rather to confess that the Council was overborne by the importunity of the Commissioner. These building cases are a source of great expense and annoyance to the rate-payers. Each of them requires to be carefully sifted, and the members of the Council ought to sit by rotation to enquire into them, and pass their verdict after a thorough scrutiny of the pros and cons in each case. It is idle to ask Mr. Grant after two years what he did in a particular building case when he was Acting Municipal Commissioner for Bombay. Let each individual member of the Council realize his position by placing himself in Mr. Grant's place. It is simply childish to send a reference to him as is now proposed to be done. If the Commissioner is a hard-worked officer, as is now admitted, how can Mr. Grant remember anything of one solitary case out of hundreds that must have come before him, except so far as he can say from the papers in the office, which must be accessible to the Council as well? If the Chairman agreed with Mr. Navroji that irregularity was committed in connection with the abovementioned case, we ask him and his colleagues whether they have improved their own procedure for deciding such cases. If not, it is again the story of the mole in a neighbour's eye regardless of the beam in one's own. Supposing again Mr. Navroji to be correct in holding that the Assistant Engineer is to blame, we again enquire whether his colleagues are not more open to blame for not scrutinizing more closely the proceedings of this Assistant Engineer at the proper time. Colonel Merewether thinks that certain legal opinions having been received, the matter should have been communicated to the Town Council. Cui bono shutting the stables after the steed has been stolen? Did the Town Council pass an order that the said opinions were to be communicated to them before the suit was allowed to go on? If not, it seems preposterous to urge this argument after the whole case has been concluded.

Comments in connection with the new drainage scheme for Poona.

The Quarterly Journal of the Poona Sárvajanik Sabha (4) for the month of July but received on the 16th August describes the physical situation of the city of Poona, the natural drainage of the city, its rain water sheds and underground drains, and suggests in limine the following reforms:—(1) The privies that are situated about and on the Kátraj main aqueduct must be removed beyond the draining area of the aqueduct and the cisterns. (2) The graveyard established close by the western side of the Kátraj main near the Parvati tank should be suppressed. (3) The collections of stinking water in connection with the weir of the Parvati tank should be drained off. (4) The tanneries situated to the windward of the city in Navi Peth should be removed. (5) Certain obnoxious trades, such as snuff manufacture, dall manufacture, dyeing, paper manufactures, &c., should be removed to the suburban parts leeward of the city. (6) The stationing of the night-soil carts in different parts of the city, which is injurious to the public health, should be discontinued. (7) Slaughtering of sheep, &c., should only be permitted outside of the city in fields where the offal can be utilized as manure. (8) Alloo (a kind of plant) plantations in the heart of the city should be put a stop to. (9) Collection of manures in the compounds of private houses, as well as in the intra-mural fields and gardens, should be disallowed. (10) Night-soil manure should not be used in the fields situated within the municipal limits. (11) The manufacture of fireworks in the heart of the city, as well as the storing of combustibles, should be prohibited. (12) The burial of the dead should not be allowed in the city on any pretext whatever, now that the municipality has made provision for extramural burial-grounds in three different places outside the city. (13) The practice of bathing and washing on the margins of the cisterns or houds should be disallowed, and bathing places apart from the houds should be provided for the people; or, if the practice cannot be discontinued, then hydrants should be provided at each houd for the supply of pure drinking water to the people. (14) The roads and streets in the western confines of the city should be cleared and widened down to the river, the overgrown hedges should be trimmed, and a free ingress to the westerly breeze from that side should be provided so that the people may go for their evening promenade in that direction, instead of having to travel to Bhámburda or to go beyond the Parvati tank before they can get a breath of fresh air. (15) The municipality should see that the privies are better constructed than at present and well ventilated, and have good shutters so as to prevent the effluent matter from flowing into the gutters. (16) The cesspools which infest the city should be closed and filled up. (17) The privies should be cleaned twice a day. (18) All the road-side gutters should be built according to the new pattern. The openings kept in the side of the covered gutters for the admission of rain water should be enlarged so as to prevent the roads from being flooded. These openings should be grated to prevent their being blocked up. (19) In giving permission to build new houses, the municipality should see that the privies are built in the rear, away from the public roads and streets. (20) Trees should be planted between the city and the canal so as to lessen the sub-soil percolation from the canal. The writer then proceeds to discuss the drainage scheme lately devised by Colonel Ducat in the following terms :—It is admirable in conception and design, but we must see how far it is applicable to the city of Poona. In discussing Colonel Ducat's scheme we must recollect that Poona is an inland town provided with a supply of water which is at times intermittent and precarious, especially in the months of March, April and May, just when it is most needed. The supply at other times is fairly abundant, but this abundant supply is secured by payment. Colonel Ducat's plan does not make any provision of water for flushing the sewers. He thinks that the sullage water alone is enough to flush and carry away the night-soil. Whenever any obstruction presents itself, it is proposed to pond up "the sewage behind, so that the increased flow will bring down any obstruction to the nearest manhole, whence it can be removed." We think that the sullage water will not be sufficient to flush and cleanse the sewers. The sullage itself is filthy. It cannot cleanse the pipes if ordure flows through them. If pure water be not provided for flushing, the result will be the adherence of the sludge and ordure to the inside of the pipes. The deposited sludge will act as a ferment to the fresh ordure, and set up a most vigorous decomposition accompanied with equally vigorous evolutions of deleterious gases. An unlimited supply of fresh water will have to be ensured, which, if we take it at the lowest estimate allowed in England, viz. 5 gallons per head per day, will amount to about 15,000,000 gallons per month. This quantity at 3 annas per 1,000 gallons will cost about Rs. 2,812-8-0 per month, or Rs. 33,750 per year, as a permanent charge for the city alone. The water-closet system, to be successful, must have an uninterrupted stream flowing day and night through the sewers, to secure which the quantity of water above estimated, though it might prove too low for a tropical city where evaporation is so rapid and the evolution of stinking gases proportionately greater and quicker, is under the most favourable circumstances absolutely necessary. The drawbacks to this plan are the following:—(1) The generation of diseases incidental to every water-carriage system. (2) The cost and precarious nature of the pumping system. (3) The cost of water for flushing the sewers. (4) The ignorance of the people. (5) The danger of the bursting of the pipes. (6) The general costliness of the scheme. The sewer-diseases most to be dreaded are enteric fever and diarrhœa. Other diseases which may arise from the water-closet system are cholera, diphtheria, ophthalmia, fevers, boils, &c. If the sewers be well constructed, if ventilation through them be perfect, the flushing regular and abundant, and the current through the sewers unceasing and not locked or broken, the chances of the production of these diseases may perhaps be minimized. But why should we risk the production of a dreadful and fatal disease like enteric fever, when even in England the superiority of the water-carriage over the dry system in the improvement of public health has not been generally admitted? If there is any conclusion suggested by English experience which has a bearing on the choice between the two systems, that conclusion is that the balance of authorities inclines in the favour of the dry system, especially for inland cities and towns. The introduction of night-soil into the sewers is in tropical countries fraught with danger to public health. When fæcal matter is unmixed, it undergoes changes slowly, or dries up, but when it is mixed with wine, or even with pure water, it undergoes decomposition rapidly. We state this on the authority of Dr. Parkes, whose experience is confined to cold climates like that of England. In India the admixture of ordure and wine will give rise to more rapid and copious decomposition, with the consequential evolution of sewer gases which will give rise to enteric fever and other diseases. Hence in India night-soil should never be allowed to flow into the sewers. Suppose Colonel Ducat's scheme be adopted as it is, that is, if night-soil be admitted into the sewers, then the distance between the man-holes, which is to be about 300 feet, will have to be lessened. The man-holes will have to be provided at a distance of 25 or 30 feet, so as to ensure perfect ventilation. The distance of 300 feet between the man-holes, which is hardly sufficient in cold climates, is much less so in India. To avoid the permanent and recurring charge of pumping and its paraphernalia, and to guard against the contingency of its imperfect working in cases of accidents to engines, the evil effects of which will reverberate throughout the city, it will be judicious and economical to extend the sewers, either covered or open, according to the demands of each locality, from the Mangalwár pumping station to a site a mile distant to the north-east of the Ghorpadi Barracks, there to be discharged spontaneously into the fields. As the ground slopes towards the east, as is evidenced by the flowing of the river and the Mutha Canal in that direction, a natural outlet is sure to be found thereabout in Mundva, where ample and cheap land can also be had for the sewage farm. The cost of the extension of the sewers to Mundva will not only be fully compensated for by the cheapness of land to be obtained there for the sewage farm, but there will be a vast saving of the permanent and recurring expense for the maintenance of the pumping station. Again the proverbial conservatism and ignorance of the native population in general will prevent them from appreciating such a scheme as that of Colonel Ducat's. They are nearly 200 years behind Europeans in the race of civilization. This scheme with its traps, soil pipes, valves, bathing platforms, ventilating shafts, syphons, &c., will be too complicated and difficult for the people to manage. To prevent the pipes from bursting either from inward pressure or from the insinuation of the roots of trees into them, they will have to be embedded in a thick coating of lime and brick masonry around them as a protection. If the night-soil is not allowed to enter the sewers, as in a tropical town like Poona it should not, then this scheme will be too costly to be adopted simply for the carriage of the sullage water, since the charge for the removal of night-soil, which is well nigh 45,000 rupees a year, will remain the same. No doubt, all these considerations about expense should be subordinated to the preservation of health, but the expense should have limits and be proportionate to the income of the municipality and the poverty of the people living in an uncommercial town. The pecuniary returns which are expected to be realized from the sewage farm are too high to be perennial and do not seem to accord with the local agricultural experience. As Colonel Ducat's scheme, complete and well designed though it is, seems to be too costly for one municipality, we have to face the question whether there is another plan which can be suggested as an alternative one. Colonel Ducat has not apparently any idea of utilizing the existing underground drains in his plan. We are of opinion that they can be utilized in the general sewerage of the city. No doubt they are not scientifically built so as to carry the sullage water rapidly and to allow of their being flushed whenever obstructed or necessary, because they have square and flat bottoms. But the materials are there and the channels shaped, dug and ready. If the night-soil is to be removed as at present by the hand system these drains can be repaired and used for carrying sullage water. To be efficient their bottoms will have to be built oval, and similar drains will have to be constructed in those parts of the city where they are wanting, and the sullage water, instead of being allowed to flow into the river as at present, will have to be pumped out into the fields or carried through the drain which will have to be extended to Mundva. The whole of the drains will have to be provided with grated openings for ventilation at distances of 30 or 40 feet. Rain water should be excluded from these drains. This system will drain the sub-soil water from the ground, which in its turn will serve to cleanse and flush these drains of sludge. The drains will require periodical flushing also. It will also be necessary that the house privies should be provided with a double iron tub for the separate reception of night-soil and urine and the ablution water should be allowed to flow into the drains. We suggest another alternative plan, the best that occurs to us. The present road-side gutters should be built according to the new pattern lately introduced in our city by the municipality. These new gutters are built of cut-stone with oval bottoms. The gutters should be made water-tight by being coated with cement on the inside, and the sullage water should be allowed to flow through these gutters. If sullage water is allowed to pass through these gutters, how is it to be disposed of? In that part of the city which is situated on the right bank of the Nágjhari the land is so efficiently drained naturally that the sullage water can be wholly consumed in irrigating fields and gardens, of which there are many. During the rainy season, when sullage water will not be required for irrigating fields and when it will be increased in volume, it can be allowed to flow in the nallás and river, the flow being regulated by trap-doors, which will permit the sullage water to flow into the fields when required and into the nallás and river when not required during the rains. The sullage water, mixed with the water of the river when it is full, will be perfectly diluted and purified. The sullage water from those parts of the city which are situated on the elevated and southern confines, as also from Navi Peth and the upper portions of Sadáshiv Peth, and from the houses situated along the banks of the river and Nágjhari, can be easily applied to the fields and gardens which abound in these several localities. The sullage water from the central parts of the city only, which are marked by the underground drains, will have to be carried down to a low-lying intercepting channel. From this channel the sullage water will have to be pumped out or carried off to Mundva by the extension of the channel. These gutters should be kept open. Being uncovered their contents will be freely exposed to the sun, light and air during the day. All the smells and gases arising from these open gutters will thus be destroyed and thoroughly diffused in the air. Even during night the smells and gases will be diluted and neutralized by the air. In those parts of the city where the traffic is great, the gutters should be covered up for the sake of safety with flag-stones, as the gutters in Budhwár and Aditwár Peths are at present. The next question is, will intra-mural irrigation with sullage water prove injurious to public health? There is hardly reason for any apprehension on this point, for we are now irrigating fields and gardens in the city with water and manure of all kinds. The use of sullage water could not be worse than that, if not better. There seems to be no harm in using sullage water for irrigating the fields and gardens in the city. One precaution will have to be taken with flat lands which are likely to be water-logged. They will have to be provided with sub-soil drainage. But for sloping lands no such provision is necessary.

Does not approve of the proposed construction of a fish market for the town of Vengurla.

The Vengurla Vritt (71) of the 30th August does not approve of the construction of a fish market for the town of Vengurla which was sanctioned at a general meeting of the municipal committee, and says that as the market is not very urgently required its construction should be postponed until such time as elected members will be admitted into the committee under the new local self-government scheme.

Cholera in Bulsár.

A correspondent of the Gujarát Mitrá (76) of the 2nd September says that cholera has made its appearance in the town of Bulsár. Three cases occurred in the bazár in the vicinity of the hospital. The Medical Officer in charge of the hospital has caused the bazár to be disinfected by the fumigation of sulphur and dammer. There has, however, been no diminution in the filth in and about the town. The oarts of Vánias stink so horribly that it is not possible to pass by them. The open places in the bazár are used by the people for natural purposes and one cannot pass by them without the use of handkerchiefs. The municipal peons witness this state of things, and when any complaint is carried to them they reply by saying that the owners of those places are not to be found in the town. Cannot the municipality take any measures against this nuisance, assume what proportions it will?

Insanitary condition of Ahmedabad.

The Indu Prakásh (9) of the 3rd September says:—Mr. Phillpotts' death ought to open the eyes of the Ahmedabad Municipality to the insanitary condition of that town. There is unfortunately good room for the complaint of the Ahmedabad correspondent of the Bombay Gazette that the city is badly looked after. The practice of serving dinners on public streets, which obtains in almost all parts of Gujarát, ought to be discouraged by Government.

Native States.

Advises Government to remove Christian missionaries from all Native States.

The Dnyán Prakásh (8) of the 3rd September says that the Christian missionaries are much mistaken in supposing that they will get redress from the Home Government in the matter of their complaint against the Mahárája Holkar. They are scarcely aware how delicate are the relations between the British Government and the Native States of India, and there is nothing surprising in the Government of India having already declined to comply with the request of the missionaries. It is well and good that the Mahárája has at present to deal with an officer of Sir Lepel Griffin's wisdom. This affair would certainly have assumed a different aspect had the Governor General's Agent been a man easy of belief and unfavourably disposed to the interests of Native States generally. In short, it is to be suggested that Government should avoid the possibility of untoward accidents by removing Christian missionaries from all Native States.

Says that it was not right that the Government of India should not have punished the Political Agent of Káthiáwár in connection with the recent Junágad affair.

The Poona Vaibhav (49) of the 2nd September says that it is a matter for surprise that the Political Agent of Káthiáwár has been gently let down by the Government of India in their resolution on the subject of the massacre of the Maiyás by the Junágad Darbár. It cannot be said that the Nawáb acted in the way he did without the consent of the Political Agent, as in that case the latter would have at once reported the matter to Government. The circumstance that the Political Agent has in his report to Government tried to shield the Darbár from all blame goes to prove his complicity in the sad catastrophe. Moreover it was the duty of the Political Agent to guide the young Nawáb by his counsel, and he, to say the least, failed in the performance of this duty. The Political Agent should therefore have been punished in some measure, and the fact that he has been allowed to go scot-free has undoubtedly served to bring a stain on the just character of the administration of the present Viceroy. [The Jagadádarsh (31) and the Gujaráti (96) of the same date express similar sentiments.]

Berár Affairs.

Says that the people of Berár are anxious to know the result of the conference held at Hyderabad for discussing the scheme of local self-government.

The Varhád Samáchár (68) of the 3rd September observes that the people of Berár are anxious to know the result of the conference recently held at Hyderabad in connection with the scheme of local self-government. It is gratifying that in the two great towns of Berár, Amráoti and Akola, the Deputy Commissioners, who are ex-officio presidents of the municipal boards, have left the greater portion of the executive municipal work to the committees without unduly restraining their independence of action, and that in the majority of cases both of them allow their influence to be felt rather from without than from within.

The same points out the advantages of communicating official news to the public on subjects with which they ought to become acquainted, and observes that had the Government of Hyderabad informed the subjects of the Nizám of the conditions on which it was intended to construct the proposed Chánda Railway, there would have been no popular demonstration against the project. The Samáchár then prays the Resident at Hyderabad to charge one of his Secretaries with the duty of communicating to the public such information from official records as it may not be objectionable to put before them.

Requests the Resident at Hyderabad to communicate to the public such official news as it may not be objectionable to put before them.

Notes.—A. The notices from the different Newspapers have been collected in the Report under different heads, which are printed in italics.

B. The names of Newspapers are printed in the body of the Report in italics, and the number of the Newspaper in the above list is printed in brackets after the name.

C. The proprietors of the Newspapers marked * have not given information as to the number of copies issued. In these cases an estimate has been made by the Reporter.

D. The system of spelling vernacular words followed by the Reporter is the same as that adopted in the Official Spelling List of the Bombay Presidency. One peculiar feature of this system is that when the long a (आ or á) is the last letter of a word, the accent is left out, and the short a (अ = u in gun) is, to prevent confusion, never placed at the end of a word. This rule has been strictly followed, except that when the short a appears to be absolutely necessary to complete the pronunciation of a word, as in Arunodaya or the well known Mitra, it is printed with a mark over it to indicate that it is short, thus—ă.

E. Berár papers are received in this office for report under the Resolution of the Government of Bombay in the General Department, No. 1795, dated 8th June 1881.

Politics and the Public Administration.

Comments on the British administration of India.

The Mahrátta (2) of the 9th September, in noticing Miss Florence Nightingale's article reviewing Mr. J. Seymour Keay's article on the "Spoliation of India," remarks:—Miss Nightingale proposes that a thorough inquiry into Indian affairs should be conducted by a Royal Commission consisting of men of the highest standing and reputation. No doubt such an inquiry would be productive of good results to India. The days are gone when men like Mr. Elphinstone won the hearts of Natives by their exertions. The members of the Civil Service now-a-days consider themselves as birds of passage, and want to go home as soon and as often as possible. Mr. Keay remarks that Europeans now know much less and care much less about the people they govern than in former days. But we think the case is still worse. Men of the present generation know more, and yet care less for the people than men of former times. Miss Nightingale fully endorses the opinion of Mr. Keay that "a government of officials, not responsible to the people of India and practically unsupervised by their countrymen at home, would naturally and almost unconsciously establish a system favourable to their own patronage and power—a system providing too much for the interest of the governors and too little for the welfare of the governed." Here is the exact picture. Miss Nightingale sums up the grounds of complaints under two heads: the unsuitability of the institutions and the great cost met by taxation. It is an undisputed truth that in order to lessen the burden of taxation there should be retrenchment. Is retrenchment possible? Yes, it is, if the cheap Native agency is employed. We do not even for a moment advocate that a cheap agency should be resorted to at the cost of efficiency. Is there so great a necessity for such a large number of Civilians to be imported into India to eat up all her revenues? Is it not possible that able Native gentlemen may be found who will pass the prescribed standard of efficiency if all unnecessary obstacles are removed? Why was the limit of age for candidates for the Civil Service Examination reduced from 21 to 19? Why is the competitive examination held in England only and not here? All these questions are best answered by stating that India is governed for England alone. When a true and noble statesman like Lord Ripon tries to raise the status of Natives by employing them in high offices or by conferring on them some high powers, what a clamour is raised against him! At the time when the Black Act was passed the English community was set in great commotion. The same has happened with regard to the Jurisdiction Bill. A writer in the Saturday Review, in noticing Mr. Keay's article, compares the state of India under the Mogul Emperors with her state under the British rule. We very willingly admit that India never enjoyed under her Mahomedan rulers that security of life and property which she now enjoys, and that this security is quite necessary for the progress of peaceful arts and civilization. But we cannot help feeling indignant when the writer in the Review, with a brazen-facedness quite characteristic of that class of politicians who always talk of blood and iron, makes the sweeping assertion that the Asiatic breaks through all restraint, human or divine, &c. We do not even for a moment maintain that all Asiatics are honest. But at the same time we shall be the last to admit that all Asiatics are a set of impostors and rascals. Is England free from bad men? Even such men as Lord Clive and Warren Hastings were not free from certain vices, and on certain occasions acted with questionable propriety. Human nature is the same in all countries. It must have its black as well as its white side. We will try to answer all the questions which the writer in the Review has asked. How can the Civil Service be recruited?—Raise the limit of years and let the examination be held here. In no time you will have the less costly but the not less efficient Native agency, working on a greater scale than hitherto. How can the taxes be revised?—First abolish those taxes which oppress the poor, for instance the salt-tax, reduce the rent of land, and let taxes be levied on luxuries. The repeal of cotton duties,—duties which ought to have been retained if not for protection at least for revenue, was not a step in the right direction, as it was necessary and advisable that duties on necessaries should have been removed first. How can the army be maintained?—In order to maintain it, an extraordinary expenditure is necessary. It is unjust that India should be burdened with charges for nothing good. Let some of the paid regiments, especially the European ones, be disbanded, and let Natives form themselves into volunteer corps. It is time that the policy of distrust should be done away with. This ought to be done if Government are in earnest in retrenching expenditure. How to promote Natives in civil employ so as to raise the masses?—All of Lord Ripon's measures,—local self-government, the Jurisdiction Bill and others,—will go a great length towards securing this object.

Approves of the contemplated appointment of a Parliamentary committee for examining the present condition of India.

The Gujaráti (95) of the 9th September says that the news about the contemplated appointment of a Parliamentary committee for the purpose of scrutinizing the present condition of India and examining the accounts of the revenues and expenditure of the country is highly satisfactory in one way. Every native of India has reason to be gratified at the circumstance that this should have been the result of the writings of Mr. Keay and Miss Florence Nightingale, of the advocacy of members of Parliament like Mr. Blake, and of similar cries from India. It is to be hoped, however, that this Parliamentary committee will not, like the old finance committees, rest in sleep after protracted sittings. We have just seen that the Secretary of State has declined to adopt the recommendations of the Army Commission, which after long deliberation proposed a reduction of 1½ or 2 krors in military expenditure. We wish that a commission composed of men of generous minds may be appointed, and being asked to report on the questions of civil and military expenditure, the employment of Natives in the public service, land revenue, public works, ábkári and similar subjects, their recommendations may at once be acted upon. But we do not want commissions who hold their sittings for eight years, whose reports are allowed to lie at the India Office for about fifteen years, and whose recommendations are thrown to the winds after thirty years.

Indian affairs in Parliament.

The same, in an article headed "India in Parliament," says:—We have frequently observed that the British Parliament gives very little attention to Indian matters. That the rulers in England should be careless of the interests of the people of a country which yields a very large revenue, and which materially assists in the maintenance of the people of England, may be a matter for deep regret, but is it not very surprising that we should look upon this carelessness with equanimity? Whether Conservative, Liberal, or Radical, every Englishman is cognizant of the disregard shown to Indian interests, and is also acquainted with some of the specific grievances of the people; but no efficient measures have yet been taken for affording redress. The question of reforming the administrative policy in India has been engaging the public attention for the last fifteen years. On many occasions members of Parliament have taken exception to the policy of saddling India with the expenditure on account of certain wars, but to no purpose. What good then has resulted from such discussions in Parliament? The members of Parliament have indeed become known for ably carrying on a warfare of words, but they have not succeeded in changing the aspect of affairs. We have carefully watched the proceedings of the last session of Parliament. Many members, hitherto unknown, rose to address the House, but few were swayed by any sincere motives. It cannot be considered that the several questions raised were in any degree calculated to confer any appreciable good upon India. Members like Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett indulge in jokes and pranks, and uselessly take up the time of the House. They animadvert on the wholesome reforms proposed to be introduced into the Indian administration, without having any knowledge of the rules of politics. How then can such animadversions prove beneficial to this country? There is no more need of a warfare of words in Parliament, and something more substantial is required. The question of reduction in the public expenditure was moved during the last session, but there appears to be no chance of its being taken up in earnest. The Indian budget was placed before the House at the fag end of the session. As Mr. Maclean has pertinently remarked, it is a disgraceful farce that the budget should be discussed after half the amount provided in it has been already spent. It bespeaks a deplorable and dangerous state of things that a budget of 70 krors should be discussed by the House at a time when the majority of members have left London for the country, and when, as the few that remain do not consider the subject important, there is great difficulty in securing a number sufficient to form a quorum.

Points out the necessity of constructing navigation canals in India.

In an article headed "Our River System and the Navigation Canals," the Native Opinion (10) of the 9th September says:—The rain that has been falling so long and so incessantly in Bombay has also visited in profusion other parts of our continent, and has saved the country from a calamity too grim and dreadful to contemplate. Had this rain held back for a few days more, famine would have stalked abroad, and lorded it over the whole length and breadth of the land in a most voracious manner. Happily the relentless foe has been already cheated of his spoil, and we are glad to say that the country—supposing always the locust war is successful—will surely smile with teeming harvests. This calamity, very narrowly averted by the grace of Providence, should teach us a lesson. It is not that Providence will always save us from famines in the future, as it has not always saved the country in the past. If we are to depend upon its grace, we should bear in mind the adage that God helps those who help themselves. Now by long experience we know that famine has become an important factor in Indian affairs, and the question how to mitigate, if not entirely remove, the severity of its repeated visitations has occupied the minds of our rulers from the earliest times. So long ago as 1853 a commission reported that extended irrigation and water-storage would be very efficacious in preventing famines. From time to time Governors, Governors General, and Secretaries of State have sung in the same strain, and have given their opinion that a sufficient and well-regulated water-supply would be the true solution of the famine problem. This country has been with a great deal of truth often called an agricultural country, and since agriculture wants a supply of water, its absence means a famine. The reasoning is so plain that almost all the ancient and modern rulers of the land have unhesitatingly accepted this conclusion as correct. We find from the vast number of tanks now dilapidated that the old Native rulers realized the truth of this conclusion, and tried manfully to cope with the evil by storing water in immense quantities so as to balance the abundance of one year with the drought of another. What we now find is, however, only a recognition of the truth of the proposition that the true remedy for averting famines is the storage of water, but we do not meet with any sustained effort to promote that storage. It has been often supposed that want of water in the country is the cause of famines. But this is not correct. Sir A. Cotton and many others of equal standing and note have recorded their opinion that there is no want of water in the country, and that in the worst year that ever occurred there was water flowing into the sea more than enough to provide food for the population. The only desideratum is that the water that falls over the country should be stored in tanks so that it may be used when needed, and that the rivers should be laid under contribution by artificial means to supply the adjacent tracts with the much-valued treasure which they pour into the ocean to no purpose. These are the two grand remedies which have been found by experience to answer the purpose. Canals and tanks in the country would far better ensure the country against the ravages of famines than any amount of resolutions to reserve a certain sum annually to be spent on relief works when famine is actually in the land. Prevention is always better than cure. If a large portion of the annual reserve or famine premium be spent upon irrigation works, we should derive a double benefit. We should have the benefits of irrigation actually secured to us, and the Government of India would have no room for temptation to spend the accumulated funds at an emergency upon purposes other than legitimate. The irrigation canals would not only supply the primary want of India by giving to the soil a timely supply of water and increase the cereal produce, but would also, if properly constructed, provide the best possible means of transit at a small cost. The Panjáb, the North-Western Provinces and Bengal have already such a natural system of river navigation that it can be made almost perfect with comparatively very little cost. In the Deccan too the Narbada and the Tápti flowing from the interior into the western sea, and the Godávari, the Krishna and the Káveri flowing into the Bay of Bengal, can at no great cost be made to serve as means of intercommunication over a vast area. The Godávari was surveyed a long time ago with this view, and it was then conclusively shown by able engineers that that river and its tributary, the Wardha, could be easily made navigable up to within a short distance of their sources. Even as the Godávari now stands, it is navigable by boats to a long distance from its mouth. The Krishna and the Madras rivers do not differ much in this respect from the Godávari. This magnificent water system would not only provide the means of transit, but at the same time would fertilize the country through which it would pass. We earnestly desire that this question, which has been allowed to lie comparatively dormant for at least a quarter of a century, may be brought on the tapis. We regret that so long a time has already been wasted in devising schemes which have signally failed. What we have suggested above has already been more than once suggested by Sir A. Cotton, who has gone so far as actually to prepare a scheme of the undertaking which he has satisfactorily shown to be feasible. Had the canal navigation scheme been adopted long ago, it would have saved the country from several very heavy burdens. We could have then dispensed with some of our guaranteed railways with all their charges on the revenues of India. That is, however, a thing of the past. But in future if our Government, instead of undertaking State railways, would undertake navigation canals, a great saving might be effected. Taking the actual cost of construction per mile for railways and canals, it can be satisfactorily shown that the cost of the former is as much as from 3 to 8 times the cost of the latter. The substitution of canals for railways would thus prove to be a clear gain. Moreover, when we invest our capital in railways we really devote a large portion of it to buying iron and coal from England, and bring no commensurate benefit to our country. We do not mean to absolutely deny the value of railways, and we assert that some lines are necessary if India is to play an important part in the economy of the world as a large grain-producing and grain-exporting country. But this purpose would be sufficiently served if we constructed railways only in places where the construction of canals would be either impossible or next to it. Our country is not even now in a position to support railways. They do not suit the genius of it so well as navigation canals would. Nor does the argument of speed make any great difference between the respective merits of the two systems. We believe that by means of steam barges a speed sufficient for practical purposes can be attained over navigation canals. We recommend these considerations to the attention of the present Government of India. We believe canals are more calculated to fit in with our system of revenue and expenditure and the infant development of our resources than railways which are mere heavy ornaments. Canals would add to the revenue by increasing the fertility of the land, and leave us more capital to apply towards the other wants of the country.

Expresses a hope that a Gujaráti gentleman will be nominated this year to the Native Civil Service.

The Gujaráti (95) of the 9th September says:—November is again drawing nigh and conjectures are rife regarding the nomination of a member from this Presidency to the Native Civil Service. From the time that this service has been started, two Pársis, two Dakshini Bráhmans and one Musalman have been appointed to it. Last year we suggested that a Gujaráti Hindu ought to be nominated to the service. Among the names of persons recommended last year three were Gujaráti, but perhaps the Bombay Government did not urge the special claims of the Gujaráti candidates, which circumstance might have led to the unpopular nomination made last year. We hope the last year's injustice will not be repeated, and that one of the three Gujaráti candidates recommended last year or some other qualified Gujaráti will be appointed this year.

Suggests that the shrievalty of Bombay for the coming year should be conferred upon a Mahomedan gentleman.

The Yajdán Parást (123) of the 9th September observes that since 1856, when a Native gentleman was for the first time appointed to the shrievalty of Bombay, this honourable office has been conferred upon six Hindus and six Pársis, but not a single Mahomedan gentleman has been fortunate enough to get it. Fifteen years ago there were very few Mahomedan gentlemen having a good English education, and it was rather difficult to find qualified person in that community for appointment to the shrievalty; but within the last fifteen years education has made considerable progress among the Mahomedans, and several eligible candidates may be found. The most conspicuous among the Islamite community of Bombay are Messrs. Badrudin Tyebji, Kamrudin Tyebji, Mahomed Ali Rogay, Rahimtula Mahomed Sayáni and Khán Báhádur Honorary Surgeon Shekh Kásam; and one from among them ought to be appointed Sheriff for the coming year. Mr. Badrudin's would be the most appropriate selection and the Mahomedan community would be highly grateful to Government for the honour done to it. [The Vartamán Sár (120) of the 11th idem expresses its approval of the suggestion.]

The grievances of the employés of the Salt Department at Goa.

The Arunodayá (14) of the 9th September, in a communicated article, dwells on the inconveniences which the employés of the Salt Department at Goa have been obliged to suffer, and says that it is a matter for regret that in spite of this they should have been served with notices intimating that their services would not be required after a stated period, and that they were liable to be dismissed whenever necessary. All the employés have been seized with a feeling of discontent and are at a loss how to get out of the impending difficulty. In foreign territory like that of Portuguese India it was proper that the last place should be worth at least Rs. 15 and continuable during the whole of the year. The authorities have, however, converted the appointments into nine-monthly. The employés on nine-monthly establishments are thrown out of employment at the commencement of the rainy season, and they are required to resume their work before its close. They are therefore obliged to undergo much expense and trouble, and find it difficult to live within their means. Those that do not receive the salaries that were originally fixed in consideration of the inconveniences of a foreign rule and the dearness of provisions are obliged to purchase their necessaries on credit. It is very unjust that those that have served for three and a half years in the Portuguese territories should not yet be transferred to the Presidency. All complaints should now be met by paying to such persons as have not been allowed the originally fixed salaries the amount saved from their salaries, by giving employment all the year round to such persons as are now borne on nine-monthly establishments, by transferring all of them to the Presidency, and by providing for such as may be thrown altogether out of employ in the arrangements that may be effected for the protection of the salt-works in the Konkan.

Locusts in the Sátára District.

A correspondent of the Mahárashtrá Mitrá (40) of the 13th September, writing from Pasarni in the Wái Táluka of the Sátára District, says that there is a difference of opinion between the people and Government officers regarding the existence of locusts in the district on account of the circumstance that apparently no creatures of that description are to be seen in the fields. Whenever, however, the soil is broken in being weeded, innumerable locusts are seen to jump, and it is urgently necessary that they should be destroyed in their present condition. Government should therefore cause mercury powder to be fired, and the forests, which afford great shelter to the insects, to be destroyed by being burnt. They should also ask the cultivators to use nets for catching them. It is believed that the miseries that have at present overtaken the people are due to the circumstance that there is very little good merit to the credit of the rulers, while injustice is rampant. The Forest Department is an important source of the sins of the rulers, while the Deccan Agriculturists' Relief Act is such a sinful measure that God cannot brook it. The Subordinate Judges have now begun to dispense justice against their own convictions. They cannot help it. The law dictates how justice shall be dispensed. The mandates of Dr. Pollen are surprisingly tyrannical. It is very dangerous to deal out injustice when one is conscious of what he is doing. The sighs and lamentations of the people are attributable to this cause. If Government put a stop to all sinful conduct, all miseries will cease and the subjects will be happy. The editor of the Mahárashtrá Mitrá (40) says that it is believed that the difference between Government officers and people regarding the existence of locusts is attributable to the solicitude of the latter to waive all demands for remissions of land revenue, which will have to be met in case the existence of locusts is recognized. The editor wishes that this belief may not be correct.

Brings to notice certain matters in connection with the farm of the ábkári revenue of Surat.

A correspondent of the Gujarát Mitrá (76) of the 9th September says:—The enforcement of the A'bkári Act for the last four years has deprived the poor labourers of a natural beverage like toddy, and by granting the farm of the ábkári revenue of Surat to a single contractor Government have, with the view of securing an increase in their income, reduced the people almost to a state of starvation. When in August last the farm for the whole of the district was granted to Mr. Dubásh, a petition on behalf of the Pársis of Surat was laid before Government, representing that the system of granting the farm to a single contractor was calculated to prove prejudicial to the liquor distilling industry of Surat, and that the people would not be able to get as good wines as were to be had from private distillers. Government informed the petitioners in reply that they had bound the new contractor to supply liquor of as good quality as that before furnished by previous contractors, and that therefore there was no ground for anxiety on that score. But within a period of two months from the time this assurance was given by Government, complaints have begun to be raised regarding the quality of the liquor supplied by the contractor. The only recourse now left to the people is to make a joint representation to Government in the matter. When Mr. Dubásh first entered on his contract he allowed the old distillers to keep their stops on condition that they would receive one bottle of liquor for each gallon distilled, to enable them to meet the expenses of distillation. The shop-keepers considered this condition rather hard, and therefore expressed their intention to stop work. Subsequently, however, they were obliged to give way for want of other employment, and bound themselves to render service to the contractor by a written agreement after depositing the required sums of money. This arrangement continued for one month, after which time Mr. Dubásh was tempted to retract his promise of allowing one bottle of liquor for each gallon distilled by the circumstance that the consumption of liquor was gradually increasing. He then offered to give one pint of liquor per gallon, which has spread dissatisfaction among the distillers. It is moreover known that the liquor which is manufactured at the distillery as 25° under proof turns out to be really 30°, and the inspectors of the contractor can therefore make good capital out of this circumstance and prosecute the shop-keepers for adulterating liquor in contravention of the 4th clause of the agreement into which they have entered with the contractor. If, therefore, Government cause the liquor to be analysed by their Chemical Analyser they will be able to know what quality of liquor is manufactured at the distillery. The editor of the Gujarát Mitrá invites the attention of Messrs. White and Whitworth to complaints of this nature. If the shop-keepers are not willing to accede to the modified concession of a pint of liquor per gallon, why should not the contractor return to them the money deposited by them, and why should he insist upon their giving a resignation of the agreement in the terms dictated by him?

Does not understand why Mr. Gurshidápa should be at Dhárwár, where there is no work for him.

The Dhárwár Vritt (24) of the 6th September is sorry that Mr. Gurshidápa Virbasápa should still be at Dhárwár, where there is no work for him. The Collector is said to have reported that there was no work for him, and why should no notice have been taken of this report?

Does not approve of the discontinuance of the work of constructing dharmashálás at Pandharpur for the accommodation of pilgrims.

The Pandhari Vaibhav (48) of the 9th September says that the work of constructing dharmashálas, which the municipality of Pandharpur is said to have undertaken at the instance of Government for the accommodation of pilgrims at the annual fair, has been stopped all of a sudden and there appears to be no early prospect of its being resumed. The work is important and useful to the public, and it is improper either to put it off or to discontinue it altogether. Will the municipality awake to its duty after what we have said above?

Disapproves of the proposal made by Colonel Barton, Political Agent, Káthiáwár, for the abolition of the Judicial Assistant's Court.

The Indian Spectator (1) of the 9th September says:—The retiring Political Agent of Káthiáwár recommends the abolition of its only Judicial Court. We would not credit the worst enemy of the province with such a recommendation. The suggestion is said to be based on the ground that there is no work for the Judicial Assistant as Sessions Judge. This way of putting the thing is very misleading. We know from personal experience that there is enough work for the Judge and that he is willing to do it. The fact is that judicial decisions do not suit military political officers. The Political Assistants have therefore not only to perform their executive and administrative functions, for which they have barely time, but they are supposed to go through a large amount of judicial work likewise, which of course they cannot overtake. The result is a heap of arrears in every pránt and ruinous delays that are little short of a failure of justice. There are important suits still hanging fire, the parties to which have died or disappeared! There are cases which were taken in hand five or six years ago and not yet decided! Such a state of matters is not at all consistent with the spirit of British justice. These cases can be very well entrusted to the Judicial Assistant, for whom they are intended. But military political officers have their own ideas of justice, which judicially trained Civilians cannot defer to. Hence this movement to oust the Judicial Assistant. If such a thing happens, it will shake the confidence of suitors and bring the administration of justice into contempt. The Political Assistants have neither time nor the required training for the disposal of purely judicial business. The political officers are reported to have tried their utmost to reduce the responsible Sessions Judge of Káthiáwár to the position of a mere recorder or registrar. Foiled in this attempt it is no wonder that they now go out of their way to deprive the province of the officer whose presence is indispensable. The Government of Bombay has done much to keep Colonel Barton in countenance with the hapless princes and people. But we pray it may not listen to this iniquitous proposal. The result of removing the judicial officer from Káthiáwar will be at the best so much more work for the already over-burdened Political Assistants, who will leave these extra duties to their daftardárs and shirastedárs. And woe be to the suitors to whom these men have to dispense justice! We cannot bear to look at the suggestion without a sinking of heart. [The Vartamán Sár (120) of the 11th September expresses similar sentiments.]

A case of extorting confession by cruel means.

The Gujarát Mitr (76) of the 9th September, in a communicated article, reports the particulars of a case in which the patel of the village of Morchand in the Gogha Táluka of the Ahmedabad District is said to have attempted to extort confession from one of his female relatives in the matter of a theft in his own house. It is said that the patel caused some oil to be heated, asked the suspected party to take off some coins from within the oil, and said that if she was innocent she would not be hurt. The innocent woman put her hand into the oil and its skin was off! After some days when the wound was healed, the woman went to her father's house, and when interrogated by her brothers explained to them the circumstances under which her hand was burnt. The brothers are said to have taunted the poor woman for living such a disgraceful life, whereupon she is reported to have ended her existence by poisoning herself. If this report be true, the patel is guilty of a serious crime. If there was a theft in his house, why should he not have investigated the matter through Government, or taken other measures, instead of resorting to such a cruel deed?

A case of rape compounded by the faujdár of Gogha.

The same, in a communicated article, reports the circumstances of a case in which a girássia of the village of Morchand in the Gogha Táluka of the Ahmedabad District committed rape on a woman of the Khoja caste. It is said that the husband of the woman, on being informed by her of the full particulars of the case, reported it to the police patel and subsequently lodged a complaint before the faujdár of Gogha. The faujdár sent the woman to the Native medical officer of the station for examination, who kept her for two days and then allowed her to go. Thereupon, the husband of the woman says, the faujdár caused the offence to be compounded against the will of the complainant. The questions for consideration are as follow:—Had the faujdár any authority to act as he did? Had he authority to compound the offence? Why should he have advised, nay compelled, the complainant to accept a compromise? Had the woman been eight or ten years of age, her being sent to the doctor for examination would have been intelligible; but why should she have been sent to the doctor when she was a mother of four children? The woman had in the first place suffered disgrace by the rape committed on her, and the insult was aggravated by her being examined by a Native doctor. What may be the reason for keeping her for two days at the dispensary? It is very distressing that such injustice should be allowed to be perpetrated under the regime of the vigilant and just British Government. The offender in this case is said to have undergone imprisonment in the Ahmedabad jail for one year on account of his complicity in a fracas with certain tribes, and he is also known to be generally a suspicious character. When such a person is allowed to go scot-free after committing such serious offences, great outcry is raised by the people.

Points out the advisability of having a legal enactment for the protection of Hindu widows.

The Indian Spectator (1) of the 9th September quotes three recent cases of infanticide at Ahmedabad, and remarks:—Cases of infanticide are reported to us almost week after week from Gujarát, Káthiáwár, the Deccan and other parts. These are only instances that come to light in spite of the most careful attempts at secrecy. How many little ones may be drowned and buried out of sight we have not the heart even to guess. There must be some 50,000 high-caste widows in Gujarát living under their father's protection, each under the same roof that shelters father, uncle, brother and their wives, witnessing the joys and sorrows of social life but strictly forbidden to take part in the former, with their moral nature entirely neglected and exposed to the wiles of the vulpine Gorji and the voluptuous Máhárāj. What chance is there for these young women to resist temptation or suppress the force of instinct? It is all very well to talk of watch and guard. The high-caste Hindu in these parts is a philosophic dog. Caste is a helpless cripple in such cases, whatever its power over the widow and the advocates of her rights. The more we consider the subject, the more we are convinced that nothing short of legal protection afforded to the widow will prevent infanticide and other crimes. But the suggestion seems to be too much for a virtuous society and a humane paternal government. All that we can say is that society and Government are responsible for the deaths periodically reported by the police and also for the many more that are never reported. In the absence of a legal enactment, we do not know why some other arrangement may not be made. It was suggested some time ago that the widows of a district might be registered, and those suspected might be periodically examined by a respectable nurse or lady doctor. We do not like this proposal: it has some thing in it of the hateful Contagious Diseases Act. But it is certain that if some such plan were adopted, and if the betrayer of the widow were made to pay for the maintenance of the child, the social evil would be partly checked. Again the fear of having to be examined would drive half of the widows to contract honourable alliances. A Foundling House at Ahmedabad on the model of the Pandharpur House would be useful for Gujarát as well as Káthiáwár. We appeal to the Government of Bombay to do something for the most unfortunate class of its subjects, the Hindu widows and their off-spring.

Does not approve of the appointment of Mr. Lester to the post of Chief Clerk in the Presidency Magistrates' Courts.

The Gujaráti (95) of the 9th September says:—Has the Bombay Government any explanation to give of the injustice that has been done to Natives in the matter of the recent appointment to the post of Chief Clerk in the Presidency Magistrates' Courts? Mr. Barker, the permanent incumbent of the post, having gone on leave, an Eurasian by name Mr. Lester has been appointed to succeed him. Mr. Cooper having referred the matter to the High Court, the Judges, without considering the claims of Natives, informed him that the post should not be conferred on a Native. We do not wish to refer to the merits or demerits of Mr. Lester, who is a junior in the service, having served for about 6 or 7 years only. Messrs. Wáslekar and Jaykar have superior claims to the post. The former has to his credit a service of 30 years, while the latter once acted as a Presidency Magistrate. Why should not Natives be appointed to this post? Is the resolution passed by Lord Lytton in 1879 acted upon in this way? The policy of conferring good berths on Europeans to the exclusion of Natives is calculated to bring discredit on the Government of Bombay.

Increase in the number of gamblers at Ahmedabad.

The Hitechchhu (77) of Ahmedabad of the 13th September says that the number of gamblers has increased of late in the city and the suburbs. They are to be seen in large numbers in the camp, in the suburbs of Achárji, Vatva and Kákaria, Saraspur and Gomatipur, and on the Kocharb road. The Police Superintendent and his subordinates ought to be vigilant in apprehending them.

Does not approve of the despatch of the Ratnágiri post from Bombay by steamer for one day in a week.

The Satyá Shodhak (57) of the 9th September says:—The post for Ratnágiri for Thursday, the 6th September, was sent from Bombay by sea, but was carried to the south on account of the steamer not having touched at the port of Ratnágiri. If the steamer touches at Kárwár, the post would be sent back to Ratnágiri by runners and would thus reach the place later than if it was sent from Bombay by the usual land route. With the view of securing the uncertain advantage of an early arrival of the post at Ratnágiri by sending it by sea one day in a week, the authorities run the risk of delaying it as the steamer does not touch at Ratnágiri many times during the year. The postal authorities should therefore consider this matter and order the regular despatch of letters by the land route, heavy parcels, &c., being sent by sea. Such an arrangement is particularly necessary during the rainy season.

A postal complaint.

The Hitechchhu (77) of Ahmedabad of the 13th September says that the postal delivery peon of the Khádia section is so very slow that he is always seen delivering letters at about noon. This causes great inconvenience to the residents of that part of the city, for they cannot post their replies by the passenger train. It may be true that the peon has a large number of letters to distribute, but in that case an additional man should be employed. The post-master ought to attend to the matter.

Complains of the bad state of Government roads in the Southern Marátha Country.

A travelling correspondent of the Indian Spectator (1) of the 9th September writes:—Part of the road from Kolhápur to Sángli is very good, but part being under repair we had to take a country track miserably ill-kept. I am told it belongs to the British Government. If you want to see the Collector at the height of his autocratic obstructiveness, you cannot do better than run over the interior of the Southern Marátha Country. Roads under Native States are generally very well kept, but here and there you come across patches fearfully cut up belonging to the British Sarkár. These patches are a disgrace to the municipality concerned. No muram, no metal, on the best of them; and with the black soil, it takes nearly an hour in some places to go over a mile. They are called fair-weather roads, local funds or provincial funds roads, but to call them roads is a piece of nonsense. They are no better than a half-ploughed field. So notorious is the mismanagement that any particularly bad road in the Southern Marátha Country is called Sarkári. The authorities exact tolls and cesses. What they do with the money I cannot say; they probably divert it. They bully the Chiefs to attend to roads within their boundaries, but when the Chiefs and their Political Officers complain of their own neglect or mismanagement, they bring forward frivolous excuses, and in some cases actually compel a friendly Chief to make and repair roads with which he has no concern.

Complains of the bad state of the road from Surat to Ránder.

The Vartamán Sár (120) of the 11th September says that since the recent floods at Surat it has become difficult to walk over the road leading from the Hope Bridge to Ránder. As the road is situated very close to the banks of the river, a little rising of the water washes it away. At present the road has been washed away, and as there are big and deep pits in it which are full of water, it is very difficult to wade through them. As the road is under the supervision of the local funds committee, Mr. Lalubhái, Executive Engineer, ought to inspect it and have it speedily repaired. It would be better if a new road were constructed through the fields. The money spent on the repair of the present road would be wasted, considering that the road would be again washed away.

Complains of the bad state of the road from Surat to Katárgám.

The Suryá Prakásh (80) of the 8th September says that the road from the garden owned by the Honourable Mr. Nánábhái Haridás to Katárgám stands in great need of repair, and that the road exhales bad odours, which may give rise to cholera. Mr. White, the president of the local funds committee, ought to personally inspect the road and have it immediately repaired and cleaned.

Comments in connection with the new circular of the Government of India on the subject of publicity in legislation.

The Native Opinion (10) of the 9th September says:—A supplementary resolution appears in the last issue of the Gazette of India regarding publicity in legislation. The whole scheme is fairly drawn up as far as schemes, which must always depend for their success on the zeal and co-operation of subordinate Governments and officials, can be formulated. The resolution goes into the question very searchingly, and brings to the surface some defects which though apparently not very important in themselves are really serious in their effects. Indeed the general run of the vernacular translations of legislative measures will appear high-flown, even after making allowance for the difference of idiom and flexibility between the English and the vernacular languages. They not only show samples of bad taste which make them repugnant to the fine sense of scholars, but they at times are characterized by obsolete or far-fetched phrases which lift them considerably higher than the common reach of the understanding of the reading public. The neglect too of some local officers in ascertaining public opinion around them is justly called attention to. The idea of establishing a sort of legislative blue-book publication system is quite original, and is calculated to give a strong impetus to discussions of important public measures by the people at large. When this scheme begins to run smooth and becomes popular, it will serve as a great, though silent, engine in the political and administrative education of the people. The à priori dogma that every man knows the law must for ages to come remain a grand though a convenient delusion; and it is schemes like these which will help gradually to make this legal fiction less and less so. [The Indian Spectator (1) of the 9th September says:—It is indeed a boon to the press and the public that a Bill, or the proceedings of debates, or reports of select committees, covering 64 pages, can be bought for a rupee. In fact the rate is fixed so low as to bring the State papers on legislation within the reach of almost all educated men. It will not be in the power of our "patriots," "orators" and "agitators" to hereafter taunt the Imperial Government that it attempts to legislate in the dark. Thus a very practical step, and a most important one, has been taken for reforming subordinate matters connected with legislation. The Native press especially ought to be grateful for the boon granted to it. It is very satisfactory to observe that the Government of India has wisely determined to have Urdu or Hindustáni translations of all Bills apart from their translations into other vernacular languages. The importance of such a step is obvious. Hindustáni or Urdu is a sort of lingua franca in the country. Hence for permanent record nothing could be better than Hindustáni or Urdu translations of all Bills. Altogether the Government of India has fulfilled the promise it made last year to take all available steps to give the widest publicity to legislative measures and other papers connected therewith. The resolution is a fresh instance, if an instance is at all needed, of the Viceroy's earnestness and sincerity. He does what he says. Lord Ripon has worthily done his part. It now rests with the various local Governments to do theirs. We trust they will not be slow to do so. For it must be remembered that in many other matters Imperial resolutions and circulars have remained so many dead letters. A vigilant executive at the head-quarters can alone insist on the present steps being rigidly put into effect. We will only give the latest instance of the unwillingness of the local Government in the matter. The Pharmacy Bill was introduced into the Bombay Legislative Council last year. The Honourable Mr. Badrudin Tyebji urged that the Bill should be translated into the vernacular languages of the Presidency. So far as we are aware, that request, though acceded to by the executive a year ago, has not been practically granted. This is reprehensible. Hence any amount of vigilance that the Supreme Government can keep in this matter will not be lost. We believe the best way of keeping watch will be to demand from each local Government at the end of the official year its report on the steps which it may have taken in reference to all legislative measures that may have occupied it during the year. The report may be in a tabulated form embodying all the essential details that are now published in the circular letter. The Supreme Government will then be in a position to know how far each subordinate Government has carried out its instructions and to remind erring officials of what they owe to the public. The Vartamán Sár (120) of the 11th idem expresses sentiments similar to those of the Spectator, and remarks that the resolution is a proof of the anxiety felt for, and the trust placed in, the people by the representative of the Queen-Empress. The Mahrátta (2) of the 9th idem remarks:—It is yet time to see how the local Government intends to act in this matter. The proviso as to a newspaper's having established itself leaves much scope for patronage and selection. Cannot all newspapers be included? Most of them may be said to be established, as they are more than a year old. The rule may be made general and applicable to all newspapers alike. Several other vernacular papers express their approval of the orders recently issued by the Government of India regarding publicity in legislation, some of them suggesting that copies of Bills should be furnished to libraries and pasted in the principal places in towns and villages.]

Local Self-government.

A suggestion to the Bombay Government in connection with the Select Committee appointed to report upon the Local Self-government Bills.

The Native Opinion (10) of the 9th September says:—The Bombay Gazette recommends that, in order that the Select Committee appointed to report upon the Local Self-government Bills for this Presidency may have a clear insight into the management and working of local funds accounts, a revenue officer either in the person of a Revenue Commissioner or Collector may be appointed to assist the Select Committee in their work. The proposal may be useful so far as the working or management of the accounts is concerned, but we believe that the mere assistance of either of the officers recommended will not satisfy all needs. We think that in addition to what information the Collector may furnish, independent members of some of the leading local fund boards may be usefully examined before the Select Committee to enable the latter to form a proper estimate of the working of local fund boards under the present order of things, and to see what safeguards are necessary to completely secure the application of these funds to their proper purposes.

Comments on the speech delivered by the Honourable Mr. Peile on the occasion of the introduction of the Local Self-government Bills into the Bombay Legislative Council.

The Mahrátta (2) of the 9th September, in commenting on the Honourable Mr. Peile's speech on the occasion of the introduction of the Local Self-government Bills into the Bombay Legislative Council, remarks:—We honestly confess that though the policy which was inaugurated for securing the independence of local boards was changed in 1877 to one which seriously affected their independent vitality, yet this was not done with the least faulty motive. Though there was no change in the policy of Government so far as the administration of the Municipal Act was concerned, Section 7 of the District Municipal Act was allowed to remain a dead letter for full ten years. This in itself is enough to prove that if anything real and practical is to be done in the matter of giving a stimulus to local self-government, the law on the subject must not only be not permissive but it must even be imperative in certain matters. If the system of popular representation has to be introduced not so much as a matter of unavoidable necessity as that of sound statesmanly policy, the law ought not to leave this matter to the sweet will of the executive Government. The evil of combining in the body of the same persons the duties of the legislative and the executive here manifests itself. Howsoever proud Government may feel in having framed Bills that are elastic enough to provide for present necessities and future requirements, we confess we do not find in them anything that guarantees to us a progressive continuity. All legislation is intended for correcting present and checking future abuse, so that any piece of legislation that falls short of these objects does not come up to the proper standard. The present abuse to be checked being not so much of the legislative as that of the executive, it was necessary that the Bills should have definitely laid down principles which could have bound down the hands of the executive. If we are not much mistaken, Mr. Peile has not given us in his speech any explanation as to what guarantee the law gives us that the Bills will be enforced in the absence of Sir James Fergusson and Mr. Peile in the same manner as they will be in their presence. Sir James very justly remarked in the Council that he would rather leave the land as unpopular as man ever left these shores than sacrifice one point of principle, and we humbly ask His Excellency in return if he is not sacrificing the principle of all constitutional governments by leaving the whole substance of the scheme in the hands of the executive, who ought only to do what the law commands them. Mr. Peile has thus only confirmed the opinion that the Bills being only permissive in their nature do not meet the high expectations that were raised in civilized quarters respecting them. At the very outset Mr. Peile remarked that he was rather summing up the results of an exhaustive debate than preparing to explain the scope of and the reasons for new legislation. So far as the improvement of the executive function is concerned, we say that the more important works that are proposed to be left to the body will only involve them in financial difficulties, and the greater financial independence that is talked of is but a delusion. Mr. Peile appears to have been at some pains to make out a strong case in support of the provisions in the Bill about the appointment of presidents and vice-presidents. When Mr. Peile knew that he had non-official independent members like Messrs. Mandlik and Badrudin to fight against, he thought it safe to put the opinion of the Poona Sárvajanik Sabha against the expected opposition of the non-official members. Inasmuch as the Bills are essentially based on the September resolution of the Bombay Government, the opinions regarding them cannot be looked upon as having had their due share of importance given them. Had Mr. Peile really summed up the discussion that has been going on for the last few months, we are sure he could never have been put to the necessity of falling upon the "volunteered" letters of the Poona Sárvajanik Sabha. The entire Native press is against the opinion of Government regarding official presidents, and so are all right-thinking men. The Poona Sabha is evidently one of those on whom conviction operates slowly. Mr. Peile would have therefore done well if he had left the Sabha alone and followed the general current of public opinion. On the whole, Mr. Peile's speech sounds more like a justification than an explanation, and that portion of it which purports to be an explanation is not quite satisfactory.

Criticises the Bombay District Municipal Act Amendment Bill.

In criticising the Bombay District Municipal Act Amendment Bill, the Indu Prakásh (9) of the 10th September says:—Neither the total number of members of any municipal board nor the exact proportion between elective and official members is specified in the Bill. We think it desirable that the Legislature should once for all fix the number of members forming the boards,—should at least determine the maximum and minimum number, and not leave it to the discretion of the executive Government to make rules in each case as to what number shall compose a particular board. The Bombay Municipal Act fixes the total number and its components definitively. We think it ought not to be difficult to similarly fix the total number of members and the relative proportion of the elective and the nominative elements. If the divergence of population and intellectual condition of different places makes it impossible to fix the same number indiscriminately for all, we think Government must be in full possession of all requisite information in respect to all places to enable them to annex a schedule to the Bill specifying the number of members a particular municipal board shall consist of. In regard to the relative proportions of the two elements composing the boards, we think there ought to be no difficulty at all in fixing them definitely in the Bill itself. As it is, the Bill obscurely indicates the proportion by enacting that the elective members shall not be less than one-half of the whole number, exclusive of the president, and that not more than one-half of the nominated commissioners shall be salaried servants of Government. Further we think the old division into town and city municipalities may be usefully retained by giving to the city municipalities somewhat higher privileges than to the town municipalities. The schedule which ought to be annexed to the Bill should declare what places, by their political or commercial importance, by the number, enlightenment and public spirit of their population, deserve to rank as city municipalities. The city municipalities may not inappropriately consist of a larger number of elective members, say three-fourths or two-thirds of the whole, and may also have an elected president. We are aware of the importance of proceeding cautiously and tentatively, but we are persuaded to think that bestowing higher privileges on advanced cities like Poona or Ahmedabad is not likely to spoil the experiment of self-government. On the other hand, to treat all places with two thousand inhabitants and upwards as equally advanced, and to apply to them all one rule of fitness, is to ignore the actual present condition of different cities and to put an undue restraint upon their progress. Thus, while approving of the proportion of one-half between the elected and the nominated members in town municipalities, we should like to see such places as Poona designated city municipalities with the privilege of having elected members at three-fourths or two-thirds of the total number. Section 12 empowers Government to disenfranchise any municipality which may prove to be incompetent or apathetic. While admitting the necessity of such a power being vested in Government, we think it would be conducive to the success of the experiment of local self-government if Government first declared by means of a schedule what places were in their opinion backward and unfit for the elective franchise, instead of bestowing the franchise indiscriminately and then putting certain places to the indignity of surrendering the franchise. The qualifications of electors and members are also left by the Bill to be settled by the executive Government by rules and bye-laws, but such rules and bye-laws are rarely discussed by the public and the qualifications for the franchise are too important to be left to be decided by the fiat of the executive. It is difficult to definitely specify who shall be entitled to the franchise. The different tests qualifying for the franchise ought to be laid down. We have seen in our discussion of the Local Boards Bill that the only tests there laid down are the property and the office tests with no specific provision for intelligence and education. There is in the present Bill also a chance of the education and intelligence tests being overlooked if the determination is to be made by the executive Government.

Legislation.—The Native Magistrates' Jurisdiction Bill.

Highly disapproves of the reflections cast by the Honourable Mr. Rivers Thompson on the Native character in his minute on the Native Magistrates' Jurisdiction Bill.

The Yajdán Parast (123) of the 9th September observes that the Honourable Mr. Rivers Thompson, the Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal, has in his minute on the Native Magistrates' Jurisdiction Bill abused the natives of India and has cast reflections on their character. The political atmosphere of Calcutta has been contaminated by the mad ravings of some European fanatics, and it is no wonder if Mr. Thompson has caught the contagion. But it is much to be regretted that he has forgotten his high position and has set a bad example to other high officials. Hitherto Indian officials followed the discreet and sound policy of expressing their sentiments with due discretion and far-sightedness; but Mr. Thompson has overstepped the bounds of that policy and taken a course which does not become his high office. The Native press of Bengal will not deserve much blame if it retaliates and abuses the Lieutenant-Governor, who has taken the lead in this unpleasant matter.

Education.

Complains of the want of encouragement to Gujaráti literature from the Department of Public Instruction.

The Hitechchhu (77) of Ahmedabad of the 13th September complains of the want of encouragement to Gujaráti literature from the Department of Public Instruction. Gujarát is far behind Mahárashtra as regards education. There are many reasons for this backwardness. Gujarát is far removed from the Presidency town, and the ruling authorities are not well acquainted with the province. It is far removed from the sight of the Director of Public Instruction. Very few books are published in Gujaráti, as neither the public nor Government give due encouragement to literature in that language. From an examination of the accounts of the Government fund styled Encouragement to Literature Fund, which is in the hands of the Director, it will appear that Gujaráti authors receive less encouragement than others. It is unintelligible why a report of the administration of this fund is not published by the Director. Moreover Maráthi authors receive encouragement from the Dakshina Prize Fund, and there is no reason why Gujaráti authors should not receive aid from it. The people of Gujarát have an equal claim on this prize fund with the people of Mahárashtra. The Government of Sir James Fergusson ought not to allow this injustice to continue any longer.

Railways.

Hopes that no job will be allowed to be perpetrated in the purchase of the Eastern Bengal Railway.

With reference to the notice given by the Secretary of State for India of the intention of Government to purchase the Eastern Bengal Railway, the Bombay Chronicle (75) of the 9th September observes that it is to be hoped that when the purchase is completed the public will have the satisfaction of knowing that the interests of the Indian tax-payer have been properly protected. A job was allowed, perhaps inadvertently, to be perpetrated in favour of the East India Railway Company when its concern was taken over by Government, whereby that Company profited to the amount of some millions sterling at the expense of the Indian tax-payer; and it is to be hoped that a similar course will be avoided in the purchase of the Eastern Bengal Railway.

A complaint against the misconduct of some of the mofussil employés of the B. B. & C. I. Railway.

The Indian Spectator (1) of the 9th September says :—Rumours of a damaging character have reached us as to the misconduct of some of the mofussil employés of the B. B. & C. I. Railway Company, such as European servants calling upon Native subordinates for personal service, which no honest man can render, and visiting disobedience with petty persecution. This, if true, is highly discreditable. We trust the absence of that excellent officer, Mr. Duxbury, will not be turned to account in a manner to bring disgrace on our best managed Railway Company. Mr. Pendlebury must be approached by the aggrieved.

Suggestion to the Rájputána Railway authorities.

The Hitechchhu (77) of Ahmedabad of the 13th September says that a large number of Hindu pilgrims have left Ahmedabad for the Ambáji fair. They were packed like sheep in railway carriages. The railway authorities should take measures to prevent a crush at the booking office at Kharedi and Pálanpur on the return of the pilgrims, as was the case last year. [A correspondent of the Bombay Samáchár (86) of the 15th September also complains of the inconvenience caused to passengers by being overcrowded.]

A complaint against the station-master of Limbdi.

A correspondent of the Samsher Báhádur (111) of the 7th September says that a merchant of Limbdi presented a parcel to the station-master of Limbdi to be forwarded to a certain station. The station-master did not attend to his request and the parcel was not forwarded. The same parcel was again presented on the third day by a partner of the merchant, but the station-master said that he would forward it if its owner presented it at the station. The parcel was at last forwarded by the merchant through a passenger. The correspondent does not understand why notice of the arrival of goods at the station is not given to their owners, as is the case in other places, in order that the owners may not be under the necessity of paying demurrage charges. The railway authorities ought to attend to the matter.

Municipalities.

Comments on a recent case of defalcation in the Engineering Department of the Bombay Municipality.

In an article headed "Official Delinquency again," the Indian Spectator (1) of the 9th September says:—Both Messrs. Javerilál and Telang have done their duty well by insisting on the municipal executive furnishing a detailed report on each of the queries embodied in the notice of motion touching recent defalcations in the Engineering Department of the municipality. So strong is the tendency of the municipal officers, where their own neglect or carelessness is glaring, to avoid independent inquiry and to stifle discussion at a Corporation meeting by bringing friendly or other influences to bear on slavish members of the Corporation, that special care has to be taken by independent members that their inquiries may not prove abortive. We shall not anticipate the report now called for. But we may at least point out three facts. First, that the municipality have engaged the defalcating cashier, and that the officer in charge of the department placed implicit confidence in him. Had the authorities who first employed that person taken the ordinary care to ascertain his antecedents, as every business-man and merchant would do when employing a shroff, no such defalcation as is now discovered could have taken place. Second, that no substantial security, commensurate with the position he occupied and the stake he was entrusted with, was ever taken! What do these two facts point to? They simply point to the conclusion that men of doubtful character get into municipal service because officials are weak enough, or interested enough, to submit to the pressure brought to bear on them by influential members of the Town Council or Corporation. It is notorious that immense pressure was put upon the Municipal Commissioner last year by certain of our city fathers (city betrayers, rather) to engage the services of their friends and relations. Why should this be the case? Why not have open competition? But there is a third fact, and that not the least important. It might be remembered that we were the first to strenuously advocate the reconstruction of the Engineering Department after the unfortunate bungle of the Malabár Hill Reservoir. Mr. Grant, then Commissioner, publicly gave the last Corporation to understand that he would reorganize that department, open as it was to public suspicion. But he could do nothing of the kind, and soon after went on furlough. Mr. Ollivant was so absorbed in the early part of his municipal career in elaborating the Assessment Department, which now threatens to turn out a costly failure, that he allowed this reform to be thrust aside. And here is the result. Now what we say is that there was a grave dereliction of duty, both on the part of Mr. Ollivant and of the members of the Corporation, in not reorganizing the Engineering Department immediately after the reservoir controversy. The axe ought to have been laid at the rotten root of that department. Had that been done, the rate-payers would not have been robbed to-day of their monies to the extent of Rs. 15,000. When will responsible citizens do the duty which they are so anxious to undertake on behalf of the people?

Comments on the steam-roller nuisance at Bombay.

The Native Opinion (10) of the 9th September says:—Like the story of the lamb in Æsop's Fables, it being found that the steam-roller driver and his brethren could not be found fault with in respect of the unfortunate case of the late Dr. Cody, another charge in the shape of carelessness in the management of steam machinery has been laid at their doors. If the charge is well founded increased wages may supply more efficient and careful men, but it is unjust that the Native driver should be made the scape-goat of a mishap which our Town Council ought to bear in mind did not arise from his carelessness. We would suggest that in making a new arrangement the services of the steam-roller drivers already in the employ of the municipality should not summarily be dispensed with, but that they should be allowed time to show that they are not so inefficient as they are alleged to be. By the way, we might say that the working of steam-rollers after midnight and before sunrise would be a preferable arrangement, calculated to avoid accidents and save the municipality from additional expenditure in the name of efficiency. [The Indian Spectator (1) of the same date says:—It is certainly necessary to improve the working of steam-rollers in our streets. But we do not see why Rs. 50 a month cannot get an efficient driver, Native or European. The idea of closing up the street all day long where the roller is at work is antiquated. Why not work the engine late at night and very early in the morning? If this is impossible, a few men may be posted at principal corners leading to the locality under roller service to warn carriage drivers to take another road. The Dátardun (90) of the 13th idem expresses disapproval of the employment of European drivers on steam-rollers in the place of Natives.]

Recommends a thorough cleaning of the Dhobi Taláv quarter of Bombay in order to drive away cholera from that locality.

The Bombay Samáchár (86) of the 10th October observes that since the appearance of cholera in Bombay nearly half a dozen streets of the Dhobi Taláv quarter of the city have been suffering from the epidemic, which has of late gathered more strength. In several houses of this quarter more deaths than one have occurred from this disease. Whenever the Health Department is apprized of a death from the epidemic, cow-dung cakes, dammer and sulphur are burnt in the street for disinfecting the quarter; but that this is not enough for purposes of sanitation is evident from the fact that though the process has been frequently followed at Dhobi Taláv that quarter has not yet been freed from the epidemic. The Health Department ought to clean the street gutters, passages between houses, and other spots where dirt has accumulated, in order to drive away the epidemic completely.

Does not approve of the proposal to spend Rs. 50,000 for the reception of the Duke and the Duchess of Connaught.

The Gujaráti (95) of the 9th September regrets that it cannot support the proposal made by the Municipal Corporation of Bombay to spend Rs. 50,000 for according a fitting reception to their Royal Highnesses the Duke and Duchess of Connaught. The municipality had better meet other demands on its funds than waste such a large amount for this purpose. What advantages resulted to the country from the visits of royal princes on two former occasions? The Duke is coming not in the capacity of a ruler but in that of a servant, and an expenditure of Rs. 10,000 would be considerable. [The Rást Goftár (110) of the same date also does not approve of the expenditure of a sum of Rs. 50,000 for according a reception to the prince.]

Comments on the food supply of the city of Poona.

The Quarterly Journal of the Poona Sárvajanik Sabha (4) for the month of July, in continuation of its article on the subject of the new drainage scheme for the city of Poona, reported at pages 16 to 19 of the Report on Native Papers for the week ending 8th September 1883, says:—Before we conclude these remarks we deem it necessary to say a few words about our food supply. The grains, vegetables, &c., which we get in Poona are not as yet, in regard to their wholesomeness, subjected to that supervision at the hands of the municipality which the public health demands. Many articles are exposed for sale which are unfit for human consumption; the old and new grains are mixed and sold; bad and good grains are similarly sold together; old and diseased sheep, &c., are slaughtered for mutton; over-ripe and spoiled fruits are exposed for sale. The vegetables share the same fate. Though our food supply is not adulterated scientifically as is done in Europe, yet the flour sold in bazárs is rarely got pure; wheat flour is mixed with jowári flour, bájri flour is adulterated with jowári flour, and so on. We hope the municipality will in future look more carefully to our food supply. Without going into a detailed analysis of our articles of food, we shall only notice one fact which seems to have escaped general attention to the great detriment of our physique. Our lands which produce our food have been exhausted of the bone-and-flesh-forming materials by repeated croppings. We have been eating off the land all the organic and inorganic ingredients year after year without returning to the soil their adequate equivalents in some shape or other to preserve its fertility. In consequence of this neglect there has been a deterioration in the quality and a diminution in the quantity of the average yield of crops. The food we get does not contain sufficient phosphates—the bone-forming constituents of our body—and other nutritive materials. This is the true cause of our low physique, and as such it deserves the careful attention of everyone among us. There are various other causes, religious, social, commercial, &c., which are wearing away our constitution, but the chief cause is the want of phosphates and of other nutritive elements in our food. Look at our people. They are becoming small-boned, lean, diminutive, dispirited, and apathetic. Even those who use animal food do not fare better. The same causes account for the deteriorated physique of our cattle. In conclusion, we wish to press on the attention of the authorities the importance of the principle which underlies the maxim that "prevention is better than cure." Hitherto our attempts have been almost exclusively directed towards finding out specifics for the cure of diseases instead of preventing them. The best way is to prevent diseases as much as lies in our power. This consideration will not fail to direct general attention to the absolute necessity of improving the sanitation of our city.

Points out the necessity of constructing an iron railing at the stone bridge near Kumbhár Vesh in the city of Poona.

The Poona Vaibhav (49) of the 9th September reports the occurrence of the death by drowning of a passenger by the stone bridge near Kumbhár Vesh in the city of Poona, and requests the attention of the municipal commissioners of the city to the necessity of constructing a strong iron railing at least on one side of the bridge.

Does not approve of the municipality of Ahmedabad raising a loan of Rs. 50,000.

The Samsher Báhádur (111) of the 7th September does not see the necessity for the municipality of Ahmedabad to raise a loan of Rs. 50,000, and thus add to the existing burden on the people. The sub-committee appointed for the purpose advised the municipality to borrow Rs. 30,000 only; but the general committee resolved to borrow Rs. 50,000. This clearly shows that the amount to be raised is much more than is necessary. If the purchase of two houses by the municipality for the improvement of the new road were postponed for a time, a saving of Rs. 6,300 would be effected and then it would be necessary to borrow Rs. 24,000 only. The municipality can realize about Rs. 10,000 by the sale of the spare ground at its disposal. The sale of the two new municipal markets and of some of the municipal shops would enable the municipality to do away with the loan. It is to be hoped that the municipal commissioners will think over the matter and desist from increasing the burden of debt on the people. [The Hitechchhu (77) of Ahmedabad of the 13th idem expresses disapproval of the above suggestion and attributes it to interested motives.]

Native States.

Comments in connection with the attitude of His Highness Mahárája Holkar towards Christian missionaries in his territories.

The Indu Prakásh (9) of the 10th September says:—Those who are quite in raptures over His Highness the Holkar's jealous attitude towards Christian missionaries seem to us guilty of an inconsistency as strange as it is absurd. No doubt it is a fact that the Christian missionaries are not quite accurate in basing their "right" to preach in Native States on the Queen's Proclamation. That Proclamation applied only to British territories, and a Native prince cannot be affected by anything said or promised in it. But the "right" of the Christian missionaries depends on the principle that the Native States should walk in the footsteps of the paramount power. On what principle is it that the British Government often interferes with the internal government of Native States? Sometimes we hear of the prince of a Native State being directed, or, what amounts to the same thing, being asked, to select a certain protége of the paramount power as his Diwán. Much more does it stand to reason that the British Government should interfere when a prince excludes the followers of a particular religion from his territories. The attempt made by some of our contemporaries to show that the Mahárája Holkar is right seems most ludicrous—especially when we bear in mind that these very contemporaries are in other matters the foremost in talking about political independence, freedom of thought, and like jargon. It is the insane policy of praising the British Government for doing a thing and praising a Native State for not doing it that excites the contempt of sensible critics, and we at least would strongly object to being a party to such unprincipled journalism. [The Shiváji (61) of the 7th September, however, approves of the conduct of the Holkar in prohibiting Christian missionaries from preaching in his State.]

The effects of the resolution of the Government of India in the matter of the massacre of the Maiyás by the Junágad Darbár.

The Gujaráti (95) of the 9th September says:—The resolution of the Government of India regarding the massacre of the Maiyás by the Junágad Darbár has created great consternation among the Rájas and Ránas of Káthiáwár. Hitherto it was said that the princes were free to treat their subjects with great severity, but now they have been deprived of that power to the great advantage of their subjects. Several Kárbháris used to treat the people as slaves, but the recent orders of the Supreme Government will have a wholesome influence on them. Oppression has been rampant in two or three States, but the Kárbháris have now mended their ways. They fear that if they pursue their present course in a reckless manner, the cry of the people will be very loud, and in case the Supreme Government interferes affairs will not take a favourable turn. If such a feeling prevails generally, we have reason to hope that the complaints of the people of all States will cease, and the people ought to thank the Viceroy for the beneficial influence that his recent orders have had on the affairs in Káthiáwár. The authorities at Junágad have, however, been much humiliated by this resolution. The trouble taken by the Kárbháris in spending money on the employment of vakils, &c., for the purpose of having justice declared in their favour and representing their sinful acts to the world with a fair front has gone to nothing. We know that Mr. Sále Hindi has lost his reputation in this affair on account of his weak understanding, but we do not, like some of our brethren, recommend the cancellation of his C. I. E. Messrs. Mámal and Bápálál are solely to blame in this affair. Government and the future Diwán of Junágad ought to clear the State of all such intriguers. [The Gujarát Mitrá (76) of the same date is surprised that the late Diwán of Junágad has not yet been deprived of the title of C. I. E. That a man who has been disgraced with dismissal should be allowed to be a Companion of the Indian Empire is shameful not only to India but to Her Imperial Majesty the Queen. It is therefore necessary that he should be divested of the honour conferred on him at an early date. It is also necessary that the Diwán with his accomplices should be exiled from the State in order that they may not interfere with the work of the new Diwán by influencing the Nawáb, who has great confidence in Mr. Sále Hindi.]

Recommends the appointment of a commission to enquire into Rájpipla affairs.

The Indian Spectator (1) of the 9th September says:—Now that an inquiry is being officially made into the Darbár management of Rájpipla it may not be amiss to submit a few practical suggestions to the authorities. The Political Agent is undoubtedly the best person to conduct the investigation. But he is at a distance, with several duties to attend to. The complaints against the Darbár seem to be so many and so complex that the Political Agent cannot well look into them all without going to Nádod and giving up most of his other work for a time. There is besides the danger of the Rája and his men objecting at the last hour to an inquiry by the local officer as being prejudiced against them. The best plan therefore would be to appoint an independent commission of inquiry with Colonel West or Colonel Watson as president and at least three Native members. As first of these we would propose Mr. Mukundrái Manirái, who has a good deal of both political and judicial experience and who, if we mistake not, shortly retires from the service. Mr. Jagjiwandás Khusháldás or Mr. Barjorji Edalji Modi may also do very well, and as a revenue member we may name Mr. Virprasád. A revenue officer is indispensable. The commission might hold an open court and look into all the charges, hearing both sides, and then submit a report with suggestions for the future management of the State. But whatever the mode of inquiry, we trust the representation or explanation of the old Rájpipla Kámdárs will not be taken on trust. It is some of these men who have brought Rájpipla to its present state. They are not above suspicion. About ten years ago they were proved by the police, the magistrate and Government to have had complicity in the great Kulluum Dacoity case. The dacoits made away with property to the extent of Rs. 22,000 from Broach and were traced at Nádod. The Kárbháris shielded the thieves and the Rája may have shielded the Kárbháris. Police officers were kept at bay for three months. But at last Messrs. Cameron, Rámkrishna Dáji and Jehangirshah Táleyárkhán obtained conviction, and recovered the bulk of the stolen property. A part of the property was, however, swallowed by the Kárbháris, who for a long time denied all knowledge of it. And were it not for a determined Political Agent, Major Reeves we believe, who threatened the Ráj with confiscation, the property would never have been disgorged and the complicity of the Kárbháris never established. It is to be hoped that none of these men are now in Rájpipla's service. But there is no knowing who and how many work mischief in a Native State where the ruler himself has an elastic conscience.

Notes.—A. The notices from the different Newspapers have been collected in the Report under different heads, which are printed in italics.

B. The names of Newspapers are printed in the body of the Report in italics, and the number of the Newspaper in the above list is printed in brackets after the name.

C. The proprietors of the Newspapers marked * have not given information as to the number of copies issued. In these cases an estimate has been made by the Reporter.

D. The system of spelling vernacular words followed by the Reporter is the same as that adopted in the Official Spelling List of the Bombay Presidency. One peculiar feature of this system is that when the long a (आ or á) is the last letter of a word, the accent is left out, and the short a (अ = u in gun) is, to prevent confusion, never placed at the end of a word. This rule has been strictly followed, except that when the short a appears to be absolutely necessary to complete the pronunciation of a word, as in Arunodaya or the well known Mitra, it is printed with a mark over it to indicate that it is short, thus—ă.

E. Berár papers are received in this office for report under the Resolution of the Government of Bombay in the General Department, No. 1795, dated 8th June 1881.

Politics and the Public Administration.

Suggestions for making Indian Legislative Councils properly representative.

In an article headed "Our Legislative Councils," the Native Opinion (10) of the 16th September says:—In India the problem that is being constantly and gradually solved or at least attempted to be solved is how the Natives of the country can be stirred from their apathy, made to take interest in the affairs of their country, and associated in the work of administration with their foreign rulers. The condition of our country presents an historical aspect of not very frequent occurrence. Here you have a country inhabited by various tribes and races originally as distinct from each other as any two races inhabiting different portions of the globe in manners, customs, religion, and everything that goes to constitute a social unit. There are the aboriginal inhabitants now represented by tribes following a sort of fetish worship and dwelling in mountainous and jungly tracts. Then comes the Bráhmin Arya, as some say, hailing from the Caucasus with his Vedas and his pantheism, his castes and his ritual, all complete by themselves, presenting a novel civilization and a green energy as bold in thought as in arms. The rude and stern Mahomedan follows after the lapse of centuries and establishes himself over the stationary and crystallized civilization of his predecessors. This discordant mass further receives an accession to its confusion in the shape of the Pársi refugees and the Christian converts from outside, while from inside it divides itself into several religious and social sects. In this manner the homogeneous character of the population continued to be constantly disturbed with the constant addition to its number, and for a long time it presented to the outsider a confused and chaotic mass, every particle of which tried to curb the others and was in its turn operated upon in a similar manner by others. Originally rank distinctions and religious prejudices reigned supreme, and all the different components were at one time at daggers drawn with each other. But in the vast alembic of time this heterogeneous mass has so far molten down as to form a sort of mechanical compound. Yet through ages of jarring and war, while apparently the aspect presented a look of wild and hopeless confusion, the country has preserved a comparatively stable civilization which, though it could not move onwards, yet refused to go far backwards, and was too hard to be entirely broken by the tremendous blows that were dealt against it. It accomplished this by the help of a certain strength at the core which preserved the heart of the country as it were in a humble and obscure, but a tough cell. This peculiar trait in our civilization for a long time eluded the grasp of historians, who have now acknowledged the real value of our village communities. Go where you may, if you but look deep enough you will find a sort of municipal constitution more or less vital. From the Himálayas to Cape Comorin, there exists in every city and every village a sort of self-government to which the Western boroughs and free cities are mere children of yesterday. From ages past, from a time beyond any historical vista, our villages have been governing themselves. There are the executive and the legislative bodies; the police and the post in miniature are there; and every village presents a complete microcosm of administration. These institutions were so pliant yet enduring, and they showed so little vitality when there was a strong central government over the country, that they appeared almost defunct; but they rose proudly in all their native vigour in times of anarchy and confusion. Even in the best times when their energy lay dormant they supplied no mean place in the machinery of general administration. Here was the work for the practical politician and to this rock he could cling as to a thing pre-eminently firm. This was the only certain element while all else was transient. All plans for the solution of the great administrative and financial problems must be worked out from this beginning. There can be no doubt that India has for ages been accustomed to local self-government, and it is not now for the first time that she is about to enter on her novitiate of self-dependence under the ægis of the British rule. This fact has already been fished up and made use of by our political prophets like Sir Charles Trevelyan and by wise Viceroys like Lords Mayo, Northbrook and Ripon. The germ of local self-government which was existent in the country has been gradually fostered until it has arrived at its present stage of development. We are sure it cannot stop here, but has a great future before it. When the District and Táluka Boards begin to do business, they will assert their own position and can be utilized for purposes more important than the supervision of drains and roads. They can be made to supply us with a nucleus of our representative institutions which in the fullness of time may grow into so many district vigilance committees. Even if we were not yet fit for Parliamentary Government, yet we think we have arrived at a stage where a compromise between an absolute and a popular Government can be not only practicable but desirable. If England is to hold India and we earnestly wish that she may do so for a long time to come, England must either raise us or she must fall down to our level. A free country like England cannot in her own interest afford to allow us to be governed in an autocratic fashion. The present administration of India is best calculated to rear up a large and influential body of persons imbued with despotic principles. From a comparatively early age our administrators became habituated to be irresponsible and autocratic. However well-intentioned they may be from their peculiar position in this country, their opinion of their own wisdom becomes superlatively inflated, and their contempt for popular voice increases in the same proportion. Such a race of men can have no great respect for the constitution of a country where the voice of the voter is the be-all and the end-all of the administration. We are sure that with the increasing strength of such a body the danger, though a very distant one, to the English constitution itself also increases. The truth of this matter can even now be perceived though very faintly. As a class the retired Anglo-Indians find themselves completely estranged from their country. They cease to appreciate the bracing effects of popular discussion, and in fact find themselves surrounded by institutions which they find completely foreign to their nature. This is a great evil, and we think that England must guard herself against it. The chances of Anglo-Indian opinion misleading the British nation are indeed not very great or near; but it is wise statesmanship to nip in the bud what may in time prove obnoxious. To this end it is desirable that English officers while in India should not be allowed to forget deference to the popular voice. Some sorts of representative institutions must be maintained to which they would have at times to submit. If the principle of local self-government as at present working in our country be extended a little, all the requirements of this many-sided problem could be worked out. The District and Táluka Boards might be raised into constituencies for sending members to the local legislature, which in their turn might return members to the Supreme Council. Thus a wholesome system of popular representation might gradually be introduced into the administration. These Presidency and District Councils might be further invested with certain powers over and above those of legislating and they might be allowed to keep a supervising eye over the doings of the executive. We might then have an executive from the Governor to the lowest public servant side by side with vigilance and consultative committees at Presidency-towns to the humblest village communities. The decentralization principle might be worked more literally by entrusting these bodies with a certain power over the finances of their respective divisions of the country. We have already said that the principle of local self-government cannot stop where it is at present. The principle would force itself upwards notwithstanding any opposition that it might encounter. But it is possible that its beneficent effects would be considerably modified if it be not properly directed and developed. That we must have representative councils admits of no dispute, and our worthy Viceroy has already made a beginning in that direction by the selection of the Honourable Kristodás Pál as a member of the Supreme Council. Such a development of this principle is not only imperative, but its success or otherwise involves great issues not only with regard to this country but to England herself. When such institutions as these spread wide over the country, England and India will advance to a glorious future in a happy partnership of mutual benefit, and England will not only have earned our gratitude, but will stand foremost among the nations of the world as the greatest and the most generous of them. [The Bombay Chronicle (75) of the 16th September and the Arunodayá (14) of the same date also point out the necessity of making the Indian Legislative Councils properly representative in their character].

The Panchánanā (47) of the 16th September says:—The views recently expressed by the Government of India on the question of making concessions in duty in the case of salt required for cattle and tree-culture excite laughter and give an insight into the evil-mindedness of the authorities. If Government have an earnest desire to make salt available for cattle and trees it is really unintelligible why it should be considered advisable to make arrangements to reduce salt by chemical processes to a state in which, while being useful for cattle and trees, it may be useless for human consumption. The desired object would be gained by placing salt within the easy reach of all classes. Chemists in Bengal and the Panjáb are said to have tried in vain to invent a process of the nature required by Government, and it is but proper that it should be so. It is necessary that salt should be made unmerchantable without a deterioration in its quality. The economy of Providence, however, does not make distinctions between salt used for human food and that used for cattle and trees, and it is well that man should follow the example of its kindness.

Does not approve of the intention of the Government of India to make concessions in duty in the case of salt required for cattle and trees by making it useless for human consumption.

The Hitechchhu (77) of Ahmedabad of the 20th September expresses approval of the Resolution of the Government of India regarding the abolition of Government Book Depôts, and remarks that this measure will prove advantageous to the public as well as to the proprietors of printing presses. The Bombay Government ought speedily to put a stop to the expenditure on its book depôts and sell off at cost price the books now in hand. The Hitechchhu hears that the Director of Public Instruction is opposed to the measure and that he has written a minute against it. If this be a fact, then it is a matter for great regret. It is to be hoped, however, that the Director's objections will not be taken into consideration and that no delay will occur in carrying out this useful measure.

Approves of the Resolution of the Government of India regarding the abolition of Government Book Depôts.

A correspondent of the Satyá Shodhak (57) of the 16th September says:—Recently Government have exempted from stamp duty copies of Government documents in Civil and Criminal cases required by private persons. This exemption has evidently proved very beneficial to the public at large. The public, however, have as frequent recourse to the Revenue Courts as to the Civil and Criminal ones; but as these orders are not made applicable to the former, they find it very expensive to secure copies of documents in revenue matters. Government ought to provide for the convenience of people in this as they have already done in the other respects, and they can do it without prejudice to their interests.

Requests Government to exempt from stamp duty copies of Government documents in revenue matters required by private persons.

The Bakul (16) of the 16th September observes that in its issue of the 19th August it stated that it had learnt from a private letter that the people of several villages in the Dápoli and Khed Tálukas of the Ratnágiri District were starving. The Collector of Ratnágiri has called upon the Bakul to declare the source of this information; and it may be stated in reply that the paragraph giving the news furnishes the source from which it was received. The Collector should have ascertained the truth of the information either personally or through one of his Assistants. Eighty residents of the villages of Kumbhár, Humbra and others in the Khed Táluka robbed some grain and were punished with imprisonment. This fact shows the condition of the people of that part of the district. That these eighty residents are not professional thieves and that some of them are respectable persons, proves that they must have then suffered from starvation. The Assistant Collector who is moving in these tálukas will corroborate the statement made in the Bakul if he is asked to state what the condition of the poor people is, what they eat and whether they get sufficient to eat. Even in the villages that are not visited by locusts the poor people do not get any food on the days on which they find no work.

A reply to a requisition from the Collector of Ratnágiri calling upon the Bakul to give the grounds for the statement contained in its issue of the 19th August that the residents of several villages in the Dápoli and Khed Tálukas were starving.

The Jáme Jamshed (99) of the 19th September observes that it is now the turn of a European to get the shrievalty of Bombay for the coming year, and there is not a more deserving person than Mr. Wordsworth, the Principal of the Elphinstone College, who should get this lucrative office. Mr. Wordsworth is a real friend and well-wisher of India. He has been taking a conspicuous part in public questions and has rendered valuable services to natives as well as to the ruling race. He has acquitted himself most laudably in the part he took in the discussions on the Native Magistrates' Jurisdiction Bill. He has shown great earnestness and soundness of judgment in imparting education to his students. Sir James Fergusson ought to confer on him the shrievalty for the coming year, and his selection will give universal satisfaction.

Recommends that Mr. Wordsworth, the Principal of the Elphinstone College, may be made Sheriff of Bombay for the coming year.

The Yajdán Parast (123) of the 16th September observes that this year the public banks in Bombay closed their business for four and a half days on account of the Pársi holiday of Pateti. They closed their offices after working for half the day on Saturday, and they suspended business on the following Monday, Tuesday and Wednesday. Thus the closing of business consecutively for four and a half days must have proved inconvenient to the mercantile community, particularly when the English Mail left on Tuesday and there was a probability of the Mail from England arriving on the following Wednesday. In closing business for holidays the Managers and Agents of banks look more to their own convenience than to the interests of merchants. This system is likely to cause temporary loss to some merchants, and it is therefore desirable that the banks should be checked in their predilection for long holidays.

Does not approve of the long holidays enjoyed by the banks in Bombay.

The Indian Spectator (1) of the 16th September says:—A respectable correspondent confirms the rumour that the retiring Political Agent of Káthiáwár will remain in the province for some time to initiate his successor into his own policy, that in fact Colonel Barton is pressed to do so. This is grievous. Perhaps Colonel West's chief recommendation is that he is new to the province. What is the value of his appointment if he is to be educated by his predecessor before he can act for himself? Where is the justification then for Colonel Watson's supersession? In our opinion the very fact of Colonel Barton remaining in Káthiáwár a week after making over charge will have a mischievous effect. To the Káthiáwári there is no difference between what is and what seems to be. The arrangement hinted at is likely to put the new officer in a false position, and to mar the beginning of what we hope may be better times for Káthiáwár.

Says that Colonel Barton ought not to be permitted to remain in Káthiáwár after he makes over charge of his appointment.

A correspondent of the Satyá Shodhak (57) of the 16th September says:—Hitherto the establishment of the Superintendent of Revenue Survey at Ratnágiri used to receive batta while on tour according to the scale applicable to the establishments of Collectors. Recently, however, a lower scale varying from 2 annas for a salary of Rs. 15 to 10 annas for a salary of Rs. 100, has been adopted. It is not known on what authority this lower scale has been laid down by the Survey Commissioner. The establishment of the Ratnágiri Superintendent has generally to perform an extensive tour, and officers on low salaries are obliged to incur debts in addition to the allowances received by them to meet their expenses. In the same manner the Survey Commissioner does not sanction the grant of double the rates of railway fares, while no batta is allowed for the days of actual travel by railway or steamer. It is very strange that while the orders of Government are adhered to in this latter instance they are ignored in fixing the scales of batta. The aggrieved parties submitted a representation to the Survey Commissioner, who is said to have replied by saying that as the members of the Superintendent's establishment were allowed high salaries they would not get batta according to the prescribed scale. What an injustice is this? The new Civil Travelling Allowance Code nowhere lays down the above-mentioned scale as regulating the grant of batta to the employés of the Survey Department. Why then does the Survey Commissioner evince such obstinacy?

Says that the establishment of the Superintendent of Revenue Survey at Ratnágiri is allowed batta at lower rates than hitherto.

Recommends that the District Judge's Court proposed to be located at Sholápur should be posted at Bijápur.

The Dnyán Bodhak (25) of the 16th September dwells on the inconveniences that are likely to be experienced by the public on account of the contemplated establishment of a District Judge's Court at Sholápur having jurisdiction over the districts of Kaládgi and Sholápur, and suggests the advisability of making Bijápur the judicial head-quarter station for the two districts. Even when a Senior Assistant Judge is stationed at Kaládgi, as at present, the people in the Southern portions of the district have to travel over a distance of from 90 to 100 miles; and when the Judicial Court is transferred to Sholápur there will be no end of the miseries of the people of the Kaládgi District. To reach Sholápur they will have to cross 6 rivers and to travel over a distance of from 200 to 250 miles. If the Bombay Government had taken thought of the annoyance that would be caused to these people for the sake of the comforts and conveniences of the traders and bankers of Sholápur they would not have recommended to the Government of India the location of the Judicial Court at the latter station.

Recommends that the First Class Subordinate Judge's Court at Násik should not be transferred to Thána temporarily.

The Suryodayá (65) of the 17th September is thankful to the Government of Bombay for recommending to the Government of India the appointment of a First Class Subordinate Judge at Thána, but observes that there is no need of transferring the Court of the First Class Subordinate Judge from Násik to Thána until the recommendation is sanctioned. The writer then points out the inconveniences which would arise to suitors and pleaders from the immediate transfer of the Násik Subordinate Judge to Thána.

Government should repair the tank situated between the villages of Dhámápur and Kálsa in the Ratnágiri District.

A correspondent of the Bakul (16) of the 16th September states that the large tank between the villages of Dhámápur and Kálsa in the Málvan Táluka of the Ratnágiri District enabled the villagers to raise garden crops. The tank has, however, fallen into disrepair and the villagers some time ago prayed Government to repair it, but nothing has been done in the matter beyond certain enquiries. This year the dam of the tank has given way and consequently the tank does not contain water sufficient to enable the villagers to raise garden crops, and they will therefore experience much inconvenience in paying the heavy land revenue assessment. Government ought to repair the dam at once.

Expresses satisfaction at the exemption of Surat from the punitive Police.

The Gujarát Mitrá (76) of the 16th September says that it is a matter for congratulation that the city of Surat has been freed by Government from the punitive Police imposed upon it for some time past. The people of Surat should now take a lesson from the incident that led to the imposition of the punitive Police and desist from unruly conduct under any circumstances. Government generally strive to protect the interests of the people. Whenever any differences arise between the people and Government it is the officers who are unacquainted with the requirements and opinions of the people that are to blame and not Government. To the rayats the officers of Government are everything, and therefore they blame Government for the acts of their officers. But they should not do so. If they are dissatisfied with the particular acts of the officials they should take legal measures to obtain redress. They may appeal to Government, submit petitions to them, and place their grievances before them. But they should not join the unruly in their riotous conduct.

Complains of the oppression exercised by the Police in a recent case of affray between certain officers of the Bombay Police and certain Boráh merchants of Nal Bázár.

The Káside Mumbai (103) of the 21st September in referring to the acquittal of certain Boráhs who were charged before Mr. Dosábhái Frámji, Second Presidency Magistrate, with obstructing certain Police officers in the discharge of their duty at Nal Bázár, observes that the remark made by Mr. Dosábhái, that the testimony of Mr. Superintendent Brewin was not worthy of belief, was very surprising. Sir Frank Souter ought to attend to this matter, for it is not a trifling circumstance that the Police should thus oppress the people, and beat, pinion and prosecute them with the evil intention of getting them punished. It is the duty of the Police to look after the safety of the life and property of the people, but when they thus annoy them instead, it is necessary that the Commissioner of Police should take some stringent measures to remedy the evil. This case ought to assure him that some Police officers do harass the people. He ought personally to enquire into the matter and punish the delinquents. As stated by Mr. Brown, the Solicitor for the defence, all public roads are the property of the Municipality, and the Police have no authority to harass, as they at present do, the shopkeepers by throwing off their curtains, &c.

Complains that the Pársis of Bombay gamble with money on their Pateti holidays.

The Yajdán Parast (123) of the 16th September severely censures the Pársis of Bombay for gambling with money on the Pateti holidays, and requests the Commissioner of Police to adopt measures for the apprehension of the gamblers. This evil practice is of a long standing and ought to be suppressed with a strong hand.

Complains that some European lads kill birds in the native quarters of the town of Bombay.

A correspondent of the Kaiser-i-Hind (102) of the 16th September complains that for the last four months some European lads have been visiting the native quarters of the town of Bombay and killing the birds which are found sitting on the tops of houses. This conduct of theirs hurts the feelings of the native residents, and particularly the Hindus. Sometimes these lads break the window panes when they miss their aim. It is feared that one of these days a row between these lads and the natives will ensue. The Police ought to prohibit the boys from amusing themselves with this cruel pastime.

Brings to notice a case of dereliction of duty on the part of the Police of Dhulia.

The Khándesh Vaibhav (36) of the 14th September gives the particulars of a case of dereliction of duty on the part of the Police establishment on the chief Police Station on the Agra Road at Dhulia, in which a woman complained that a relation of hers was being severely beaten by a drunkard and sought the protection of the Police, who, however, turned a deaf ear to all her representations, and requests the attention of the proper authorities to the matter.

A complaint against the Faujdár of Dholka.

A correspondent of the Hitechchhu (77) of Ahmedabad of the 20th September says that on the occasion of the visit of a Shankarácharya Mahárájon the 7th idem to the Faujdár of Dholka, Mr. Kálidásbhái, the Secretary of the local Municipality, went in person to the Mahárájʼs residence with a musical band and with the entire Police force in full dress to invite him. The procession formed was very pompous. The local Police in full dress, mounted and pedestrian, also formed part of the procession. Government will know from this what power Police officers exercise in the districts.

Complains that gambling is carried on at Bulsár and Poona in the name of lotteries.

A correspondent of the Gujarát Mitra (76) of the 16th September writing from Bulsár says:—For many years past about a dozen shopkeepers in the bázár have been carrying on gambling in the name of lotteries. This occupation suits them so well that they remove from their shops all the usual articles of merchandize and convert their shops into lottery-houses. They resort to various tricks for inveigling young boys who steal things from their houses to satisfy the demands of the lottery-house. This generally takes place before the Diváli holidays and that time is now drawing nigh. If the new Faujdár stops such gambling and punishes the keepers of such shops he will have done an act calculated to do good to the growing boys of the town. The writer also reports that cholera is raging in the town of Bulsár. [The Dnyán Prakásh (8) of the 17th September is informed that some shops have been opened in Ganesh Peth in the city of Poona for purposes which are akin to those of lotteries and raffles. It is said that certain articles such as knives, scissors, &c., are exposed on tables, and these articles are given to those who throw a ring round them. Many people miss their aims and thus several poor people are ruined. It is to be hoped that the Police will institute an enquiry into the matter and take proper measures to check the evil.]

Necessity of opening a Branch Post Office in the Baroda City.

A correspondent of the Ahmedabad Samáchár (81) of the 19th September says that it is necessary that a Branch Post Office should be opened in the Baroda City as people find it very inconvenient to carry on money-transaction with the head Post Office.

Local Self-government.

Points out the necessity of placing more funds at the disposal of local Boards than at present contemplated.

The Mahrátta (2) of the 16th September, in an article headed "A financial view of the Local Funds Bill: Táluka Boards—Bodies in name only" observes:—In our article reviewing the speech of the Honourable Mr. Peile we have remarked that the more important works that are proposed to be transferred to local bodies will only involve them in financial difficulties. Special consideration of this subject has therefore become necessary, and we agree with our contemporary of the Bombay Gazette when it says that the financial position of Local Fund Boards has not received from the public and the press the consideration it deserves. Sections 42 to 47 set forth the sources of Local Fund revenue, its division between the Táluka and District Boards, and also the Municipalities and Cantonment Committees, the assignment of funds for educational purposes, and the division of responsibility in regard to matters other than educational between the Táluka and District Boards. Now it appears that Local Funds are to be applied to the construction and repairs of public works, such as roads, wells, tanks, trees, dharmashálas, dispensaries, markets, water-works, &c., and to educational purposes such as the provision of suitable accommodation for public schools and the development and extension of education generally. The actual receipts for public works in 1880-81 were about 23 lákhs of rupees, and for educational purposes about 11½ lákhs of rupees, so that Local Boards will have control over the expenditure of between 34 and 35 lákhs of rupees every year. This sum will be administered by about 23 District and 194 Táluka Boards. The District Boards will have solely at their disposal a sum of about 15⅓ lákhs of rupees, and the Táluka Boards about 7⅔ lákhs, out of the public works portion of the revenue. The Educational Fund remains with the District Boards so that, roughly speaking, each Táluka Board will have the power of spending every year on an average a sum of rupees four thousand, that is, will be able to maintain 24 coolies at the rate of rupees seven per month, if half of this be allowed for materials!!! Does His Excellency Sir James Fergusson really think that the cream of the Táluka society's intelligence is unable to make proper use of such paltry sums, and that the introduction of the "bludgeon clauses" is justifiable under the circumstances? The writer here tries by means of figures to give an approximately correct view of the case for each District and Division based on the receipts of the public works portion of the funds for the year 1880-81, and proceeds to remark as follows:—If the facts thus stated even approach the truth, the trouble will not be worth the candle. The formation of villages into groups, the preparation of voters' lists, the process of election, the formality of budgets, accounts and audit, and the control clauses, will more than counterbalance the real benefit to be derived from empowering the august assemblies of 16 or 20 members to spend Rs. 3,000 to Rs. 5,000 during the course of 365 days. The whole proceeding will be a sham. If the Government of Bombay is anxious to invest the Táluka Boards with some powers of doing good to the community they represent, we are convinced that they must be given more money than at present contemplated. The revenues of the district must be divided so as to give at least half of the money collected to the Táluka Boards. As proposed in the Bill the work of the Boards in the department of education will be a sham and a financial embarrassment. As at present framed, the Bill makes the District Boards paymasters of the bills preferred against them by the Educational Department, which will look to every thing educational except the maintenance of some public school-buildings. This function does not call into requisition the superior intelligence of the District Boards. We present this financial view of the Local Boards Bill to the honourable members of the Select Committee appointed to report on the Local Self-government Bills and to all public associations in the hope that the defect pointed out will be remedied so as to leave no cause for complaint to the people.

Suggests the insertion of a section in the Local Boards Bill for the improvement of the sanitary condition of villages having no Municipalities.

In an article headed "The Local Boards Bill," the Military Instructor (137) of the 15th September says:—We have to urge, and we may say we cannot do it too strongly, certain suggestions about the conservancy clauses. Government take special care of the health of the army, both European and Native, and spend inconceivably large sums on securing means for the preservation of good health in military stations. But this large expenditure has not yet produced sufficiently good results, the only impediment being the defective sanitation of Indian villages. Cantonment Bázárs too have no small influence on the health of military stations. Cantonment Committees are being established in different localities; and the places where such Committees have been working for the last few years show satisfactory progress. But Indian villages have not yet improved, and unless some special provision is made in the new Bills, we have little hope of any improvement in that quarter. At page 106 of Volume 10 of the Report on Sanitary Measures in India, Surgeon-Major T. G. Hewlett says:—"The sanitary condition of the towns and villages in this Presidency is, and must be for many years to come I fear, in an unsatisfactory state. In those villages where the Bombay District Municipal Act is in force there are more or less successful attempts made to carry out the sanitary provisions of the Act, but in the whole Presidency there are only 10 City and 170 Town Municipalities where the Act has been brought into operation. I am of opinion, as at present it is impossible to raise money for the execution of sanitary works in any other way, that it would be desirable to extend its provisions so as to include places further apart from each other than one mile, and containing a smaller population than 2,000, which is the number now required to live within a district before it can be constituted a Municipality; or I would suggest that a third kind of Municipality, namely a Village Circle Municipality, should be constituted, which might embrace a certain number of neighbouring villages, for the cleansing of which there might be a peripatetic establishment which could visit and clean in succession each village within its limits." In framing the new Municipal Bill this suggestion has escaped the attention of Government. During the last year fourteen Municipalities were raised to the status of City Municipalities, so that Chapter V. of the District Municipal Act will now be in force in no less than 24 towns. The new Bills provide that villages which contain a population of two thousand and upwards shall have Municipalities; but what about the conservancy of villages that have populations below that minimum? According to the latest information 7,067 villages have a population below 200; 8,534 have a population between 200 and 500; there are 5,471 which have no more than 1,000 inhabitants; while there are 2,464 which reach the minimum standard. Thus there will be 23,536 villages which will not be affected by the provisions of the new Bills regarding sanitation. We think the suggestion of Surgeon-Major Hewlett should be accepted and a section inserted in the Bill providing that these twenty-three thousand villages shall be grouped in circles and the different circles superintended by a peripatetic establishment. The Local Boards Bill makes provision for the grouping together of villages, but this is for other than Municipal purposes; we therefore urge that this grouping system should also be followed in municipal matters. If we scrutinize the number of patients suffering from several diseases and if we make an attempt at tracing their source we shall invariably find that nearly 60 per cent. of the diseases can be traced to the defective sanitation of villages. We request the Sanitary Commissioner to urge this peripatetic system on the notice of the Select Committee appointed to report upon the Local Self-Government Bills.

Legislation.—The Native Magistrates' Jurisdiction Bill.

Approves of a compromise being effected in the matter of the Native Magistrates' Jurisdiction Bill.

The Mahrátta (2) of the 16th September, in noticing the Blue Book published by the Government of India embodying the opinions of officers and others on the subject of the Native Magistrates' Jurisdiction Bill, remarks:—The opinions for and against the Bill have been published; the opposition has had its full say on the subject; the arbiters of our destinies have also told us what their views on the subject are; and lastly the best of our well-wishers have given us their advice. Lord Ripon may be inclined to pass the Bill as it stands for aught we know, and the Government at home too may uphold the action of its representative. Thus the action of one party is probably already determined upon; the only question for the present with us natives is what shall we do in the matter, knowing as we do what the opinion of a majority of the officials about us is; shall we or shall we not yet press the Government of Lord Ripon to pass the Bill as it stands? Shall we be frightened by the array made against us and give up our claims to an equality of rights with Europeans, notwithstanding the fact that we are admittedly their fellow-subjects? Are these the only courses left open to us, or is there any safer and a better course which we may follow with advantage? Howsoever radical our opinions may be in certain matters connected with the administration of this country, and howsoever enthusiastic we may have been or may be in asking for privileges, we have at least one and the best consolation that we have never fought for any right on the ground of expediency. We hold that privileges are taken and never granted, and it is this golden rule that has been our guiding principle; and in the present controversy too we have never forsaken an iota of that principle. We have always been, and we are proud to say we even now are, for a compromise; but in suggesting a compromise we have always said that we do not much care if the Bill is or is not extended to a certain class of Native Magistrates, provided the difference observed on account of a mere matter of accident is done away with. We can full well understand that if the powers of trying a criminal for an offence involving the question of life and death should fall into the hands of a half-educated judge, whether native or European, justice would be at stake; but certainly we are not prepared 'to learn all from one' as a Latin proverb says. When once appointed, a judge is a judge and a magistrate a magistrate, irrespective of his caste or creed; it therefore does not stand to sense that because an individual happens to be a Presidency Magistrate, he can exercise jurisdiction over European British subjects, whereas if he happens to be in a mofussil town he cannot. Justice is justice, and we are glad even the strongest opponents of the Bill have not allowed themselves to be blinded to it. They, at any rate most of them, agree in thinking that the native Civilian who has entered the service by competition can by no means be said to be inferior to his brother European. This was what we fought for. Let Sessions Judges or District Magistrates get the powers, and let Deputy Collectors and Magistrates be excluded. It is not a matter of great importance. These will be excluded because Government think it proper that certain powers should not belong to a class of Magistrates below a particular status. If we desire that these two should have the power, we shall fight again for it when the time comes. Thus then we are content to have the Bill in that form or even in any other form so long as the principle of it remains untouched; in short what we mean is, it is ours to fight for and get the principle settled; it is for Government to work up details. As is too well-known, Lord Ripon commands the highest confidence of the party now in power in England, and if he should insist upon passing the Bill as it stands he may most likely carry the day too. But we do not like to counsel the adoption of this course; for as a party question it may be the highest triumph, but such a course is calculated to do us little good. Our fellow-subjects in India, the Europeans, do not like such a course, and in their interests we should like to yield; for the different opinions published have shown that for some cause or other a misunderstanding has taken complete possession of their minds which, if the Bill were passed, will only become stronger,—a circumstance which will be fatal to the growth of British Liberal Policy. We do not wish to make enemies of a class that has done us some good and has given us a good deal of political education. The next question is, shall we be frightened into a desertion of our cause? We most emphatically answer 'no;' it shall not be. What is the principal objection urged against natives? It is that morally natives have not yet sufficiently advanced. Let us make the best of this argument and urge upon Government the extreme necessity of giving a stimulus to higher education. The other argument flung at us is that the number of native Civilians is yet very small, and the Bill therefore is not called for. Let us try to alter the circumstances, let us fight out the Civil Service question and get the limit of age raised and ask for examinations in India, so that in a few years the number of Native Civilians entering by competition will increase and the argument now launched against us defeated. The agitators against the Bill have only done us great good by forcing upon our notice our weaknesses; so that it will be folly on our part not to profit by the sound, though a little severe, lecture that is read to us. The Jurisdiction Bill was evidently a test question, and it is no matter for surprise that it has been so hotly discussed. The fate of this Bill is to be an epoch in the administration of this country,—an epoch from which a new leaf will be turned in that administration. We are of opinion that it would be unsound policy to pass the Bill whole and entire, for that would, under present circumstances, amount to bringing about a revolution which the Government of Lord Ripon never thought of. His Government is only for reform and not for revolution, as the Viceroy has most distinctly told us in the several resolutions he has passed and the speeches he has made. The characteristic feature of this Government is that it wishes to correct abuses and set matters right with the most laudable object of consolidating the foundations of the British Empire in India. One objection raised by the opponents of the Bill is that in the mofussil-towns the check of public opinion is not so strong as it is in the Presidency-towns. This objection is true to a certain extent. Nothing therefore can be more prudent than to limit the scope of the Bill to such towns only as are sufficiently advanced and where public opinion is felt to be a power. Such towns are zilla-towns, and it is but proper that the provisions of the Bill should extend to District Magistrates and Sessions Judges. The several resolutions which have been from time to time published about reforms in Legislative Councils pretty fairly show what great value the present Government of India attaches to public opinion, and it is expecting impossibilities to wish that Lord Ripon should pass the Bill as it stands irrespective of the opposition raised against it. We need not mention that in considering the Bill the noble Marquis will give weight only to sensible opposition, so that the plea of superiority of race and birth-right must necessarily fall to the ground as being unfounded, unsound and preposterous. In conclusion we say that this is the time when we should show our prudence; for otherwise the work of national progress will be thrown back several years or perhaps centuries. [The Lok Mitrá (78), Rást Goftár (110), the Gujarát Mitrá (76), the Poona Vaibhav (49) of the same date, the Dnyán Prakásh (8) of the 17th, the Kesari (35) of the 18th September and some others express similar sentiments.]

Comments on the opinions of officers on the Native Magistrates' Jurisdiction Bill.

The Indian Spectator (1) of the 16th September says:—It will not do to conceal our disappointment at the number of officials in favour of the Bill; it might have been larger. But there is consolation even for those who share this feeling of disappointment. It will be seen that many of these are revised opinions, not exactly the outcome of conscientious conviction or regard for principle, having been affected by after-events. This is a noteworthy fact not to be made light of, though for practical administration the course adopted by the officials may be justifiable to some extent. The proportion between "yes" and "no" is not so very great as the opponents of the Bill led us to believe, and as a matter of fact a majority of the most influential officers of the State have expressed themselves either as approving the measure as it stands or approving the principle underlying it. Indeed, the number in favour of the principle is gratifying, all things considered. Let the principle be enforced in however small a degree, and we may not grudge our opponents the fruit of organized agitation here and in England, such as the people of this country could not cope with. Our disappointment, however, is not due so much to the smallness of the official number in support of the Bill as to the language made use of by some of the opposing officials. Non-officials might indulge in such language. Irresponsible writers might be excused for the vehemence and bitterness of partisan spirit. But such language from responsible authorities, officers paid from the public exchequer for their support to the State policy, appears to us to be highly objectionable. No one who knows Mr. Rivers Thompson can help cherishing the liveliest regard for him personally; we say this in spite of what Bengal papers have been writing of him. It is the more disappointing therefore to find the Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal among the few rabid irreconcilables. His Honour is welcome to his opinions, but he might surely have been more guarded in expression. Such a worthy man and high official might have set a better example to his subordinates. His attitude cannot be easily accounted for, unless the hand of Providence is at work in the matter to show that official opposition from Bengal and Assam is neither meant to be relied upon nor followed. [The Native Opinion (10) of the same date says that there should have been no objection to referring the Bill for opinion to a larger number of Natives than that already consulted. Legal practitioners on the Original and Appellate Sides of the High Court of Bombay, who from the nature of their work have opportunities of having a knowledge of the country, ought to have been consulted by the Bombay Government in this matter. It is to be hoped that the Viceregal Council will take this circumstance into consideration in judging of the weight to be attached to the numerical superiority of the opinions opposed to the Bill.]

Makes a defence of Native character from the aspersions cast upon it by Mr. Baker, Acting District Judge of Ratnágiri, in his opinion on the native Magistrates' Jurisdiction Bill.

In an article headed "The Bombay opinions on the Ilbert Bill," the Indu Prakásh (9) of the 17th September says:—Mr Baker, Acting District Judge of Ratnágiri, opposes the Bill because (1) it is opposed by Europeans, (2) the Statutory Civilians have never been to England, (3) Native Magistrates would generally be unable to "resist the temptation of punishing a European severely," (4)" a great deal of what is written by the so-called representatives of native opinion has for its object the ascendancy of Bráhmans," (5)" no equality can exist between Europeans and Natives." We may observe en passant that Mr. Baker is quite mistaken in his statement that Vásudev Balvant Phadke was welcomed by the people of Poona "after his conviction in the Poona Sessions Court." At the time of Phadke's dacoities in 1879, it was the leading educated natives of Poona who co-operated with Government in finding out the culprits who set fire to the large building of Budhvár Váda, and the Bombay detectives employed by Sir Richard Temple had to come to the conclusion that the educated natives had nothing to do with the dacoities either directly or indirectly. Mr. Baker is rather unjust to our people when he says that they sympathize with crimes,—a testimony directly contrary to the testimony of many reputed Anglo-Indians that the people of India are a law-abiding people. At the time of the Tichborne trial in London, the populace there, it is said, used to sympathize with the impostor and ridicule the Judges. Does that justify one in saying that the English are not law-abiding? Mr. Baker himself, it is clear from his minute, has strong opinions against native character. Shall we therefore be justified in saying that he is not fit to try natives? Surely such vague generalizations from unfounded reports cannot be made the basis of serious opinions.

Recommends that the Native Magistrates' Jurisdiction Bill should confer higher powers on every Magistrate of the first class.

In noticing the official opinions on the Native Magistrates' Jurisdiction Bill, the Suryodayá (65) of the 17th September observes that it will not do much good to confer the jurisdiction on a few Native Covenanted Civil Servants, nor will such limitation satisfy the millions of native population. To produce a satisfactory result the jurisdiction should be conferred on every Magistrate holding first class powers. The Suryodayá then expresses satisfaction with the opinion of the Honourable Mr. Badrudin Taibji on the Bill and disapproves of that recorded by Mr. Robertson, the Commissioner of the Central Division. The Suryakánt (64) of the 16th September expresses similar sentiments. The Arunodayá (14) of the 16th September cannot believe that the Government of Lord Ripon will curtail the concessions proposed to be made in the original Bill by restricting the jurisdiction over European British subjects to Native District Magistrates and Sessions Judges.

Does not approve of the sum of Rs. 2,000 sanctioned by the Town Council for the purpose of presenting an address to the Duke of Connaught.

The Gujaráti (95) of the 16th September says that the sum of Rs. 2,000, sanctioned by the Town Council in the place of the sum Rs. 50,000 proposed by the Corporation for the purpose of according a fitting welcome to their Highnesses the Duke and Duchess of Connaught, is as unseemly as it is insufficient to enable the public to make a proper demonstration of their loyalty to the Royal Family. The Municipality of Bombay is certainly not in such a miserable condition as not to be able to spare more than Rs. 2,000 for the purpose, and it would have looked more graceful if the Town Council had sanctioned a moderate sum of Rs. 10,000. The Gujaráti then proceeds to censure the members of the Town Council who opposed the proposal of the Corporation, and says that the Hindu members were not swayed by considerations of economy but by a feeling of jealousy towards Mr. Mandlik, who is always known for his independent views and who moved the proposal for the grant of Rs. 50,000 in the Corporation. The European members, however, had an idea of showing to the English public that while the princes that visited India on two former occasions were honoured by the people the unpopularity of Lord Ripon accounted for the cold reception that was intended to be given to the coming royal visitors. Under these circumstances the Gujaráti advises the Duke of Connaught to decline to accept the address proposed to be given to him by the Bombay Municipality. The first resolution of the Corporation was erroneous, while the amendment of the Town Council was disgraceful and unwise and suggestive of feelings of jealousy. The Indian Spectator (1) of the 16th September expresses a hope that the public will acquit itself fairly on this occasion. Let Bombay receive the coming guest with due honours and let the Corporation grant at least Rs. 5,000. The Satyá Shodhak (57) of the same date approves of the conduct of the Town Council in sanctioning a grant of Rs. 2,000 for the purpose of presenting an address to the Royal Duke.

Points out the necessity of improving the sanitation of the thickly-populated parts of the town of Bombay before turning to the Byculla flats.

The Prabhákar (50) of the 19th September says that if the injury to public health from the insanitary condition of the Byculla Flats is recognized it must be admitted that it is all the more necessary that the filth in the thick of the town should be speedily removed. If the Corporation are thinking of spending thousands of rupees on the improvement of the sanitation of the flats it is just that they should first devote the funds to the thickly-populated parts of the town and then turn to the suburbs. If, however, they cannot afford to subordinate the latter to the former they must undertake both the works simultaneously.

Complains of delay in the publication of the Census Report for the City of Bombay by the local Municipality.

In a paragraph headed "the Bombay Census," the Indu Prakásh (9) of the 17th September says:—What is our Municipality about, that the report on the Census taken in this city in 1881 should not yet be ready? It is now more than two years since the Census was taken; Mr. Baines's report on the Census taken in the mofussil was published last March, although it was a much more laborious task, while no one knows yet what has become of the Bombay Census. The Municipal officers are still at it. Will one of the members of our Corporation ask a question on this point?

Complaint against the Municipality of Násik.

A correspondent of the Poona Vaibhav (49) of the 16th September writing from Násik says:—Rain has made the roads muddy. Wherever you go you meet with small pits, while in lanes they are innumerable. They think it enough to put metal on the principal roads. But what is to become of the other roads? The scavengers take their own time in the discharge of their duties, and this causes great inconvenience to the people. Except on the main roads lamps are posted at long distances and some of these are not even lighted by the Municipal servants. As a good deal of rubbish falls outside the dustbins great annoyance is caused to the public. It is to be hoped that the Municipality will look to these complaints.

Suggests certain reforms in the arrangements for lighting the town of Pandharpur.

The Pandhari Vaibhav (48) of the 16th September complains of the want of proper arrangements at Pandharpur regarding water-pipes and lamp-posts. In some parts of the town water-pipes and lamps are posted at distances shorter than necessary, while in others they are posted at inconveniently long distances. As regards water-pipes the Municipality has room to take umbrage at the argument that as the arrangements for water-supply at present stand water cannot rise to places which are on a high level. This argument, however, will not apply to lamp-posts and nothing but the negligence of Municipal authorities is responsible for the inconvenience on this score. It is to be suggested therefore that the Municipal Secretary should take the hint from what has been said above and should remove darkness from the town by posting additional lamps between those that may be situated at inconveniently long intervals.

Complains of oppressive taxes levied by the Municipality of Yeola.

The Monthly Journal of the Poona Sárvajanik Sabha (53) for the months of February and March but received on the 29th August contains a communication from one of the Sabha's agents who, while describing the condition of the Násik District, says that the house and water taxes levied by the Municipality of Yeola are so oppressive as to be almost without a parallel. The house-tax on some of the houses is as high as Rs. 60. Some people have disposed of their houses owing to this heavy tax. The water-tax is levied in advance for realizing the amount required for the construction of water-works. The works will be commenced after the full amount has been realized. That the people should have to pay a heavy water-rate without being able to get water even in the midst of the rainy season is nothing short of anarchy. The people have become altogether disgusted with this sort of tyranny. They proposed to collect the necessary funds by contributions or to lend the required money to the Municipality but their proposals were not heeded by Government.

Complaint againt the Sanitary Sub-Committee of Surat.

The Gujarát Mitrá (76) of the 16th September is informed that recently a petition was submitted to the Sanitary Sub-Committee of Surat by some respectable residents of the Chauk Bázár quarter requesting the Committee to either stop night-soil carriages from passing by that road or to make them so air-tight as to remove all possibility of any injury resulting to the health of the public from the noxious odours exhaled by their filthy contents. Notwithstanding the circumstance that this petition was presented by men of position the Secretary is said to have replied by intimating that the night-soil carriages were already kept in as good a condition as necessary and that it was not possible that they could be taken by any other road. It is a matter for regret that the Sub-Committee has not only not considered the complaints preferred to them but has as it were proved them to be groundless, and has thrown the representation to the winds. If the Sanitary Department that spends thousands of rupees cannot do anything in the matter of a petition preferred by 50 persons, then we wish to enquire when will such anarchy end. If some European had been living in this quarter he would have compelled the Secretary to stop such carriages from passing through it.

Says that lime and brick kilns should not be removed from their present sites so long as they do not interfere with the public health.

Referring to the question of lime and brick kilns that was to have been discussed at a general meeting of the Municipality of Surat on the 22nd September, the Gujarát Mitrá (76) of the 16th idem points out the necessity for each Commissioner to consider the subject well. As for the kilns, the question of whose sites has not hitherto formed a subject of complaint or which have remained in their present sites for 15 to 30 years, it is worth serious consideration whether they should be removed. So long as no proof is forthcoming of a danger to public health, and so long as no inconvenience is suffered by the public from the smoke of the kilns, there is no necessity to remove the kilns to the outside of the town. The question was once satisfactorily settled with the advice of the late Acting Assistant Surgeon, Mr. Motivála, and we should like to know what has caused its revival.

Recommends a change in the time kept by the clock on the Hospital Tower at Surat, and points out the necessity of its being lighted.

The Gujarát Mitrá (76) of the 16th September says that one of its correspondents complains that the clock on the Hospital Tower at Surat shows Madras time and that it is useless at night in the absence of lights to illuminate it. The Mitrá strongly points out to the Municipal Commissioners the necessity of changing the time of the clock and of lighting it.

Native States.

Says that the scope of the contemplated visit of the Nizám of Hyderabad to Calcutta should be extended, and that he should see other important Native States.

The Mahrátta (2) of the 16th September observes:—The event of the Nizám of Hyderabad going to Calcutta during the Christmas holidays will be looked upon by some old Hydarábádis with grave concern. They will not like the idea of their august prince going to the English Viceroy. There is a lowering of dignity in this. But this race of men is now dying out. The Hydarábádis of to-day will not, we think, attach any political significance to this event. We suggest that the scope of this visit of the Nizám's should be extended. His Highness ought to see some of the other more important Native States and examine the manner in which State business goes on there. As His Highness will shortly be called upon to rule over the destinies of his great State, it will be advantageous to him to see practical work.

Points out the necessity of having one set of laws for the provinces of Káthiáwár, Mahi Kántha, Rewa Kántha and Pálanpur.

The Gujarát Monthly Journal (96) for the months of Chaitra and Vaisháhk of the Samwat year 1939 (April, May and June) observes that under each of the Political Agencies of Káthiáwár, Mahi Kántha, Rewa Kántha, and Pálanpur there are several large and small States with jurisdictions extending over different areas. Some of these States enact laws for themselves, while others follow the laws enacted by other States. If there was one set of laws for all these States their subjects would not meet with many inconveniences in their dealings with each other which they now suffer. The Agency authorities and the different States ought to enact uniform laws applicable throughout the province after holding consultations on the subject. The different Political Agencies and States have laws of their own for the registration of valuable documents, and one State refuses to accept a document registered in another State, while the Agencies have issued circulars intimating that documents registered in the Courts of justice in Native States will not be accepted as legal evidence in the Courts of justice established by the Agencies. This state of things causes great inconvenience to trade and commerce throughout the province, and it is desirable therefore that there should be one law for registration and the documents registered under it should be accepted as legal evidence in all Courts of justice throughout the province.

Complains of the injustice of the admission of Mr. Jádavrái Harishankar to the Agency Courts in Káthiáwár.

A correspondent of the Gujaráti (95) of the 16th September says:—Mr. Jádavrái Harishankar is a known man in Káthiáwár. He was an influential pleader of the Agency Courts. He was convicted of having forged a number of documents and was sentenced to pay a fine and in addition to undergo imprisonment for a certain period. This man has now returned from jail. One can understand that he may have many friends in Káthiáwár, but nobody ever thought that the doors of the Agency buildings would be opened to him, and that he would be allowed to practise there as a pleader. Colonel Barton has, however, falsified this notion by approving Mr. Jádavrái's nomination to the post of Vakil for the Chuda Táluka at the Political Agent's Court and by also allowing him to practise as a pleader. Among the rules for the admission of pleaders to the Courts in Káthiáwár good behaviour and a certain standard of education occupy the principal place. Tálukdárs of the first four classes are competent to exercise their choice as regards the satisfaction of the latter test, but as the former qualification is considered a sine qua non their nominations are subject to the approval of the Political Agent with regard to that test. Did not Colonel Barton see any difficulty in giving his approval to the nomination in question? The Kárbhári of Chuda may see nothing objectionable in the appointment of Mr. Jádavrái, but Colonel Barton has shown that he has abandoned all regard for his own honour by not taking exception to the nomination while approving it on behalf of Government. It is said that this affair has been brought about by the interest which Mr. Ratilál Sárábhái, the Kárbhári of Vánkáner, has with Colonel Barton. This report may or may not be true, but the people cannot account for this affair in any other way. Can nobody prevent the Agency from breaking, in the interests of individuals, the rules which it has framed for its own and the people's guidance? It is to be hoped that if this matter reaches the ears of Government it will be set right.

Affairs at Junágad and the Girássias.

A correspondent of the Gujaráti (95) of the 16th September says:—It is rumoured that Mr. Sále Hindi has tendered his resignation and has been moving in the matter of getting a new Kárbhári appointed, simply with the view of soothing Government, but that secretly and virtually he is to remain what he was. The whole administration of the State would be carried on under his direction, and the rank, influence and jághir enjoyed by him would remain unaffected. He has, however, not to take the trouble of putting his signature to State papers. The public opinion regarding Mr. Bápálál is that he would be, to all appearances, dismissed from the service, but the Darbár would not but pay him his salary privately. These rumours appear to be well-founded. Even after the receipt of the Government Resolution these two officers are known to have been taking a principal part in the administration of the State. Now-a-days Mr. Bápálál has been incessantly moving between Junágad, Colonel Barton's Camp, and Bombay, and for this purpose the Darbár has kept stages for horses and carriages at distances of 5 miles. Since the policy of usurping portions of territories from adjoining States has been put a stop to by Government, a tendency to deprive either by hook or crook Girássias and other land-holders of portions of their property, with the view of annexing them to the State, has been observable among Tálukdárs. According as an officer is skilful in this business he is considered loyal to the State. Native States generally hunt after such officers. Messrs. Sále Hindi and Bápálál are peculiarly possessed of this qualification. Mr. Sále Hindi cannot brook the name of Girássias. The oppression of the Girássias by the Junágad Darbár commences from the date of the accession of Mr. Sále Hindi to power. Mr. Bápálál has become popular with the Darbár because his nature accords with that of his Chief. It is not likely that Junágad will swallow the bitter dose of the dismissal of these two officers. It is an incontestable fact that a desire to seize the lands of Maiyás was at the bottom of the tyranny exercised on them. The Darbár was very much elated by the Resolution which the Government of Bombay passed in its favour in the matter of the tax imposed by it on the Maiyás. The writer then quotes three instances in which certain persons have recently been deprived of their girás lands by the Darbár, and says that the circumstance that these instances occurred when the orders of Government in the Maiyá affair were being issued gives sufficient ground to form a conclusion as to the effect of the Government orders on the Darbár people.

Says that the British Government ought to take over in their charge the State of Rájpipla.

The Samsher Báhádur (111) of the 14th September, in referring to the state of affairs at Rájpipla, observes that the appointment of Mr. Dhurandhar, Barrister-at-law, as Diván, led the people to hope for some substantial reforms in the State. But it is a matter for regret that the Mahárája should interfere in the management of his State and prevent the introduction of reforms. So long as the selfish and scheming adherents of the Mahárája are not removed from the State, no hope can be entertained for the redress of the grievances of the people. The Samsher hears that the Mahárája thinks of nominating Mr. Mukundrái of Ahmedabad, who shortly retires from service, to the post of Diván. Whoever the Diván may be, Rájpipla will not improve so long as the British Government do not take in their own hands the supervision of the State. Government ought for once to take in their hands the reins of the State and so bless the people.

Berár Affairs.

Makes a few observations in connection with the report on the charitable medical dispensaries in Berár for the year 1882.

In noticing the report on the civil hospitals and charitable medical dispensaries in Berár for the year 1882, the Pramod Sindhu (52) of the 10th September observes that Dr. Little has censured the Natives of the province for subscribing rupees eight thousand only towards these dispensaries, but that amount, though a little less than the sum contributed in 1881, is nearly double the amount of the contributions collected in 1880. Dr. Little puts the residents of Amraoti and Akola to shame for contributing very little to the dispensaries of their respective towns and for obtaining medicines for themselves as paupers. But it ought to be remembered that the Municipalities of the two towns make an annual contribution of one thousand rupees each to medical dispensaries; and this fact ought not to have led the doctor to expect further contributions from the people. Again, these towns maintain a few private practitioners. Of course the well-to-do persons who obtain medicines from these dispensaries deserve blame, but Government desire that the people should be accustomed to the use of English medicines and therefore do not insist upon payment for the medicines received by the well-to-do classes. The Europeans in Berár also did not contribute a large amount to the dispensaries. This was, as observed by the Commissioner, owing to no particular efforts having been made to collect subscriptions from them; and the same may be said in regard to the small amount contributed by the Natives. Had due efforts been made for raising subscriptions, Europeans and Natives would not have held back from contributing respectable amounts.

Notes.—A. The notices from the different Newspapers have been collected in the Report under different heads, which are printed in italics.

B. The names of Newspapers are printed in the body of the Report in italics, and the number of the Newspaper in the above list is printed in brackets after the name.

C. The proprietors of the Newspapers marked * have not given information as to the number of copies issued. In these cases an estimate has been made by the Reporter.

D. The system of spelling vernacular words followed by the Reporter is the same as that adopted in the Official Spelling List of the Bombay Presidency. One peculiar feature of this system is that when the long a (आ or ā) is the last letter of a word, the accent is left out, and the short a (अ = u in gun) is, to prevent confusion, never placed at the end of a word. This rule has been strictly followed, except that when the short a appears to be absolutely necessary to complete the pronunciation of a word, as in Arunodaya or the well known Mitra, it is printed with a mark over it to indicate that it is short, thus—ă.

E. Berár papers are received in this office for report under the Resolution of the Government of Bombay in the General Department, No. 1795, dated 8th June 1881.

Politics and the Public Administration.

In continuation of its article reported at pages 3—4 of the Report on Native Papers for the week ending 22nd September 1883, the Native Opinion (10) of the 23rd September says :—

Suggestions for making Indian Legislative Councils properly representative.

The problem of Indian Administration can best be solved by means of representative institutions in this country. The elements for rearing up representative institutions are here, and can be made use of by a skilful moulder. It might be asked if such institutions can really serve the country better than the present unhampered enlightened Civilians. We answer in the affirmative, always supposing that there is a proper balance between the different factors of the administrative machinery. The chief defect of the present administration is its jealous exclusiveness, and its unintelligibility in the eyes of the natives. Laws are made and obeyed, but we don't know if one in a thousand of those who obey them understands them. The majority of the people of India obey the numerous emanations from the legal member as so many strange inscrutable products of Kaliyuga, so graphically described in their Puráns. The British Indian Government imposes on them a legal system based upon European ideas and worked with stringent penalties in accordance with the scientific ideas of Bentham and Austin. The natives are used to a simple legal machinery, speedy and inexpensive, and in their eyes the multiplicity of courts and appeals and the heavy fines that have to be paid for procuring justice are simply bewildering. The attempts which are made to regenerate India are made with the best possible intentions and with a sincere desire to effect improvements. But the fault lies in beginning to work on a material without understanding its nature and qualities. Many Englishmen themselves have admitted that their knowledge of the people of India is superficial. The manner in which the rulers and the ruled behave towards each other serves most to keep the former in thorough ignorance of the real condition of the latter. The European Civilian rarely mingles with a native in a friendly intercourse. At home or in his Kacheri he is surrounded by persons whose only desire is to please him, and naturally the defects which always keep company with sycophancy are displayed vividly in his eyes. He sees jealousy, chicanery, and falsehood rampant in the class which every day passes in review before him. What can such an official know of the real feelings and wishes of the people? The Government of the country is always moving in a circle of ideas foreign to those of its subjects. The legal administrative measures of Government have been too much in advance of the requirements of the people. The Indian Civil Service has been so organised as to be most proficient in the art of despatch. The members of this splendid service are nothing, if they are not pushing, dashing go-ahead people, and they carry out in the administration nothing but their own principles. But too much of this go-ahead spirit is sure to become dangerous to the safety of the State. There must be a check put upon them, and this check can best be found in the representative Councils of the Presidencies and the Districts. Such Councils will greatly modify their administrative zeal. At first perhaps the so-called reform and enlightenment will not advance rapidly; but what little progress it will make will be the more valuable for being sure and solid. Had the practice of taking the advice of the people been adopted earlier, we should have been surely saved from many displays of unsuitable legislation. Our present Legislative Councils can safely, as far as the popular element in them is concerned, be pronounced shams. There is only the pretence of a popular element, which is the more irritating on account of its being merely a pretence. Of course there have been times when the popular voice has strongly influenced the deliberations of these assemblies, but what we have said above is pretty accurate. Of all our Governors-General the present Viceroy has best grasped the true bearings of this problem. It is evident that he has realised the ignorance of the people as to the laws that are passed for them, and we are sure that he has addressed himself to the rectification of the error. We have been assured recently by an illustrious colleague of his that His Lordship is opposed to all shams, and we confidently hope that he will knock this the greatest sham on the head before he retires. We have every confidence in his tact and discretion, and we sincerely trust that he will now advance from merely inviting popular opinion from outside to the stage of introducing into the Councils a representative element.

Criticises the speech of the Under Secretary of State for India on the last Indian Budget.

In noticing Mr. Cross's speech on the Indian Budget for the current official year, the Lok Mitrá (78) of the 23rd September observes that whether the incidence of taxation is really crushing compared to the annual average income per head is a question that does not disturb the self-complacency of either the Secretary of State or his supporters. The bright side of the picture is presented to the public gaze, while the dark one is entirely hidden. However convinced one may inwardly be of the truth touching the poverty of the masses as pointed out by Major Baring, it will not do to make such a statement. Such an assertion would be mischievous. It would only go to support the pessimists. Then again the revenue is increasing. Of course it is. But Mr. Cross did not point out that the cost of collection is also increasing, and that salt is still immensely dear, compared with the cost of production, that the excise duty on spirits has stimulated the vice of drinking, and that stamp duties have made justice very dear. The expenditure side of the account was also treated in the same happy go-lucky style. Public expenditure on reproductive works is justifiable; but there is another and a dark side to the picture which ought to have been exposed. Military expenditure was spoken of glibly, as if no reduction could be effected in that huge department. In fact, the talk of reducing civil and military expenditure simply acts as a wet blanket on the Secretary of State or the Under Secretary who for the time being is expounding an Indian Budget. Vested interests must not be touched. So that very many of the statements made by Mr. Cross have about them the ring of the old platitudes on Indian Finance. There is, however, as much meaning about these sweet shibboleths in which the optimist Anglo-Indians perpetually indulge as in that hollow phrase about the "independence and integrity of the Ottoman Empire." But nobody is deceived in this country by such worthless platitudes.

Trade with Central Asia.

The Jáme Jamshed (99) of the 24th September regrets that Russia should have raised obstacles in the way of trade in Central Asia, and observes that Russia herself, in spite of the facilities secured for her own products, cannot carry on a thriving trade on account of the inferiority of her goods. During the past year the volume of Indian trade with Central Asia was far less than in former years, and this decline may be attributed to Russian influences. The British Government ought therefore to make proper arrangements with Russia for the encouragement of British and Indian trade in that part of the Asiatic continent.

Value of stores sent to India from England on account of Government.

With reference to the remark recently made by the Times of India that in spite of the desire of the Government of India to encourage local enterprise the Secretary of State for India in Council persists in sending out from England stores annually in steadily increasing amounts, as is to be seen from the Accounts of the Trade and Navigation of British India for four months ending 31st July last, the Bombay Chronicle (75) of the 23rd September observes that the Indian Government ought to publish some explanation on the subject. It is very desirable to know what regard the authorities holding the purse-strings of India have for the feelings of theIndian taxpayer, and whether some better control of the public expenditure than what now obtains is not absolutely necessary for the benefit of a people whose resources for paying taxes are by no means great, as is freely admitted and emphatically declared by Lord Hartington and other English statesmen.

Advises a reduction in the charges of growing and manufacturing Bengal opium and in the excise duty on Málva drug in order to put down the competition of the Persian and Chinese produce.

The Bombay Chronicle (75) of the 23rd September observes that the Indian trade in opium and the revenue derived from it are quite legitimate, and the opposition offered by some English philanthropists ought not to be allowed any weight. The rivalry encountered by the Indian drug from the Persian and indigenous drug in the Chinese market is however growing serious, and demands the close attention of Indian statesmen. The rivalry is found to be on the increase every year, resulting in ever-diminishing consumption of Indian opium by Chinese smokers, and the reports from the Consuls in China confirm this view of the case. The chief cause of the successful competition is the comparative cheapness of the Persian and Chinese drugs. So great is the superiority of the Indian commodity as regards flavor that when the means of the consumer permit, he generally prefers it to its cheaper rivals, while the smokers of more moderate means try as much as possible to procure a good preparation of mixed Indian and Chinese or Persian drugs. It is the poorer classes only that resort to the use of either the pure Chinese or pure Persian drug or a simple mixture of these two on account of its cheapness. In spite of all attempts hitherto made to improve their qualities the Persian and the Chinese drugs have not as yet approached the high standard of the Indian commodity, and this state of things must continue for a long time. If the price of the Indian produce were therefore reduced to the standard of the Persian and Chinese drugs the latter would soon be driven from the market. It is therefore worth while to ascertain what could be done by way of changes in the system of growing and manufacturing the Bengal drug and of reducing the excise duty on Málva so as to diminish the cost of both when sold in China.

Complains of official publications and reports not being communicated to native newspapers.

The Indian Spectator (1) of the 23rd September observes:—Having so often congratulated Government on its policy with regard to supplying correct information to the Press and thereby making it a good medium of popular education as well as a valuable aid to the administration of the country, we may now submit a few details to show that the wisest policy is of little account unless practically enforced. For instance, we doubt if a single native paper in India has been supplied with Hunter's Imperial Gazetteer. We know it for a fact that the Bombay Gazetteer is seldom, if at all, issued to native writers. There are hundreds of other useful publications, provincial and imperial, of which most of the native papers do not know even the existence. There are the Administration Reports of Native States, Jail Reports, Trades and Navigation Reports, Postal and Telegraph Reports, Military, Judicial and Revenue Reports, Educational and Emigration Reports, Railway Reports and a number of other Reports, Statements and Schedules, which, if regularly supplied to native papers, would be very useful. We are favoured with some of these from time to time, but had occasion some weeks ago to submit a formal application for others. For the Imperial Gazetteer we were referred from one Government to another, and at last dismissed with the usual expression of regret that copies had run out. We had to buy the 9 volumes in the bázár. As for the Bombay Gazetteer His Excellency the Governor regretted his inability to help us. The same was the case with Administration Reports of other provinces and of Native States which we wanted for comparison. Most other papers are worse off than the Indian Spectator. Now, what wonder is there that these journals should make mistakes in the absence of correct information? It is to be sincerly hoped that the Government of India's latest Resolution on the subject will free the Native Press from this cruel disability. Let there be cheap editions of books and pamphlets; let native journalists pay for them if they cannot be supplied gratis, as in the case of Anglo-Indian publicists. The present treatment of native papers, especially vernacular, ill accords with the principles of enlightened Government. It is not that heads of administrations cannot afford to supply their critics with correct data; the unwillingness to break through routine is too great. To do anything new, and that at the suggestion of outsiders, is too much for your infallibles. But the worst of it is that what little is done for the Native Press is done very irregularly. There is no such thing as impartial distribution. In the matter of information as well as paid advertisements we have observed that all Government officials do not act in a boná fide spirit. There are some papers that seldom or never get departmental advertisements, whilst others, every way inferior, seem to enjoy a monopoly of these official "tips". The reason is not far to seek; it is neither creditable to the journalist nor the official patron. This is scarcely the way to inspire the Native Press with self-respect. There must be a degree of confidence between the journalist and the official, and such confidence can be based only on just dealing. The officials do not, on the whole, deal fairly by the journalists, and the latter look upon the official class as their natural enemies. A glaring instance in point is a Mr. Kaikhushru Edalji Modi of Surat. In the course of a recent debate this official member of the local municipality turned fiercely upon two other members, who are journalists, and who wanted certain facts to be published, with the astounding statement that newspapers contained lies and should not, therefore, be supplied with the required information! The Government of Bombay will do well to advise bumptious little bureaucrats to be on their guard. If some papers report facts incorrectly they are not so much to blame as the officials following the policy of the dog in the manger.

Comments in connection with the Annual Sanitary Report of the Bombay Presidency for the year 1881.

In an article headed "Sanitary Administration," the Native Opinion (10) of the 23rd September says:—The last Government Gazette contains the usual Annual Sanitary Report of this Presidency for the year 1881. These things are useful in their way, but except as critical resumés we cannot say that the country gains much by these annual reviews. We do not know how many Army Sanitary Commissioners have seen India or have read or studied Hindu works on medicine, and some of their remarks strike us as a sheer waste of energy. Every year we have the same story. A man is said to die of cholera. Next morning his residence is searched, clothes are burnt, and plenty of carbolic powder is used. But that anything definite is gained we cannot admit. Our health reports every year give us plenty of new theories, but we are as wise about cholera now as we were several ages ago. The remarks on the sanitary condition of Násik ought to be studied by those who attack Dr. Blaney for his advocacy of open drains. This year cholera epidemic was very severe in that town and a large quantity of sulphur and tar was burnt without any relief. But we do not see any inquiry in this memorandum on the growth of intemperance in drink in this and other cities and its effect on the death-rate. For it is the belief amongst natives that when the human system is affected by strong drinks, the slightest attack is certain to be fatal to the patient. Dr. Hewlett may see from the returns whether Poona, Násik and such like places have not degenerated during the last twenty years, and if so how far. We observe that irrigation is at last being considered a source of disease. It has been so stamped by the whole native community of Poona since the advent of Khadakvásla waters into that city, and yet no remedy has been applied, and the funds of the municipality are being wasted on gaudy projects to the utter neglect of the solid comforts of the community.

Suggests some names in connection with the approaching nomination to the shrievalty of Bombay.

The Indian Spectator (1) of the 23rd September says:—The Jáme Jamshed strongly recommends Mr. Wordsworth's appointment as Sheriff of Bombay for 1884. We think the Press and Public of Bombay will cordially welcome the appointment. Some of the recent nominations have been anything but popular, and it is much to be wished that the present Government may not incur odium by putting in the first influential beggar or professing loyalist they come across. Mr. Khote's successor will be an Englishman, but when the time comes, we should very much like to see a Mahomedan gentleman appointed Sheriff of Bombay.

Suggests means for checking the vice of intoxication which is alleged to have considerably increased of late.

The Gujarát Mitrá (76) of the 23rd September alludes to the report made by a Committee ten years ago, that the vice of drinking liquors had considerably increased in the Bombay Presidency and that this increase had greatly augmented crime. The Mitrá also notices the petition made by the people of Ahmedabad complaining that the vice in question had increased in that city, as well as the suggestion made by the Poona Sárvajanik Sabha that the collection and disposal of the ábkári revenue should be transferred to Municipal Corporations in order to enable them to check the vice by reducing the number of liquorshops. The Mitrá censures Government for having failed to check the growth of the evil in its avarice to derive a large revenue from the A'bkári Department, and observes that it is not likely that Municipal Corporations will be able to discharge the duty of checking the evil satisfactorily. Government can and ought to check the evil. It should discontinue the system of giving an exclusive right of manufacturing and selling liquor to a single individual and should revert to the former arrangement of selling each liquorshop by contract; it should take measures to reduce the number of shops gradually and to improve the quality of liquor and to enhance the duty levied on spirituous drinks.

Disapproves of the contemplated transfer of the Dápoli Táluka from the Ratnágiri District of which it now forms a part to the Kolába Collectorate.

The Satyá Shodhak (57) of the 23rd September in a communicated article says that it has heard that it is in contemplation to detach the Dápoli Táluka from the Ratnágiri District and to annex it to the Kolába Collectorate. Such a transfer will be extremely inconvenient to the inhabitants of the Dápoli Táluka. The transfer of the Civil and Revenue work of this Táluka to the jurisdiction of the Judge of Thána and of the Collector of Kolába respectively will cause much unnecessary trouble, inconvenience and annoyance to persons who may have to appeal from the decisions of subordinate Judicial and Revenue Courts. By joining the Dápoli Táluka to the Kolába District appellants will be obliged to travel a distance of a couple of hundred miles in order to lodge appeals in the Court of the District Judge of Thána against the decisions of the Sub-Judge of Dápoli. Ratnágiri is much nearer to Dápoli than Thána, and the transfer of the appellate civil work from the jurisdiction of the Judge of Ratnágiri will oblige litigants to travel enormously long distances without any corresponding advantage. The writer considers the contemplated step altogether undesirable, and gives a variety of reasons in support of his contention. At present there are four Judges stationed at Ratnágiri with powers to hear appeals. It would be well if one of them was posted at Dápoli and invested with power to hear appeals from Courts in the Tálukas of Dápoli, Khed and Chiplun. Such an arrangement would be extremely beneficial.

Complains of a passage for water near the village of Andáda, Táluka Ankleshvar, being stopped by the railway line passing over it.

A correspondent of the Hitechchhu (77) of Ahmedabad of the 27th September, in referring to the rise of the waters of the river Nerbudda on the 11th instant, says that the distance between the village of Andáda, Táluka Ankleshvar, and the banks of the Nerbudda, is two miles. The waters of the river during the recent rise had approached very near the village. But the passage for the waters being stopped by the railway line, the fields in the neighbourhood became submerged and the rayats have been consequently great losers. The poor rayats have been suffering in this way for several years past. Government should either have the passage opened or reduced the assessment on the said lands. The editor, in a note, urges Government to speedily redress this grievance of the rayats.

Disapproves of Colonel Barton visiting several important Native States of Káthiáwár after giving over charge of his appointment.

In a paragraph headed "Colonel Barton taking leave of Káthiáwár," the Indu Prakásh (9) of the 24th September says:—We understand that Colonel Barton, Political Agent of Káthiáwár, who retires from his office on the 24th of this month proposes before finally quitting the scene of his labours, to visit some of the important Native States in the Province. At least some of these States have been, we hear, so informed. Probably these Native Chiefs will look upon it as a high compliment paid to them, to find that an officer, whose word of advice when in office was to be treated as little short of 'command,' should deign to honour them with a visit. There may be nothing positively wrong in such friendly visits. We cannot help looking upon this as a reprehensible practice in an officer after he has laid down the seals of his office to undertake an official tour of this kind, and we think Government should take steps to discourage such visits. Such a practice cannot but result in a lowering of the prestige of British Political officers on the one hand, and a waste of money in receptions and ceremonials on the other. We object to such visits on principle. If the Chiefs of Káthiáwár have found in Colonel Barton a friend, a well-wisher, and a benefactor, let them assemble in a public meeting, say at Rájkot, and vote him an address expressive of their sentiments, or perpetuate his memory by raising a public subscription for a scholarship, or a prize in his honour, or for founding any public institution bearing his name, but the Political Agent has no business, we think, to pay visits to one State after another, when his official connection with such States has ended.

Suggests that some medical practitioners should be sent to Bulsár to put down cholera which is committing great havoc.

The Gujaráti (95) of the 23rd September states that cholera is committing great havoc in the town of Bulsár, causing 15 to 20 deaths per day. The Golvád and Chhipvád portions of the town are alone free from the epidemic. The single doctor practising there is unable to cope with the scourge, and requires assistance. The municipality has not made due exertions to improve the sanitation of the town. Government ought to send a few medical practitioners to assist in the work of putting down the epidemic.

Points out the necessity of repairing the Varáchha creek at Surat.

The Suryá Prakásh (80) of the 22nd September says that according to the Jáme Jamshed newspaper, Government had sanctioned a sum of Rs. 53,000 in 1844 for the repairs of the Varáchha creek at Surat. It is not known what has become of this sanction. It is now necessary that the work should be taken up by Government, and that the local municipality and the B. B. & C. I. Railway Company should contribute their share towards the repairs of the creek. The Railway Company will thereby be saved the great annual loss it suffers by its line between Navsári and Kim being washed away every year by the occurrence of the floods. It will be an easy affair if Government, the local municipality and the Railway Company take up the work at an expense of Rs. 53,000. If Government cannot give any help, it should let the people know this, so that other measures may be taken for the amelioration of the distress of the people of Surat and the surrounding parts. There is a surplus of about Rs. 50,000 in the hands of the Bombay Committee of the Surat Flood Relief Fund, and it might contribute a portion of the surplus towards the work, which is in harmony with the object of the fund. If the necessary repairs to the creek are done, Surat will be saved from the occurrence of disastrous floods such as those which visited the city recently.

Points out the advisability of keeping the gates of the city of Surat open after 3 A.M.

The Surat Akhbár (79) of the 24th September points out the necessity of having the city gates closed at 10 P.M. and opened at 3 A.M. The closing of the city gates for the whole night enables some men doing duty at the gates to exact presents from cartmen, farmers and others. It would give a stimulus to trade if the gates were kept open.

Opium-sellers at Kaira should be made to exhibit a board in their shops setting forth the rates at which it is sold.

The Kaira Vartamán (101) of the 26th September requests the Collector of Kaira to compel opium-sellers to exhibit a board in their shops, setting forth the rates at which it is sold. This practice prevails in Ahmedabad.

Comments in connection with the removal of the punitive police from Surat.

The Indian Spectator (1) of the 23rd September says:—A few weeks ago we had to write strongly against Government saddling a whole town with the expense of an additional police because of the misconduct of individuals. We are glad to see that Surat is about to be relieved of this costly incubus. But it is doubtful if Government has here yielded to popular representation. Our officials are never guilty of such weakness. To do or undo anything at the request of the people! Perish the thought. The additional police is to be removed from Surat, because it is now full 5 years since it was fastened on the unhappy people. [The Suryá Prakásh (80) of the 22nd and the Deshi Mitrá (91) of the 27th September thank Government for removing the punitive police.]

A complaint against the Police Faujdár of Sholápur.

The Káside Mumbai (103) of the 26th September, in noticing the recent affray between the Hindus and Mahomedans at Sholápur, says that it is unaccountable that the local Faujdár did not prevent the Hindu procession from beating the drum when it approached the Mahomedan mosque? Why did not the havildár accompanying the procession apprehend the person who was beating the drum and thus disturbing the public peace. It is surprising that notwithstanding the Government order of 15th November last prohibiting the beating of drums near mosques and the affray last year between the two communities and the terms of settlement between them, the Faujdár should not have taken precautionary measures. The Superintendent of Police at Sholápur ought to privately investigate the matter. The investigation may throw some light on the affair. It is to be hoped that the Government of Sir James Fergusson will adopt some measures with a view to prevent similar affrays occurring in future.

Local Self-government.

Criticises the Bombay District Municipal Act Amendment Bill.

In further criticising the Bombay District Municipal Act Amendment Bill, the Indu Prakásh (9) of the 24th September says :—In our issue of the 10th instant we said that the Bill does not specify any positive tests of qualification for either the right to vote, or to be voted for, and we have suggested that such tests should be laid down by the Legislature. But though thus omitting to define what shall constitute eligibility, the Bill declares in sections 15 and 21 what circumstances will disqualify a person from becoming a member of a Municipal Board, or from voting at a Municipal election. These provisions about disqualification are as faulty in commission as those about qualification are in omission. Firstly, the limit of age in both cases may in our opinion be fixed at 18. A person attains majority by law at that age, and if in the eye of the law he is qualified to acquire rights and liabilities in the course of business, he may with equal reason be considered competent to do the duties of a citizen, whether as a voter or as a member of a Municipal Board. Perhaps the function of a member is more difficult than that of a voter, and therefore in the former case a higher limit of age may plausibly be insisted on. But in respect to the power of voting, we think it may as safely be entrusted to a person of 18 as to one of 21. A person who is old enough to know his own interest and to be held responsible for his words and acts may surely be expected to use discrimination in his choice of a Municipal Commissioner. We are therefore of opinion that the limit of age may at least in the case of the power of voting be advantageously reduced to 18. Secondly, the disqualification arising out of a conviction for a criminal offence should, we think, be limited to non-compoundable offences. A person who has been proved guilty of any of the offences which imply moral turpitude may rightly be held unfit to be entrusted with the management of municipal concerns, but such offences as defamation, contempt of court or of any lawful order, and so forth, do not necessarily import moral turpitude or incompetence to manage civic affairs. Similarly, in respect to the power of voting, persons who have been convicted of heinous offences against society may justly be denied the privileges of citizens. Thirdly, the District Judge is declared ineligible on the ground of his being the Appellate Judge. We think the District Judge ought not to be thus excluded. A Judge, like Sir William Wedderburn for instance, would be a most desirable acquisition to a Municipal Board. The Collector, on the other hand, is not disqualified, though he is endowed by the Bill itself with various powers of control and supervision of the Local Boards. Consistently with the policy of the Bills, and with the spirit of the Viceregal Resolutions of last year, we think, the Collector may properly be held disqualified from becoming a member. If it is open to the Collector to become a member, he may surely be expected to be the president in each case, and then will be lost all usefulness of the Bills as means of instruction to the people in self-government. We venture to suggest that along with the powers of control the power of hearing appeals in disputed elections should also be given to the Collector, and the Collector be disqualified from becoming a member, while the disqualification attaching to a District Judge should be removed. As before pointed out, the Collector's position as a member of a Board, and as the controlling authority, will be very anomalous, and we think it necessary in the interest of efficiency that the Collector should be relieved of such an anomalous position. The Bill no doubt provides for a transfer of the powers of control by the Collector to another person, but seeing that the Collector is the highest executive officer in a district, the powers of control, if they are to be used usefully and efficiently, cannot be transferred to any other officer in the district who must needs be subordinate to the Collector. Instead therefore of encumbering the Collector with too many inconsistent and dubious powers, we think it would conduce better to the success of self-government if the Collector were restricted to the position of a controlling authority merely. If the members of a Board want any light or leading, they will not be in lack of it from the other Revenue and Judicial officers who are competent to be members. We may here point out that under the Bombay Municipal Act an appeal in a disputed election lies to the Chief Presidency Magistrate, and not to any of the Civil Courts. Among the disqualifying clauses there is one which remains yet to be noticed, and which in our opinion requires some modification. We mean the clause as to absence from the limits of a municipal district for four consecutive months depriving a member of his membership. For ensuring regularity of attendance it is no doubt necessary that some check should be imposed, but absolute deprivation of membership is, we think, too severe a penalty for such absence. We venture to suggest that absence from a certain number of consecutive meetings may be held to disentitle a person to continue a member. With respect to the much-disputed point as to the office of the President of a Board, the Bill provides in Section 23 that "the president shall be one of the Commissioners, and shall be appointed by the Government or, if the Governor in Council so directs, elected by the municipality." We fear this is a very lame and impotent conclusion of all the controversy about official and non-official presidents, and is, to say the least, a very inadequate fulfilment of the assurance of the Bombay Government to the Viceroy that so far as possible there shall be no official presidents. Now we do not object to an official president as such, but we think it desirable that there should be as few nominated presidents as possible. If there is to be an earnest attempt at thoroughly educating the people in self-government, it stands to reason that wherever possible the people should be left free to nominate their own president. If our suggestion in our last article on this subject as to making two classes of municipalities be adopted, then the class possessed of superior intelligence and public spirit and self-sacrifice may be given the privilege of electing its own president; the other class, which we have designated Town Municipalities, may have its presidents nominated for it wherever necessary. We think the section ought to be so worded as to make the office of the president primâ facie elective. A president should be nominated only when the Governor in Council thinks a Board so backward as to be incapable of selecting a proper person. As regards the office of the vice-president the Bill provides for election of one only, when the president appointed or elected is a salaried servant of Government. It would seem that there would be no vice-president where the president is not a salaried servant of Government. We think the office should not be made dependent upon the existence or otherwise of a president who is a salaried servant of Government. We think it highly important that there should be no uncertainty or inequality as regards the constitution and staff of the different Municipal Boards. The duties of a vice-president should also, we think, be more clearly defined. If the vice-president is a necessary executive officer he ought to have a place on all Municipal Boards and must be given by the statute a definite position of authority. A distinct division of work should be specified. As it is, the vice-president is entirely dependent on the president. We think it desirable that the Bill itself should leave as little scope for friction as possible.

Contrasts the Local Self-Government Bills for the North-West Provinces and Oudh and Bombay.

The Indian Spectator (1) of the 23rd September contrasts the provisions of the North-West Provinces and Oudh Local Self-Government Bill with those of the Bills for Bombay, and remarks:—It is needless to say that as far as the constitution of Local Boards is concerned, as well as the powers of interference by the District Collector and Magistrate, the Bill is decidedly superior to that of the Bombay Government. With all the tall talk of the latter about its "cautious policy," the Government of Bombay's Local Boards Bill is illiberal, placed side by side with the Local Boards Bill of the North-West Provinces. There is none of that petty, arbitrary, meddling spirit which is to be discerned in the Bombay Bills. In the latter almost all the important sections contain cunningly devised clauses, so as to make the whole measure in practice a mere apology for what it ought to be. We strongly advise the Honourable Mr. Peile to take a few hints from this Bill. He will not only be the wiser for them, but will earn the gratitude of the people. His Excellency the Governor might also peruse with profit the speeches made by Messrs. Quinton and Hunter at the third reading of the Bill. He will then be able to see that in giving a more liberal measure of local self-government to the people of this Presidency he will, under no circumstances, tread on weak or unsafe ground as he now apprehends. Dr. Hunter spoke nothing but the naked truth when he observed that "if there was ever a series of measures free from the charge of doctrinaire legislation, it is the series to which the present Bill belongs . . . . Whatever may be the defects or the merits of the Bill, they are not the merits or defects of doctrinaire legislation." Certainly not. Yet, in the Bombay Presidency, which is as homogeneous as the North-West Provinces and Oudh, and even more advanced politically, our hysterically cautious rulers cannot give us a more liberal measure and that for the reason that the legislation forced upon them by the Supreme Government is dictated more by sentiments or impulses than by any pressing necessity or demand by the people at large! In short, that the scheme of local self-government is more or less the consequence of the doctrinaire spirit that is now alleged to be predominant in the Viceregal Council. We have more than once combated this absurd and very impolitic view. The scheme has absolutely nothing doctrinaire about it. The word is simply a shibboleth devised by the Indian bureaucracy, which has from the beginning resented the measure, striking as it does at its very root. Dr. Hunter is doing yeoman's service to the cause of political education in India, to which his lamented chief and friend Lord Mayo was the first to give a tangible impulse. And what we are more grateful for is that Dr. Hunter acts in this connection not so much as a member of Government as an independent member, as a representative of the people, if we may so put it.

Legislation.—The Native Magistrates' Jurisdiction Bill.

The natives of India will not be dissatisfied with a modification of the Native Magistrates' Jurisdiction Bill.

The Bombay Samáchár (86) of the 24th September observes that it is extensively believed that the Native Magistrates' Jurisdiction Bill will undergo modifications, and that the jurisdiction to try European offenders will be conferred not upon the Native Magistrates mentioned in the Bill but upon those natives only who belong to the Covenanted Civil Service and who have attained to the position of a District Magistrate or a Sessions Judge. This report has induced the opponents of the Bill to advance a new argument for withdrawing the measure. They assert that the proposed modification will confer the jurisdiction in question on two or three Native Magistrates; and this narrowed jurisdiction will displease natives. Thus the Bill will be distasteful to Europeans and natives alike and hence the best policy is to withdraw it. But natives are not of the opinion attributed to them. They anxiously desire that the Jurisdiction Bill should be passed in its present shape. They will, however, not be displeased if it is passed in a modified form. They value the Bill highly for the principle enunciated in it, and are quite indifferent to its minor provisions. That principle will remove to a limited extent the invidious distinction of race, and natives will be highly grateful to the Viceroy for this boon. They will also gladly wait for the extended application of the principle hereafter.

The disaffection shown by the planters of Bengal in connection with the Jurisdiction Bill ought to be put down with a strong hand.

With reference to the meeting recently held at Bhágalpore by the Indigo planters at which it was resolved that they should follow the advice given by Mr. Hudson in connection with the Jurisdiction Bill, that the Native Magistrate who for the first time tries a British-born subject should be ousted and should himself be tried for having dared to try a European, the Jáme Jamshed (99) of the 24th September observes that this resolution was passed at a public meeting, and if it be not disaffection towards Government, what else can it be? With regard to the intention expressed by the planters of Terai that if the Native Magistrates' Jurisdiction Bill becomes law, they will not enlist into a Volunteer Corps, and after alluding to the persistence shown by the Englishman newspaper in making improper remarks in connection with the telegram sent to England about the number of official opinions in favour of and against the Jurisdiction Bill, the Jáme remarks that this most unjustifiable opposition to the Supreme Government is the result of the weakness of the Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal, and unless he is removed and replaced by an officer of strong will the opponents of the measure will gather strength. The Supreme Government however ought to take severe notice of the disaffection which threatens to assume a more serious form if allowed to pass unnoticed. The Jáme thankfully acknowledges the offer made by Mr. Thomas Hughes to contribute his mite in support of the Jurisdiction Bill, and highly praises the Englishmen for their disinterestedness and love of fair-play.

Disapproves of the opinion given by Mr. Bamanji Edalji Modi, Acting First Class Magistrate of Broach, against the Native Magistrates' Jurisdiction Bill.

The Indian Spectator (1) of the 23rd September says:—Mr. Bamanji Edalji Modi, Acting First Class Magistrate of Broach, has favoured the world with his opinion on the Ilbert Bill. Of course it is against the Bill. He does not seem to have troubled himself much about the reasons on which he bases his opinion. But he has taken care to give us a bit of his family history instead! Mr. Modi says that though his family has always sided with the British Government (he means with certain officials) it has been a sufferer by the loyal adhesion. This remains to be seen. But Mr. Modi forgets that his patrons are not so ungrateful after all. The officials have provided the Surat Modis with lucrative posts and with honorary titles. He also forgets to make mention of the grant of valuable land made to his family by Mr. Alexander Rogers. Surely loyalists are not better paid in other countries. And yet, on perhaps the first occasion when Government wants his co-operation towards improving the judicial administration of the country, Mr. Modi opposes his official patrons! Mr. Modi will see that there are two ways of looking at a thing. Men who pique themselves on their loyalty are seldom of any use to the State. We do not object to Mr. Modi's personal opinion; but he must not pose himself as a friend of Government. Is it not something of a mockery that when a junior official like Mr. Modi is allowed to air his opinion, experienced men like Mr. Ránade and others are left in the back-ground? If a good number of native subordinate officials were asked to express their opinions, and if leading non-official citizens from among the native community were requested to do the same, the much-vaunted official majority against the Bill would be simply swamped.

Railways.

Complains of the want of third class carriages on the Rájputána Railway on the occasion of the recent fair at Ambáji.

The Hitechchhu (77) of Ahmedabad of the 27th September complains of the want of third class carriages on the Rájputána Railway on the occasion of the recent fair at Ambáji. As a large number of Hindu pilgrims collected at the Ahmedabad Station, a special train made up of goods waggons was run for four consecutive days. It is a matter for some consolation that the passengers had not to suffer so much hardship as they have to do on the occasion of other fairs. It is to be regretted that though nearly three years have elapsed since a direct communication by this line of railway was opened with Delhi and Agra, pilgrims should be packed like sheep in goods and cattle waggons for want of third class carriages. Four or five fairs occur every year in that portion of Gujarát which this line traverses and on which occasions a large number of pilgrims travel by it. It is necessary, therefore, that the railway authorities should keep some third class carriages in reserve at the Ahmedabad Station for use on such occasions. It is to be regretted that the same arrangements that were made for taking the pilgrims on to Abu Road Station were not observed on their return to Ahmedabad. It is to be hoped that the railway authorities will not fail to show solicitude for the convenience of pilgrims on the occasion of future fairs.

Municipalities.

Severely censures the Engineering Department of the Bombay Municipality for preparing a wrong estimate for the erection of the roof on the Malabar Hill Reservoir and a filter-bed in connection with the tank.

The Yajdán Parast (123) of the 23rd September observes that the actual expenditure on the Police quarters at Byculla was found to be three times the amount of the original estimate. Many days have not passed since this recklessness of the Municipal Engineering Department was discovered when a more astounding statement appears before the public. It is said that the roof over the Malabar Hill Reservoir and the filter-bed in connection with it cannot be completed within the sum of four lákhs of rupees which the Corporation has already granted and which was considered at the time more than sufficient for all requirements, and that two lákhs more will be wanted to complete them. The Engineering Department is liberally paid, and if it cannot prepare correct estimates it can be of little use to the Corporation. It has been found to have committed more than once serious blunders in preparing estimates, and if it be allowed to commit in future similar errors, it will place the Corporation one day in a very false position. The tremendous error of two lákhs of rupees in the estimate for the reservoir and the filter-bed ought not therefore to be allowed to pass without taking appropriate notice of it. The officer through whose negligence this mistake has been made ought to be duly punished. More than once have some of the municipal officers escaped the punishment they deserved for their negligence, by influencing their friends in the Corporation, and it is to be hoped that a similar shameful failure of justice will not be allowed in regard to the sad mess made in connection with the Malabar Hill Reservoir.

Municipal affairs at Surat.

The Indian Spectator (1) of the 23rd September says:—It is well known that the public of Surat are opposed to the dismantling of the fort walls, to the introduction of electric light and the extension of the garden—three hobbies on which the officials seem to have set their hearts. The fort walls have been found useful during the recent floods. Instead of light and the garden, the people have been clamouring for a supply of pure water. But the officials have put down all legitimate opposition, and have arranged, it is said, to get everything done according to their own wishes by irregular means. We commented upon the proceedings of a recent municipal meeting where the representatives of the people were very shabbily treated by the Collector and his men. At another meeting the other day under Mr. Whitworth (Mr. Collector White being absent) Mr. Kikábhái Prabhudás moved that the papers relating to these works be published so that people may see in what way and with whose consent their monies were spent. Mr. Kikábhái was supported by two or three other independent Commissioners. They were for the publication of the papers. But this was too much for Mr. Modi, an official member, who got up and said that there was no necessity for any publication, that newspapers only keep up differences between members of the municipality and the public! Mr. Whitworth is said to have been so shocked at Mr. Modi's unwarrantable aspersions that he asked that Pársi official to sit down. Votes were now taken, and the President voting on the right side, Mr. Modi and the other officials lost the day. This would not have happened if Mr. White had been in the chair. Mr. Whitworth has higher notions of duty. The old Modis of Surat have made themselves the laughing-stock of the public by their ridiculous airs of superiority and assumption of power. It is a pity their heirs cannot do better with all their education. No amount of official favour will save the family from popular opprobrium, unless they learn to respect public opinion. They must know that loyalty is not inconsistent with the claims of citizenship. [The Deshi Mitrá (91) of the 27th September expresses approval of the way in which Mr. Whitworth conducts the duties of the presidentship and wishes to have him nominated as president by Government. The people of Surat would be very fortunate if he were appointed president of the local municipality.]

Bales of cotton ought not to be stored in thickly-populated parts of the town of Surat.

The Gujarát Mitrá (76) of the 23rd September states that for a long time past large numbers of cotton bales belonging to cotton dealers or owners of cotton mills are being warehoused in thickly-populated parts of the town of Surat. It is feared that if a fire breaks out anywhere in the neighbourhood, much damage would be the result. The municipality ought to prohibit the storing of inflammable substances in thickly-populated parts.

The washermen and dyers at Kapadvanj ought to have a separate place for carrying on washing operations.

A correspondent of the Akhbáre Sodágar (82) of the 26th September complains that washermen and dyers wash clothes at several spots on the Mohor and Váránashi rivers at Kapadvanj, and hence persons who draw water at those places for their household consumption get dirty water, which must affect the health of the consumers. It is therefore desirable that the washermen and dyers should have a place specially allotted to them somewhere lower down in these rivers. They may be allowed to perform the washing operations near the bridge of Shangavpur. The attention of the authorities concerned is requested to the subject.

Native States.

Says that the office of the Assistant Political Agent at Cutch should now be done away with, as the specific temporary purpose for which the office was created no longer exists.

In a paragraph headed "the Assistant Political Agent at Cutch," the Indu Prakásh (9) of the 24th September says:—We find that Prince Kálubha, the younger brother of His Highness the Ráo of Cutch, has joined the Rájkumár College. This is a step in the right direction, and all we now trust is that the arrangement will bring about the curtailment of the costly machinery at present maintained at Cutch for special educational purposes. An English officer with the rank and title of Assistant Political Agent of Cutch has been maintained at a cost of several thousands of rupees annually to the State for the purposes of superintending the education of His Highness the Ráo. This education, it now appears, His Highness has completed, and the help of the officer is, we are told, no longer needed by His Highness, the greater part of whose time at present is devoted to being initiated in the administrative affairs of the State, and since the brother of the Ráo has now gone to Rájkot, the educational duties of the Assistant Political Agent have in fact ceased to exist. Nor can it be said that the work in the Agency at Bhuj is of such a heavy character as to render it necessary for the Political Agent to have the help of an Assistant. We cannot suppose therefore that for the sake of patronage the Bombay Government will think fit to maintain an officer in Cutch a day longer than necessary. The revenues of Cutch, we are told, cannot afford to put up with this burden for any length of time. The office of the Assistant Political Agent was created some years back after the death of the late Ráo for a specific temporary purpose, namely, the education of His Highness the Ráo. That object having been attained, let us hope that Sir James Fergusson, who has the interest of Cutch at heart, will see fit to disburden the State of this costly office and save the revenues from being expended in the maintenance of the luxury of an Assistant Political Agent.

Certain conduct of the Political Agent of Káthiáwár has terrified the people of that province so much that nobody transacts any business for the Maiyás.

A correspondent of the Gujaráti (95) of the 23rd September observes that the Maiyás complained to the Bombay Government that the members of the Commission appointed to enquire about their rights were the partizans of the Junágad State, but no attention was paid to their complaint. A memorial was therefore submitted to the Viceroy complaining against Colonel Barton. The Colonel did not like this and summoned Aja, the headman of the Maiyás. The latter was asked to mention the name of the person who wrote the memorial, and on its being found that one A'ppa Sáheb of Poona drafted it, the writer was at once seized in Morvi and taken to the Political Agent. His apprehension has spread so much terror in Káthiáwár that nobody dares to transact any business for the Maiyás, who are about to petition the Bombay Government on the subject.

A complaint against the misconduct of the Bhávnagar Police at the annual fair held at Gundikoliyák.

A correspondent of the Gujarát Mitrá (76) of the 23rd September states that an annual fair is held at Gundikoliyák, which is situated at a distance of six miles to the south of Gogha, on the 15th of the dark half of the Hindu month of Shrávan. The sacred place is situated within the boundaries of the Bhávnagar State, the police of which is deputed to preserve order and peace in the congregation at the fair. Some of the policemen do not discharge their duties properly, and sometimes make indecent attacks on good-looking females and levy black-mail on the shopkeepers. The correspondent hopes that the State authorities will take steps to prevent such scandalous acts being perpetrated by the police at future fairs.

Notes.—A. The notices from the different Newspapers have been collected in the Report under different heads, which are printed in italics.

B. The names of Newspapers are printed in the body of the Report in italics, and the number of the Newspaper in the above list is printed in brackets after the name.

C. The proprietors of the Newspapers marked * have not given information as to the number of copies issued. In these cases an estimate has been made by the Reporter.

D. The system of spelling vernacular words followed by the Reporter is the same as that adopted in the Official Spelling List of the Bombay Presidency. One peculiar feature of this system is that when the long a (आ or á) is the last letter of a word, the accent is left out, and the short a (अ = u in gun) is, to prevent confusion, never placed at the end of a word. This rule has been strictly followed, except that when the short a appears to be absolutely necessary to complete the pronunciation of a word, as in Arunodaya or the well known Mitra, it is printed with a mark over it to indicate that it is short, thus—ă.

E. Berár papers are received in this office for report under the Resolution of the Government of Bombay in the General Department, No. 1795, dated 8th June 1881.

Politics and the Public Administration.

Prays for an improvement in the existing system of nominating Natives to the Covenanted Civil Service.

The Bombay Samáchár (86) of the 6th October observes that the system of nominating Natives to the Covenanted Civil Service has been repeatedly condemned. To avoid the inconveniences of a visit to and residence in England for the purpose of passing the competitive examination, the natives of India desired that the examination should be held in India for the benefit of Native candidates. Instead of granting this prayer, Lord Lytton's Government introduced the system of selection and nomination irrespective of the educational attainments of the persons nominated. The system is defective and will ultimately lead to the impressment of many incompetent persons into the service. The opponents of the Native Magistrates' Jurisdiction Bill have harped upon the shortcomings of the method of nomination, and have rightly remarked that the jurisdiction to try Europeans should not be conferred on persons so selected. The number of the nominated Civilians is not large at present, but when it increases in course of time their shortcomings are sure to become glaring, and then they will be told to perform merely ministerial duties. Thoughtful Natives have from the beginning predicted the failure of Native Civilians nominated under the system of patronage. All Natives should join in requesting the Viceroy to put an end to the present absurd mode of admitting Natives into the Covenanted Civil Service. The Native aspirants for the Civil Service should be subjected to severe educational tests, and those who pass this ordeal should be sent to England for a limited period in case a visit to that country is considered indispensable. It is to be hoped that Lord Ripon will make some change in the direction above indicated and put Native Civilians on a par with their European coadjutors who have entered the service by competition. [The Jáme Jamshed (99) of the 5th October is glad that Government is about to make some alterations as above described in the present defective system of nomination.]

Suggests an increase in the limit of age for admission into the Indian Civil Service and condemns the present mode of nominating Natives to it.

In a paragraph headed "The limit of age for the Civil Service Examination," the Indu Prakásh (9) of the 1st October says:—It is very satisfactory to learn that there is a prospect of the limit of age for the Civil Service being again raised. The vicious policy of lowering the limit to 19 for the purpose of preventing the natives of India from successfully competing for the service has done harm to those very persons for whose especial benefit the change was introduced, and the parents and directors of educational institutions in England have been loud in their complaints as to the ruinous effects of cramming boys of 18 and 19 with the tremendous quantity of knowledge required for the Civil Service Examination. It is because the reduction of age has told considerably upon the health and intellect of English youths that the movement to ensure the increase of the limit of age has begun, and that there is a chance of success in such movement. The Bombay Gazette, in an able leader in its issue of Friday last, points out the unwisdom of the reduction of age to 19 and the necessity of again restoring it to 23 or to 21 at least. The Gazette has a hit at the statutory Civilians, and suggests that what has been called the back-door entrance to the Civil Service should be closed. We should not at all regret if this back-door is closed, provided a certain minimum number of places in the Civil Service is reserved. We were among the foremost of the bitterest opponents of Lord Lytton's scheme of the nominated Native Civil Service. We pointed out then that what Natives desired was not favouritism or patronage, but fair play and equal rights—that they claimed admission, not in a separate inferior service by means of official partiality, but in the great Civil Service of the country by open competition on the same terms. We are fully alive to the possibility of Europeans looking with contempt upon the inferior Civilians of Lord Lytton's creation, and we think the contempt may to a certain extent be even justifiable. We fully endorse the views of Professor Wordsworth and Mr. Justice Pinhey as to the incompetency, the deficient mental and moral calibre, and the somewhat ignominious position of these nominated Civilians. Occasionally the selection of Government may be happy; the recipient of Government favour may prove quite as efficient an officer as one of the other service. On the other hand, it is not everyone that belongs to the competitive service that is able and conscientious. There may be a few black sheep in the latter as there may be an occasional brilliant luminary in the former service. But as a matter of principle, it is unquestionable that the competitive system will give the very pick of the market, while the patronage system will bring forth only sycophants and intellectual non-entities. Thus in so far as Lord Lytton's scheme rewards flattery and wealth without any regard to intellectual fitness and perpetuates inferiority, we are quite prepared to see that scheme knocked on the head. But as we have said, we should not grudge the abolition, only if the one merit of that scheme, viz. the recognition of our claim to at least one-sixth of the number of appointments, be preserved to us under the competitive system, and a few other small facilities given to us for joining in the competition, such, for instance, as a higher limit of age, the holding of the examination in India, and so forth. Until that is done we must be thankful for small favours.

Relations of the British Government with the Amir of Cabul, and remarks in connection therewith.

The Shiváji (61) of the 28th September says that the Indian public has no means of judging how far the efforts of the Government of India to win over the Amir of Afghanistan to its side have been or are likely to be successful. It is a matter of notoriety that the representative of the British Government at the court of Cabul is not much respected, and if this be so it does not behove the Government of India to place much reliance on the friendly assurances of the Amir. It does not require much ingenuity to show from the conduct and character of the Amir Abdul Rahman, that he is not skilled in the art of government or in diplomacy. There can be no doubt whatever that his best interests ought to induce him to behave in a friendly manner towards the reigning power in India. The Government of India has no intention whatever of subjugating Afghanistan and annexing it to its dominions. The intentions of the Russian Government, however, are very different. If Russia has an evil eye on India, then only it will be able to accomplish its design by first conquering Afghanistan and making it Russian territory. For these reasons the Amir should throw in his fate with the destinies of the rulers of India if he wishes to preserve his independence. If it be true that the Amir does not treat the representative of the Viceroy of India at his court with becoming respect, then the latter should pursue a cautious policy towards this foolish prince. The British Government should also behave in a liberal and frank spirit towards its Native subjects, and should endeavour to conciliate them if it wishes its rule in India to be perpetual. If the rulers of India pursue a policy of trickery towards their Native subjects, they will find the task of confronting Russia one of enormous difficulty.

Makes some remarks in connection with the list of agricultural implements and machines published by the Government of India.

After expressing heartfelt gratitude to the Supreme Government for publishing a list of agricultural implements and machines which have been found useful in India, and after briefly noticing the contents of the list, the Bombay Samáchár (86) of the 3rd October observes that the description of the implements and machines is not sufficiently copious. The prices of several of these implements are high and consequently poor agriculturists will not be able to purchase them. The ploughs whose prices vary from ten to fifty rupees are within the reach of cultivators; but those of water-pumps and of sugarcane mills are exorbitant when compared with the pecuniary resources of the Indian ryot. The smallest of these machines cost one hundred rupees each, but as they perform less work than indigenous implements of the same kind, the cultivators will not care to purchase them. The agriculturists ask for such implements and machines as can be procured cheaply and which would do more work in less time and with less labour than can be executed by indigenous implements and machines. If European artizans are unable to meet this demand, Native artizans should try and meet it themselves.

The Yajdán Parast (123) of the 30th September is glad that Government have resolved to close the retail sale of school-books. The establishment of the Government Central Book Depôt interfered with private enterprize. It ought to have been abolished long ago. It is said that the Director of Public Instruction is opposed to the abolition of the Central Book Depôt, but the objections which can be urged against such a step are neither weighty nor sound. The proprietors of several private presses are in a position to print and sell school-books at a cheaper rate than the rate at which they are sold at present. Proprietors of private presses can also obtain better wood-cuts than those given in the manuals of Mr. Hope's Gujaráti school series, and can produce school-books the printing and binding of which is of a superior character. It is to be hoped that the Director of Public Instruction will not interfere with private enterprize, which will prove very beneficial to the public, and that the resolution of Government on the subject will be carried out in its entirety.

Is glad that Government have resolved to stop the retail sale of school-books at the Government Central Book Depôt.

The Subodh Patrika (11) of the 30th September says:—Is it true that the Calcutta correspondent of the London Times is in the service of Government, and therefore receives his pay from the taxes paid by the people of India? It is said this is so, and yet he has been not only abusing in the most vehement manner the people and the Government of India, but also supplying the most one-sided and garbled accounts to the London paper and thus mislead the public in England. We therefore beg to ask—is this in accordance with the rules of the service, and can Native servants of Government act similarly, or is this also a privilege or birthright of the Britons? We entreat the Times of India to answer this question, because that paper most prominently dwelt on Native servants of Government attending public meetings held to express sympathy for Bábu Surendranáth Bánnerji, and if the rule should be the same for all, we would ask Government to see to the removal of this small anomaly also. No doubt if the Government of Lord Ripon moves in this matter just now his Lordship's motives would be misconstrued and a terrible onslaught would be made against him. He would be represented as a despot who wishes to smother all honest channels of public opinion, and so in this instance Sir T. Mádhav Ráo's suggestion based on "practical statesmanship" may be followed with advantage and consideration of the matter held over a few months; but we do hope it may not be overlooked entirely. Every man of course has a perfect right to his opinion and his ways; but if these conflict with the terms of his position in the public service, he must clearly make up his choice between the two, as he has no right to eat the salt of the people and the Government and to denounce both to serve a partisan cause.

Says that the Calcutta correspondent of the London Times, as a servant of Government, has no right to denounce Government and the people of India, whose salt he eats, in order to serve a partisan cause.

The Bombay Chronicle (75) of the 30th September observes that the people of Goa complain that, not satisfied with causing discontent amongst their own poor subjects in the Bombay Presidency by taxing the toddy-trees heavily, the British authorities are pressing the Government of Goa to follow their example. The Goanese earnestly hope that their Government will not readily consent to adopt the policy of depriving their poor subjects of a cheap and harmless article of consumption. If the Goanese Government stoutly resist the pressure which the British Delegate is said to be putting on them, they will deserve the hearty thanks of their subjects.

Wishes that the toddy trees in Goa should not be heavily taxed.

The Dnyán Prakásh (8) of the 1st October in its local news states that owing to a heavy fall of rain on the 27th of September last the rivulets on the road to Alandi from Poona were unusually swollen and several accidents happened to pilgrims in crossing them. Owing to the water in the rivulet called Kalus having risen to an immense height and the current being also very strong, several persons are reported to have been carried away in crossing it. Such accidents occur annually to the pilgrims who resort to Alandi. It would be well if the local fund committee were to take measures to construct a bridge over this rivulet. If funds are not available for this purpose, the local fund committee should raise a loan to enable it to construct the work in question, and a small fee of a quarter of an anna should be levied on each pilgrim crossing this bridge in order to meet the charges on account of interest and the repayment of the money raised.

Advises the early construction of flood-works at Surat.

With reference to the request made by the people of Surat to the flood relief committee to ask Government to take steps for constructing certain works on the Tápti for the prevention of damage from floods, the Yajdán Parast (123) of the 30th September advises the inhabitants of Surat to memorialize Government on the subject, and suggests that the committee should strongly support this appeal. Within the last fourteen years Surat has been visited by floods about six times, and there can be no doubt that works are urgently required for its protection. The municipality did something in this matter in 1869, but had the corporation executed all the works that were then considered necessary, the floods would not have been so destructive as they actually were. Government ought to appoint a commission to ascertain what works are needed and an estimate for them may be made afterwards. In the meanwhile the corporation would do well to save funds for these indispensable works, for which provision ought to be made at the earliest opportunity.

Points out the advantages of constructing a strong iron quay near that end of the Hope Bridge which leads to Ránder.

The Suryá Prakásh (80) of the 29th September says that the road leading to Ránder after crossing the Hope Bridge at Surat is annually washed away by the floods. It is necessary, therefore, that a strong iron quay should be constructed there, which will save the money spent every year on its repairs. Moreover, the construction of the quay will add to the safety of the Hope Bridge and will prove beneficial to the people and the toll-farmer. The matter is important, and it is to be hoped that the authorities concerned will attend to it.

Advises the police of Bombay to make enquiries into certain cases of suicide recently committed.

With reference to the suicide by poison committed recently by a young Pársi woman in Vániávádi lane in the Dhobitaláv quarter, the Kaiser-i-Hind (102) of the 30th September observes that the Coroner's jury gave on the evidence produced before it the verdict that the deceased committed suicide in consequence of the ill-treatment to which she was subjected by her mother-in-law, and yet, strange to say, the police do not appear to have made any enquiries into the nature of the ill-treatment. From the information received by the Kaiser it seems that there is some truth in the inference drawn by the jury that the deceased suffered oppression from her mother-in-law. In order that justice may be done in this case as well as that the evil may be checked, it is desirable that the police should make due enquiries and bring the mother-in-law to condign punishment. Enquiries should also be made by the police in regard to the suicide committed by a young Pársi, in whose case the Coroner's jury returned the verdict that the deceased committed the crime in consequence of the improper conduct of his wife. The wife should be made an example of in order to serve as a warning to other women.

Local Self-government.

Criticisms on the clauses relating to control in the Local Self-government Bills for the Bombay Presidency.

In an article headed "The Local Self-government Bills," the Indu Prakásh (9) of the 1st October says:—One very obvious defect which pervades all the sections about control is the total disregard of the principle of audi alteram partem. In none of the provisions, whether the control or check has to be applied by the Collector or his nominee, by the Commissioner, or by His Excellency in Council, is there any power reserved to the peccant municipal board to represent its grievances or submit its explanation before the authority in question chooses to fulminate its anathema maranatha. That no man shall be convicted without a hearing is one of the most familiar and undisputed maxims of the British law, and yet in the control provisions as framed there is a complete latitude given to the officers invested with the powers to use them without calling upon a defaulting board to account for a particular piece of misconduct and without allowing it a locus penitentiæ. We humbly submit that in whatever matter there is to be the least interference with the action of the boards, the latter should have the right of being heard first before judgment is pronounced against it, and it should also have the right of appeal to a higher tribunal. If we are right in our contention, the provisions will have to be modified to secure the privilege above contended for to municipal boards. We are aware that in reply to this it may be said that no controlling authority will as a matter of fact be so indiscreet as to interfere with the action of a board without first giving it an opportunity of explaining its conduct, that the explanation will be asked for and given as a matter of course, but we think it highly important that the right of being heard before interference should be declared by the Legislature in express terms. The enforcement of the powers of control is unquestionably a matter of discretion with the executive officers, but while trusting to their discretion and good sense as to the propriety of an occasion of interference, we think it necessary that the procedure in which that discretion is to be exercised should be clearly laid down, and in that procedure should be included this right of the defaulting board to be heard, as we have said, before judgment, and a further right of appealing to a higher authority. The object of the control provisions has been stated to be "to restrict the expenditure of local funds by local bodies to legitimate and reasonable purposes and to correct any abuse or errors which may occur." In another place it has been said that "it is the duty of a responsible government to make provision that those who are entrusted with public money shall spend it in the true interests of the localities to which it belongs, and of the whole community," and further it could not be tolerated that a local board should dissociate itself from the policy of the central government or fall back from the level of civilization which that government endeavours to maintain. As we have said, we fully admit the importance of these objects, but we venture to think the provisions devised to secure these objects are unnecessarily severe. Thus in Section 36 the Collector is empowered to peremptorily stop the doing of a thing proposed to be done by a municipality if in his opinion it is likely to cause injury or annoyance to the public or to lead to a breach of the peace, and he is only required to report his action to the Commissioner and to Government, who are both empowered to revise the action of the Collector. Here, it will be observed, no right is reserved to the board of appealing against the Collector's proceedings. In the first place it seems highly unlikely that a board composed of the very cream of society, some of them responsible officers of Government, should be guilty of any action so outrageous as to cause a breach of the peace. But assuming such a contingency possible, the powers given to the Collector are to our mind extremely summary, and the revisional check so distant and shadowy that in many cases where the Collector's opinion might be eventually found to be wrong the aggrieved municipality will be without a remedy and its intended action will be frustrated. We think a timely remonstrance and report will amply meet the requirements of the case. Further, the municipality should have the right of complaining against the Collector both to the Commissioner and the Governor in Council. Similarly Section 37 empowers the Collector to order municipal boards to do certain things he may please, and on default to get the things done at the cost of the municipality. Further, the Collector is given control over municipal funds. The only check provided is a report by the Collector to the Commissioner advising him of his action. Here also we think very arbitrary powers are bestowed on the Collector. We know of an instance in which the Collector ordered a municipality to pay the cost of laying out a private garden near his own bungalow. The chairman of the municipality, who happened to be an independent man, declined to pay the cost. The Collector got the chairman to vacate his office by making it too hot for him to remain in it, and then saw himself paid from the municipal funds. Now we ask, what is there to prevent such an occurrence under Section 37? The Collector might think the execution of a particular reform necessary and urgent, but his power should be limited to advising the municipality and to reporting to the Commissioner in case any board proved recalcitrant. The board should likewise have the right of representation to the Commissioner and the Governor in Council. But in no case should the Collector be empowered to compel a board to do his bidding, or appropriate the revenues of the board to any purpose against the express wishes of the board. The effect of such a provision will, we apprehend, be very demoralizing. If the Collector is to be allowed thus to put the screw on the boards, and if he is to have such sovereign power over their funds, there will be no protection to the boards if an unscrupulous Collector chose to force his pet schemes of reform upon them, and the boards themselves will be quite powerless to resist the Collector's encroachments. Section 38 likewise empowers the Governor in Council to suspend or prohibit, with or without previous enquiry, the levy of any tax, toll and so forth which may be thought by His Excellency in Council to be unfair or obnoxious. Now we have no objection to a suspension, but we certainly do not see any reason in prohibiting a levy without any enquiry. The rules and bye-laws under which an impost may be levied must be sanctioned by Government before they are enforced. Prima facie, therefore, the levy will be fair and justifiable. But if the people affected by it represent to His Excellency that it is unfair and obnoxious, His Excellency may be justified in suspending the impost, but not, we submit, prohibiting it altogether without even calling upon the board for explanation. Sections 39 and 40 are similarly arbitrary, and, in our opinion, severe measures. We are afraid the action of the boards cannot be free and independent with such halters round their necks. In respect to the different grades of controlling authorities, we think there may be appointed a central local self-government board in place of the Commissioners, which like the self-government board in England, or the Special Judge and his assistants superintending the operation of the Deccan Agriculturists' Relief Act, should have the power of directing, regulating, supervising and revising the conduct of the different local boards in the Presidency. Mr. Javerilál Umiáshankar in his excellent Note suggested the formation of such a central board, and we think the suggestion deserving of great consideration. A central board will act as a mediator between local boards and the executive Government, and by its intercession the friction likely to be caused by the control provisions will be considerably minimized. The board may be composed of a paid executive officer and some honorary members, and the expense of its establishment may be paid by a contribution from the different local boards. Thus without any additional expense to Government a controlling office will be created which will greatly lighten the labours and responsibilities of the executive officers of Government. Among the miscellaneous provisions there are some sections requiring remark. Section 45 prescribes a limitation of three months from the cause of action to suits against municipalities. Now, having regard to the difficulty an aggrieved person frequently has of finding through the intricacies of correspondence when a particular cause of action arose, the limitation may not, we think, improperly be fixed at one year or at least six months from the last decision. Among the duties of municipalities are enumerated the establishment and maintenance of relief and relief works in time of famine or scarcity and the maintenance of middle-class and primary schools. With respect to these, provision should be made in the Act itself as to what amount of contribution the boards shall receive from the provincial revenues. The Honourable Mr. Peile intimated in his speech before the Council that arrangements are being made for the transfer of the items of revenue and expenditure on these heads to the local boards. But we think some indication may be made in the Act itself as to the proposed transfer. Lastly, we have to suggest that the present Bill should rather consolidate and amend than merely amend the existing law. The leading principles underlying the present measure are so distinct from those of Act VI. of 1873 that the changes proposed to be made entirely alter the character of the law, and we deem it expedient that the new boards and the public should have placed before them the whole law in one Act rather than the clumsy apparatus of an old Act and its amendment. A similar remark is applicable to the Local Boards Bill.

Maladministration of local funds.

The Indian Spectator (1) of the 30th September, in an article headed "'Highly successful' administration of Local Funds!!" remarks:—It is worthy of note that prominent members of Government, be they members of the higher or lower Olympus, or minor deities presiding over a district, are now and then charged with misrepresentation. We have repeatedly protested against this unfortunate habit. Departments are found to falsify facts and contrive to represent matters to the public in a way almost to leave a wrong impression. So general is the practice of misleading, that it is not possible now-a-days for impartial publicists to put anything like implicit trust in official statements. An unpleasant impression comes over the mind that there may be a studied attempt at suppression of truth and suggestion of its contrary. Evidence to this effect abounds in State papers, minutes and administration reports emanating from time to time from various Governments and Administrations. So that we think there is fair justification for the Statesman's bitter remark, "if you want to be misled, put your faith in an official report upon the subject you are enquiring into." If the reader is desirous to be misled into the belief that local funds, as administered in past years by district officials in this Presidency, have been "highly successful," he is welcome to pin his faith in the inspired assertion in the 4th paragraph of the Statement of Objects and Reasons that accompanies Mr. Peile's Local Boards Bills. It passes our comprehension how so reckless an opinion should have been hazarded by this experienced official when ample evidence is to be found in the Parliamentary Blue-book, published some time ago, containing a variety of opinions on local self-government in the past as given by many a fair-minded district officer of this Presidency. But if further verification of that highly misleading assertion is desirable, we beg the reader to take note of the facts we now place before him in connection with the alleged misapplication of the funds of the Ahmedabad Municipality. The writer here points out the hollowness of the party cry of mismanagement raised against the new municipal board at Ahmedabad, how the municipality, which had two years ago a cash balance of about two lákhs of rupees, became involved in debt by the construction of the so-called "arterial" road and by the erection of some new markets and warehouses, the misappropriation of the sum of Rs. 20,000, the trust fund of the Ranchhordás Charitable Dispensary by Mr. Fernandez, the late permanent chairman of the municipality, and proceeds:—It will be urged on behalf of the late permanent chairman that he acted under the orders of the Collector. If so, in the interests of the Ahmedabad public we demand that all the papers and correspondence relating to this unfortunate transaction be forthwith placed on the editors' table. Let the public be allowed the opportunity to judge how far this official delinquency could have been shared by the Collector. The Government of Bombay will suffer in its reputation for fairness and impartiality if with the view to screen the offenders it fails to make public the entire correspondence, inclusive of the minute recorded at Broach by Mr. Borradaile. What a sad moral this is on the regime of official presidents, who are supposed to successfully administer local funds of city municipalities in the Presidency! But if such high-handedness is practised in broad daylight in a first class city like Ahmedabad, what will not a district official and his nominees do in remote tálukás cut off from public criticism, where the people dare not breathe a syllable or raise so much as their hands to heaven against the maladministration of their funds? So petrified is their public spirit by the blighting influence of the district potentate! And then our rulers talk of keeping watch over local boards, lest these should misapply the funds to be entrusted to them under the new Acts. How very honourable! What a highly moral spectacle they present to the gaze of the public, to whom they are never tired of saying that the local boards to be now created must be kept in check at every stage by the Collector with the all-powerful bludgeon clauses so necessary in the beginning! We should like to know by what name Mr. Richey would call this diversion of the local funds by his protege, Mr. Fernandez, the late chairman of the Ahmedabad Municipality. This matter will enable the impartial public to judge how far official statements can be relied upon, and how far all the tall talk about the admirable and efficient management of local funds by Collector-presidents is based on facts.

Legislation.—The Native Magistrates' Jurisdiction Bill.

Remarks regarding the attitude of the opponents of the Jurisdiction Bill.

The Subodh Patrika (11) of the 30th September says :—The Times of India thinks it has discovered an invulnerable argument against Lord Ripon in his Lordship's declaration of March last that the fullest opportunity would be given for the expression of public opinion on the Ilbert Bill and that adverse opinion will receive due weight. That journal therefore triumphantly quotes and repeats his Lordship's words, and again and again asks him to withdraw the Bill if he is not to withdraw his own words. What a logic is here displayed! It is as sane and sound and honest as the assertion so often made by the opponents of the Bill that Natives have or can have no interest in the matter. Because Lord Ripon promised to give weight to opinions against the Bill, his Lordship must ignore all arguments in its favour and forthwith abandon the measure. With the one-sided assurance which has characterized the opposition it is declared to be impossible that in his Lordship's judgment the arguments in favour of the Bill should outweigh those against it. Will the Times of India and its confrères deign to allow any liberty of opinion to the Viceroy? If it is pleased to do so our contemporary may with its similarly situated brother of the Indian Daily News take solid comfort in the reflection that if Lord Ripon in the exercise of his right does not abandon the Bill he will have given more weight to their first utterances on the wisdom and justice of the measure than to the opinions which both the journals above named, from whatever cause, were obliged to advocate with a sudden change of front; and as first thoughts are said to be the best thoughts, the journals in question should feel inwardly flattered, though they may express outward displeasure, at the passing of the Bill which on its first appearance and in the absence of misleading influences met with their own hearty approval.

Criticises Rája Sir T. Mádhav Ráo's opinion on the Jurisdiction Bill.

The same says :—Among the very few Natives, official and non-official, who have recommended the withdrawal of the Native Magistrates' Jurisdiction Bill we regret to find the name of Rája Sir T. Mádhav Ráo, and we do so not because he like another Rája hailing from the north has for whatever reason ranged himself against the Bill,—no, far from it, for Rája Sir T. Mádhav Ráo was not like Rája Shivprasád speaking as a representative—though nominated and not elected—of any section of the people, and therefore is fully entitled to hold and express what opinions he chooses. The cause of our dissatisfaction with the particular opinion he has given is that a very lame reason is assigned for it. The Rája approves of the principle of the Bill, but counsels its withdrawal only because it is opposed by a majority of Anglo-Indians, and he does so in the hope that the clamour of the opposition may in a short time be appeased, when it could be taken up again. This position seems to us utterly untenable irrespective of the circumstance that the arguments against the Bill are far less weighty than those in favour of it. The position assumed by Sir T. Mádhav Ráo ignores two important facts, namely, that this clamour was raised with unexpected suddenness by a clique after the principle of the Bill had been tacitly acquiesced in by officials and non-officials, and it is sure to be revived with tenfold vigour from the temporary success which it would meet with (if this counsel is followed) whenever an amendment of the law in this direction should be brought up; and secondly, that when civil jurisdiction was proposed to be given to Native Judges over Europeans a similar opposition was manifested. If the Government of that day had followed the advice now tendered by Sir T. Mádhav Ráo, where would even that jurisdiction which is now accepted as a matter of course have been to-day, and what grave disadvantages would people having money-dealings with Europeans have not been put to? Any such concession to the clamour of a class, however powerful or noisy, therefore, would simply result in a virtual surrender of the principle at stake, and this would be a poor achievement for that "practical statesmanship" in the name of which Sir T. Mádhav Ráo recommends the Government of Lord Ripon to withdraw the Jurisdiction Bill. Surely the Rája in the course of his own official experience must have come across similar questions, on a small scale no doubt, but involving the same principle, and how did he act then? In his dealings with the vested interests of the Sardárs and sávkárs of Baroda, for instance, did he show such deference to the opposition as he now advises? Of course he did not, and for this he has been justly praised, though if circumstances alone are to shape the course of practical statesmanship this advice might have been more suitable in that case. This then is the reason why we are dissatified with the opinion of Rája Sir T. Mádhav Ráo on the Ilbert Bill, and as he speaks with certain authority, though in his individual capacity, it is requisite that the Native press should not allow his opinion to go unchallenged, as it is certain to be made use of by the opponents of the Bill.

Education.

Mr. Oliver as Professor of English at the Elphinstone College and remarks in connection therewith.

A correspondent of the Mahrátta (2) of the 30th September, signing himself "an Elphinstonian," in alluding to the appointment of Mr. Selby as Tutor to the Chief of Gondal, says that the result of this arrangement will be that Mr. Oliver will continue to act as Professor of English Literature at the Elphinstone College for an indefinite period in the future. Those who have had to study under this gentleman have much cause to be dissatisfied with his teaching. Mr. Wordsworth's remark before the Education Commission that while paying larger fees than the fees at the Continental Universities in Europe the students here get an inferior article for the money they spend, is very aptly illustrated by the English teaching in the Elphinstone College. The explanations which Mr. Oliver gives of easy words and phrases are often extremely ludicrous and absurd. When to this sort of teaching are added utterly wrong interpretations of passages copiously annotated in different editions, the question of his competency to teach English in an Arts College can no longer be a matter of doubt. The correspondent knows it for a fact that a representation about this matter was made to the Principal of Elphinstone College, but a counter-representation having been sent on account of party spirit the affair was allowed to drop. The correspondent requests Mr. Wordsworth to redress this grievance of the students. It is the duty of the Director of Public Instruction to provide a competent staff of professors.

Railways.

Remarks in connection with the treatment of the lowest class of passengers on railways.

The Subodh Patrika (11) of the 30th September says:—We see it stated that one of the defects perceived by the committee appointed to enquire into the working of the railway police system in India is that there is no independent agency at present to bring to the notice of the authorities any irregularities and oppression on the part of the Railway Companies' servants. This defect, though noticed in connection with the working of the Madras railways, holds equally good of all railways, and in no case more strongly than in that of the G. I. P. Railway. It affects most the lowest class of passengers, who are the main source of the railway passenger income, but who nevertheless are treated as little better than beasts, especially in the matter of overcrowding, and when this is the case with the very first item of comfortable travelling it is useless to expect better attention in other respects. On the station platforms the railway officials are the monarchs of all they survey, and with police peons at their beck can do pretty much as they like. The presence of an independent agency travelling with passengers with each train and ready to hear complaints is calculated to meet an urgent want, and it is to be hoped that the Government of India, whose attention to the subject of railway management has resulted in the removal of some inconveniences, will introduce this much-needed agency on all our railways in the interest of the ignorant and poor third class passengers.

Complains of overcrowding in third class carriages on the Rájputána-Málwa Railway.

The Hitechchhu (77) of Ahmedabad of the 4th October complains of overcrowding in third class carriages on the Rájputána-Málwa Railway and the great inconvenience and trouble suffered by women and children travelling in third class carriages by it. At the Ahmedabad station some care appears to be taken for the comfort of passengers, but at the intermediate stations the case is the reverse. Rash and mischievous persons sit at ease, place their luggage on the seats, and thereby cause great inconvenience to other passengers. The Cábuli pilgrims who travel by this line occupy a whole carriage for themselves between about 20 persons, when the carriage should contain 32 passengers. Owing to the ignorance of the language spoken by these pilgrims and their dirty habits, other passengers do not like to travel in the same carriage with them, and the result is that the latter have to suffer inconvenience. The overcrowding of carriages is owing to the negligence of the railway employés at the different stations who do not look after the comfort of passengers. There is only one station-master and a shunting-porter at petty stations, and it is manifest that they cannot attend to the accommodation of such a large number of passengers. The second guard is also unable to give his entire attention to the comfort of passengers, for he has to attend to other things as well. It is necessary that this state of things should be put a stop to. The police should attend to the matter.

Municipalities.

Requests the municipality of Bombay to compel owners of fields in Khetwádi, Girgaon, Tárdev and Byculla to raise the level of their lands.

The Kaiser-i-Hind (102) of the 30th September is thankful to the municipality of Bombay for raising the level of Khetwádi and thereby improving its sanitation, and observes that in the same quarter and in Girgaon, Tárdev, and Byculla there are fields here and there the level of which is far below the level of the surrounding land. In these fields are grown vegetables in the fair season and rice in the monsoon. For the cultivation of rice these fields are enclosed and water is stored in them in the rains and for some time afterwards. They thus become shallow ponds for nearly six months in the year, keeping the surrounding atmosphere moist, and thus cause jungle fever in the neighbouring quarters. The municipality ought to compel the owners of these fields to raise their level. The proprietors of these lands are mostly well-to-do persons who can well afford to meet the cost of filling them. If they sink capital for this work they would be repaid by superior kitchen and garden produce. The Corporation ought to put some pressure on the owners of these fields in the interests of public health.

Extensive prevalence of cholera at Bulsár, the sanitation of which needs improvement.

A correspondent of the Rást Goftár (110) of the 30th September states that cholera has been committing havoc among the Mahomedans and the lower classes of Hindus at Bulsár. There were latterly several deaths among the Pársis of the same place from the same epidemic, and such a panic has spread among the last-named that several families have left the station and have gone to reside elsewhere. Much dirt and rubbish are collected in several places at Bulsár, but strange to say the municipality has yet taken no steps to improve the sanitation of the town, nor is any attention paid to the sale of diseased mutton in the bazárs.

Native States.

Complains of the oppressive conduct of the Gáikwád's police located on the road between Cambay and A'nand.

A correspondent of the Gujarát Mitra (76) of the 30th September observes that a police guard is kept in the Gáikwád's territory on the road between Cambay and A'nand to protect travellers from highway robbers. The carts bound from Cambay to Adhováya visit A'nand and keep village guards with them, who are taken up at either Danteli or some other village. The Gáikwád's policemen do not allow these carts to enter Petlád or the road from Petlád to A'nand unless the cartmen agree to take up the village watchmen selected by the police and to pay them the remuneration dictated by themselves. It seems that the Gáikwád's police divide the remuneration with the watchmen furnished by them. If the guards brought by cartmen from Danteli or other villages be untrustworthy, the Superintendent of Police of the Kaira District, the Police Náib Subha of the Petlád Division, and a properly authorized officer from the Cambay State should settle between them what guards should accompany the carts, and should relieve the travellers of the unnecessary annoyance to which they are put by the Gáikwád's police.

Says that insects are destroying cotton crops in Amreli and surrounding villages.

A correspondent of the Bombay Samáchár (86) of the 1st October, writing on the 23rd September from Amreli, states that after the recent heavy downpour insects called Telu have appeared in the fields of this place and the surrounding villages. These insects have totally eaten up young cotton plants and consumed the leaves of grown-up cotton plants, and have done much damage to the cotton crop.

Recommends that the post of Assistant Political Agent at Cutch should be abolished.

The Gujaráti (95) of the 30th September observes that the young Ráo of Cutch is now perfectly able to manage his territory, and his brother Káluba has joined the Rájkumár College at Rájkot, and there is therefore no longer any need for continuing the post of Assistant Political Agent, which should be at once abolished. This office is quite useless. The Bombay Government, however, is reckless of the interests of Native States and often involves them in useless expenditure. Several years ago the Chief of Pálanpur was young and the State suffered from the evil of highway robberies. An Assistant Political Agent was thereupon appointed to the State and an addition of Rs. 300 was made to his pay. This increase was made on the plea that the officer was to be the guardian of the prince until he should have attained his majority. The boundary dispute between Dánta and Pálanpur has been settled and there is now no fear of highway robberies. The Chief now personally conducts the administration, and yet the Political Agent continues to draw Rs. 300, which was granted to him for the performance of a special duty which he has ceased to do. The Kárbháris of the State tried to curtail this extra expenditure, but they did not succeed. Whenever an application on the subject was made, the Assistant Political Agent got angry and it had to be withdrawn. The Bombay Government also does not appear to have paid due attention to the matter. It is to be hoped that this will not occur in the case of Cutch.

Observes that the Chief of Gondal does not require a tutor.

The Gujarát Mitrá (76) of the 30th September observes that after completing his education at the Rájkumár College the young Chief of Gondal was sent on a tour to England and the Continent of Europe, and he is expected to return to India at the close of November next. He was distinguished at college for hard study and close application. Messrs. Macnaghten and Selby, the joint-administrator of Gondal, and the Political Agent of Káthiáwár have one and all testified to the great intelligence of the Chief, and Mr. Macnaghten and Lieutenant-Colonel Scott recommended that on the completion of his eighteenth year he should be entrusted with the administration of his State. The young Ráo of Cutch was charged with the administration of his State at the age of seventeen though he did not receive his education in a college. The Chief of Bánsda was placed in possession of his State though he did not complete his education in the Rájkumár College. Notwithstanding all these facts, the Bombay Government have nominated Mr. Selby tutor to the Chief of Gondal, and he is to take charge of his new duties from 6th October 1883 while the Chief is to arrive about the end of November following! Again, since the Chief has completed his college career and will have soon finished his travels in Europe there is no need of a tutor to him after his return to India. Under these circumstances it seems strange that Government should delay in making over the administration of the State to its Chief. The Chief of Limbdi was entrusted with the administration of his State soon after his return from Europe, while the young Chiefs of Wadhwán, Morvi and other States were placed in charge of their respective States after a tour of six months in India. The State of Gondal has been in charge of the British Government for the last fourteen years, and the people thereof have had to suffer many grievances. The mother of the young Chief ought therefore to take due steps to get the administration of the State entrusted to her son immediately after his return. If the Government of Bombay were acquainted with all the circumstances connected with this Chief, they would not impose upon the State the burden of the salaries of three European officials. Major Nutt and Mr. Jayashankar together draw a monthly salary of Rs. 1,700, Major Hancock is in Europe with the Chief and draws Rs. 1,000 per month, and Mr. Selby is to get his pay from the State from 6th October.

Notes.—A. The notices from the different Newspapers have been collected in the Report under different heads, which are printed in italics.

B. The names of Newspapers are printed in the body of the Report in italics, and the number of the Newspaper in the above list is printed in brackets after the name.

C. The proprietors of the Newspapers marked * have not given information as to the number of copies issued. In these cases an estimate has been made by the Reporter.

D. The system of spelling vernacular words followed by the Reporter is the same as that adopted in the Official Spelling List of the Bombay Presidency. One peculiar feature of this system is that when the long a (आ or á) is the last letter of a word, the accent is left out, and the short a (अ = u in gun) is, to prevent confusion, never placed at the end of a word. This rule has been strictly followed, except that when the short a appears to be absolutely necessary to complete the pronunciation of a word, as in Arunodaya or the well known Mitra, it is printed with a mark over it to indicate that it is short, thus—ă.

E. Berár papers are received in this office for report under the Resolution of the Government of Bombay in the General Department, No. 1795, dated 8th June 1881.

Politics and the Public Administration.

Remarks on the British rule.

The Poona Vaibhav (48) of the 7th October in a leading article says that the method of government adopted by the present rulers of India is somewhat peculiar. It is difficult to assert that oppression is practised under the British Government, and yet it is impossible to say that such a state of things does not exist. The only object which the English rulers seem to have in ruling India is to denude this country of its wealth and transport it to England. They often try to conceal this their real aim, though unsuccessfully. Under the pretence of enacting laws for the benefit of the people, they pass Acts and Regulations which tend to their own enrichment. The laws relating to salt, land and ábkári are instances in point. Now although these Acts have been drawn with great care and labour, yet upon the whole they have not proved beneficial to the people, but on the contrary have done much harm. The Vaibhav does not mean to assert that bad and oppressive laws do not exist in Native States; but there tyranny is openly practised, while the same is done here under the pretence of doing good to the people. The reason why the English rulers of India are so utterly regardless of the true interests of Natives is that there is no check over them. If a sovereign has nothing to fear from his own subjects or from a neighbouring State, his subjects are sure to be ill-treated and oppressed. The natives of India are in an extremely effete condition, and hence their rulers have nothing to fear from them. They have been brought into their present degraded condition by the English themselves. The British Government has also nothing to apprehend from any powerful State in its neighbourhood. Here the Vaibhav compares the conduct of the British Government with that of an adulterous woman, who in order to conceal her own intrigues keeps a strict eye on her daughters and daughters-in-law. The policy which the British Government pursues towards Native States is somewhat of the same nature. The slightest mismanagement in a Native State is immediately noticed by the British Government, but unfortunately the latter cannot be brought to account for its own misgovernment. Such a state of things is not only ruinous to the people, but may ultimately prove disastrous to the British Government itself. For the good of the British Government itself it would be well if a powerful sovereign existed in the vicinity of India. The presence of such a foe would act as a check on the English rulers, and would oblige them to pursue a policy of conciliation and justice towards their Native subjects.

Says that India should not be made a party question between the Whigs and the Tories.

In noticing the speech of the Under Secretary of State for India on the presentation of the Indian Budget to Parliament, the Bombay Samáchár (85) of the 9th October observes that Mr. Cross asserted that the taxes on the Indian people were very light when compared with those levied in other countries, and that the Indian administration was carried on in the most economical manner. Neither of these assertions, however, is based upon facts. That the burden of taxation falls heavily on the people has been so often proved that a repetition of the proof is simply useless. Mr. Cross remarked that the tax on salt did not cause any irritation whatever. It is, however, notorious that the masses can with difficulty obtain this indispensable condiment of their daily food in sufficient quantity owing to its dearness. The Under Secretary further stated that the land tax was no tax; but that its incidence is very heavy and that the agriculturists are ground down by it has been abundantly proved by arguments which have been admitted to be unanswerable. Mr. Cross's assertion that the Indian administration is conducted in the most economical manner is not based on fact. The complaint about lavish expenditure is of old standing and many suggestions have been made for effecting reductions. Mr. Cross's speech was a rejoinder conceived in a party spirit, but it was not an exposition of principles. When the Conservatives were in power the financial condition of India was just the same as it is now. They tried to show that it was satisfactory, while the Liberals made assertions to the contrary. The Liberals are now in power. They endeavour to show that the finances of India are in a sound condition and the Conservatives allege the reverse. Thus it is quite plain that India will not fare well so long as her interests are made the subject of a party question, and it is feared that in this political rivalry and strife she will be one day reduced to insolvency.

Some remarks in connection with the statement of one Amritlál Roy regarding the future of India which originally appeared in an American newspaper and which was recently copied in the Times of India of 29th September.

The Dnyán Prakásh (8) of the 8th October gives the translation of a certain statement regarding the future of India made by a Hindu traveller named Amritlál Roy, which originally appeared in America and was recently published by the Times of India in its issue of the 29th September, and observes that the opinion of a distinguished English philosopher that a foreign government, however civilized and superior, can never promote to any appreciable extent the happiness of the subject races is rigidly true. Since the conquest of India by England, the English rulers have made various attempts to improve the condition of Natives; but they have hardly been successful, since the country is being gradually drained of its wealth. The statements of Mr. Roy are not altogether true. What he says about the material welfare of the masses is pretty accurate; but it is not correct to say that the bulk of the people are dissatisfied with British rule. The natives of India have always been noted for their loyalty to the reigning power, and they would always continue to be so to their present rulers if they were treated with tolerable justice; but should they be governed by a succession of bad rulers like Lord Lytton, who should make it their business to trample the people under their feet, then even the Hindus would endeavour to regain their liberty. The present governors of India are aware of this and they are far-seeing enough not to allow matters to come to such a pass. Secret societies are unknown in India and have never existed here. The English have learnt wisdom from the example of America. The Americans may rest assured that a repetition of what happened in America will not be enacted here. To wish for their independence just now is perhaps the most foolish thing which the Hindus can think of. They are not strong enough to protect their own houses and will continue to be in need of the support of a powerful nation like England until they are able to repel aggression. Instead of wishing for their own independence the best Natives desire that India may be blessed by a succession of good rulers like Lord Ripon, who may confer rights and privileges which may ultimately prepare them for managing their own affairs.

Advocates the curtailment of the home charges.

The Bombay Chronicle (74) of the 7th October observes that the home accounts of the Government of India are the chief cause of the poverty of this country. They are the oppressive mill-stone round the neck of the people that undermines the resources of their prosperity. These accounts very often become the occasion of no trifling embarrassment to the financial member of the Government of India when called upon to make provision for the meeting of drafts for expenditure incurred at the sweet will of the Secretary of State for India or the English War Office. Sir John Strachey used to complain bitterly at times, and so did Sir Evelyn Baring. Both agreed in thinking that, however the Indian Finance Department might strive to be economical, there could be no real economy in the matter of the public expenditure so long as no check was placed on the extravagant propensity of the Secretary of State for India and the English War Office to act the spendthrift at the expense of India. Some independent, intelligent and active member of the House of Commons would do well to turn his attention to the subject with the view of getting the home charges placed on a proper footing.

Suggests certain reforms in the constitution of Indian Legislative Councils.

The Mahrátta (2) of the 7th October says:—It is said that India is not yet ripe for Parliamentary institutions. We humbly ask, why? Education has spread far and wide throughout the country with wonderful rapidity, and has taught the inhabitants to claim and exercise their own rights and privileges; science has advanced and is advancing with rapid strides; commerce is flourishing at a pretty brisk pace; orators and authors worth the name are not wanting; there are men who can fairly compete even with the best statesmen of the West; persons have been found here who exhibit wonderful ability in the discharge of both executive and administrative duties and over and above all this varied forces are still constantly at work to raise the country in the scale of nations. We shall be quite content if the principle of election is applied to Legislative Councils in the first instance. In these days of liberal government it is not too much to expect the different sections of the community to be represented in the Legislative Councils. Under the benign rule of our present noble and generous Viceroy we have been most graciously favoured with the choicest boon of local self-government. In this respect we are undoubtedly under a deep debt of gratitude to Lord Ripon. Every opportunity that presents itself should therefore be scrupulously availed of in order to develop the scheme in all its principal parts. Now that the whole press is mustering its force to impress the necessity of placing our Legislative Councils on a sounder political basis, it is time that they should be remodelled in as perfect a manner as possible. The Legislative Councils in the several Presidencies as they exist at present are so many official institutions, and have maintained their character as such since the time of their birth. But the present is an age of popular institutions. In our good old days institutions like these were not uncommon. What was the Panchâyat? It was a purely popular institution. The practice of nominating members from the non-official community, which at present obtains in all the Presidencies, may with advantage be done away with, and a system of election substituted in its stead. The number of members, which now hardly comes up even to twenty, should likewise be increased to a considerable extent. The Councils being strengthened in the manner above indicated will do abundant good, not only to the country but also to Government. The system of election will insensibly create sound public opinion by affording to every eligible candidate a chance of being returned as a member at some future time. The public will do well to follow the example set by the memorialists in the North-West Provinces and claim for themselves a larger share of representation in our Legislative Councils.

Points out the necessity of doing away with the present system of nominating Natives to the Civil Service.

In an article headed "Statutory Civilians," the Native Opinion (10) of the 7th October says:—The statutory Civil Service has attracted much attention of late, and we might take this to be one of the beneficial results of the agitation against the Ilbert Bill. Now we are not prepared to accept the proposition that the members of this service ought not to be vested with jurisdiction over European British subjects. As to the matter of jurisdiction, if the statutory Civilian is held competent to try all the races which are natives of India and all Europeans not rejoicing in the artificial distinction of European British subjects, he might well be declared competent to try also those who come under the latter appellation. This is not the real question now at issue with regard to this service alone. The question of jurisdiction is not directed towards any class of Native magistracy in particular, but is rather a question of principle. The real issue now started with regard to statutory Civilians is whether their institution is on the whole a beneficial one, and whether it loyally satisfies the promises so repeatedly given to the natives of India of higher and more responsible State employment. The very principle of selection of the statutory Civilians is a vicious one, and a young man's being selected to be a Civil Servant does not so much depend upon his own exertions and acquirements as upon those of his father and uncle in earning by some means or other the favour of some high official. This patronage system, as was seen at its initiation, has not worked well, and has served to retard the very end in pursuance of which it was instituted. It does not require a great exertion of mind to perceive the immense inferiority of our patronage Civilians to their competition-brethren. In the one there is every guarantee of culture and strength of mind, while in the other these are entirely absent. The patronage man might be entirely uneducated, and the only certain thing we know about him is that he has some relation who basks in court favour. In opening this service we doubt if Lord Lytton acted with entire good faith, since any statesman who was internally resolved to see the natives of India declared incapable of higher employments could not have taken better means to attain that end. This system should be put an end to before it has had time to work any great mischief, and measures should be introduced which will put Native Civilians on a par with those from England, not only on paper but also in reality. We think the time has arrived when we should insist upon the front door of the Civil Service being opened to our young men instead of their being allowed to slip in by the back door under sufferance. The universal condemnation which the patronage men have received in the present discussion evidently calls for reformation. The bracing effect of a competitive examination can be best illustrated by the confident tone of the Native Civilians selected by competition on the one hand and by the obscure and almost skulking silence of the patronage Civilians on the other. We think the end can best be attained by examining candidates here in the same papers that are set in England for the first test, and those that are selected after this examination should be sent to England at Government expense and should be obliged to pass two years there with the other candidates. Now we are sure the proposal of examining the candidates here unaccompanied by the obligation of a journey to England looks more tempting, but looking to the present circumstances a residence in England for some time in company with their confrères appears to us quite necessary for our candidates at least for some time to come. Unless our candidates pass some time in England they will not be relieved of their innate feelings of being members of a subject race and all the embarrassments that result from it. They must learn, play, talk and deal on an equal footing with the English Civilian to obtain the moral advantages which the latter so pre-eminently possesses. The English Civilian must cease in the eyes of his Native colleague to be a sáheb and a superior man, and must come naturally to be considered as an equal and nothing more. Thus only can an efficient Native addition to the Civil Service be effected. To ignore the advantages of such a residence and to insist upon an examination in India only would, we think, be not honest. We must admit what is good in the English Civilian and must try our best to secure for our own candidates the same. [The Indian Spectator (1) of the 7th and the Hitechchhu (76) of Ahmedabad of the 11th October express similar sentiments. The Spectator says that the limit of age for candidates competing in England must be raised to 21. The limitation of one-sixth must be superseded by one-half or one-third at the least if anything like justice is to be accorded to Natives. The existing superior Native ability to be found in the ranks of the uncovenanted service ought to be considerably utilised. Each Presidency or Regulation Province contains a number of Native gentlemen who from their ability, practical official experience and approved merit are eminently qualified to be honoured with membership of the statutory Civil Service. We lay great stress on the importance of this class of Native officials being first drafted into the superior service, and for this we can urge strong reasons. The Hitechchhu observes that the status of nominated Native Civilians should be raised and placed on a perfect equality with that of the Civilians coming from England. For this purpose the candidates for the Native Civil Service should be required to undergo a certain examination and those who pass it should be nominated. The persons so nominated may, if necessary, be made to take a trip to England so as to become acquainted with European habits and thoughts, a knowledge of which is considered by some to be a necessary ingredient of the qualifications of a Native exercising criminal jurisdiction over Europeans.]

Mode of selecting Native Civilians and remarks and suggestions in connection with this subject.

The Subodh Patrika (11) of the 7th October says:—The discussion on the Jurisdiction Bill has brought out two important questions of extreme importance to the Native public which our contemporaries and public bodies ought to take up in hand earnestly. The first of these questions is the status of what are called the statutory Civilians. All except the most demented opponents of the Bill admit it to be unjust to exclude those Native members of the Civil Service who have won their places by open competition with Englishmen in their own country, but there are many who think the men who are simply nominated locally by Government to the service afford no guarantee of their intellectual and moral fitness to exercise criminal jurisdiction over Europeans because of their social and caste prejudices. This argument is not at all sound in itself, for if these men are fit to try Natives of different castes and creeds there is no reason why they should fail only in trying Europeans, and if their ignorance of European life and manners is held to disqualify them for the task, the European Civilians would be much more disqualified for trying Natives. But we oppose the system of nomination because it is in itself vicious; it has on that ground been discarded in the case of English candidates, and its adoption in our case inflicts an injustice on the Native community generally. We are therefore glad a reconsideration of it is likely to be forced on the attention of the authorities. The extreme opponents of the Bill say that it is a great boon to Natives to be nominated to posts in the Civil Service without examination, and therefore if such nominees are debarred from trying European criminals it should form no ground of complaint on their part or on that of the Native community. But it is not for the privileges of a few individuals that the community care, and certainly it cannot consent to a great principle being sacrificed for their sake and to the injustice of being represented in the highest branch of the public service of the country by indifferent specimens. The objection moreover ignores the true history of the case. After the Civil Service of India was thrown open to all, a few of our countrymen passed successfully; but the regulations afterward began to be so altered as to prove more and more disadvantageous to them. To remove some of the inequality Sir Stafford Northcote—who as leader of the Conservative party is now opposing the policy of Lord Ripon —when Secretary of State for India established nine scholarships to enable Native Indian youths to study in England for the Civil Service or other professions; but this boon was soon afterwards withdrawn by his successor, the Liberal Duke of Argyle, who considered nine scholarships a ridiculously small number for 250 millions of people, and the result was the statute of 1870, under which the Government of India was to nominate to posts in the covenanted Civil Service without examination such Native members of the uncovenanted branch of the service as had shown themselves to be possessed of talents and proved worthy of such nomination. In making rules to carry out this law, however, the Government of Lord Lytton entirely changed its aim and provided for the employment of young men of good families, but practically for those having interest with the powers that be, without exacting any educational tests but subject of course to the departmental examination and rules of conduct and discipline, and it is the men thus nominated who are called the statutory Civilians and whose qualifications are called in question. Now whether or not these men prove worthy of the service to which they are appointed—and it would be absurd to say that all of them would fail—the point we desire to draw attention to is that the Native community never asked for nomination without examination, nor has it approved of the system after it was thrust on it. Native opinion has always cried for fair field and no favour, and what was strenuously demanded on behalf of our countrymen was that to equalise the conditions of competition between English and Native youths a fair proportion of the Civil Service posts should be offered for open competition in India, and that the successful candidates should then be required, with such pecuniary help from the State as is given to their English confrères, to proceed to England and complete their training with the latter; and now that the question has again cropped up it is time to press it on the attention of the authorities. As the number of places to be annually assigned to Natives has already been fixed at one-sixth of the whole, one great difficulty is already solved; all that remains is to ask for a change in the mode of selection and extension to the successful candidates of the terms already granted to the competitors in England. No one can reasonably object to requiring the successful candidates on these terms to finish their education in England or to deny that a travel to and sojourn in that country after their success in the open competition will prove advantageous to them and to the service in a variety of ways. The evil effects which have been perceived even on English youths of the undue reduction in the maximum age of the Civil Service candidates unwisely effected a few years ago, and which are now engaging the attention of the authorities, are likely to result in a restoration of the former limit, and this circumstance is calculated to act in favour of the natives of India; for not only would they then have a reasonable time to prepare for the struggle, but before they leave for England they will have acquired sufficient mental stability and judgment to resist those denationalizing influences which have been found to exercise an undue effect on minds which have been brought into a premature contact with foreign life and civilization. Thus from all points of view it is desirable to seek a change in the mode of selecting Native Civilians in the direction suggested, and the time and circumstances seem to be favourable for such efforts.

Says that the export of Indian wheat should not be encouraged by Government.

In alluding to the desire expressed to Government by the European exporters of Indian wheat to England that the revenue authorities should exercise strict supervision over the wheat trade so as to prevent frauds or mixture of hard and soft grain, and to the suggestion made by the Bombay Chamber of Commerce that Government should supply to the cultivators of this grain good seed, the Chamber contributing a portion of the cost of carrying out the proposal, the Bombay Samáchár (85) of the 8th October observes that there is no reason for making any fuss about this article of export. Why cannot the European exporters buy grain in the open market as is done in the markets of other countries? Why should the Government interfere in this matter at all? Mr. Caird and other experienced officials have shown that the production of food grains in India is not equal to the consumption in the country. It is a serious question for consideration whether large quantities of wheat should be permitted to be exported. At any rate no pressure whatever should be exercised on the cultivators and traders in wheat and the export trade in this article should not be encouraged. If the recommendations and suggestions of the European exporters are adopted they will not hesitate to ask hereafter for the enactment of a law to suppress frauds in wheat, and that law would prove as annoying as did the late Cotton Frauds Act when it was in existence. There are already too many laws in India, and no new law for the cultivation of any kind of grain in a particular manner ought to be enacted. The cultivators and traders know their own interests, and if they make any mistakes they should be pointed out to them, but Government should not exercise any pressure upon them, since such interference would check the trade.

Says that the suggestions made by the Bombay Chamber of Commerce for the encouragement of the wheat trade with England ought to have been adopted by the Bombay Government.

The Jáme Jamshed (98) of the 8th October observes that the Bombay Chamber of Commerce requested Government to take steps to prevent frauds being perpetrated in wheat, and suggested that Government should give rewards for the cultivation of good grain, but it is to be regretted that Sir James Fergusson's administration, though admitting the necessity for an improvement in the article, should have in its resolution of 2nd August last refused to adopt the suggestions, and should have remarked that the wheat merchants themselves ought to take the necessary steps. In 1861 and in subsequent years the Government of India annually distributed ten thousand rupees for effecting improvements in the cultivation of cotton, and if a similar amount be expended annually for three or four years in the shape of rewards to those who may improve the quality of wheat the result cannot but be satisfactory. The Chamber should again move the Bombay Government on the subject, and if it still persists in its present course should appeal to the Government of India. The village and higher authorities should explain to the agriculturists the advantages of cultivating good wheat and bringing it unadulterated for sale to the market. Government should supply to the cultivators gratis good seed. The Jáme hopes that cultivators and traders will take steps to prevent fraudulent mixtures of this grain being made, and trusts that no law will be passed to check frauds since such a measure is likely to hinder the rising trade in this grain.

Asks Government to give due encouragement to Indian iron industry.

The same of the 9th October highly praises Mr. O' Connor's annual reports on Indian commerce, and regrets that the Government of India should not have furnished a copy of it to the principal vernacular newspapers. After noticing some of the items in the report for the year ending 31st March 1883, the Jáme observes that a rising iron industry is carried on in Bombay that has supplied the Panjáb and the North-West Provinces iron articles in large quantities. Messrs. Richardson and Craddas alone have taken a contract to supply two thousand tons of articles of iron to Simla. This shows that if encouragement is given, particularly by Government, to the Indian iron industry, iron works would multiply and superior iron work would be turned out. The Government of India indent for an immense quantity of iron material from England and sufficient encouragement is not afforded to the producers of iron in India. But it is said that the Department of Stores for India in England is rotten, and to improve it as well as to encourage the Indian industry the Secretary of State should call for tenders for supply in England as well as in India.

Wishes that a law should be passed for the regulation of religious and charitable endowments in the Bombay Presidency.

The Bombay Chronicle (74) of the 7th October observes that large sums of money or their equivalent in property, which ought to be devoted to the maintenance of religious and charitable works in the Bombay Presidency, are diverted to the personal use or benefit of their crafty or designing managers. Ignorance, cupidity or dishonesty on the part of such managers has been converting the income of large funds and the funds themselves to improper purposes, to the endless misery of individuals and the detriment of public good. The Government of Bombay ought therefore to persevere in the laudable effort to get passed a comprehensive law for the management of these endowments. The general accomplishments of the Honourable Mr. Raymond West, his knowledge of India and its people, and his special acquaintance with the details of such work as that under notice, point him out as eminently fitted to be a safe and sound adviser. His extensive experience as a member of the late Indian Law Commission ought to prove of great service.

Suggests the creation of a bench of Honorary Magistrates in Thána.

The Arunodayá (14) of the 7th October says that it is reported that Mr. Dáji Govind Gupte has been invested with the powers of an Honorary Second Class Magistrate in the town of Thána. If this report be true, the Government and the people of Thána ought to be congratulated as the selection is an extremely good one. Mr. Gupte was a distinguished Subordinate Judge and in his new career as Magistrate he is sure to win golden opinions. He is clever and independent and the public interests are not likely to suffer in his hands. The Arunodayá is however surprised that a bench of Magistrates like those existing in Hubli and Dhárwár should not be sanctioned in the town of Thána. Half a dozen individuals can be named in Thána who are perfectly competent to perform the duties of Honorary Magistrates. Such men would satisfactorily decide cases arising within municipal limits and would thus afford relief to stipendiary Magistrates. It is to be hoped that the Collector of Thána will recommend to Government the creation of a bench of Magistrates in the town of Thána.

Prays Government to distribute freely administration and other periodical reports among vernacular newspapers.

The Kaiser-i-Hind (101) of the 7th October considers it a great injustice to the Native press that the Government of Bombay should furnish copies of their periodical administration and other reports to the local English newspapers and not so freely to vernacular newspapers. The Kaiser points out the great help these volumes will render to Native newspapers in disseminating useful information among the Native public, and hopes that the published selections from the Government records will be freely distributed among the vernacular newspapers.

Disapproves of the open ground between the Marine Lines and Churney Road stations being utilized for building purposes.

The Bombay Chronicle (74) of the 7th October observes that a large portion of the open ground between the Marine Lines and Churney Road stations which forms the resort of Natives for taking exercise is advertised for sale for building purposes. The proposed sale of plots of land is objectionable on public grounds. The residents of the thickly populated parts of the Native town have a prescriptive right to the place for purposes of recreation. Young and old, rich and poor, in the city are alike interested in seeing it left open or free of any buildings as it now is. Government itself is under an obligation to see that it is not studded with buildings. When the scheme of the Back Bay reclamation was promulgated the people of Bombay were promised that a large portion of the reclaimed ground would be left vacant for the free use of the inhabitants by way of compensation to them for the site taken up for building purposes on the esplanade. The municipal authorities ought to exert themselves to prevent the above-mentioned encroachment on the public rights. [The Jáme Jamshed (98) of the 8th and the Akhbáre Sodágar (81) of the 9th October express similar sentiments.]

Suggests that in lieu of the land on the Back Bay, plots of ground on the G. I. P. Railway line as far as Thána may be used for building purposes.

The Jáme Jamshed (98) of the 9th October observes that the strip of ground on the Back Bay between the Marine Lines and the Churney Road stations is to be given away for building purposes, because there is a scarcity of good airy buildings and a high rent is charged for existing residences of that sort. But the convenience and comfort of thousands of citizens ought not to be sacrificed for the well-being of a small number of individuals, for whom houses can be provided on the Back Bay shore. Again, open spaces of large extent are to be found along the G. I. P. Railway line as far as Thána. At Mátunga and Kurla there are desirable plots for building purposes, which ought to be utilized. But in order to be able to bring these places within convenient distance, the G. I. P. Railway must run about 25 local trains between Bombay and Thána, open some additional stations, and bring out from England such steam engines as are used on the B. B. & C. I. Railway which can be brought to a stop suddenly and easily.

Complains that the labourers employed in the destruction of locusts in the Sangameshvar Táluka of the Ratnágiri Collectorate have not been paid their wages.

A correspondent of the Satyá Shodhak (96) of the 7th October says that about the 12th August last an order came from the Collector of Ratnágiri to the Mámlatdár of Sangameshvar to divide all the villages in his táluka into groups of three and to appoint one supervisor over each group to superintend the labourers employed in the work of destroying locusts. In accordance with these instructions supervisors were appointed, who engaged labourers with the expectation that their services would be remunerated. The labourers also worked hard in the belief that they would be paid for their trouble. Even Mr. Logan, the Assistant Collector, and the Mámlatdár of the táluka, when on tour, held out hopes to the workmen that their services would be remunerated. Notwithstanding this, the labourers employed in the destruction of locusts found after several days' hard labour that their wages were not forthcoming, and hence they appealed for redress to the Assistant Collector, who replied that they would not be paid any hire. Such instances of bad faith have never before occurred under the English rule. One untoward result of not paying the labourers will be that the work of destroying locusts will come to an end. The damage which will ensue on an increase in the number of locusts will be very great.

Advocates the claims of Mr. Sitárám Dhákji to the chief clerkship in the Presidency Magistrates' Courts, Bombay.

With reference to the recommendation made to Government by the Chief Presidency Magistrate to confirm Mr. Lester in the post of chief clerk, the Rást Goftár (109) of the 7th October observes that Mr. Cooper has overlooked the just claims of Mr. Sitárám Dhákji to the post. Mr. Lester has been in Government service for about ten years; he is junior in the Police Office to several clerks, and was in receipt of a monthly salary of Rs. 125; while Mr. Sitárám has served for about thirty-five years, has been in the Police Office for eighteen years, and receives Rs. 200 per month. Mr. Sitárám has been conducting the duties of a magistrate's clerk since 1866 and is now head clerk in the Girgaon Police Office. He possesses, therefore, better claims to the chief clerkship than Mr. Lester. He has been superseded because he happens to be a Native. It is to be hoped that Government will not allow injustice to be done to Mr. Sitárám.

An instance of police oppression in Bombay.

The Srishtidarpan (62) of the 8th October states that on the 2nd October last about 2 o'clock after midnight a police peon near Bhuleshvar accosted a pointsman employed on the G. I. P. Railway line at Byculla, and asked him to explain why he was out at so late an hour. The pointsman replied that he had been at work until 2 and was then on his way home. He further added that he had then in his possession two gold finger rings, a chain and twelve annas. The police sepoy not believing the pointsman's statement, said that he must search his clothes and person. Upon this the pointsman submitted to the treatment, and on the police peon expressing his satisfaction the former asked the latter to give his number. Thereupon the police peon became enraged, caught hold of the pointsman by his arm, and declared that he would give him his number at the police station. The pointsman, who was quite tired by eight hours' hard work, finding that he might be troubled, said that he did not care to know the number. The police peon, however, would not let him go. When they reached the Girgaon Police Station the police peon handed over the pointsman into the charge of another police peon and himself went away. The pointsman was then kept waiting until the orders of his superior European officer could be made known. The latter, however, on that day was the worse for liquor, and hence, notwithstanding the efforts of his madam and butler, nearly an hour elapsed before he could be awakened. When, however, he woke up he ordered the pointsman to be locked up, who was accordingly forced to deliver up his things and valuables and was confined in the lock-up. The poor pointsman, who was in an emaciated condition brought about by work and hunger, found himself in an exceedingly filthy place, the stench of which was unbearable. On the following morning the European constable made enquiries and ultimately released the pointsman. The poor man, however, having been confined in an unwholesome place for several hours became sick and began to fear for his life. The Srishtidarpan considers the conduct of the police peon most disgraceful. He accosted the man and demanded an explanation from the pointsman in order to extract money. It is to be hoped that enquiries will be made into the above case.

Some remarks in connection with police regulations regarding the letting off of fire-works and crackers during the Diváli holidays.

The Subodh Patrika (11) of the 7th October says :—The Diváli is approaching and we may shortly expect the usual local police order regarding the letting off of fire-works and crackers. This order is beautifully vague as to restrictions of time or space, and hence its working is felt to be oppressive and destructive of all family joy during the holiday in many a Hindu household. We would therefore suggest that the leaders of Bombay Hindu society should address the Commissioner of Police asking him to define the time and the distance from public roads traversed by horses and carriages beyond which the police shall have no power to enter houses and forcibly snatch away innocent boys, and occasionally adults too, from the bosoms of their families and place them in lock-ups like felons just at the hours of sweet social reunion. No time should be lost in making the requisite representation. The police may restrict or even absolutely prohibit the letting off of fire-works if they like; all we care for is that no loop-hole in the order should be left for the exercise of what the most law-abiding of Her Majesty's lieges feel, and justly too, to be an unmitigated oppression on the most innocent members of society and at the most inopportune moment.

Complains of the improper conduct of the first class head constable of Rájápur in doing duty at the village of Sakhrinata in the táluka of Rájápur in the Collectorate of Ratnágiri.

A correspondent of the Din Bandhu (5) of the 7th October states that in the village of Sakhrinata in the táluka of Rájápur some marriages were celebrated among Mahomedan fishermen in or about the month of Shrávan last. These fishermen lived in the lower lane of the village mosque. In order to preserve order in the marriage processions the first class head constable of Rájápur with a few policemen was present. According to the usual practice and the magistrate's order the processions should have been allowed to be moved during day-time; but the head constable, in contravention of the spirit of this order permitted them to be carried about till late in the evening and to let off fire-works when passing through the upper lane of the mosque. Upon this about one hundred residents (Mahomedans) of the upper lane called upon the head constable and protested against the proceedings. Thereupon the head constable got enraged and had hand-cuffs put upon four of the complainants, which, however, were immediately removed, and the rest were treated summarily with sticks and blows. On the following day the head constable sent for the complainants and threatened them with prosecution. Upon this the latter asked one Bahádur, a police constable, to intercede, and the matter was amicably settled. It is said that the inhabitants of the upper and lower lanes have been put to much expense. Last year the third class head constable of Jaitápur was present to preserve order during the careering of the marriage processions in this village, but the people were not fleeced to the same extent. The correspondent promises to give details hereafter.

An attempt alleged to have been made by a police officer at Broach to secure certain votes in favour of a candidate at the recent municipal elections.

A correspondent of the Bombay Samáchár (85) of the 12th October mentions a rumour that on the occasion of the recent municipal elections at Broach a police officer of that town sent some policemen and caused to be brought to him several voters of the Ghánchi (oil-men) caste in order to secure their votes in favour of a candidate in whom he took interest. The friends of the voters made efforts to effect their release and they were accordingly set free. If this had not been done the unfortunate Ghánchis would have suffered serious inconveniences. The poor fellows have been much frightened by this proceeding. In conclusion, the writer requests that an enquiry should be made into the truth of this report.

Local Self-government.

Maladministration of local funds.

The Indian Spectator (1) of the 7th October, in an article headed "More facts as to 'highly successful' administration of Local Funds!!" again dwells on the maladministration of the funds of the Ahmedabad Municipality by Mr. Fernandez, and remarks:—The construction of the "arterial road" at Ahmedabad had never been legally sanctioned. The expenditure thereon was therefore unlawful. It is not for us to say who should be brought to book for this illegal management. Properly speaking the late president must be called upon to account for it. But the series of alleged maladministrations of the funds by that officer are really astonishing. It is said that in the acquisition of houses required to be pulled down for so-called public purposes extravagant prices were paid. Nay, more; even the ordinary precaution of ascertaining beforehand the real ownership of such properties was in cases neglected! Law suits have been the result. Suits brought on by house-owners are pending in the court, notably one in reference to a property known as Radhan Máya's Haveli. It has been alleged that in the acquisition of all the houses purchased the municipal commissioners were never consulted. There was not even a semblance of consultation by the appointment of a formal committee to assess the value of the houses. Of what use their serving on the local fund committee when independent members are treated as so many ciphers? There must be a natural feeling of repugnance at such high-handed and arbitrary procedure. Who would care to attend meetings where his only business was to say "johookum" to the sáheb? Officials may proclaim from housetops that people even in advanced cities and towns are not able to manage their own affairs under the new scheme of Lord Ripon. We now know the true reason. What a travesty of the real state of matters! But who can expose the misdeeds of the all-powerful Collector or permanent chairman? We think we are justified in repeatedly recommending the necessity of having non-official chairmen everywhere under the new local and district boards. Why, if we had any hesitation before as to the advisability of even backward localities having non-official chairmen, we have absolutely none now. This nasty Ahmedabad affair has convinced us of the necessity of having a clause in the two draft Acts for elected chairmen as in the case of the Bill recently passed for the North-West Provinces. But to return to Radhan Máya's Haveli. It is alleged that this property was, like others, illegally purchased. It cost 6,000 to 7,000 rupees. Its purchase was never sanctioned by the committee or the general body of commissioners. It is now found that the vendor had no right to sell it. The real owner has, therefore, refused to give possession of the house. A suit is now pending in the Judge's court and meanwhile the real claimant is allowed to keep possession. The scandal in reference to this purchase is so great that attempts are being made to bring about a compromise so that the late permanent chairman may save himself the exposure which is otherwise inevitable! A more painful instance of the maladministration of local funds by the district official could not have been brought to light. We appeal to the good sense of Sir James Fergusson's Government to call for all the papers in connection with Mr. Fernandez's management of the funds. It is due to the public that all the facts should be made known. There ought to be no official condonation. It would compromise the reputation of the Bombay Government to burke investigation. In the interests of Ahmedabad as much as in the interests of the people at large of this Presidency, we demand that the required papers be laid on the editors' table. This course is necessary at a juncture when the boon of self-government is to be conferred on the people. Above all we submit that a commission of enquiry should be appointed consisting of independent persons to bring to light every unlawful act that the late permanent chairman of the local funds committee at Ahmedabad may have committed. The opinions recorded by the municipal commissioners on Mr. Borradaile's able minute should be published forthwith. These alone will enable the intelligent public to understand what value to attach to that high-sounding but empty phrase "highly successful" administration of local funds.

Legislation.

Approves of the Bill for rendering pecuniary help to agriculturists for the improvement of agriculture.

The Bombay Samáchár (85) of the 12th October heartily approves of the Bill for affording pecuniary aid to agriculturists for the improvement of agriculture, but regrets that help is to be given for sinking wells and tanks and no efforts on a sufficiently large scale are to be made for the extension of irrigation works. Of course canal irrigation is expensive, but compared to the miseries suffered by the people and the expense incurred by Government in their absence in times of scarcity and famine, their cost cannot be much and they ought to be ungrudgingly undertaken. [The Jáme Jamshed (98) of the same date expresses approval of the Bill.]

Education.

Criticises the conduct of Mr. Chatfield, Director of Public Instruction, Bombay, with regard to the appointment of Mr. Selby as tutor to the Thákor of Gondal.

The Mahrátta (2) of the 7th October quotes the remarks of the Bombay Gazette on the appointment of Mr. Selby as tutor to the Thákor of Gondal, and remarks:—Mr. Chatfield seems to be utterly regardless of the welfare and prosperity of the Deccan College. We fear his mind is not as yet completely dispossessed of that old hobby of turning the institution into a lunatic asylum. It will be remembered that the students of the Deccan College have been great losers by the removal of Professor Selby. Professors are highly paid, not for teaching the elements of a subject, but for teaching the higher branches of knowledge. They have also to perform a far more glorious task to which but few of them are capable of doing justice. But how is all this to be even partially accomplished if the head of the Educational Department does not think it necessary to make such departmental appointments as to have all important posts filled by the men most qualified to discharge the duties attached to them? Since his appointment as Director of Public Instruction, Mr. Chatfield has shown himself to be a thorough disciple of the absolute school, and has uniformly exhibited a cold shoulder to all public criticism of his acts. Yet from regard to the duty we owe to the public, we once more ask, what can he mean by keeping Mr. Selby out of his proper sphere for such an indefinite period? If Professor Selby has found the easy climate of a Native court congenial to him, and is therefore unwilling to return to the hard intellectual work of a college, let him resign and let another competent Professor be ordered from Oxford to fill up his place. If we mistake not, there are men in the Department, both Natives and Europeans, who can better discharge the duties of the Principal of the Rájkumár College and those of a tutor to a Native prince than those of a Professor in an Arts college. With Professor Selby's removal from the Deccan College the study of logic and moral philosophy has altogether ceased, and there is no hope of its revival until his return! The Director of Public Instruction does not care a straw for such a miserable state of things. He will have his own way at all hazards. The loss the students suffer is a matter of no concern to him. If they show a refractory spirit on account of injustice to them, he knows how to check it peremptorily by rustication and forfeiture of scholarships. Bacon tells us that position showeth the man. The words of the sagacious philosopher appear to be perfectly realized in the case of Mr. Chatfield. Mr. Chatfield as the Director of Public Instruction is quite a different man from Mr. Chatfield the Principal of the Elphinstone College. We hear that Sir James Fergusson is going to pay a second visit to the Deccan College during the course of next week. We hope His Excellency will take notice of this grievance at the time.

Disapproves of the appointment of Mr. Selby as tutor to the Chief of Gondal after his return from England in November next.

A correspondent of the Indu Prakásh (9) of the 8th October, writing from Káthiáwár, says:—In your issue of the 24th September last you objected to the continuance of an Assistant Political Agent in Cutch when there was no longer any need for his services. What will you say to a worse job which has been perpetrated here? The young Chief of Gondal was sent to England last April. Colonel Barton wished Mr. Selby, Acting Principal of the Rájkumár College, to accompany him. Before the Chief's departure, Colonel Barton went on leave and Colonel Watson wished that Major Hancock should get the appointment. Consequently Mr. Selby's appointment was cancelled and Major Hancock was sent with the prince. The Government of India, it appears, did not approve of Gondal being saddled with the heavy cost of Major Hancock's large salary. The prince is to leave Brindisi on the 20th instant on his return journey. So he cannot be expected to be back before the middle of November. Yet the Bombay Government have appointed Mr. Selby his tutor from 6th October. The object of this appointment is not clear. No European tutor has ever been appointed in Káthiáwár to teach a young Chief after his leaving college. The Gondal prince has been praised on all sides, by the Political Agent, by the Principal of the College, and by his different examiners, for his superior attainments, industry, conduct and his excellent knowledge of English. He has resided in the College for more than 9 years. Where then is the need for a special tutor for him now? If, on the other hand, Mr. Selby is to go on tour with the prince through India, it is very hard on the latter that he should be sent on a second tour so soon after the completion of his first one. When he was sent to England it was well understood that he should not be made to go on a second tour after his return. But Colonel Barton's wish to send Mr. Selby on tour with him was not gratified owing to Major Hancock's appointment. The result is that the young prince has now to undergo a second period of banishment. This is how the strange appointment is interpreted in Káthiáwár. The additional expense is one objection. But the more serious objection is that the prince is to be compelled to continue travelling in order to provide certain European officers with desirable appointments and to enable them to travel inexpensively. It is believed that the Government of India expressed a desire to curtail the expenses of Major Hancock's appointment. But no change in the original programme took place in consequence. It is said that a son of Colonel Barton's sister-in-law is to be appointed to travel with the young Chief of Wála. The Political Agent can permit or refuse permission to a young Chief to retire from the Rájkumár College at a certain age. A vast field is here opened out to the relatives and favourites of a Political Agent.

Says that the true interests of the Deccan College have been sacrificed by the appointment of Mr. Selby as tutor to the Chief of Gondal.

The Subodh Patrika (11) of the 7th October says that the opinion which the public appears to have formed that Mr. Chatfield does not care for the interests of the Department over which he presides has received confirmation from some recent educational appointments. Several years ago the students of the Deccan College were caught committing what seemed to be a trifling breach of college discipline, for which the Director inflicted upon them the severest punishment possible. On that occasion he also recommended the abolition of the Deccan College. Again about two years ago Mr. Selby, who was specially brought from England to teach logic and moral philosophy at the Deccan College, was transferred to the acting Principalship of the Rájkumár College at Rájkot on a higher salary. Now the institution at Rájkot being intended for the education of Native princes is dignified with the name of a college although in reality the teaching which is carried on there is not superior to that in an ordinary high school. This being so, there was no necessity whatever to transfer Mr. Selby to that post, particularly when a qualified man could not be obtained to do his work during his absence. This very same gentleman is now appointed tutor to the Chief of Gondal for an indefinite period. In making this appointment Mr. Chatfield has benefited his friend Mr. Selby pecuniarily at the sacrifice of the true interests of the Deccan College. Besides the Chief of Gondal does not now require a highly paid English tutor. The Subodh Patrika has heard that the students of the Deccan College intend to make a representation on the subject. It is to be hoped that they will act with all due precautions.

Defends Mr. Oliver, Acting Professor of English Literature at the Elphinstone College, from an attack made on him by a correspondent of the Mahrátta newspaper.

A correspondent of the Mahrátta (2) of the 7th October, signing himself "Justice," says:—In a recent issue of your paper a correspondent has thought fit to make some impertinent and untruthful remarks about Mr. Oliver, Acting Professor of English at the Elphinstone College. Your correspondent's letter probably arose from the fact that a few students who had failed in three or four subjects at the terminal examination of the Elphinstone College were prevented from appearing at the Previous Examination this year. The arrangement for keeping back these students was made by the Principal of the College with the approval of all the Professors. But your correspondent appears aggrieved at an arrangement which was made as much in the interest of the students as of the College, and has not hesitated to insinuate that Mr. Oliver is incapable of explaining the two very simple English books which have been appointed for the Previous Examination. It may not be out of place to consider how far your correspondent's statements are in accordance with the real facts of the case. If anyone will take the trouble to refer to the Registrar of the Bombay University, he will learn that nearly all the students from the Elphinstone College who took up English at the last B.A. Examination passed in that subject; at the First B.A. Examination about 40 students passed in the same subject, and at the Previous Examination nearly 70 passed. Your correspondent apparently does not see that when he makes a false statement about Mr. Oliver he is indirectly implying that the examiners also were incompetent, for had they been competent so many students could not have passed in English from the Elphinstone College. Now I ask whether your correspondent is in a position to censure in such a conceited and impudent manner the three English examiners appointed by the University as well as the English Professor at the Elphinstone College? The conceit and the disregard for truth which characterize your correspondent's letter are the very qualities which are bringing graduates as a class into discredit with the public. These same qualities, there is no doubt, also prevent Government from appointing graduates to the much-coveted Native Civil Service. There is another point in your correspondent's letter which shows his ludicrous ignorance of English literature. He states that Goldsmith's plays, which have been appointed for the next Previous Examination, present almost insurmountable difficulties to the student. If the self-complacent correspondent will take the trouble to consult a few well-informed English gentlemen, he will learn that those plays, though containing a certain number of idiomatic expressions, are not considered by English students as difficult as a book of Milton or a play of Shakespeare.

Native States.

Supports the demands of the Maiyás of Junágad.

After stating that Colonel Barton is said to have lent support to the appeal made to the Secretary of State for India by the Junágad Darbár in the matter of the slaughter of the Maiyás, the Gujarát Mitrá (75) of the 7th October observes that the Maiyás are reported to have prepared an appeal for submission to the Secretary of State, and it is prayed therein that as the Maiyás were slaughtered at Menderda within the territorial limits of the Agency thána (post), the guilty parties should be tried in a British court of justice, and that in accordance with the custom of the province the heirs of the slaughtered Maiyás should be presented with lands for their maintenance. These prayers are, it is believed, neither improper nor exorbitant. Perhaps Government hesitate to hold the trial on account of Junágad being a first class State; but since Malhár Ráo Gáikwád and a prince of Chhota Udepur were tried for comparatively minor offences, there ought to be no scruple about trying the Junágad offenders. The Mitrá also remarks that though Ráo Sáheb Haridás is appointed Diwán of Junágad he is not independent and has to submit to the counsels of Messrs. Sále Hindi and Bápálál, who have only nominally resigned their respective offices.

The desertion of a village in the Cambay State by its residents.

A correspondent of the Gujarát Mitrá (75) of the 7th October states that the inhabitants of the village of Amliyála in the Cambay State have deserted the place, and Mr. Lalubhái Nánábhái, the Revenue Commissioner, has been trying to bring them back, but they have flatly refused to return unless satisfactory arrangements are made for the redress of their grievances.

Says that Colonel Barton should be asked to leave Káthiáwár at once.

The Gujaráti (94) of the 7th October observes that if Colonel Barton is to remain in Káthiáwár for two months for communicating to Colonel West information about the different States of that province and their kárbháris, what was the good of appointing an independent officer to the Political Agency and setting aside the claims of Colonel Watson to that post? Colonel West is not such a stranger to Káthiáwár as to require advice from the retiring Political Agent. Colonel Barton's instructions will be favourable to his favourite States and injurious to the interests of other principalities. The Bombay Government ought therefore to ask Colonel Barton to leave Káthiáwár at once. The Colonel is about to visit several of these States, where he would receive expensive welcomes. His object in paying these visits appears to be to obtain honours from the Chiefs for himself and to instruct them how to act with the new Political Agent. This waste of money ought to be prohibited. The different Chiefs might be permitted to meet the retiring officer at some appointed place. [The Samsher Báhádur (110) of the 5th October also expresses disapproval of Colonel Barton visiting several Native States of Káthiáwár after vacating office.]

Disapproves of prince Kálubha, brother of the Ráo of Cutch, being compelled by Government to join the Rájkumár College.

The Samsher Báhádur (110) of the 5th October expresses surprise at prince Kálubha, brother of the Ráo of Cutch, being compelled by Government to join the Rájkumár College. Tutors on large salaries were engaged for the prince and all other arrangements for giving him a sound education were made by Mr. Manibhái. The true reasons of the present change cannot be understood. Why are not the two grown up Pálitána princes, who perhaps receive a nominal education at home, compelled to join the College? The Pálitána Darbár is not so well educated as to appreciate the advantages of a sound education and is not likely to give in without compulsion. When the Pálitána princes are not compelled to join the Rájkumár College, why is prince Kálubha forced to go there?

B. The names of Newspapers are printed in the body of the Report in italics, and the number of the Newspaper in the above list is printed in brackets after the name.

C. The proprietors of the Newspapers marked * have not given information as to the number of copies issued. In these cases an estimate has been made by the Reporter.

D. The system of spelling vernacular words followed by the Reporter is the same as that adopted in the Official Spelling List of the Bombay Presidency. One peculiar feature of this system is that when the long a (आ or á) is the last letter of a word, the accent is left out, and the short a (अ = u in gun) is, to prevent confusion, never placed at the end of a word. This rule has been strictly followed, except that when the short a appears to be absolutely necessary to complete the pronunciation of a word, as in Arunodaya or the well known Mitra, it is printed with a mark over it to indicate that it is short, thus—a.

E. Berár papers are received in this office for report under the Resolution of the Government of Bombay in the General Department, No. 1795, dated 8th June 1881.

Politics and the Public Administration.

Enumerates some of the grievances of India.

The Trimásik Tikákár or the quarterly review (119) for the month of Shrávan of the Samvat year 1939, in a leader headed "The just rights of India, No. 4," severely censures the British Government for disarming Natives, for imposing a heavy duty on salt, and for administering the country in such a way as to impoverish her and enrich England. The disarming of the population has, observes the Tikákár, led to extensive destruction of human lives and cattle from the attacks of wild animals, and has made the people effeminate. Natives are loyal and grateful to their Empress, and therefore no danger need be apprehended from their being permitted to use weapons to protect their lives and property. If they are allowed to carry arms they would not only protect themselves from wild animals, but prove a source of strength to their rulers in an emergency. Salt is so heavily taxed as to make it almost unprocurable by the poor classes, and the very limited use of this indispensable condiment by the general population has increased diseases among them. On account of the disadvantages incident to foreign rule much of the wealth of the country is drained to England and the people are impoverished. Her Imperial Majesty should, in order to lessen the miseries of the people of India, send one of her sons to rule her Eastern Empire, and he should sympathize with the country and improve the condition of the Indian subjects. In conclusion, the Tikákár prays the Viceroy to alleviate the sufferings of the country.

Inveighs against the British rule in India.

The Hitopadeshak Ratnă (100) for October laments that India has come under the foreign yoke of Britain and is being oppressed by her foreign rulers. India was conquered by mean artifices and treachery, and yet England vainly boasts that she was vanquished by the sword and should be retained by the sword. Englishmen are intoxicated by power, and have little sympathy with the Indians, who are oppressed by them. Their tyrannical rule will cause the complete ruin of the Indian population, which is cowed by their oppressive policy and is compelled to show submission to the rulers.

Suggests certain reforms in the constitution of Indian Legislative Councils.

The Mahrátta (2) of the 14th October says:—We said last time that the existing Legislative Councils are the reverse of popular institutions. That they are so is an established fact and requires but little proof. To remedy the evil recourse must necessarily be had to the principles of free election, a system immensely superior in this respect to the system of nomination. Germs have already been laid out all over the country by our noble Viceroy, and the experiment has to this date proved a complete success. Not only this, but there exist no fears whatever in any quarter as to its failure in future. The nomination system too has its advantages, which, situated as we at present are, cannot of course be entirely overlooked. We therefore propose that a Council should henceforth consist of elected and nominated members in equal proportion and that half of the latter again should be from the official ranks. The manner of election may at the outset appear to be a difficult affair; but the fact of the existence of intelligent and influential associations amongst us capable even now of returning members qualified efficiently to discharge the onerous functions of their new office being taken into consideration, all fears regarding the practicability of putting our suggestion into execution will vanish away. These bodies might be asked to send fit persons from among their own number, which duty, we doubt not, they will perform with zeal and propriety. By the time of the next election the scheme of local self-government will be sufficiently developed and the new district and táluka boards will be in a fair position to send their representatives to the local Councils. These boards being by their very nature the centres of local intelligence and trained in the art of self-government will, we think, scarcely find any difficulty in returning members for the Councils. They might however be given the option of electing either an outsider or one of their own body to represent them as would best suit their convenience. Being thus permanently based on a sounder footing, our local Councils will in due course of time be capable in their turn of sending members to the Supreme Council. This system, if introduced on the plan above mentioned, will give a healthier tone to public opinion. Candidates of various castes and creeds will strive their utmost to attain the requisite degree of qualification, and will each try to assert his own claims for membership. Government also will be greatly assisted in its legislative business by coming in closer contact with persons of various views and receiving non-official opinion at first hand. The invidious race distinction which has many a time materially injured the national cause and seriously undermined the growth and progress of the country will gradually disappear and cease to exist, as the Native and European Councillors will have frequently to meet each other face to face and discuss questions of the utmost political importance as persons of equal weight and worth. How smoothly and cordially persons of different denominations could work together may easily be learnt from the working of the Town Council and the Chamber of Commerce at Bombay. The number of members should be increased to 48 in the case of a local Council and 60 in the case of the Supreme Council. This, we think, is a reasonable number as being sufficient to secure a variety of views and information. It may, if need be, be further increased with the national development and the progressive advancement of the boards. As regards the extension of the powers of the honourable members, we suggest that besides their legislative powers they should be invested with further powers of general supervision over the administration.

Requests Government to adopt measures for the improvement of jute and the jute industry.

In alluding to the successful competition of American jute with the Indian produce, the Bombay Chronicle (75) of the 14th October observes that the Government and the people of India would do well to look round carefully in order to discover the means of counteracting the new danger to an important and valuable industry of this country and one of the principal sources of its material prosperity. The Department of Agriculture and Commerce ought to give careful and earnest thought to this subject at an early date. [The Akhbáre Sodágar (82) of the 15th October expresses similar sentiments.]

Disapproves of the enactment of a law for putting down adulteration in the wheat trade.

The Arunodayá (14) of the 14th October alludes to the mixing of inferior and superior kinds of wheats exported to Europe, and observes that the enactment of a law for putting down adulteration in this grain is unnecessary and undesirable. The English merchants have ample means in their power for protecting themselves. If they refuse to buy wheats in which there is a mixture of inferior and superior kinds of grain, the agriculturists will not resort to practices which tend to reduce the prices of their commodities and diminish their gains. Instead of proposing the passing of a law similar to the defunct Cotton Frauds Act, it would be well if English purchasers of wheats were warned to exercise due vigilance in making their purchases. The suggestion of the Bombay Chamber of Commerce that the cultivators of wheats should be supplied with superior seed is extremely good and should be acted upon. If some selected agriculturists are supplied with good seed gratis and are advised as to the best way of growing wheats, some progress will have been made in improving the quality of this grain.

Suggests that the appointment of the reported Law Commission should be deferred till the results of the labours of the Education Commission are published.

The Bombay Samáchár (87) of the 17th October is glad that the Government of India is about to appoint a law commission for enquiring into certain matters connected with courts and other things mentioned by a correspondent of the Bombay Gazette, but observes that it will be well if the appointment is deferred until the report of the Education Commission is published and the effects of its labours are known. For in such case the public would be in a position to express their sentiments as to what results they should expect from the proposed commission. There is no doubt that the particular matters mentioned by the correspondent of the Gazette urgently need reform, and some of them are so very important as to require a separate commission for enquiry into each of them.

Says that the seditious writings in the Englishman ought to be put down.

With reference to the article which recently appeared in the Englishman of Calcutta recommending Englishmen in India to make every preparation to assume the reins of government in India in case the Native Magistrates' Jurisdiction Bill is passed, the Jáme Jamshed (101) of the 20th October asks, Is there any government in Bengal? The Englishman has been writing seditious articles, and has been encouraged in its reckless course by the weakness shown by the Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal. If similar effusions had appeared in any newspaper in England the writer would have been severely punished. India is inhabited by persons of different nationalities, and hence the publication of such compositions is very dangerous. In the time of the late East India Company there existed a law that a European who excited inimical feelings between Europeans and Natives should be deported; and accordingly several Europeans were sent out of the country. This law would have proved of great service if it had been in force now. The Englishman alone of all newspapers has been guilty of exciting bad feelings between Europeans and Natives by its seditious writings. If the Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal fails to put down this nuisance, the Viceroy should not neglect to do so.

Disapproves of the Kennedy Sea face being covered with buildings.

With reference to the notification for the sale of building sites on the Kennedy Sea face, the Rást Goftár (112) of the 14th October observes that in place of the thatched bungalows in the Marine Lines and the Strangers' Line pucka-built houses should be built. In this locality the B. B. & C. I. Railway Company is going to erect a large building for the accommodation of its offices, and the Bombay Club will build a club house. And beyond the railway line on the Kennedy Sea face Government now propose to allow private people to build a line of bungalows and have advertized the sale of building sites. The erection of these buildings will cut off the supply of fresh air from the sea to the thickly populated parts of the fort. If the Kennedy Sea face is occupied by buildings, the people of Bombay will lose the only vacant ground which serves them for a cool promenade every morning and evening. Sir Bartle Frere promised to allow the reclaimed ground on Back Bay to be left vacant for the use of the public when it was decided to occupy most of the esplanade with new buildings. The erection of new edifices on the Kennedy Sea face will injuriously affect the health of Bombay, and for this reason the people, and particularly the municipality of the city, ought to request Government to give up their intention of parting with land for building sites. [The Bombay Chronicle (75), the Kaiser-i-Hind (104) and the Gujaráti (97) of the same date, and the Jáme Jamshed (101) of the 16th October express similar sentiments.]

Remarks in connection with the post of Sindi Translator to Government.

A correspondent of the Indian Spectator (1) of the 14th October, signing himself "Fair Play," writes:—Some time back there appeared in your columns a letter on the uselessness of keeping an Englishman as a Sindi Translator, who had for all practical purposes nothing to do but simply to draw a salary of Rs. 250 per month for putting his signature to three or four papers. I fully agree with the writer, and have further to add that Government for this mistake has, besides incurring useless expenditure, to undergo much inconvenience owing to the delay which on this account is caused in the publication of translations. As a rule the sinecure post of the Translator falls to the fortune of the Assistant Commissioner, who for about four months every year goes on circuit. All the Rules, Regulations, Bills, Acts, books, etcetera, that are to be translated go to him on circuit, whence at his convenience he sends them to Karáchi to the Assistant Translator, who after translating them sends them to the Translator for his signature, from whom after some delay they are sent to Karáchi to the Assistant Translator to be sent to press. Now imagine the inconvenience, delay and waste of time which thus ensue. This inconvenience has been admitted, but what is the remedy? Why, the Assistant Translator and the staff too are made to accompany the Translator on his tour. But does anybody think of the unnecessary and reckless expense that is caused by this peregrination? The Assistant Translator and his clerk are each paid Rs. 60 a month as batta. Now all this expense is to be incurred for the sake of the Assistant Commissioner in order to justify the payment to him of Rs. 250, which he gets for doing nothing. Thus besides the objections against an Englishman serving as a Sindi Translator, the evils of a union of two offices are glaringly brought into prominence.

Prohibition to carry firewood from one village to another without a pass from a Forest Officer and inconveniences suffered thereby by the public.

The Nyáyá Sindhu (45) of the 15th October says that the prohibition to carry firewood from one village to another without a pass from the authorities of the Forest Department has caused and still causes the greatest possible inconvenience to the public. To bring a cart-load of firewood within the municipal limits of Ahmednagar, the driver has to engage the services of a man to take care of the cart while he himself has to move about in order to obtain a pass. When he at last succeeds in finding out the office of the Forest Officer whose duty it is to grant a pass, he is told that the sáheb is on tour. On account of the trouble and annoyance to which they are subjected, cart-drivers refuse the conveyance of fire-wood, and hence it has become scarce and dear. Even persons who collect firewood from their own jungles cannot bring it into Ahmednagar without a pass from the Forest Officer. The fee on each cart-load is two pies. For the payment of this small sum the drivers have to walk great distances and the public has to put up with the high price of one of the necessaries of life. It is to be hoped that the authorities concerned will take remedial action without delay.

Complains that the light on the lighthouse at Calicut is not kept burning all night.

A correspondent of the Bombay Samáchár (87) of the 17th October states that the masters of ships that visit the much-frequented port of Calicut complain that the light on the lighthouse in this port goes out at an early hour, and consequently they cannot safely steer their vessels during dark nights.

Complains of the outrages on respectable women perpetrated by sepoys of the 3rd Beluchi Regiment stationed at Hyderabad (Sind).

A correspondent of the Indian Spectator (1) of the 14th October, writing from Karáchi, says:—For a long time the roughs of the 3rd Beluchi Regiment stationed at Hyderabad have been causing serious trouble to the townspeople by insulting their women in byelanes and even in the open bazár. The principal citizens, Hindu and Mahomedan, more than three months ago waited upon the District Superintendent of Police with a petition, in which they complained that the Beluchi sepoys loitered in the lanes and alleys of the city inhabited by respectable families; that they affronted and harassed women in various ways by elbowing them, by making indecent gestures, and sometimes by rudely peeping into their faces through their veils; that the sepoys always managed to scatter about before help could arrive; and that unless the old order prohibiting the sepoys from visiting the native town except at certain stated hours, and then too not without a pass and full uniform, was restored, the nuisance would grow altogether intolerable and lead to serious consequences. The Superintendent promised to do his best to check the evil, but it nevertheless continues. Only the other day a correspondent signing himself "Hyderabadi" wrote to the Sind Gazette complaining of this grievance. His letter elicited a reply from the Captain and Adjutant of the regiment, who stated that every sepoy of the 3rd Beluchis who entered the native town did so with a pass and wore his regimental puggree, and ended his letter with the following suggestive passage:—"'Hyderabadi' is a good hand at romancing, but if he will take the advice of one who knows something about the temper of the 3rd Beluchis he will romance on some safer subject in future." What does this mean? Is the temper of the 3rd Beluchis such that even their officers cannot control it? The Captain of the regiment does not contradict the fact that they are a terror to helpless women, whom the police are unable to protect. They are a terror to the police as well. I believe the Police Inspector himself can testify to the rough, high-handed, free-and-easy treatment to which the sepoys subject the weaker sex. It was the sepoys of this regiment who lately fell upon a peaceful village near Hyderabad, beat the males and outraged the modesty of females. Of course not one of them could be identified and none was convicted, though there was no doubt either about the beating or the outrages. I was recently told by an eyewitness that a couple of sepoys pounced upon two helpless pardáh women in a solitary street, that one of the women was actually prostrated on the ground and a rape would have been committed had not my informant been fortunately attracted to the scene by her cries. I sent my informant to the Police Inspector, and I believe his information is on the police records. Just as I am writing this letter I hear of another fresh outrage perpetrated in broad daylight near the Malkani lane. A party of sepoys caught a woman at the mouth of the street, surrounded her on all sides, and subjected her to unmentionably indecent assaults. She is said to have fainted, but I do not know if any of the malefactors have been apprehended. How long is this to last? Is the magistracy dead? What is the District Magistrate doing? If the police are altogether demoralized, is it not high time to replace them by some more efficient men, or at any rate to add to their strength? Scenes such as these are sure to lead to riots and bloodshed. Is it not the bounden duty of the executive to prevent such scenes? The offence of outraging the modesty of a woman is a cognisable one. Why is it that not a single arrest has been made, although the outrageous conduct of the Beluchis is notorious? What a commentary this upon all the tall talk about the security of person and property under British rule! Here is a peaceful city and an inoffensive people saddled with a regiment which they do not require at all, and meeting daily with wrongs and insults at the hands of this regiment, which make one's hair stand on end and which are sure one day to result in reprisals and revenge. The Hyderabadis are law-abiding, but not cowardly. The military are for the protection of the people and not for preying upon them. A Native can endure anything but an insult to his womenfolk. The editor, in a note, says that this is a scandalous state of matters and needs looking into.

Mentions cases of ill-treatment of Natives by Europeans and makes remarks.

The Indu Prakăsh (9) of the 15th October in a Maráthi leader alludes generally to the ill-treatment of Natives by Europeans, and after noticing the cases of Mr. George Hewett, who was dismissed from the public service for running after his peon with a loaded pistol, and of Captain Rogers, who was accused of assaulting at Meerut in July last one Bholánáth Mukarji, a pleader in the High Court of the North-West Provinces for not saluting him, observes that in the manner in which the trials of these men were conducted great injustice has been done. In the case of Captain Rogers the trying magistrate purposely fined him in a sum of less than Rs. 200 in order to prevent his decision being reviewed by his military superiors. The Indu Prakásh considers that the offence of which Captain Rogers was found guilty deserved a severe punishment. He ought to have been made to apologise to the complainant in open court. A fine of Rs. 200 or even of Rs. 2,000 would be no punishment to well-to-do officers like Captain Rogers, who like the Native population to look upon them as gods. It would be well if Lord Ripon were to send for the papers in this case, and after due deliberation inflict adequate punishment on Captain Rogers. The Indu Prakásh suggests that a book should be written containing narratives of trials in which Europeans have been found guilty of ill-treating Natives, and it should he made a subject for examination in the case of officers in the Revenue and Military Departments. Europeans would not then venture to assault innocent Natives as they do now. No real friendly feeling will spring up between Europeans and Natives so long as the former consider themselves as belonging to a superior race and refuse to accord proper treatment to the latter.

Advocates the claims of Mr. Shitárám Dhákji to the post of chief clerk to the Chief Presidency Magistrate, Bombay.

In a paragraph headed "An unjust supersession," the Native Opinion (10) of the 14th October remarks:—It is reported that the Chief Clerkship of our First Presidency Magistrate is to be filled up by an outsider, that is, one who has neither official experience nor official claims to the post. According to the standing practice, whenever there is a vacancy the next subordinate officer has the chance, but in this instance the right claimant is to be set aside for reasons hard to discover, while a new importation is to be pitchforked into it. Why is Mr. Shitárám Dhákji's official experience of the last thirty-five years to be considered quite incommensurate with the chief clerk's official responsibilities? Even official precedents are in Mr. Shitárám's favour, and if the rule recently laid down by the Secretary of State were to receive due consideration Mr. Shitárám's claims cannot be disputed. But poor Mr. Shitárám cannot advance any other claims than those of experience, and it will not be surprising if these claims should have to give way before those of the skin. We hope the rumour is not true and the officials are not so inconsiderate as to pass over the best claims of a man who has honestly served Government for so long a period. [The Subodh Patrika (11) of the 14th and the Indu Prakásh (9) of the 15th October express similar sentiments.]

Complains of the injury done to crops by stray cattle in Ránder.

A correspondent of the Gujarát Mitrá (76) of the 14th October complains that several residents of Ránder keep cattle and let them loose at night to feed. These stray cattle wander into the cultivated fields and cause damage to the owners thereof. The cultivators are unable to seize and impound the cattle through fear of being maltreated by the owners of the straying animals. The police ought to take steps to protect the cultivators from the injury done to their crops.

Requests the Commissioner of Police, Bombay, to permit fireworks to be let off on roads in the out-of-the-way quarters of the city.

The Jáme Jamshed (101) of the 16th October observes that the notification annually issued by the Commissioner of Police, Bombay, prohibiting the letting off of fireworks on public roads in the Diwáli holidays is worded in general terms, and consequently the police have the power of prohibiting the letting off of fireworks even in out-of-the-way quarters of the city. Such interference mars the innocent pleasure which children derive from this amusement. It would be enough to strictly prohibit the letting off of fireworks on such public roads as the Kálbádevi, Apollo, Moti Bazár, Market, Paidhuni, &c., on which a heavy and continuous traffic is carried on. It is to be hoped that the Commissioner will this year specify the roads on which fireworks should not be allowed to be let off and exempt other roads from the prohibition.

Complaint against the postal authorities.

The Satyá Prakásh (54) of the 19th October says that when a short time ago the Postal Department agreed on the payment of three months' postage in advance by the proprietors of newspapers to allow their papers to pass without a stamp, it was distinctly stated that no extra charge would be made if the circulation of the paper increased during those three months, or a refund would be allowed in case the number of subscribers decreased during the same interval. But notwithstanding this clear pledge, the postal authorities have varied this rule and are demanding extra payment in the case of those newspapers whose circulation has increased. The conduct of the postal authorities is must unjust and ought to be strongly protested against by those whose interests are affected by it.

Local Self-government.

Maladministration of local funds.

The Indian Spectator (1) of the 14th October, in an article headed "Wanted a Commission of Inquiry for Ahmedabad," criticises the remarks made by the Honourable Mr. Peile in his speech on the occasion of the introduction of the Bombay Local Self-government Bills in the Legislative Council regarding the retention of official presidents of municipal boards, and remarks:—To those who have followed the several facts of alleged mismanagement of local funds of the Ahmedabad Municipality as stated in our last two issues, it will be clear that our demand for a commission of inquiry in the interests of the public at large is justifiable. We have temperately criticised the many high-handed acts of the late permanent chairman of the local funds committee, and now we cannot ask for less than a public inquiry by well-known persons of approved independence and integrity. The veil that has so long hidden from the public gaze the arbitrary exercise of official powers has been partially removed. But in order that the whole truth may be sifted, it is necessary that a commission of inquiry should be appointed as soon as practicable. In a matter of this kind no time should be lost in order to prevent the chief actors working the oracle at head-quarters with the view to drop a curtain over a public scandal. We think the independent citizens of Ahmedabad should appeal for such an inquiry. It is their interest to do so. On the result of the investigation will very much depend the future of local self-government in this Presidency. We say that a commission of inquiry is much needed as it may, if it goes about acting honestly and independently, reveal a number of other facts in connection with the management of the Ahmedabad local funds. So convinced are we of the urgency of such a commission that we advise the people of Ahmedabad to memorialize Government if a commission is not soon ordered. [The Vartamán Sár (121) of the 16th October recommends the appointment of a commission of inquiry into the misdeeds of the Ahmedabad and Surat municipalities. It expresses disapproval of the conduct of Mr. Fernandez, the late permanent chairman of the Ahmedabad Municipality, and says that Mr. White has wasted the money of the Surat Municipality. When Government have expressed one opinion and the public another regarding the management of local funds it is highly necessary in the interests of justice and honour that a decision should be come to after due investigation. Not only have the local funds at Surat and Ahmedabad been mismanaged, but the same has been the case in many other places. It would be well if a commission were appointed to inquire into the management of local funds in general. If this is not practicable, a commission of inquiry ought at least to be nominated for Surat and Ahmedabad.]

Remarks in connection with the report made by the committee appointed by the Bombay Municipality regarding the transfer of certain institutions from Government to municipal management.

The Indu Prakásh (9) of the 15th October says:—The report on the subject of education made by the committee appointed by the Bombay Municipality is chiefly interesting on account of the Educational Board. The committee propose that the work of directing management and control of all primary schools within the municipal limits of Bombay shall be performed by a board composed of eight elected members, of whom four at least shall be members of the Municipal Corporation. To the constitution of the board we should like to add one more element, viz. a salaried permanent secretary as in England, where they have a permanent under-secretary in each department who is versed in the traditions and the details of work in the department. The secretary must be a responsible officer and not a mere clerk. He in conjunction with the chairman must have an initiative in all matters of reform, management and control, must have charge of the records of the office, and must be in charge of all correspondence. In a manner he must be a superior officer to Government Deputy Inspectors, and must occupy nearly the same position in Bombay as Educational Inspectors in the districts. The chairman and members, their offices being elective, will be ever-changing. The board as proposed will do well enough for a deliberative or consultative body, but it seems to us necessary that the executive functions should be performed by some person or persons who will be permanently in office. The constitution of our municipality itself makes provision for a similar division of labour. The Municipal Commissioner and his many assistants are the permanent executive officers, and they are controlled and directed by the Town Council and the Corporation, both of whom have more or less purely consultative functions. A similar arrangement must, we think, be made in respect to the educational board. If it is proposed to add an educational department to our municipal secretariat and place it under the Municipal Commissioner there would not be much objection, except that it will add to the work and responsibilities of that already over-worked officer, and the work of superintending education is altogether so inharmonious with the work of city conservancy and house-assessments, that we think it would be more conducive to efficiency if a separate officer, more conversant with educational matters and not distracted by any others, were made responsible for the proper management of our schools. The scheme as at present published makes mention of the primary schools only, but as the committee propose to include five

Anglo-vernacular schools among the institutions the municipality is to take charge of, those schools also will have to be looked after and the whole work will be quite enough to absorb the energies of one good officer. Under Government management the executive functions are performed by two Deputy Educational Inspectors under the guidance of the Educational Inspector, Central Division, and of the Director of Public Instruction. The Deputy Inspectors will now be merely examining and inspecting officers, while the two higher officers will be for all practical work non-existent for Bombay. Their places have to be filled, and they will be ill filled, whether by the ever-changing board or the Municipal Commissioner. The board, as we have said, will work well as a consultative body and not as one having executive functions, and the Municipal Commissioner is already sufficiently occupied with other work. While, therefore, the general work of advising on measures and passing estimates will be done well enough under the scheme as proposed, the work of putting the measures into force is, to our mind, left unprovided. It is desirable that adequate provision should be made for this branch of the work. Another point that requires observation is that no test has been laid down as to the qualifications of those persons who not being members of the Corporation are to be members of the board. We think some test of eligibility should be laid down, as, for instance, a man being a University Fellow or graduate of some standing, which will prevent incompetent persons from getting in. Further, the disqualification from sentence of imprisonment for a crime should, as we have suggested in the discussion on the Local Self-government Bills, be limited to convictions for non-compoundable offences. The provisions which define the functions of the board give it the power of opening new schools and abolishing others. In respect to this we observe that paragraph 12 expressly provides that the teachers appointed by the board shall hold office during the pleasure of the board. This rule makes the tenure of the office of a teacher very precarious. Under the existing arrangements the service of many of the teachers is pensionable. It is not quite clear whether the teachers hereafter appointed are to have no claim for pension. Further, as regards those whose service is at present pensionable, it is not clear to whom they are to look for their pension. We trust some satisfactory arrangement will be made whereby the present incumbents will be assured of their rights and the future teachers given a more secure and profitable footing in the service. The other report deals with the amendments proposed to be made in the existing municipal law. The point first considered is whether having regard to the increase of population from 614,000 to 743,196 there should be a corresponding increase in the number of seats in the Corporation. This question the committee propose to solve by suggesting that the number of seats should be increased from 64 to 72 and that the seats should be redistributed by giving half the number (36) as heretofore to rate-payers, 8 more seats, that is 24 in all, to the Justices by reducing the number of Government seats to 8, and by creating 2 new constituencies, viz. the Fellows of the University and the Chamber of Commerce, and giving them 2 seats each. We heartily approve of the increase in the number of seats and the creation of the two new constituencies. In fact, we suggested long ago that such intelligent bodies as the University ought to have the right of representation in our local parliament. But we think their claim is not yet sufficiently acknowledged. For our own part we would fain see the Justices limited to their old number and the remaining seats divided between the new constituencies. The University and the Chamber of Commerce are both quite important and numerous enough bodies to deserve to have at least six seats each if the Justices are honoured with sixteen seats. The canvassing which witnessed not altogether satisfactory results obtained at the last election by the Justices is enough to make us think that the number of seats the Justices have already got is not too small, and that it is not desirable to have it increased. If Government agree to have their number cut down, we think all available seats should be bestowed upon the University and the Chamber of Commerce. Besides like the Chamber of Commerce there are other bodies, as the Port Trust, the Mill-owners' Association and so forth, whose claims, we think, should not be overlooked. On the other hand the test of qualification for the rate-payers should be revised. The limit should be raised sufficiently high to prevent the whole hosts of unintelligent voters getting in that were to be seen driven to the polling stations on the last occasion like so many slaves. It was altogether sickening to see the unscrupulous agents of wealthy candidates elbowing the crowd with troops of hack-carriage-drivers locked up in their arms. We certainly wish that the franchise should be as widely enjoyed as possible. But it ought to be conferred only on those persons who know its value and can use it well. On the subject of the number of votes each voter should possess, we are glad the committee adopt a suggestion made by us some time back, viz. that each voter should have as many votes as the number of seats in the ward in which he votes. The cumulative system of voting has also been advocated. Both these reforms are, we think, urgent and will tend to ensure the return of qualified members. The suggestions that the appointment of the Municipal Commissioner should be made by the Corporation, and that the Town Council should be made the chief executive authority, with the Municipal Commissioner as its head, have both been negatived by the committee, and, we think, rightly. We agree with the committee that the arrangements at present existing are good enough. The temptation of securing the patronage of appointing such a highly-paid officer as the Municipal Commissioner is great, though there is some reason in the argument that if the Commissioner is a servant of the Corporation the latter should have the right of choosing its own man. On the other hand the possibility of jobbery and favouritism is great when the appointment is vested in the Corporation itself. On the whole, we think it is well as it is.

Observes that the present chairman of the managing committee of the Nadiád Municipality is not fit for the post of president of the corporation.

The Gujarát Mitrá (76) of the 14th October observes that the present chairman of the managing committee of the Nadiád Municipality is to be appointed by Government president of the corporation on the re-construction of the municipal machinery under the scheme of local self-government. He is not a Government servant, but it is remarkable how little he shows independence of character. In the matter of the underground privies and other questions a certain proposal was made which had the concurrence of the general body of rate-payers, but it was afterwards withdrawn. Some member then made another proposal and it was carried. The president wrote to Government, who, however, severely censured the corporation. .When the leaders of the people evince instability of character and fail to act with vigour and disregard the true interests of the public, there is little hope of local self-government prospering. It is said this gentleman has in his capacity of chairman wrested certain lands from their legitimate owners, and that this fact has now come to light. If this report be true, he is not a fit person to perform the duties of president. If he is appointed to that office the scheme of local self-government is sure to miscarry.

Legislation.

Points out the necessity of passing the Bengal Tenancy Bill.

The Mahrátta (2) of the 14th October says:—The Bengal Tenancy Bill, if it passes in the shape it is now or with slight modifications, will appear to the judgment of future generations as a measure second only to the local self-government scheme in point of deep political foresight and enlightened love of humanity. Local self-government is a small beginning of independent political existence; the Bengal Tenancy Bill is a small beginning of that equal distribution of physical comforts which the advancing world from its existing feelings and instinctive propensities seems to be destined to possess at some remote date. Political independence and physical comfort seem to be the two chief factors of human happiness; and the memory of the noble Viceroy who has made their "small beginnings" in this conquered land cannot but be indelibly imprinted on the sympathetic hearts of the people. Let the zamindárs raise what cry they like, we trust His Excellency and His Excellency's liberal advisers will not shrink for a moment from completing the righteous work of the amelioration of the Bengal tenantry. Interested parties will try to cry down a noble measure, but a far-sighted statesman should not yield to the threatening attitude assumed by the losers of power, wealth and patronage. The Bill as it stands appears to us to be perfectly just, and the arguments adduced against it in the memorial of the British India Association are altogether untenable. The decentralization scheme and its corollary, the establishment of local self-government, found complete favour with us. We hailed the introduction of these measures with great delight, and a faithful carrying out of the principles involved therein will lead to our permanent welfare. Why should we object to a measure which, if passed, is sure to avoid the repetition of the horrible scenes of murder and assassination which have so often disturbed the peace of Ireland ? We cannot reasonably blame a policy which anticipates dangers and provides safeguards against them beforehand. The greatest purpose which history serves is that it enables us to profit by the experience of the past. If the zamindárs of Bengal be wise enough to see that the maintenance of landlordism is certain to result in producing ere long Irish difficulties here, they will willingly prepare themselves to make some sacrifices in favour of their tenants and show their readiness to permit without opposition the Government of Lord Ripon to extend to their tenants some benefits of the permanent settlement. We are prepared to show that the Bill contemplates no radical changes; it only seeks to make the tenants partners to a certain extent in the system of the land tenure which has immensely benefited the zamindárs. We look upon the changes proposed in the Bill as nothing but an attempt to give a further extension to the permanent settlement. The zamindárs will necessarily have to part with a certain portion of their profits ; but the question is whether the profits which they have been so long enjoying are legitimate, or whether they assert their right to them only because they have long been in enjoyment. We will grant for argument's sake that Lord Cornwallis made them proprietors or landlords of the soil in the widest sense of the term. We may even go a step further and grant that oven under the Moguls the zamindárs had full proprietary rights over the soil (as they are sure to maintain) and Lord Cornwallis simply confirmed them. Even supposing that the zamindárs have held these proprietary rights from time immemorial, what rational man can say that Government are bound to uphold them in their full integrity, paying no attention whatever to the change of circumstances which inevitably comes on with the march of time ? We are not blind to the sacred character of vested rights, nor are we inclined to show the least favour to radical and revolutionary legislation. But we emphatically deny that the changes proposed in the Bill have radical or revolutionary tendencies. On the contrary we hope to show that if in deference to the combined opposition of the landlords or some other cause the present Government fail to pass the Bill, the growing indigence and heart-rending poverty of the ryots will cause changes and revolutions of a terrible nature. If the zamindárs will think, they will find that their self-interest requires that the Bill be passed. They earned their jághirs or ináms either by doing some valuable service to the State (whether to the Mogul or to the British Government) or by paying their equivalent in money. Whatever may be the way in which they obtained the possession of their vested rights they are equally sacred, and a government in this country or in any other must maintain them as far as it may be compatible with the general welfare of society. When that is threatened to be shaken to its foundation some modifications have to be made, notwithstanding their inviolable character and their sacredness. Some may say that these opinions breathe a spirit of rank radicalism. But whatever some may think or say, when circumstances are ripe for them, changes will find their way into society and force themselves upon it. Wisdom lies in timely foreseeing this inevitability and in creating, counteracting or balancing situations. When this is done, the catastrophe is averted, and peace and prosperity continue undisturbed. When a nation fails to show such wisdom, it falls an easy prey to the ambition of demagogues and what is called Revolution is the result. To such revolutions France fell a prey; Ireland and Russia have partly been their prey. Let us, therefore, be wise and profit by the example of other countries. Let us not look to England and its landlordism. England is a manufacturing country, and therefore its peace has not in recent times been disturbed by agrarian risings. India is an essentially agricultural country, and therefore it will not do for Indian zamindárs to imitate the conduct of the English landlords or to hold fast to their principles.

In noticing the enactment of the Land Improvement Bill the Bombay Chronicle (75) of the 14th October observes that the measure received the best attention of the most clever experts on land tenure and land revenue questions as well as questions affecting the rights and duties of landlords and tenants and their relations and obligations to one another, not in India only but in England also. If practical effect is given to this Act with discretion and care, the new law will not fail to exert the happiest effects on the condition of the peasantry throughout the country.

Approves of the Land Improvement Act.

The Rást Goftár (112) of the 14th October observes that though the Government of India have altered the original Native Magistrates' Jurisdiction Bill so that it is now intended to confer the jurisdiction on Native covenanted civilians who have passed the competitive examination in England and have attained to the position of a District Judge or a Magistrate, yet the selfish opponents of the Bill are not satisfied and wish to see the measure completely thrown out. Its assailants think that Parliament will coincide in their views, and therefore insist upon the passing of the Bill being deferred till after the re-assembling of the British Senate. But at the last session the opponents met with a signal defeat, and hence it is more than probable that the Bill will receive at the next session more support than has been hitherto accorded to it. It is not discreet that an important political measure like the present should be delayed and trifled with in this fashion. Since the Supreme and the Home Governments have resolved to pass the measure there is no use in delaying its enactment, particularly when it has created great dissatisfaction, which is likely to increase still more by reason of this delay. Every enquiry has been made and due precaution taken in regard to it and nobody is likely to derive any advantage from further procrastination. The delay which has already taken place has done much harm. [The Akhbáre Sodágar (82) of the 16th October expresses similar sentiments.]

Recommends that the Native Magistrates' Jurisdiction Bill should be enacted before the re-assembling of Parliament.

Education.

In alluding to the approaching publication of the report of the Education Commission, the Lok Mitrá (78) of the 14th October observes that it is a great satisfaction to find that the unanimous opinion of the Commission leaves the question of higher education quite unprejudiced, and the fears that were entertained that an undue prominence given to middle-class education might interfere with the prospects of higher education are now practically set at rest. India cannot yet afford to forego the fostering care extended to higher education by Government, and it would be one of the most fatal blunders that the interests of higher education should be disregarded out of a laudable desire to extend the benefits of middle-class education. If any portion of the State educational machinery requires further development, it is collegiate instruction. Every effort should of course be made to bring education within the reach of the masses, but any diminution of State support to higher education, at least at present, would be an evil which would far counterbalance any benefit to be derived from a more general spread of education. It is the highly educated young men of India that must be looked to for some time to aid in her regeneration, and they will go forth as pioneers of progress amongst the masses, who would then doubly and more surely benefit by any system which has for its object their elevation in an intellectual point of view.

Is glad that the Education Commission have not recommended the withdrawal of support from higher education.

The Indu Prakásh (9) of the 15th October refers to the rumour that Government intend to prepare and publish a manual of morality for use in Government schools and colleges, and remarks:—We doubt the practical utility of teaching morality through moral catechisms and manuals, but we do not mean to imply that there is no room for improvement in the present secular system of teaching adopted in Government institutions. In his evidence before the Education Commission, Principal Wordsworth offered his own opinion upon the question of moral training, and it seems to us that, as he has observed in the course of that evidence, in a matter like this more depends upon the personal example of the teachers than on formal instruction. Such instruction seems to us to be not only useless from a practical point of view, but in some cases dangerous. Students who are made to dabble in lessons on morality are often tempted to ask the why and wherefore on several points, and if their curiosity is not satisfied or their doubts not solved they are perforce driven to the conclusion that all they are made to learn is moonshine. As an instance, let us take the following. In a manual of morality such as the educational authorities are said to have in view, such as the Education Commission is said to have expressed itself in favour of, we doubt whether that well-known lesson of morality taught by Christ which says that if thy enemy smite thy right cheek give him thy left one can be omitted; and if it is not, a Native student who may have to learn the lesson may well feel perplexed to find that for practical purposes the lesson is hardly worth consideration. It is said that there is a good deal of cramming in education, and manuals of morality will only add to the evil. Rather than light upon a policy so dubious in its results, Government should begin to think seriously of making a change in the personnel of teachers in Government schools. It is not difficult to indicate the directions in which such a change seems both desirable and necessary. In the first place teachers are selected without any special examination of their qualifications for the profession of teaching. No care seems to be paid to the fact that it is not everybody that can prove a good teacher and that the profession is a profession by itself having its own specialities. In the second place the teachers and their pupils in Government schools do not come in contact with each other beyond the school hours or outside the school room, and there is thus hardly enough scope for the influence of personal example to which Professor Wordsworth has drawn attention. The teacher remains only a teacher, but as a guide of the morals of his young pupils he proves unavailing. It has been aptly said by the biographer of the late Dr. Arnold that the secret of his success as a school-master lay in the fact that he established a friendly intercourse between the masters and the pupils under their care, that he always endeavoured to impress upon his pupils in the highest class the notion that they were as much his and his fellow-teachers' co-adjutors in the government of the school as they were pupils, and, above all, that he wished to lead—his own conduct being exemplary—rather than to drive his pupils into the ways of morality. It is this sort of teaching that one would wish to see introduced in the educational institutions of Government in preference to the introduction of moral catechisms, the practical usefulness of which is after all a matter of question. It is true that Government cannot make rules for the guidance of teachers in such matters, but must trust to their discretion and judgment. But special encouragement by way of promotion should be given to those teachers who do more than they are strictly bound to do for their pupils, i.e., devote their energies to the profession in the spirit which actuated the late Dr. Arnold. At present promotion goes by seniority, and if not by seniority, by favouritism. The head-master of the school which passes the greatest number of boys at the Matriculation examination earns the favour of the Director. This of course is as it should be. But it is not all that ought to be. The head-masters of Government schools should be directed to report on the measures adopted by them for the purpose of bringing themselves and the masters under them in contact with their pupils outside the school and beyond school hours. The Educational Inspectors ought to be asked to bring to the notice of the Director the teachers who may have exerted themselves in the interests of their pupils so as to be their real guides and friends. It seems to us that the Educational Department ought to devise some measures such as these instead of fondly indulging the idea that if they put catechisms of morality in the hands of Native students they will have done their duty.

Approves of the suggestion made by the Bombay Gazette for increasing the usefulness of the Wilson Philological Lectureship.

The Native Opinion (10) of the 14th October says:—The Bombay Gazette has our hearty support for the change it proposes with regard to the Wilson Philological Lectureship. Though we cannot profess to lay down limits to which philological research should be confined, it cannot be denied that lectures in this science do not add much to human resources. What is wanted to be done with regard to this lectureship is to put its operation on a broad basis so as to include history and other collateral sciences within its range, and such extension of its scope can, we believe, in no way interfere with the primary intentions of its founder. To say the plain truth, lectures in this branch,—perhaps lectures on Sanskrit, Prákrit, and English excepted,—have been interesting to a few only, and no wonder that to his amazement a lecturer should often find himself compelled to address empty benches. Were the proposed change to be carried out, the real utility of the foundation will be realized and the lectures made more interesting and more attractive than they have hitherto been. To the educated Native as a student of political science a knowledge of history is of greater practical use than of any other branch, and we should merely be wanting in our duty were we to spare any effort to bring about the proposed change. [The Indu Prakásh (9) of the 15th October also expresses approval of the change proposed by the Bombay Gazette for increasing the usefulness of the lectureship.]

Says that Mr. Wordsworth, Principal, Elphinstone College, should be appointed Director of Public Instruction, Bombay, during Mr. Chatfield's absence on leave.

The Indu Prakásh (9) of the 15th October says:—The Times of India believes that the Government of Bombay intend to appoint a junior civilian to act as Director of Public Instruction during Mr. Chatfield's absence and protests against it, inasmuch as it will be a slight offered to the members of the Educational Department. The slight, apart from its more immediate effects, is sure to tell mischievously on the future of the department. Educational Officers have already some reason to complain that in the matter of pension they are placed at a considerable disadvantage, and it is pretty well-known that the present learned Principal of the Elphinstone College had almost made up his mind to resign the service in the ealier part of 1880 owing to its unfavourable conditions. Had Sir Richard Temple not interfered, the Educational Department would have suffered a serious loss in the retirement of one whom all of us have learnt to respect and admire. Sir James Fergusson might well imitate his predecessor in the appreciation of the services of Professor Wordsworth. The Times of India seems to fear that the learned Professor may decline the appointment if offered to him on the score of want of administrative experience, but Government cannot do worse than anticipate in this way. What is there to show that Professor Wordsworth will reject the offer or that he thinks he is not fitted to administer the Educational Department? Nothing except his learning, with which people are apt sometimes to associate the idea of want of practical experience. Sir Alexander Grant had had no administrative experience when he was chosen for the place; and yet, reputed scholar as he was, he did not fail to make an excellent Director.

Observes that one of the officers of the Educational Department should be appointed Director of Public Instruction during the absence of Mr. Chatfield on leave.

In noticing the report that during the absence of Mr. Chatfield on leave to England Government intend to appoint a covenanted civilian in his place, the Jáme Jamshed (101) of the 15th October observes that it would be an injustice to the officers of the Educational Department to bestow the post on an outsider. Messrs. Wordsworth, Oxenham and Cooke are perfectly competent to perform the duties of the office and one of them ought to be selected. The Secretary of State for India has ruled that the Directorship of Public Instruction should be conferred on an Educational Officer, and if a qualified gentleman is not to be found in the department then only should an outsider be selected. If in the face of this order Government should determine to appoint a covenanted civilian who is comparatively unacquainted with the Educational Department, the proceeding would be tantamount to a condemnation of the above-named officers. With reference to the report that Government intend to appoint Mr. Lee-Warner, the Jáme observes that he is no doubt very able, but lacks experience of the Educational Department and ought not to be allowed to over-ride the just claims of the officers of the department. [The Yajdán Parast (124) of the 14th October expresses similar sentiments.]

Mr. Oliver as Professor of English Literature at the Elphinstone College and remarks in connection therewith.

The Subodh Patrika (11) of the 14th October says:—The appointment of Mr. Selby as tutor to the Thákor of Gondal has taken the educational world by surprise. It leaves the chair of moral philosophy and logic at the Deccan College vacant for an indefinite period, as Professor Barrett, though nominally holding that chair, does not himself profess to be master of the subject and almost all students of philosophy and logic have come over in the beginning of the year to the Elphinstone College, as no provision was made for their teaching at the Deccan College. This is sufficiently unsatisfactory. The whole affair, however, wears a much worse aspect when we see that these changes involve a longer continuance of Mr. Oliver as Professor of English Literature at the Elphinstone College. In the last two issues of the Mahrátta there appeared some correspondence in connection with this matter, which shows that the students of Elphinstone College are not satisfied with the teaching of Professor Oliver. A correspondent signing himself "Elphinstonian" made certain definite statements calling in question the competency of Professor Oliver for the chair he now occupies. The correspondents who followed him in the next issue have indeed tried to defend Professor Oliver, but as they seem to have met argument by abuse it is evident that they cannot make out a case in favour of Professor Oliver. On enquiry we learn that the most difficult part of the work which falls legitimately to the share of the Professor of English Literature is taken up by Professors Wordsworth and Macmillan and that Professor Oliver is asked to teach English only to the P. E. class. This is a sufficient indication of the Principal's estimate of Mr. Oliver's abilities. The matter needs to be brought to the notice of Government, as it is certainly undesirable that so important and honourable a post should be occupied by an incompetent person. We hope that Mr. Wordsworth, in whom the public has the greatest confidence, will give the subject the attention it deserves.

Railways.

A complaint regarding overcrowding in third class carriages at intermediate stations on the B. B. & C. I. Railway line.

The Umreth Samáchár (120) of the 14th October complains of overcrowding in third class carriages and the consequent trouble and inconvenience to passengers at intermediate stations on the B. B. & C. I. Railway line. The writer himself on one occasion witnessed a pitiful sight. So many passengers were thrust in one carriage at the Mehmadabad and Nadiád stations that there was hardly standing accommodation for them. An old ryot who had a baby in his hand and a bundle of goods on his head kept on his legs till the train reached Boriávi. After leaving the Boriávi station tears began to trickle down his cheeks, and the writer taking pity on him took the baby in his lap. The ryot had still to keep standing, but when nearing the A'nand station he began to faint. Moreover passengers sit on covered holes kept for urinary purposes and oblige others to get down at stations to answer the calls of nature, when they are sometimes left behind. It is advisable, therefore, that two or three spare third class carriages should be attached to each passenger train from the point of starting, and that the covered holes for urinary purposes be partitioned off. It is to be hoped that the railway authorities will attend to this matter.

Native States.

Complains of the conduct of the Junágad State in regard to the shares of certain girásiás.

A correspondent of the Gujaráti (97) of the 14th October observes that the Rájasthánik Court disposes of the claims of the mul or original girásiás of Káthiáwár, but takes no cognizance of the grievances of a very large number of ordinary girásiás. The Political Agency afforded due protection to girásiás of all classes until Colonel Keatinge effected a change in this practice and ruled that the Native States should dispose of the claims of their respective girásiás. Since then this class of landholders are much oppressed by their respective rulers, and the Agency pays no heed to their grievances and the aggrieved parties sometimes go into outlawry. The Rájasthánik Court has nearly finished its work and it would be well to entrust it with the disposal of the claims of all girásiás. The Chiefs are willing to accept the jurisdiction of this Court, and so there would be no difficulty in making the arrangement. The Junágad State has given no compensation for the girás lands that have been transferred to the Káthis in the division of Jetpur, Bagásara and Majmu, and has discarded the Hindu law of inheritance in regard to girásiás and resumed grants notwithstanding the existence of the heirs of deceased persons. This evil course was first taken by the late Gokulji Jhála, and Messrs. Sále Hindi and Bápálál followed in his footsteps. The Political Agent well knows that Junágad has resumed the rights of the girásiás in the division made of Jetpur and other villages, and ought to appoint a commission to enquire into the matter. The Desái of Junágad held certain rights and privileges which were granted to him by the Emperors of Delhi. He is of the same status as the mul (original) girásiás, and yet the Junágad State has resumed his lands in the division of the village of Majmu. The Political Agent interceded for him on several occasions, but the State acts in opposition to Hindu law, has not returned to him his papers and foments quarrels in his family. According to Hindu law the son of a daughter is an heir of his maternal grandfather, and the Junágad State has continued to Kalyánrái, Morlidhar and Anandrái their girás and the Political Agency has confirmed the proceeding. Gokulji allowed the son of the daughter of Narsidás Desái to succeed to the estate of his maternal grandfather. And yet the claims of Nawalrái's paternal relation have been disallowed.

Berár Affairs.

Condemns the practice of employing uneducated men in positions of trust and responsibility which has recently grown up in the Berárs.

The Varhád Samáchár (70) of the 15th October says that in the Berárs the practice of giving appointments to men of birth and position irrespective of their intellectual qualifications has very much increased of late. If a graduate of the Bombay University applies for employment, he is appointed to a clerkship on Rs. 30 ; but if the son of a Jághirdár or Inámdár wishes to enter the public service he is at once posted to a Tahsildárship although he may not have passed the entrance examination for admission into a high school. A system under which such jobs are perpetrated ought not to be allowed to exist. The Varhád Samáchár trusts that the Resident and the Commissioner will not appoint ignorant and uneducated men to positions of trust and responsibility. Should Government desire to honour men of high birth and position, the object can be achieved by assigning them the foremost places in Darbár and by increasing their pensions or allowances. They should not be entrusted with power over others. By placing value on educational acquirements in giving public employment great encouragement will be given to men of high birth and position to study and reap the advantages of high education. In the Presidency of Bombay a University degree is indispensable for employment in the Revenue Department. Why should it be otherwise in the Berárs? It is to be hoped that the Resident and the Commissioner will take remedial measures soon.

Notes.—A. The notices from the different Newspapers have been collected in the Report under different heads, which are printed in italics.

B. The names of Newspapers are printed in the body of the Report in italics, and the number of the Newspaper in the above list is printed in brackets after the name.

C. The proprietors of the Newspapers marked * have not given information as to the number of copies issued. In these cases an estimate has been made by the Reporter.

D. The system of spelling vernacular words followed by the Reporter is the same as that adopted in the Official Spelling List of the Bombay Presidency. One peculiar feature of this system is that when the long a (आ or á) is the last letter of a word, the accent is left out, and the short a (अ = u in gun) is, to prevent confusion, never placed at the end of a word. This rule has been strictly followed, except that when the short a appears to be absolutely necessary to complete the pronunciation of a word, as in Arunodaya or the well known Mitra, it is printed with a mark over it to indicate that it is short, thus—ă.

Politics and the Public Administration.

Defends the Native character from the charge of perjury levelled against it.

In an article headed "Perjury in India," the Indu Prakásh (9) of the 22nd October says:—Are the opponents of the Ilbert Bill correct in appealing to the prevalence of the crime of perjury in India? Is it a fact that the Indian courts have daily to adjudicate on a vast mass of lying and falsehood? A good deal of late has been said on the subject, and the Bengal officials who have written against the Ilbert Bill have grown eloquent over what they consider to be the worst and special feature of Indian character—the tendency to concoct evidence. One of the gentlemen consulted has even gone so far as to assert that in an Indian bazár a witness can be procured at a trifling cost. Charges brought in an indefinite manner against a people wholesale are difficult to rebut. The prejudice against Natives because they are Natives may be to a certain extent at the bottom of the feeling that in India alone more than anywhere else false evidence can be easily obtained. But not one of the many gentlemen who have recorded their opinions in this manner on the prevalence of perjury in India seems to have taken care to enquire whether, assuming that the fact is what it is said to be, the way in which justice is administered in India and by British courts of justice is not to blame for it. In the first place the opinion itself seems to us to arise out of the prejudice against Native character, so common among Anglo-Indians. They take a text or two from one or two Hindu writers who have somewhere said that it is not a sin for a man to depose falsely if thereby he saves his own life, or, if not his own, the life of a Bráhman. It is inferred from this that a people whose Shástras inculcate principles of this kind cannot be supposed to have any great regard for justice and truth. European judges are often known to decide cases with notions derived in this way. They start with the prejudice and act upon it. Every Native witness that comes before them is a perjurer, and to such an extent is the prejudice carried that even respectable witnesses bearing character of the most unimpeachable kind have been disbelieved without much regard to their position or to the probabilities of the case to which the said witnesses have deposed. Not many years ago one of the best District Judges in this Presidency fell into this error. A certain murder case was before him for adjudication, and the person who was pounced upon by the police as the culprit happened to be a Bráhman. The prosecution endeavoured to show that the accused had been at the place where the murder had been committed, whereas on behalf of the accused a plea of alibi was set up, and a very respectable gentleman holding a situation of trust and responsibility appeared to depose that on the day on which the murder was alleged to have been committed the accused had been with him (the witness) in a town some hundred miles away from the scene of murder. The Judge summarily disbelieved this witness, and argued that he had perjured himself in his anxiety to save the life of a Bráhman. The accused was found guilty and sentenced to be hanged. The case came before the High Court, which found that the evidence for the prosecution on which the Judge in the court below had found the prisoner guilty was full of improbabilities, and that fact only went to support the evidence of the respectable witness who had deposed in favour of the accused as entirely trustworthy. The conviction and sentence were reversed and the accused was acquitted. The Judge, who had devoted several pages of his judgment to show that however respectable a Native might be he would not hesitate to perjure himself, was thus found to have committed a mistake of a most serious character in that he had allowed himself to be led away by his prejudice against Native witnesses in general. It appears to be very much forgotten that the procedure of the British courts is of itself such as to encourage the getting up of false evidence. From the first to the last stage of a trial every facility is afforded to litigants to frame their cases in a particular manner so as to achieve success. Their first business is to consult a professional adviser and ascertain from him what ought to be the nature of the evidence they should adduce. The idea that a professional adviser is at perfect liberty to ascertain how many witnesses his client is able to produce to depose in his favour and to what fact those witnesses are prepared to depose was quite foreign to this country, and it cannot be denied that this wide privilege given to the professional classes is liable to be abused. Most of the litigation in India proceeds now upon this ground. It is not that professional men encourage the concoction of false evidence, but seeing that the law makes it their duty to direct the course of the evidence in favour of their clients in a particular manner they endeavour to do the best for them. The opposite party's professional adviser does the same for his side; and although in theory we presume that in this way the courts are able to see into the truth, in practice the courts get at facts which, in the process of examination, cross-examination and re-examination, are apt to turn out quite different from the real facts of the case. It is said that cross-examination tends to expose a lying witness; but in the hands of a skilful cross-examiner it often serves as a weapon used to destroy the very best of truth. If a witness should happen to be a simple man not used to the courts and a little nervous, it is ten to one that he will break down under cross-examination skilfully conducted, and contradict himself in the course of it in respect of facts deposed to, it may be correctly and truly, in the course of his examination-in-chief. What are we to think of the procedure sanctified by British law which allows a professional man to defend even the worst of felons and cross-examine in his favour although he may happen to know from the felon himself that he is pleading the cause of a man who is guilty? Mr. Sergeant Ballantyne in his "Reminiscences" says that an instance of this kind happened in his own case, and perhaps many other professional men experienced in the practice of British courts in India are able to speak to similar instances. While the law itself allows an anomaly so repulsive if not to lawyers at any rate to laymen, we find theorists ready in India to carp at the failings of a system of legal procedure which allows many loop-holes of escape to real offenders, and sanctions practices that are calculated to encourage, if they do not actually encourage, subornation of perjury. "The glorious uncertainty of British law," which has passed into notoriety, is thrust upon a people not used to it. The huge machinery of British law with its courts and professional men is set to work, and we delude ourselves with the idea that under its auspices justice is being administered to the people of India as it never before was administered to them. But the fact is that this huge machinery, so far from encouraging people to speak the truth when placed in the witness-box in a court of justice, is apt to teach them that they are not responsible if when examined and cross-examined by counsel they give answers and say things which they would not have said if they had simply to say what they knew. Of facts notorious such as these no one takes cognizance; it occurs to no one that it is a calumny of the worst kind to say that Natives are fond of perjury. It is the British law and its practices; it is the fact that Native testimony in Indian courts has to be weighed by foreign judges, who know very little of Native society and get their judgment warped by notions of pride and exclusiveness—it is these which are to blame. To those Anglo-Indians who appeal to the fact that perjury is rife in India, well may we appeal in return to the evil their own notions of legal procedure have done by their premature introduction in this country.

Comments in connection with Sir Lepel Griffin's article on "Indian Princes at Home" in the Fortnightly Review.

The Dnyán Prakásh (8) of the 25th October, in noticing Sir Lepel Griffin's paper on "Indian Princes at Home" in the Fortnightly Review, remarks:—Sir Lepel appears to us to be a firm believer in the Jesuitical doctrine that the end justifies the means. Treason ceases to be treason when it succeeds. If George Washington had not succeeded in his attempt to establish a republic in America, he would have been executed as a traitor. The simple fact that his attempt succeeded served to invest that attempt with a glorious and immortal character of patriotism. It is evident then that whether a particular action is branded as treason or is extolled as patriotism depends all upon the result. Suppose Warren Hastings and Robert Clive had not succeeded in their unscrupulous proceedings and had signally failed, what would have been the verdict of history and posterity upon their doings? Sir Lepel Griffin and others, who in season and out of season extol those questionable proceedings and still in the same breath and with strange inconsistency condemn the same proceedings in others, will do well to bear the above considerations constantly in mind. For our part we agree with Sir Lepel in holding that the logic of facts must be accepted, inasmuch as we are firm believers in the truth of that Maráthi proverb which declares that no attempt should be made to trace the origin of rivers or the descent of illustrious saints. Such a task serves no useful purpose and only serves to cover the man who is foolish and rash enough to undertake it with shame and ridicule. As regards education and medical charity no comparison need be made between the British Government and the Native States of India for the obvious reason that they are only modern conceptions; even in Europe it is only recently that education and medical charity have been recognized as the legitimate functions of the State. We accordingly confine ourselves to the two points on which Sir Lepel challenges a comparison. These two points are that the rulers should cherish their people as their own flesh and blood, and secondly, that the material prosperity of the people should be advanced by their rulers disinterestedly, that is, for its own sake, pure and simple, without the slightest intention of sharing in it. Now supposing these two tests are applied to the British Indian Government, does Sir Lepel believe for a moment that that Government will satisfy those tests completely? We will take the last test first and see how the ideal is practically realized. Railways, canals, are roads have been and are being constructed by the British Government and thus the country is opened out. It is true that all this has contributed to the prosperity and comfort of the people to some extent; but nothing can be a greater mistake than to suppose that all this has been done by the British rulers out of pure disinterestedness. As regards these improvements it is sufficient to say that none of them have been made disinterestedly. Is Sir Lepel prepared to deny the fact that over and above the somewhat natural pecuniary profits which have accrued to Government they have increased the burden on land vastly in consequence of these improvements? In all these respects the policy of the British Government has been based upon commercial principles,—principles which are so very foreign to the genius of Native rulers. It is well known that the Mahomedan rulers of India have left a good many canals in Northern India as permanent memorials of their power and generosity. Now we pointedly ask whether or not the Mahomedan rulers made these canals a free gift to the people of the area in which they were situated or whether those rulers ever followed a commercial policy like that of the British Government. In the same way the Peshwás too in some places left similar memorials, of course on a smaller scale. To take a recent example, the enlightened and accomplished father of the present Chief of Bhor, a small principality in the Sátára District, supplied his capital town with an ample supply of water and made a free gift of it to his subjects. Can the British Government show a single instance of such magnanimity? And is it for British officers to carp at Native rulers on such a ground? We have not the slightest doubt that if a comparison is made at all on such a ground between the two sets of rulers every thoughtful and impartial observer must perforce admit that the comparison is favourable to Native Chiefs and against the British Government. Of course we are willing to admit that whether the Native policy or the British policy in this respect is sound is an open question, and for our part we are inclined to fancy that the British policy is more sound than the other. The Native policy is calculated in the long run to demoralize the people by making them rely on the bounty of their rulers and to deprive them of local self-government. But one thing is at any rate certain that in point of mere magnanimity the Native rulers possess an absolute advantage over the British Government. As regards the remaining test, the less said the better. Has Sir Lepel so soon forgotten the exquisite manner in which Lord Lytton, Sir John Strachey and Sir Richard Temple between them managed to cherish the people committed to their care as their own flesh and blood during famines? The blood of the countless millions of people that were starved to death during that period rests upon the heads of these three representatives of the British Government. Would these three gentlemen have ever cherished their own flesh and blood on one-pound rations? Can Sir Lepel point to one single instance of such heartless and fiendish inhumanity on the part of any Native ruler under such circumstances? Such a proceeding is infinitely worse than slavery, which in India does not prevail in that form which has invested that practice with such a hideous character in the Western countries of Europe and America. In those countries slaves are treated as worse than brutes, whereas in India they are treated by their masters as part of their own family. Slavery is not the proper word to designate the practice that prevails in this country.

Some remarks in connection with Lord Ripon's visit to Cashmere.

In a paragraph headed "Lord Ripon and Cashmere," the Indu Prakásh (9) of the 22nd October says:—We expect much good to come from this visit of the Viceroy to Cashmere. It is only natural that His Excellency's maligners should have attempted to put the most ridiculous construction conceivable on Lord Ripon's resolve to spend the recess, customarily allowed to the members of the Supreme Government after the Simla season is over, on a tour through Cashmere, which has of late attracted some attention. During the Viceroyalty of Lord Lytton, and apparently encouraged by his aggressive ideas of unscrupulous imperialism, the enemies of Native States set themselves to work and spared no attempt to show that Cashmere was a hot-bed of administrative iniquities. Lord Lytton was appealed to and the appeal sought nothing short of annexation. But enough had been done by His Excellency to cause suspicion and anxiety throughout India, and if he had not known this fact he would ten to one have sent off the Mahárája of Cashmere bag and baggage and accomplished another imperialistic feat. Now Lord Ripon has gone about the business in a totally different manner. He thinks—and not even the most friendly advocate of Native States can cavil at it—that there may be some foundation for what is now and then said against the administration of Cashmere; but he does not wish to act upon information obtained at second-hand. So he visits the State personally, but his detractors, who never raised a finger against the round of gaieties which made the sum of Lord Lytton's residence in India, have attempted to connect Lord Ripon's most sensible policy with a desire for pleasure on His Lordship's part. If Lord Ripon had let serious cares of State alone and made the giving of dinners to the social parvenus about Simla and Calcutta his chief business, they would have not said a word against him. And these are the successors of the men who could find no language adequate to express their sense of indignation against the late Lord Lawrence, because immediately on the assumption of the office of Viceroy he cut down the sumptuary expenses of Government House and refused to issue frequent invitations at the expense of the State to those who think that all the Viceroy has to do is to strive for their aggrandizement, equivocate with and strut before the Natives, and spend public money freely on State dinners.

Approves of the rumoured appointment of the Law Commission.

The Kaiser-i-Hind (103) of the 21st October expresses gratitude to the Viceroy for having passed several administrative measures calculated to help the material and moral progress of the Indian subjects of the British Crown. It then thankfully alludes to the Law Commission which Lord Ripon is said to think of appointing for enquiring into the judicial administration of the country, and for suggesting proper measures for the re-constitution of the Native or statutory Civil Service and for improving the judicial courts. The Kaiser expects many important benefits to accrue from the labours of the proposed commission.

Requests Government to increase the pension of five rupees per month paid to a grandson of the ex-Emperor of Delhi.

With reference to the report that recently appeared in a vernacular newspaper of the North-West Provinces that a grandson of the ex-Emperor of Delhi was seen working as a labourer, the Akhbáre Sodágar (81) of the 23rd October observes that it is to be regretted that a member of the royal family of Delhi should be reduced to such a miserable condition, but there can be no doubt that the members of that family have drawn upon themselves and their posterity the misery they are suffering. Very likely the prince above alluded to had no hand in the mutiny of 1857, and hence the British Government have given him a compassionate allowance of five rupees per month. Any other government except the British would not have kept any member of the disloyal family alive. The prince deserves credit for performing honest labour in order to maintain himself and his two wives. But the merciful British Government ought not to allow him to pass his days in misery. They should increase the amount of his pension or give him suitable employment under the State, or make a present to him of a piece of land on the produce of which he might be able to subsist in ease and comfort.

Says that the Arms Act should now be made applicable only to the criminal tribes of India.

The Native Opinion (10) of the 21st October says:—While British criminal tribes can in all immunity arm themselves with every sort of weapon and even shoot the peace-preservers, natives of this country, however high their character or position, are not entitled to carry a single weapon of defence for fear of the law. It is not as if this absurdity of confidence and its absence in the two different people was not recognized during the regime of the last Cabinet; a hope was even held out that the question would be seriously considered when the Liberal party should come into power. That party is now in office, and since its enthronement a very good account can be given of its stewardship in respect of India. Nevertheless the Arms Act is still allowed to remain as a standing distrust of Native loyalty. With so many proofs of our allegiance to the Crown it is a pity that Government should still persist in retaining this reflection upon Native character. Let a compromise of the Act be made and let Government take an opportunity of showing to the outside world that it is willing to give fair play. Let the Arms Act be made applicable only to the criminal tribes and those who may be supposed likely to make an improper use of such freedom. This cannot be looked upon as an unreasonable demand. This along with other legislative measures was the offshoot of the misguided regime of Lord Lytton, and like the Gagging Act it deserves to be relegated to the limbo of oblivion never to be invoked again to soil the good name of British Government in this country.

Disapproves of the proposal made in some quarters for depriving Native soldiers of the ammunition supplied to them.

The Native Opinion (10) of the 21st October says:—The murder of a military officer in Sind has afforded an opportunity to some to propose that the twenty rounds of shot which a Native sepoy carries should henceforth be disallowed. By itself the proposal is not unreasonable, but what is remarkable is its one-sided character. Those who make the suggestion are possibly blind to the oft-repeated murders committed by European soldiers in the name of game-hunting amongst Native villagers. We hope the life of a Native villager is not less valuable than that of a military officer, at least to his family. We have a shrewd suspicion that there is something behind this sad event that must have tempted the sepoy to commit the fatal deed. But apart from this, evidence may be gathered to show that the number of murders committed by European soldiers is greater than that committed by Native sepoys, and under the circumstances the deprival of the rounds of shot in the case of Native soldiery will hardly be an act of justice. We do not believe the military authorities can afford to allow such an invidious proposal. We are not against the proposal itself, but we wish it to be thorough and not one-sided.

Approves of the rules for enquiry into faults committed by Government servants and for their dismissal from service.

The Bombay Samáchár (86) of the 27th October heartily approves of the rules recently promulgated by the Bombay Government for the investigation into faults committed by Government servants and for their dismissal from service, and expresses gratitude to His Excellency the Governor for passing such considerate rules, in which there appears nothing wanting to secure complete justice to Government servants who incur the displeasure of their European superiors.

Passed students of agricultural classes and neglect of Government order regarding them.

A correspondent of the Gujarát Mitrá (75) of the 21st October observes that in Government Resolution No. 1334, dated 4th November 1879, it was ruled that in employing subordinates in the Revenue Department preference should be given to candidates who have obtained a certificate of having attended the agricultural school course prescribed for high schools over those who have simply passed the Matriculation Examination. In the circular of the programme of agricultural studies issued by the Director of Public Instruction on 2nd October 1882 the same statement is repeated, and yet none of the vacancies have been filled up by the appointment of students who have attended the agricultural classes. The reason of this strange neglect appears to be that Collectors do not know the names of the passed students. The Educational Inspector, Northern Division, should therefore issue the necessary certificates to the successful candidates and send their names to the different District Collectors for being recorded in their respective offices.

Sale of land on the Kennedy Sea-face for building bungalows and remarks in connection with this policy.

The Bombay Samáchár (86) of the 23rd October alludes to the great inconvenience which would be felt by the Native public of Bombay if the ground on the Kennedy Sea-face between the Marine Lines and Charni Road stations on the Back Bay were sold for erecting buildings, and requests Government to give up its intention. If notwithstanding this appeal Government should persist in adhering to its resolution to sell the land in question, it should be done by public auction and the purchasers should be left free to let the bungalows which they may build to European or Native tenants indiscriminately. There is no reason why Government should make it a condition of sale that Europeans alone shall be allowed to live in the houses which may be erected on this land.

Requests the authorities concerned to enquire into the management of the David Sassoon Reformatory.

The Yajdán Parast (124) of the 21st October observes that five lads have within the last twenty days run away from the David Sassoon Reformatory, and this fact proves that the institution is not properly managed. Either the police do not keep a strict watch on the young culprits, or they are not properly treated in the asylum. The authorities ought therefore to enquire into the working of this important institution.

Exacting labour from Kunbis without giving them any remuneration.

A correspondent of the Satyá Shodhak (56) of the 21st October, writing from Dápoli, states that the officials engaged in the work of destroying locusts seize poor labourers and do not give them any remuneration for their labour. Many of these labourers are taken away from their own legitimate business and are forced to work without wages from morning till night, and hence they do not find time to earn anything in order to make provision for their households. The khots and police pátils mostly seize gangs of Kunbis and retain them for a long time before their services are actually required. The correspondent trusts that the officials engaged in the work of destroying locusts will stop the above-mentioned reprehensible practices.

Complains of the way in which the license tax is levied in the mofussil.

The Hítechchhu (76) of Ahmedabad of the 25th October complains of the way in which the license tax is levied in the mofussil. It says that there are two strong objections against the manner in which it is collected. As a certain fixed amount is to be collected in each Collectorate, the Collectors do not pay attention to the liability of persons to pay the tax but care only for the realisation of the stated amount. Again injustice is done because appeals against the levy of the tax have to be made to Collectors only and the door of civil courts is closed against them. In the mofussil the Mámlatdárs, who are entrusted with the work of levying the tax, do not send for persons liable to pay the tax, ascertain their income and examine their books, but merely fix the amount of the tax from information supplied to them. When appeals are made before Assistant or Deputy Collectors against the amount at which persons are assessed, the books of the appellants are not carefully examined and their appeals are rejected on the ground that they are untrustworthy or not properly kept. In villages Mámlatdárs appoint talátis to do the work of assessment. It cannot be said that entire confidence can be placed in these low-paid and greedy servants. Many instances of improper conduct have come to light. The Hítechchhu has heard of cases of irregular conduct on the part of these officials and the injustice done by them. But people are afraid to expose these wrong-doers. It is useless to expect redress when the officers appointed to hear appeals themselves order the collection of a certain amount of money in a certain district without enquiring into the capacity of the people to pay it. It is to be regretted that Government does not attend to the public cry on the subject. The Hitèchchhu here states that there were about forty appeal cases from Dhandhuka, one from Sánand and one from a beggar of Sarkhej, which were all rejected, and remarks that it is evident from these cases how the people in the mofussil are subjected to injustice and tyranny. How can the district officers be justified in fixing the amount of the tax to be paid by a beggar at Rs. 10? What grounds had Mr. Morison, the 2nd Assistant Collector at Ahmedabad, in confirming the amount? If this appellant from Sarkhej carried on the business of a money-lender, he would not have allowed his utensils to be sold for the realisation of a paltry sum of Rs. 10. Many traders put up with such an injustice and do not allow writs of attachment to be executed against them with a view to save their honour. It is a matter for regret that the Government of Lord Ripon has been unable to attend to this matter. It would be better if officers charged with the work were compelled to act justly and impartially. Sir James Fergusson is requested to give his attention to the unsatisfactory manner in which the license tax is levied.

Use of abusive language by Mr. Woodward, Assistant Collector, towards certain students of the Sholápur High School.

The Kalpataru (33) of the 21st October publishes in its columns a letter written by students of the first and second class belonging to the Sholápur High School. They state that on Friday the 19th October they had gone to Motibág on the invitation of Mr. Ozanne, the Director of Agriculture, for the purpose of practising in the fields. While they were doing their work Mr. Ozanne and the District Collector arrived, and after them came Mr. Woodward, the Assistant Collector. The last-named gentleman, who was on horseback, wanted to dismount, and therefore called some of the students to come and hold his horse as his syce (groom) was not at hand. The students refused as they considered the work of a groom rather beneath their position and dignity. Upon this Mr. Woodward got very angry and used foul and abusive language to the young lads. The Head Master of the High School, who was in charge of the students, then went forward to Mr. Woodward and told him that the lads belonged to respectable families and that they would not hold his horse, and that it was not proper to use opprobrious epithets to them. Mr. Woodward did not relish the protest of the Head Master and asked him what right he had to interfere. The Head Master declared that he had spoken as he did as the students were in his charge. The students, in conclusion, express surprise that a gentleman in the high position of Mr. Woodward should have behaved as he did. The editor of the Kalpataru, in commenting upon the above scene, says that the conduct of Mr. Woodward in asking the students to hold his horse and afterwards abusing them for their refusing to do so is very discreditable to him as a gentleman and a member of the Covenanted Civil Service.

Considers that the offenders in a certain case of assault at Bandora have not been adequately punished.

A correspondent of the Indu Prakásh (9) of the 22nd October says:—It is a matter for regret that the English dailies have taken no notice of a case of assault at Bandora decided by Mr. Loch, first class magistrate of Thána, on the 17th instant. The complainant was one Krishna Sonu, a sweeper in the service of the local municipality, and the offenders were Mr. Symons, an exchange broker carrying on business in Bombay and residing on Bandora Hill, and his two servants. The charge was that of voluntarily causing hurt by deliberately whipping the sweeper with the assistance of his two servants. The offenders were convicted and Mr. Symons was fined Rs. 10 and the two servants 8 annas each.

Requests the attention of the Commissioner of Police, Bombay, to an accident that recently occurred near the Charni Road station.

The Subodh Patrika (11) of the 21st October says:—We are informed by an eyewitness of an accident which occurred near the Charni Road station on the Queen's Road between 5 and 6 P. M. on Monday last. A European lady was furiously driving an open carriage and pair towards the Esplanade with her two servants sitting behind her. A Boráh, who was knocked down by her carriage, was seriously injured and was lying flat on the road bleeding profusely from the wounds he had received. One might expect under such circumstances that a lady in such a high position in life would show a proper sense of duty and responsibility. But no; the lady drove on without caring for the poor fellow, and refused even to give her name to the Native policeman who made her a respectful request to that effect on the spot. The latter therefore hastily removed the Borâh to one side of the road, clung to the carriage and ran with it as well as he could. What the result was we do not know, as no notice of the accident or of any proceedings in connection with it before any magistrate appeared in the English dailies. What inference is to be drawn from this? Is it possible that the police at that hour and on that road were unable to arrest the carriage? Or is the affair hushed up on account of the position and sex of the offender? Neither alternative seems to us to be probable or creditable to the police. We therefore wait for explanation and further light on the subject. We may however here notice an incident related by our informant, viz. that a European police officer, who happened to be at a short distance from the scene of the accident and who may be reasonably supposed to have noticed it, instead of hastening to help his Native comrade, quietly walked across the road into the English cemetery and thus assisted the lady's escape. We trust our energetic Commissioner of Police will inquire into this affair. There were many intelligent and respectable persons who witnessed the occurrence as a railway train had just arrived there.

Mentions certain grievances in connection with the Dákor fair.

A correspondent of the Bombay Samáchár (86) of the 27th October observes that the policemen employed in preserving order among the crowd of pilgrims who assemble near the temple of Ranchhodji at Dákor on the Mánekthári Punam day use whips of twisted cloth on the pilgrims, who are sometimes seriously hurt thereby. Sometimes pilgrims fall down on account of the use of these whips and are crushed by the crowd. The police ought to be prohibited from making use of their whips. At the last Mánekthári Punam fair the temple priests levied a new tax of four annas per head from such pilgrims as desired to touch the feet of the idol. This tax is an innovation and is also heavy and ought to be discontinued. The roads leading to the temple are narrow, with wide open gutters on their sides, and consequently the crowds of pilgrims are much inconvenienced. The municipal corporation of the town has not erected a sufficient number of latrines for the use of the pilgrims, and though the water of the Gomti tank is rendered impure and filthy by bathing and washing, yet it is used for drinking and culinary purposes. At the last fair the pilgrims were carried in waggons on the railway; the railway carriages were not lighted, nor was any accommodation made on the station for passengers awaiting the arrival of trains. [The Kaira Vartamán (121) of the 24th and the Hitechchhu (76) of Ahmedabad of the 25th October, in a communicated article, express approval of the police arrangements made on the occasion of the recent fair. The Kaira Vartamán complains of overcrowding in railway carriages and recommends the railway authorities to discontinue the use of storeyed carriages and to keep a separate carriage for low-caste passengers. The Hitechchhu is sorry that the sepoys inside the temple should have used the lash, and thinks that the European officers are unaware of this practice.]

Legislation.

Criticises the memorial of the British Indian Association on the subject of the Bengal Tenancy Bill.

The Mahrátta (2) of the 21st October, in reviewing the memorial of the British Indian Association on the subject of the Bengal Tenancy Bill, observes:—As is natural, the zamindárs are perfectly opposed to the Bill. They maintain that their time-honoured rights are infringed and that the Bill is likely to do more injury than good to the parties concerned. These are the two possible heads under which all the arguments of the zamindárs must fall. The inviolability of contracts will fall under the first, the increase of useless litigation under the second. In this manner all their forces must rally round either of the two great centres. The first charge which the Association brings against Government is the uncalled-for character of the Bill. It is said that a proper inquiry was not made into the condition of the tenants to ascertain whether it necessitated the introduction of the Bill, and therefore the Association thinks that the whole project of legislation is based mainly upon speculation and sentiment. We fear that even the repetition of the Pubna riots will not induce the zamindárs to think that the time has come for legislative interference. Those who are immediate losers can never concede that the time ever has or will come for circumscribing their privileges. The zamindárs hold that the ryots constitute the bulk of the population of Bengal, and that it is shown by universal testimony that they are well-to-do and prosperous and as a body they understand their rights and are independent and strong enough to maintain them. Well-being and prosperity are after all comparative terms. If the zamindárs were to compare the prosperity and well-being of the ryots with their own and judge impartially, they would find that there is as yet immense scope for the further increase of the prosperity of the ryots. To say that the ryots as a body understand their own interests and are able enough to maintain them is saying exactly the reverse of truth. It is not the agriculturists of India alone that are wretched and miserable. That has been the fate of agriculturists of almost every civilized country in the world. As a rule this class is more ignorant, more ill-fed and ill-clothed, and more exposed to the attacks of natural calamities than any other. Their life is one of incessant hard work and drudgery. Their ambition is very low, and it is easy to secure their gratitude and attachment by doing them small acts of kindness. But so partial and unjust are the laws of the distribution of agricultural produce all over the world that these tenants, the feeblest, the most loyal and obedient and well-behaved part of social organization, are often driven to rebellion for want of the bare necessaries of life. Every year we hear of agrarian risings in one country or another, and the hungry and thirsty tenants gratify their hunger and cool their thirst with the flesh and blood of their tyrannical landlords. Whatever may be the primary causes, whether superiority in the field or superiority in the court, that fastened crushing hard work and slavery on one section of society and gave perfect leisure and exemption from manual work to the other, it is now perfectly clear that the tendencies of modern civilization and the growing sense of equality will not permit those unequal and unjust relations between them to subsist for a long time. The day of re-arrangement must come sooner or later, and we must be prepared to welcome it without grumbling. What the landlords can expect is a due indemnification for the loss of their long enjoyed rights. The landlords may have earned their jághirs, ináms or zamindáris either by doing some valuable services to the State or by paying their equivalent in money. They are therefore lawfully entitled to claim that portion of agricultural produce which would be equal to the interest on the amount of money for which their services or their purchases may be computed. If the State undertakes to guarantee so much to them, it has done its duty and is entirely relieved from every kind of moral obliquity. They cannot be allowed to appropriate to themselves the ever-increasing value of the agricultural produce which increases with the growth of population. The State and the cultivators must have a fair share in them. Let the tenants prosper, and the State will be a partner in their prosperity by its system of direct or indirect taxation, whose fundamental principle ought to be to establish equality of burden as far as possible. We should have proposed a more thorough and radical change than is contemplated in the Bill. We think that landlords should have the right of claiming nothing from their tenants beyond a fixed quit-rent. If the State binds itself according to the permanent settlement not to increase its share in the produce of the land, why should the landlords be unwilling to do the same towards their tenants? It will not be unjust to force them to do so. But the Bill is moderate; it does not contemplate making landlords the receivers of fixed annuities. It does not commit the sin of making a wholesale massacre of the vested rights of the zamindárs. It fully recognizes their right to a participation in the increasing value of agricultural produce. It only seeks to prevent its exclusive appropriation by them. But the zamindárs think otherwise. They maintain that facts do not warrant the interference of Government in the existing relations between landlords and tenants and that the grievances of the latter are merely speculative and sentimental.

The Shivájí (60) of the 19th October says that the Europeans in Lower Bengal have been raving in the most frantic manner on account of the determination of Government to proceed with the Ilbert Bill. They have not hesitated even to intimidate the highest officials in the country. Until lately Natives believed that Europeans would not proceed to extremities but would endeavour to criticise the shortcomings of Government in a loyal and constitutional spirit. But this belief has been completely dissipated by the recent conduct of the Europeans in Bengal. It is not only the lawyers, merchants and planters who are annoyed with Government, but even the officials are at feud with those from whom their authority is derived. The Shivájí is unable to understand why so much uproar should be made with respect to the Ilbert Bill. It is not as if the privileges of Europeans are in jeopardy. Several eminent Englishmen are in favour of passing the Ilbert Bill, while its opponents do not include in their number any men of conspicuous ability or of high position. The Europeans in Bengal have worked themselves into a state of wild excitement, not because their rights are in jeopardy, but simply because their pride is touched. If Government now recede from the position which they have taken, the result will be disastrous in many ways. Government would be exposed to the charge of yielding to intimidation, and Natives would henceforth not hesitate to employ the artifices to which the Europeans have resorted in their opposition to the Ilbert Bill. The adversaries of the Ilbert Bill ought not to forget that India contains two hundred millions of human beings. If they wish to keep their prestige intact, they should try to help Government in this matter instead of opposing it.

Remarks in connection with the conduct of Europeans regarding the Native Magistrates' Jurisdiction Bill.

The Rást Goftár (111) of the 21st October observes that the Europeans in Bengal generally, and the planters in particular, consider the natives of India as mere instruments for contributing to their happiness and desire to hold them in bondage. These Europeans assault and sometimes murder poor Natives, and the European judges either acquit them or punish them only slightly. These culprits fear that if Native magistrates and judges are invested with authority to try them they would be duly punished and would suffer check in their arbitrary conduct towards Natives. Finding that their opposition to the Native Magistrates' Jurisdiction Bill has been unavailing, the unruly Europeans are now threatening Government with creating disaffection. After ridiculing the Europeans of Calcutta for their intention to give parties to European ladies and gentlemen in order to draw them away from the gatherings held at Government House, the Goftár severely censures the Englishman for presuming to recommend Europeans to be prepared to assume the reins of power in India if the Jurisdiction Bill is passed and to conduct the administration of the country until the Radical party in England is defeated. The Goftár also expresses satisfaction with the Viceroy's order in excluding the Calcutta volunteers from forming a guard of honour at his approaching return to the metropolis. [The Bombay Samáchár (86) of the 22nd October also condemns the Englishman for writing the above-mentioned seditious matter, and requests the Viceroy to prevent that newspaper from putting forth such effusions hereafter as they are dangerous in a country like India.]

Severely censures the Englishman of Calcutta for creating disaffection against Government in connection with the Jurisdiction Bill.

Education.

The Mahrátta (2) of the 21st October says:—Appalled by the progress of theism and free thought in our Government schools and colleges, the Education Commission, it is rumoured, has made certain suggestions and recommendations for the vigorous propagation of religion and morality so as to impart a saintly character to everyone that lays his foot within the hereafter sanctified boundaries of Government seminaries. It is said that the principal of every Government college and the head master of every Government school will be required to deliver at the end of every term a number of harangues on the duties of man in his relation to God and to his fellow-beings. It is also proposed that religious catechisms should be composed to be put into the hands of college and school-going boys. Now it appears to us that the plan of conveying ideas of morality to young minds in this way is entirely absurd. It is impossible to lecture young students on the philosophic utility of several moral principles that we observe in everyday life. Higher students may take up Sidgwick or Butler, or Locke or Hume, read their works, and discuss with their professors the moral topics treated of by these writers. The study of the works of these writers is not intended to create a direct influence upon conduct; Butler's Sermons or Locke's Essay do not contain specific remedies for specific moral diseases like medical prescriptions. These and such other books contain a discussion of the primary principles of morality on which rules of practical conduct are based or would be based. At present morality is taught as a science and not with the object of inculcating moral discipline. Once this element is introduced into our college and school systems, they will become scenes of wrangling. The spirit of worthless and wordy controversy will grow rampant, the time of the students will be wasted in useless religious feuds, and unrest and disquietude will prevail everywhere to the great detriment of real progress and learning. The schools are not the only places where practical morality can be taught. Parents, friends and relatives are the proper teachers of morality. The life of a school-boy is monotonous and his relations with his fellow-students and teachers are fixed in whatever class or position he may be. Knowledge of moral laws and moral action were confounded by Socrates. It was Aristotle who made the distinction between them clear for the first time. From the days of the great Stagirite down to the present day no sensible man has lost sight of the distinction. It is true that knowledge influences conduct to a certain extent, but it does so very feebly. It is practice on which moral action largely depends. Schools and colleges are places where knowledge of moral laws can be given, but for moulding the moral action of boys in a particular way we must look to other means and sources. It is true that something can be done in this direction by the personal example of the teacher; but this something will compare most unfavourably with what can be done by a father, a mother, a brother, a sister, or even a friend. We are altogether opposed to the idea of teaching practical morality in our schools and colleges as a regular branch of the educational course. The introduction of this subject will make them worse than missionary institutions. They teach only one gospel, but the Government catechisms will contain an indefinite number of them. This will necessarily lead to undignified party spirit and vain war of words. The popularity of Government schools and colleges is at present due to their strict neutrality in religious matter. If it be shaken at any time by the excessive zeal of the over-enthusiastic section of European or Native propagandists of religion and morality, they will soon come into discredit and disrepute to the neglect of public instruction. Faith and reason are two distinct and irreconcileable departments of human intellect, and notwithstanding the great struggle of the religionists to secure their mutual peace and co-operation even in the most palmy days of religious fervour and prestige, they are separated and none can tell how great will be the angle of divergence between them in times to come. Any attempt to bring them together is tantamount to reviving the old quarrels about absolute and empirical truths, which without doing any good will do positive injury by hindering the advancement of really valuable culture. We are however at one with the Indu Prakásh in wishing that friendlier and closer relations should be established between teachers and their pupils, and that the former should mix freely with the latter in order to secure their affections and to influence their moral conduct.

Remarks in connection with the rumoured introduction of manuals of moral instruction in Government schools and colleges.

Remarks in connection with the selection of an officer to act for Mr. Chatfield during the latter's absence on furlough.

The Bakul (16) of the 21st October alludes to the rumour regarding the selection of a civilian to act for Mr. Chatfield during the latter's absence on furlough, and observes that such an appointment would be tantamount to disregarding the undoubted claims of several members of the educational service. Properly speaking Mr. Wordsworth has the strongest right to the Acting Directorship. The Bombay Government appear to have made the choice of a civilian in the belief that Mr. Wordsworth would not care to accept a post the duties of which are of a laborious and harassing nature. But it is not right to overlook his claims without giving him an opportunity to refuse the appointment. The Bakul considers that there is not another European gentleman who is Mr. Wordsworth's equal in point of learning, ability and educational experience. If the appointment is offered to Mr. Wordsworth, it is not improbable that he may waive his own scruples and undertake the onerous duties of the Directorship in the interests of education. The Bakul trusts that Mr. Wordsworth's well-known large and liberal views on high education and on the Ilbert Bill may not prejudice his claims for the highest post in the educational service. The Native public would rejoice, should Mr. Wordsworth be selected to act as Director of Public Instruction during Mr. Chatfield's absence. [Several other newspapers express somewhat similar sentiments.]

Professor Selby's appointment as tutor to the Chief of Gondal and remarks in connection therewith.

The Kesari (35) of the 23rd October says that it is rumoured that Professor Selby has been appointed tutor to the Rája of Gondal because it is intended that he should not revert to his substantive appointment at the Deccan College on account of his promulgation of atheistic views, which formed the subject of an attack in a former number of the Quarterly Journal of the Poona Sárvajanik Sabha. It is also stated that should circumstances oblige him to return to the Deccan College he will not come back in the capacity of a Professor of Logic and Moral Philosophy. Whatever may be the truth in these rumours, one thing is quite clear that the students in the Deccan College have been great losers by the transfer of Mr. Selby from that institution. If he does not return to the Deccan College and if, as is reported, Messrs. Wordsworth and Oxenham retire on pension and their places are filled by Messrs. Hathornthwaite and Forrest respectively, then the favourite idea of Mr. Chatfield of converting the Deccan College into a lunatic asylum will be very near accomplishment. Sir James Fergusson has recently done much for enhancing the material comfort and convenience of the students of the Deccan College, but this will not avail much if their intellectual needs are not satisfied. If Mr. Selby cannot be sent back to the Deccan College or he is himself unwilling to return, then a competent Professor of Logic and Moral Philosophy should at once be obtained from England. The practice of promoting European head masters of high schools to professorships in colleges is not a good one. Many recent appointments to professorships have been made solely on the ground of the colour of the skin of head masters of high schools and not on their acquirements or learning. The Kesari suggests that the students of the Deccan College should send a petition to His Excellency the Governor through their Principal on the subject of the professorship of Logic and Moral Philosophy. Sir James Fergusson has of late taken peculiar interest in the Deccan College, and it is therefore likely that he will be disposed to do what lies in his power to improve its efficiency.

Objects to Mr. Best's appointment as an examiner at the ensuing Matriculation Examination in the Ahmedabad circle.

With reference to the curt reply given by the University authorities to Mr. McAfee of the Ahmedabad Mission School in answer to his protest against the appointment of Mr. Best as one of the examiners at the ensuing Matriculation Examination, the Lok Mitrá (77) of the 21st October observes that there is great likelihood of injustice being done to other high schools and to the Ahmedabad Mission School in particular, which has to compete under such obvious disadvantages with the school under the management of Mr. Best. The Syndicate has made matters worse, and has been guilty of a double piece of injustice by appointing Mr. Best to the Ahmedabad centre, where he will have to examine his own pupils and assess the value of his own work. Mr. Best is no doubt quite incapable of making any but a conscientious use of the powers given him as an examiner; but the principle of appointing head masters as examiners at the Matriculation is in itself unjust. Mr. McAfee was certainly entitled to a courteous reply if not an explanation, and no such reply was sent nor any explanation vouchsafed, only because, as is suspected, there could be no defence to what is obviously an utterly indefensible proceeding on the part of the Syndicate. There is yet time to correct the error by transferring Mr. Best to any of the other centres in the Presidency. [The Yajdán Parast (124) and the Kaiser-i-Hind (103) of the same date express similar sentiments.]

Municipalities.

Severely censures the secretary of the Surat Municipality for causing the death of a Mahomedan by carelessness.

The Gujarát Mitrá (75) of the 21st October observes that recently the secretary to the Surat Municipality called some Khárwás with the intention of employing them on the fire-engines, and informed them that preference would be given to those who could swim. Accordingly fourteen of them went to the river in order to show their skill in swimming. The current of water was at this time rather strong, and yet the secretary ordered them to dive without making provision against accidents. Among the fourteen persons was a dumb Mahomedan, who was carried away by the current and was drowned. The secretary says that he permitted only thirteen men to go into the river, that the Mahomedan was not among them, and that he went into the water of his own accord. The reader can well imagine how far to believe this statement. The Mitrá can point out certain questionable acts of the secretary which would justify his dismissal from service, but he has many supporters. [The Vartamán Sár (121) of the 23rd October wishes to be informed whether the secretary made any report on the subject to the municipal commissioners or informed the managing committee of the accident. If the secretary has not done so, why does not the committee enquire into it? The officer who is guilty of carelessness in this matter ought to be reprimanded after due enquiry with a view to set an example.]

Railways.

Disapproves of the refusal of the G. I. P. Railway authorities to reduce their grain rates.

The Indu Prakásh (9) of the 22nd October refers to the refusal of the authorities of the G. I. P. Railway to reduce their grain rates, and observes:—The view taken by the Home Board of this question of reducing the grain rates is essentially narrow, short-sighted and suicidal. The Board seems to consider its interests in the manner of a Márvádi money-lender, to squeeze as much out of its debtor as possible without any regard for the capacity of the debtor himself. It is unwilling to relinquish its present gains because it thinks other persons are making as good profits as itself, while it seems to be wilfully blind to the fact that rival companies are gaining an advantage over it by adopting the very same steps which it is asked to take. We hope the spirited remonstrance which the Bombay Chamber of Commerce has made against the extremely illiberal attitude taken by the Board of Directors of the G. I. P. Railway Company will induce the Board to alter its decision in the light of the new facts and figures placed before it by the Chamber. The Bombay Chamber of Commerce has done invaluable service in thus drawing the attention of the public to the importance of the subject of the G. I. P. Railway grain rates in connection with the development of the wheat trade, and we trust the public will not fail to agitate the question in the proper manner and to remove this obnoxious impediment to the success of the trade.

Notes.—A. The notices from the different Newspapers have been collected in the Report under different heads, which are printed in italics.

B. The names of Newspapers are printed in the body of the Report in italics, and the number of the Newspaper in the above list is printed in brackets after the name.

C. The proprietors of the Newspapers marked * have not given information as to the number of copies issued. In these cases an estimate has been made by the Reporter.

D. The system of spelling vernacular words followed by the Reporter is the same as that adopted in the Official Spelling List of the Bombay Presidency. One peculiar feature of this system is that when the long a (आ or á) is the last letter of a word, the accent is left out, and the short a (अ = u in gun) is, to prevent confusion, never placed at the end of a word. This rule has been strictly followed, except that when the short a appears to be absolutely necessary to complete the pronunciation of a word, as in Arunodaya or the well known Mitra, it is printed with a mark over it to indicate that it is short, thus—ă.

Politics and the Public Administration.

Some remarks about the future of India.

The Shiváji (60) of the 26th October, in an article on the future of India, observes that it cannot be denied that the people of India have derived many advantages from British rule. The introduction into India of arts and manufactures which have flourished in the West has done incalculable good. The natives of India enjoy security of life and property and freedom of movement under their present rulers. All are treated equally before the law. These and many other benefits which can be mentioned are patent and manifest. But the other side of the picture must not be omitted. That the British Government is just is true only in a certain sense. It will act justly towards its subjects so long as its interests are not touched or attacked. Justice and equity are set aside where the interests of Englishmen and Natives come into conflict. The Government showed its solicitude for the welfare of its subjects by passing the Deccan Agriculturists' Relief Act and by relieving the ryots from the clutches of the Márwádi money-lenders, but it has done nothing to afford relief to the tillers of the soil from the exorbitant and rigid demand on account of the land-tax. A liberal policy relating to the recovery of the land revenue demand would have affected the coffers of Government, and therefore no attention is paid, or will be paid, to this grievance. The partiality of Government in abolishing the duty on cotton goods because it affected the interests of the merchants of Manchester is well known. Justice is done where Natives alone are concerned, but the moment there is a conflict between Europeans and Natives, the latter invariably go to the wall. If expenditure is to be reduced the peons and clerks are the first to suffer, but the salaries of Europeans are never cut down. Englishmen are cunning and deceitful, while Natives are meek and honest. If this were not so, the latter would not now be in their present degraded condition. The history of India will bear out the truth of the above remark. Englishmen did not win India by their might. They conquered this country because Natives were simple and confiding. The British Government is never backward in making promises, but in fulfilling them it is never forward. The future of India is gloomy. The natives of India will never rise from their present low condition.

Remarks in connection with the cry raised by some Europeans regarding British ascendancy in India.

The Indian Spectator (1) of the 28th October, in an article headed "Sir James Stephen on British Ascendancy," says:—True it is that a representative government for India in the sense in which it is understood in England is out of the question for perhaps centuries to come. Few natives of India are so sanguine as to cherish the hope that any such government is possible of attainment in the near future. We all accept that for the present and for many years to come the government of India must be "absolute," that is to say, a mild and enlightened form of despotism. But is it necessary that for the maintenance of such despotism the British Parliament should adopt the policy for which Sir James so vigorously contends in his new paper in the Nineteenth Century? Is it in consonance with the genius of the British nation? Nay, more—is it possible in any civilised form of human government that India should be placed in the condition in which the agitators against the Ilbert Bill would put her? The whole principle formulated by Sir James Stephen and men of his school, when reduced logically to a practical issue, comes to this only that Englishmen should maintain that ascendancy of which the present agitation against the Jurisdiction Bill in its most aggressive form is perhaps the best sample, and that the Indians should be a congeries of nations of slaves. That would be in practice the effect of the principle if carried out. But it has been uniformly discarded by far-sighted British statesmen and successive Parliaments for fifty years past. The prevailing ideas of what a wise and beneficent government for the people should be must sooner or later penetrate the chambers of the Government of India. However strongly Sir James may dread the introduction of such ideas there, the progress of time, the march of civilization, and the increasing triumph of democracy in Europe must perforce make it inevitable. It would be as absurd to prevent the introduction of those ideas in the Government of India as to stem a rising tide. The whole argument of Sir James was met, as it were in anticipation, by Macaulay half a century ago. His observation in that memorable minute on the Black Act is as true to-day as it was fifty years ago. If at all, it has derived greater emphasis and greater significance owing to the rapid strides India has made in the interval intellectually and politically. "We know that India cannot have a free government, but she may have the next best thing—a firm and impartial despotism. The worst state in which she can possibly be placed is that in which the memorialists would place her. They call on us to recognize them as a privileged order of freemen in the midst of slaves." But this is the condition to which the whole non-official Anglo-Indian world, strongly supported by the influential Indian bureaucracy, are ever anxious to bring the country. Do they not know that such a condition is repellent to the political instincts of the English nation? Is it not at variance "with reason, with justice, and with the honour of the British Government?" May it be asked whether by the policy advocated by Sir James Stephen the good of the subject people of India can really be attained? On the contrary, is it not fraught with evil—the evil being no less than that a handful of the advanced, from purely selfish motives, should grind down the subject people and keep them perpetually enthralled? According to John Stuart Mill there cannot exist a government of one people by another. The policy of Sir James, if acted upon, would soon reduce India with the active aid and over-ardent enterprise of the Bengal planters to a human cattle farm for their own benefit. But the British Parliament has strenuously set its face against so fatal a policy being adopted in the administration of India. It has striven for half a century past to provide India "with the best attainable government and with the conditions most favourable to future permanent government"—short, of course, of representative government. This is the ideal. It is being more or less slowly carried out in practice. On it alone will rest the future good of the Indians and the permanency of British rule in India. Our rulers have honestly tried to make a gradual approach to this standard of government, and any departure from it will only expose them and their empire to grave danger. In short, if ever such a retrograde policy as that which Sir James has suggested is adopted in the future administration of India, then we have no hesitation in saying, in the words of Mill, that they will be "guilty of a dereliction of the highest moral trust which can devolve upon them" as a civilized nation, and they will be considered as "selfish usurpers, on a par in criminality with any of those whose ambition and rapacity have sported from age to age with the destiny of masses of mankind."

Says that there are perjurers in England as in India.

The Yajdán Parast (124) of the 28th October observes that for some years past several Europeans in India have been speaking of the natives of India with contempt, both in public and in private. In their opposition to the Native Magistrates' Jurisdiction Bill the thoughtless Europeans of Calcutta abused Natives as a set of rascals and perjurers, meaning thereby that there were no evil characters of a like description among their own countrymen. But the Daily Telegraph reports that a certain County Court Judge, in giving judgment recently in a case at Llanidloes, remarked that the infamous perjury committed all over Wales made one's blood boil. What have those who condemn the people of India as a set of perjurers to say to this?

Says that the administration of Native States is not so bad as Sir Lepel Griffin has described.

In alluding to Sir Lepel Griffin's article on "Indian Princes at Home" the Gujaráti (96) of the 28th October observes that Sir Lepel had such good opportunities as few have had of becoming closely acquainted with Native States, and yet he says that they are mismanaged in every way. The petty States are really mismanaged, but the larger principalities have considerably improved. The States of Baroda, Gwalior, Indore, and Hyderabad are almost free from the shortcomings of British rule. What can be the aim of Sir Lepel in condemning them? It is true that Native administrations labour under some defects, but it must not be forgotten that they have their excellent points also in which British rule is wanting. Sir Lepel would have done good service to the country had he shown the bright as well as the dark side of Native administrations. It would seem as if Sir Lepel Griffin had purposely written the article in order to create a bad impression against Native rulers. The Native States have a bad name and are therefore slandered. But is the British mode of administration, which is gradually taking the life-blood from India, better?

Says that the limit of age for entrance into the Indian Civil Service should be increased and that the examination should be held simultaneously in India and England.

The Arunodayă (14) of the 28th October in a leading article observes that the British Cabinet appears disposed to do justice to India, as is evident from the policy which has been pursued since its accession to power. That policy is creditable to the English Ministry and is calculated to promote the happiness of the people of India. A change in the limit of age for admission into the Indian Civil Service is imperatively demanded in the interests of English and Native candidates. The question about holding the examination simultaneously in India and England is also equally important and requires immediate solution. The Arunodayă cannot understand why the business of selecting men for the Indian administration should be done at a distance of five thousand miles from India. If the Civil Service examination is held in England simply because Englishmen rule India, then on the same ground Natives might as well be excluded altogether from competing. If, however, the English nation wishes to govern India with equity and impartiality, then the competitive examination ought in strict justice to be held in India. If the entrance competitive examination into the Indian Civil Service ought to be held in England on account of the vast interests which Englishmen have in India, the same reasoning would lead to the conclusion that it should be held in India because the natives of India have an immense stake in their own country and because those who are invested with power over them should possess intimate acquaintance with their manners and customs. The Arunodayă considers that when the candidates have once been selected it is very desirable that they should pass a couple of years in England. The limit of age ought to be increased since Indian candidates have to pass the examination in a foreign language and because they are out-weighed in the struggle with English youths, who have the advantage of answering questions in their own vernacular. The Arunodayă trusts that justice will be ultimately done in this matter to the natives of India.

Says that Uncovenanted Civil Servants should be appointed to the Statutory Civil Service.

The Surat Akhbár (78) of the 29th October, in writing on the subject of Statutory Civilians, says that honesty and trustworthiness are the chief adjuncts of high offices. These two qualities cannot be tested in the Civil Service examination held in England, but it is inferred that Statutory Civilians are possessed of them. It is therefore disappointing to these Civilians that they should be granted less privileges than those enjoyed by Civilians coming from England as suggested by some persons. It is better not to make any such appointments than to nominate as few individuals to high posts and make them disaffected. There are two objectionable features in the present Statutory Civil Service: firstly, the sons of well-to-do men and flatterers are nominated, irrespective of their experience or abilities; secondly, the limit of age is a great defect. By it the large class of Government servants which possesses experience and abilities and which is loyal is given an excuse for becoming disaffected. Some of the officers in the Judicial, Educational, Political and other departments excel some of the members of both the English and Native Civil Services in manners, honesty and abilities; but it is to be regretted that Lord Lytton has done them an injustice by excluding them from the Statutory Civil Service. Government have lost the advantages that might accrue from the support of these servants. This is a real anomaly, which it is hoped Lord Ripon will remove before doing away with other anomalies.

Comments in connection with the resolution regarding the dismissal of Government servants.

The Subodh Patrika (11) of the 28th October says:—The Government of India has again issued a resolution directing the heads of departments not to dismiss their subordinates without recording reasons. This has become a recurring complaint with the Government of India, and the wonder of it is that seeing that resolutions like the one in question are admittedly violated in practice we do not find that any official has been made to pay the penalty of such violation. Occasion was probably given for the publication of the present resolution by some instance coming to the notice of Government. And yet the public does not yet know how Government have dealt with the official or officials whose disobedience of the standing orders has led to the present resolution. This is becoming a perpetual farce with the Indian Administration—for Government to go on complaining that its orders are not minded, and for its officials to go on violating them in spite of check and admonition. The regime of resolutions has proved a failure, and if the Government of India seriously means what it has had so often to say and repeat, it should enforce its orders and never spare those who persist in breaking them.

Expresses gratitude to the Government of Bombay for issuing the resolution regarding the dismissal of subordinates in Government service.

The Lok Mitra (77) of the 28th October observes that the recklessness with which some heads of departments dismiss from Government service for alleged misconduct their Native subordinates, to whom such dismissal must mean absolute ruin, is so reprehensible that the Government resolution just issued on the subject cannot certainly be said to be uncalled for or inopportune. The action which the Local Government has thought right to adopt in the matter is as just and considerate as it is humane, and will be the means of affording a salutary check to the exercise of their practically irresponsible powers on this head on the part of some of the excitable sáhebs, who rarely condescend to investigate with care or patience cases of alleged misconduct, or to consider the defence which the unfortunate subordinates may have, before casting them adrift on the world by a stroke of the pen. That the Government of Sir James Fergusson should have taken up the matter so promptly in the interests of the subordinate servants in Government employ speaks volumes for his humanity, and his zeal to protect the rights and interests of the humblest servants of Government will meet with sympathetic and hearty response from the whole community. [The Bombay Chronicle (74) of the same date expresses similar sentiments.]

Strongly urges Government to repeal altogether or to amend partially the Arms Act.

The Bakul (16) of the 28th October advises all local associations, leading Natives and newspaper writers to petition Lord Ripon to abolish the Arms Act altogether or to amend it so as to make its provisions less harsh and oppressive. It was generally believed that this Act would be repealed during the administration of the present ministry. There was good reason for anticipating that the Arms Act would be dealt with in the same manner as the Vernacular Press Act. It is stated that the dissolution of the present Parliament is close at hand. If this be so and if the Conservatives succeed in ousting the Liberals, then the idea of repealing or amending the Arms Act must be given up as chimerical. Lord Ripon has been of late so much occupied with the scheme of local self-government and the Ilbert Bill that he has had no time to attend to the rectification of the Arms Act; but the above two measures are now very near the goal of passing, and hence no time should be lost in urging him to give his attention to the law relating to the possession of arms. The inconveniences suffered by the people on account of the prohibition to carry arms should be brought prominently to the notice of the authorities. The destruction of human life which annually happens on account of the inability of the people to protect themselves against the attacks of wild animals is very great. The public records will testify to this fact. If Government does not doubt the loyalty of the Native population, and if the highest authorities sing the praises of Natives for their strong allegiance to the British power, then it is difficult to understand why the Arms Act should be allowed to remain in force. If the inveterate enemies of the English like the people of Ireland are allowed to keep arms, then the idea of keeping the meek and loyal natives of India disarmed cannot be explained on any rational principle. The Arms Act may be applied to the wild and turbulent tribes of India, but it is a stain on the loyalty of the great mass of people to prohibit them from retaining weapons. The Bakul trusts that Government will direct its attention to this subject and relieve the people from the oppression of the Arms Act.

Some remarks relating to the evils resulting from the enactment of the Arms Act.

The Poona Vaibhav (48) of the 28th October says that it is not easy to guess what misfortunes are in store for India. The people are in the worst state of misery and degradation. The just British Government cannot be too highly praised for the benefits which it has conferred on the inhabitants of India, but it is unaccountable that it should in some respects show indifference to the true interests of its subjects. The Forest and A'bkári laws are harsh and unnecessarily harassing to the people. The sufferings of the population on account of the prohibition to carry arms have been frequently brought to the notice of the authorities, but no remedial measures have been adopted. It is desirable that the agriculturists should be permitted to keep weapons in order to protect themselves against the attacks of wild animals. If Government is really solicitous for the welfare of its subjects, then it is strange that it should turn a deaf ear to this complaint. If Natives are allowed to possess arms and weapons it is extremely unlikely that they will use them against their rulers, since they are satisfied with British rule and would not willingly bring themselves into trouble. In case of a foreign invasion Natives will not be able to render any assistance to the British Government, since by the disuse of arms for long periods they have become inert, cowardly and utterly bereft of self-respect. In the Sholápur Táluka wild pigs and jackals have immensely increased in number owing to the extension of the area occupied by forests. These animals will do much harm to crops and to human beings unless the people are permitted to keep weapons for their own protection.

Remarks in connection with the introduction and success of agricultural banks in India.

The Native Opinion (10) of the 28th October, in an article headed "Agricultural Banks in India," observes:—The one important consideration which would materially affect the question of the success of our agricultural banks is, as admitted by Sir W. Wedderburn and Sir James Caird, the variable nature of the Government assessment. If the assessment continues to be increased at every successive revision, then, as Sir W. Wedderburn expresses it, the enhancement may swallow up the margin of profit upon which the mortgagee depends. Therefore until Government are prepared to grant us, for some time at least as a tentative measure, an exemption from these periodical enhancements, there can be no reasonable hope of seeing the beneficial efforts for the establishment of these banks bearing any fruit. Now the settlement of a permanent system of revenue would no doubt cause great disturbance in the financial arrangements of the country, and seems at first sight rather a serious, if not a dangerous, undertaking for any Government to take up. The land being the principal source of our revenue, and what is more, the only possible elastic one, that statesman must be bold indeed who would attempt to crystalize this one grand income in the face of the present existing expenditure and the possible contingencies. But we think this difficulty must be faced if the country is to be extricated from others still more formidable. If something like the bank system of Sir William be not taken in hand, the whole country will be very soon in a condition which will not leave time to our administrators to ponder what remedy they should apply, but will compel them to act at the command of circumstances. As Mr. Bright, speaking on this very question on the 4th July last, said, "the prospect—the political prospect in India would be greatly improved if such a scheme as this would succeed, because if you have population in a state of constant distress they must be in a state of constant discontent of some kind." This vast and constant discontent by making the back-bone of our population constantly hateful of life might incite them to do things of which we have already had but a faint foretaste in the Deccan and the Poona riots. Let the appearances of our so-called civilization be as glowing as possible; let our land be laid throughout with electric telegraph and railways; let our ports be crowded with shipping;—yet so long as a majority of our people is groaning under poverty and distress, we are not only not civilized but we are, as it were, standing on a mine, the more treacherous because covered with a screen of solidity. This one fact now presents to our administrators a problem which surpasses all others in the difficulty of its solution. Hitherto this difficulty has not received the attention due to it, while every successive Government of the land is treating its consideration with the same carelessness which made the polemarch of Thebes exclaim "Serious matters to-morrow." But the Nemesis of such blind security will not be long in overtaking us if we persist in this egregious folly. We wish some strong-minded statesman would look our agrarian problem direct in the face and address himself to its solution with that seriousness which it deserves. In our opinion the only solution that can be found at present will be to establish a permanent settlement throughout the length and breadth of the land. Such an undertaking requires a predetermination to reduce the expenditure of our administration materially and not only nominally. The home charges must be wiped away in the first instance and the Native element must be introduced into the administration to a very large extent. If Sir W. Wedderburn succeeds in his efforts to induce the English capitalists to invest their capital in our land banks, he will have gained a great assistance to India besides that of the starting of the banks themselves. The chief difficulty at present in the way of the improvement in the condition of our people is the want of interest which Englishmen evince towards Indian affairs. It is a fact, though surprising yet true, that questions affecting turnpikes have hitherto attracted greater attention in Parliament than Indian questions notwithstanding that they involved the well-being of millions of human beings. This remarkable feature has now become somewhat less marked, and we hope to see it vanish before we become much older. It was a political maxim with both the Parliamentary parties that Indian subjects should not be made party questions. But happily this maxim has come to be more obeyed in its violation than in its observance, and the more it is violated the better shall we be looked after. And the tendency of our drifting into party arena will, we think, be hastened if English capitalists begin to have a tangible interest in the well-being of our ryot, which will be the certain result of Sir W. Wedderburn's success in the task which he has so nobly set to himself. He has begun under very fine auspices, and we anxiously await his future achievements.

Expresses gratitude to the Bombay Government for the destruction of large numbers of locusts.

The Bombay Chronicle (74) of the 28th October observes that the saving of the crops of several districts of this Presidency, chiefly the Konkan, from the attacks of locusts, has been widely attested by officials and private individuals. The credit of saving the crops and of the prevention of misery to the poor peasants and others is justly attributed on all sides more to the paternal anxiety and care of the Government than to the work of nature. Myriads of the destructive insects have been already destroyed, and the extermination of the remainder is going on on the system of payment, at first of four and latterly of two annas per ser of the insects killed, to the villagers for voluntarily getting rid of them. The Konkan alone will thus cost to Government over thirty thousand rupees. But this sum will be much less than what the remissions in land revenue to be made to the cultivators would have amounted to had the locusts been left to grow and take wing to pursue their career. The Konkan harvest is now nearly free from such a catastrophe, and it is to be hoped that the uncertainty that now prevails regarding the later crops in the Deccan districts will likewise soon be replaced by more cheering prospects.

Says that the ground on the Kennedy Sea-face should not be sold for building purposes.

After regretting that Government has not yet withdrawn its advertizement for the sale of land on the Kennedy Sea-face for building purposes, the Jáme Jamshed (100) of the 2nd November observes that in October 1862 the Bombay Chamber of Commerce and some Europeans and Natives suggested to Government that the walls of the Fort of Bombay should be pulled down and the land occupied by them be utilized for erecting buildings. A counter-petition signed by a large number of respectable persons was presented to Government requesting it not to grant the prayer preferred in the first petition. In reply to the latter memorial Government stated that a portion of the reclaimed ground would be occupied by buildings and the remainder would be reserved for the recreation of the public. This promise was not kept, for in the days of the share-mania a large portion of the reclaimed land was covered with buildings. On this occasion also the people protested; but they were told that the reclamation on the Back Bay would be reserved for public use. If this last promise was really made, Sir James Fergusson ought to act according to it. Europeans complain that they have no bungalows to live in within easy distance of the Fort, and their demand may be met by replacing the ugly cottages in the Marine Lines by airy and ornamental edifices. This locality is far better than the Kennedy Sea-face, which Government ought to reserve permanently as a public promenade.

Says that in the mode of collecting and levying the license tax much injustice and oppression are done.

The Gujaráti (96) of the 28th October observes that complaints against the manner and mode of levying and collecting the license tax are heard from every quarter. This tax is unequal in its incidence on individuals and great severity is practised in recovering it from poor people, who can ill afford to pay it. No attention is paid to the injustice done in particular cases of over-assessment. Much oppression is practised in levying it. There is no probability of the tax being abolished, but some leniency ought to be shown in its assessment and recovery.

Advises Government to suppress the seditious writings that have appeared in the Englishman.

The Yajdán Parast (124) of the 28th October observes that the Englishman of Calcutta and its partizans have now ceased to abuse Natives, but they are trying to raise disaffection against Government. In one of its recent issues the Englishman published a communication signed A. F. and has written an article on the ravings of the writer. The correspondent states that one of the results of passing the Native Magistrates' Jurisdiction Bill would be that Natives would cut the throats of the Europeans in India and would afterwards murder each other, and then Russia would come and occupy India. The correspondent wishes that an internecine war should prevail in England, and that a single individual should assume the reins of government because he would show more concern for the power and the credit of England. The Englishman approves of this, but observes that the Europeans of Calcutta are confident that if they unite together and devise the necessary means, they would be able to expel the rebellious House of Commons and assume the reins of the Indian Government, and then Natives would not be able to cut the throats of Europeans. If Government passes into the hands of such brainless people, the country would be vastly benefited! The haters of Natives alone are fit to write such seditious matter, which, however, cannot produce any effect. It ought, however, to be suppressed at once. Though the inciters of sedition and war against the State are weak, yet they to a certain extent endanger the safety of the country and ought therefore to be put down at once. Perhaps the Government of India have desisted from taking the step, fearing that their doing so would only increase the dissatisfaction already existing. But the sedition-mongers have put a wrong construction on this inactivity of Government, and have taken undue advantage of their position. There is therefore a great need of suppressing them with a strong hand. [The Samsher Báhádur (112) of the 26th October asks why the Pioneer newspaper, which has made it its special object to revile the Government of India and the Home Government, is not suppressed? It is manifest what suggestions Europeans would have made if a Native paper had dared to write against the Viceroy in a much milder tone than the Pioneer is doing.]

Legislation.—The Native Magistrates' Jurisdiction Bill.

Some remarks regarding the attitude of English settlers and the Englishman newspaper against the Jurisdiction Bill.

The Arunodayá (14) of the 28th October in a leading article says that the Ilbert Bill has been so much discussed that any allusion to it is sufficient to produce nausea, but it is obliged to return to it through unavoidable necessity. Most of the Europeans in India are strongly opposed to it, and they are supported by the Anglo-Indian press, among whom the Englishman of Calcutta is foremost and most bitter in its opposition. The conductor of that journal has become so wild with excitement that he is unable to distinguish truth from falsehood. He has been heaping opprobrious epithets on Lord Ripon and suggesting various means for insulting His Lordship, but that nobleman is notwithstanding calmly carrying out his own policy. Latterly the Englishman has become so frantic as to propose that in the event of the passing of the Ilbert Bill the Europeans in India ought not to hesitate to act as the Americans did and assume the reins of power in India. This threat is so silly and childish that it will have the effect of inducing Lord Ripon and the English Cabinet to persevere in their present wise policy and treat those who are creating opposition to it with contempt and ridicule. There is no analogy between the state of things which prevails in India now and the events which were enacted in America about a century ago. If the handful of English settlers in India were to create disturbance, the millions of Natives would rally round Government and support it in its wise and beneficent rule. When the Government is backed by the whole Native population, the handful of English settlers will not have the slightest chance of success.

Education.

Says that there should be a permanent board of examiners for the Bombay University examinations.

In noticing the complaints made about the nomination of examiners for the University examinations, the Yajdán Parast (124) of the 28th October observes that no rules are prescribed for their appointment and the unfortunate candidates have to submit themselves every year to the freaks of new examiners. The question papers in Gujaráti, Persian, Sanskrit and Latin are answered in English, but some of the examiners in these subjects do not possess a competent knowledge of the language in which they are asked to examine and therefore cannot do justice to the replies given by the candidates. The Syndicate ought therefore to be careful in the selection of examiners, and should not adopt the recommendations of the Registrar with implicit confidence. In order to remove all chance of scandals that arise from the nomination of new examiners Mr. H. P. Jacob recommended eight years ago the appointment of a permanent board of examiners, but the Syndicate paid no attention to the recommendation. Since then the necessity for adopting the suggestion has become more evident and ought not to be neglected any more. The advantages of a permanent board are manifold: there is every probability of competent examiners being selected; the candidates will have confidence in them; the candidates will be saved from the freaks of new examiners every year; no scandals will arise from the appointment of head-masters of high schools as examiners; and the candidates will be better able to prepare for the examination. [The Gujarát Mitrá (75) of the same date expresses similar sentiments.]

Railways.

Complains of the treatment given by the G. I. P. Railway Company to its Native employés.

In an article headed "The G. I. P. Railway Employés," the Native Opinion (10) of the 28th October says:—Those who travel along our railways with their eyes open must have observed the amount of marked ability, regularity, precision and vigilance which the Native section of our railway employés display in discharging the duties entrusted to them, and yet with all this dutifulness to their masters we cannot say that they are considerately treated or that their services are duly paid by some of the railway companies. We are not prepared to say this of all the railway companies, though we are certain that the statement holds good in respect of some and particularly of the one on our side. The assertion may at first sight appear either absurd or even outrageous, but we have not the least doubt that those who will look under the surface will be convinced that what we say is not quite gratuitous. The employment of a large number of Natives makes the working of our railways cheap, and if the machinery were to be employed on a still larger scale, the working, we have no doubt, would be still more cheap, bringing in greater profits to the shareholders and a cheaper mode of conveyance to the people. But we do not propose to dwell upon this part of the subject on the present occasion; what we mean to insist upon is their better treatment and better payment. Next to Government service the railway service is regarded by the people of this country as an additional field wherein they may display their usefulness, and we must confess that the railway authorities have, whether in their own interests or in those of their constituents, engaged a large number of them. What we would endeavour to impress upon them is that they should be generous towards this class of public servants. The question of salaries apart, the Native branch of the G. I. P. Railway service is, we make bold to say, miserably situated in comparison with another branch of it in regard to leave rules. While there existed no rules in this respect, well disposed officials were often induced to consider individual cases and grant leave in proportion as necessity required. By itself such a state of things is never favourable to the well-being of a public service, but the leave rules made since the time of the late Traffic Manager have made matters still worse, and the railway servants now make no secret of the hardships they are labouring under since the creation of these leave rules. Under the latter the superior officers do not seem to be left any discretion, and the longest privilege leave they can give under any circumstances is altogether 10 days, casual leave being entirely out of the question. The absurdity of the smallness of this margin is too apparent to require any comment; no sane man would ever think that a period of 10 days in a year is in any sense adequate to any one wishing to go on leave for his own business. Possibly 10 days may suffice in a very small country intersected by a net of railways, but where people have to stay at long distances from home, it is simply ridiculous to say that the said period is enough for forward and return journeys and stay at home. It is a pity that no casual leave should be allowed. As to what privileges uncovenanted servants in Government service enjoy we need make no mention; they are already known to people. Compared with these privileges the period of privilege and casual leave accorded by the B. B. & C. I. Railway Company to its uncovenanted servants is quite adequate. The servants of this company get 40 days' leave every year, and even sick leave, we believe, whenever necessary. Some such rule in the case of the G. I. P. Railway servants is desirable, and it is surprising that the company's authorities in India should have lost sight of this absurdity, so far at least as the uncovenanted section of the service is concerned. As to the covenanted service on the G. I. P. Railway line there are certain rules under their covenant, and so we need say nothing about them. But it is difficult to understand how the authorities themselves should not have perceived this hardship, and how the railway servants should not have made any protest against such a state of things so long. Everybody knows how the company's Native staff of servants is hard-worked, and it is a reflection on their superiors that the interest of their subordinates should have been allowed to go to the wall. The company should consider itself fortunate that it has not got such a demonstrative set of servants as we see in England; otherwise there would have been numberless strikes and protests, and railway work would have been brought to a dead lock at any moment. But of such occurrences we scarcely hear amongst us in consequence of the docile character of the people. We hope the company will show greater consideration for the convenience and well-being of its uncovenanted servants. Leave rules based on the lines of those of the B. B. & C. I. Railway will quite satisfy their necessities. What is wanted is that the company should take up the subject in hand.

Native States.

The Gujarát Mitrá (75) of the 28th October states that the subjects of the Rája of Nándod have loudly complained against his oppression and several successive Political Agents have reported him to the Bombay Government, but, strange to say, no notice has been taken of his conduct. A correspondent writes that on the 6th instant the Rája, accompanied by one thousand military sepoys, his seven or eight Ránis and children, went to Rájpipla, and has almost deserted Nándod. The Diwán has also gone with him, but there is not a good understanding between the two; the Rája suspects and closely watches the actions of the Diwán. He even tried to dismiss the Diwán from his office, but it is gratifying that the Bombay Government did not permit him to do so. The eldest son of the Rája is named Chhatrasing, whose mother died some time ago. The Chief has four other sons by living Ránis, by whose instigations he has contracted a dislike for his eldest son. Chhatrasing is anxious to study in the Rájkumár College, but the Rája opposes the accomplishment of his wishes and otherwise attempts to keep him ignorant through fear of himself being deposed on the heir-apparent becoming an able ruler. The unfortunate prince is oppressed by the father and the step-mothers and his life even is in danger. The Bombay Government ought to exercise their influence with the Chief and induce him to send the heir-apparent to the College. The Chief is surrounded with evil advisers whom the Political Agent had instructed the Rája to dismiss from his service and presence, but the advice had no effect on him.

Prefers several complaints against the Rája of Nándod.

Berár Affairs.

The Varhád Samáchár (67) of the 29th October says that the people of the Berárs hardly know anything about the Calcutta Exhibition or the advantages resulting from it. The local authorities seem indifferent in the matter. It would be well if the Resident and his Assistants were to take measures to spread information regarding this exhibition among the people through municipal committees and other local bodies. Rich merchants and agriculturists in the Berárs should be induced to visit the coming exhibition at Calcutta. In the jungle districts medicinal plants are found in plenty. It would be well if some of them, with accurate descriptions of their properties, were sent to the Calcutta Exhibition.

Says that information regarding the exhibition about to be held in Calcutta should be freely communicated to the people of the Berárs through the municipal committees.

Notes.—A. The notices from the different Newspapers have been collected in the Report under different heads, which are printed in italics.

B. The names of Newspapers are printed in the body of the Report in italics, and the number of the Newspaper in the above list is printed in brackets after the name.

C. The proprietors of the Newspapers marked * have not given information as to the number of copies issued. In these cases an estimate has been made by the Reporter.

D. The system of spelling vernacular words followed by the Reporter is the same as that adopted in the Official Spelling List of the Bombay Presidency. One peculiar feature of this system is that when the long a (आ or á) is the last letter of a word, the accent is left out, and the short a (अ = u in gun) is, to prevent confusion, never placed at the end of a word. This rule has been strictly followed, except that when the short a appears to be absolutely necessary to complete the pronunciation of a word, as in Arunodaya or the well known Mitra, it is printed with a mark over it to indicate that it is short, thus—ă.

E. Berár papers are received in this office for report under the Resolution of the Government of Bombay in the General Department, No. 1795, dated 8th June 1881.

Politics and the Public Administration.

Some incoherent remarks about the policy of the British Government during the last thirty years.

In an article headed "Present Rulers and past," the Military Instructor (135) of the 3rd November says:—The moral pigmies who followed the great men who ruled India fifty years ago tell you that you cannot conduct your relations with other States on the Christian principle of doing unto them as you would have them do to you. Still less will they allow that a Nizám, or Sálar Jang, or Holkar, should be treated as Metcalfe would have treated them. The fall has been very great. We have seen in the interval that passed between Metcalfe's retirement early in 1838 and our own time, the first Afghan War, the conquest of Sind, the confiscation of the Panjáb, the open day-light robbery of Sátára, Jhánsi, Tanjore, Págpur, the seizure of the Oudh treasury, a gigantic effort all over the country to seize the freeholds of the people, the fraudulent appropriation of the Berárs, and a host of minor iniquities of the same order, finally followed up by the crime of this last Afghan War with its cost of thirty millions sterling. A painful reflection forces itself upon us in connection with this subject, namely, that the administrative policy of the last thirty years has been to a very large extent in the hands of men whom we may call "religious professors." It would have been impossible for Metcalfe to take part in a "prayer-meeting," but he could not do what our prayer-meeting-goers of the last thirty years have done over and over again without scruple. At the time when the mutiny broke out in the midst of the wickedness by which we were heaping up wrath against ourselves, the "prayer-meetings" were going at high pressure, and the way to rise in the official ladder was to be pious and saintly. Never was more strikingly illustrated the danger of a man persuading himself that he was too good, too right-minded, too religious to do what is wrong. These wrong-doers have been the very men whom the world has nick-named "saints." In private life they have been of pure character; in official life they have not known what common honesty, common fairness, common justice meant. The hypocrisy has been awful and profound.

Recommends a reduction in the expenditure of Government.

The Gujaráti (97) of the 4th November censures Government for the unsatisfactory condition of the Indian finances, and requests Parliament and the Secretary of State for India to do all in their power to improve it. The army, the civil establishments and the public works cost large sums, which may be curtailed without any disadvantage. There is no need for retaining Commanders-in-Chief at the several presidencies; the number of European soldiers is much too large and should be reduced; the cost of the civil establishments should be curtailed as pointed out on several previous occasions; and no loans should be raised for the carrying on of public works in times of peace except on the occasions of dearth or famine. The expense incidental to famine works should usually be met from the current revenues of the country.

Disapproves of the purchase of the French possessions in India by the British Government.

The Arunodayá (14) of the 4th November says that it is stated in a Calcutta newspaper that the Indian Government wishes to buy the French possessions in India. If the above statement be true, it is impossible to reconcile it with the declared intentions of the British Government that it has no desire to add new territories to its dominions. Some years ago a rumour prevailed that the British Government was going to purchase Goa, but it only succeeded in assimilating the working of the salt and ábkári departments in that territory with its own. The French possessions in India are few and small in extent, and compared to the interests involved, their administration is costly and expensive, and therefore it might be urged that they would be more economically and better governed if they formed an integral part of the British dominions. But by similar reasoning every other territory might be absorbed into British India in the same manner. The Arunodayá considers that in the interests of the British Government it is desirable that the French should keep their possessions in India. The method of government in French territory must form a contrast to that in British India and must necessarily lead people to compare the merits of the different systems of administration.

The Indian Spectator (1) of the 4th November says:—We observed the other day that not only on grounds of justice but economy also it is needful to enlarge the limit of annual admissions into the statutory Civil Service. If our rulers are sincere in their professions to find extended employment for Natives in the higher branches of administration, then it would be rash to assert that one-sixth is a liberal limit. It practically means that 4 or 5 Natives will be admitted to the service to the 24 or 25 Englishmen that annually gain admission to the other and higher branch of the service by means of open competition in England. We have shown how the door to that service, though nominally open, has been practically shut against Natives; and unless the present agitation bears some fruit, so far as the limit of age being again fixed at 21 goes, there is little likelihood of any considerable number of Indians entering the Civil Service by competition; so that the admission of 4 or 5 Native gentlemen to the other service every year can scarcely be considered satisfactory. For a better idea of the insufficiency of the number we would assume a hypothetical case which would illustrate the illiberality of the concession Government so grudgingly made four years ago. If the present system of admitting 25 members, successful at the competitive examination held in England, is continued without any alteration, we shall have at the end of 35 years—the average duration of the service of a Civil Servant—775 competitionwálás in the enjoyment of an average annual salary of Rs. 20,000 and upwards, besides being entitled on retirement to an annual average pension of £800. The number of Native statutory Civilians during the same term will be 125, in the enjoyment at the best of an annual maximum salary of Rs. 12,000, with a right to pension averaging £600. We appeal to the common sense of our rulers to say whether, consistently with the rapidly increasing class of educated Natives and their aspirations, the result of the so-called extended employment of Natives in the higher branches of administration would be considered at all satisfactory. We appeal to their sense of justice to say whether the arrangement would be thought equitable. Can it be at all consistent with their professions to lessen the burden of foreign agency, which eats away so much of the country's wealth? Is such an arrangement at all conducive to economy? Is it really in the true interests of the children of the soil? We are aware of the answers that will be made to these questions. The people will be told, as Sir Evelyn Baring has done in his paper in the Nineteenth Century, that in the present condition of India it would be extremely dangerous to reduce the number of European Civil Servants. This is the stock argument. What the danger is we have not been told, while the Government of India has repeatedly acknowledged that Natives are so far advanced and capable as to be fully entitled to be trusted with many an appointment in the higher branches of administration. If it be dangerous to have a less number of Europeans in the civil administration, why not boldly state what those dangers are? Are they real or imaginary? If the former, then Natives would be the first to cease clamouring for the diminution in the strength of foreign agency in the employ of Government; if imaginary, then they should insist upon having a greater share. The question, therefore, at issue is, who is to decide that the diminution will lead to danger? Neither the Government of India nor the Natives ought to pass an opinion. Both are interested parties. A committee of independent gentlemen, members of Parliament, and others well-known for their impartiality, presided by such a gentleman as Mr. Fawcett, should be appointed to report upon this question. But it will not do for our rulers to simply say they are the proper judges of what is right, and under their own ipse dixit, right or wrong, perpetually exclude large numbers of Natives from being employed in higher offices. We are firmly of opinion that no danger whatever will happen by reducing the number of European Civil Servants. We do not advocate, and it would be rash to do so, that the entire European agency should be abolished. That is not at all possible. Those who cherish any such delusion must be fools or madmen. But we do maintain that there is enough room for a reasonable reduction. We contend that no harm will be done by reducing it on the one hand and proportionately enlarging the present limit fixed under Lord Lytton's rules. If one-half be fixed as the limit, Natives would be quite satisfied. It might then be left to the future when that limit could again be increased to two-thirds, at which it should be finally fixed for the rest of the time that the British are masters of India. Meanwhile Natives should not rest until their agitation has so far borne fruit as to compel our rulers to concede to the demand for one-half as the number of annual admissions into the statutory Civil Service.

Says that no danger whatever will happen by reducing the number of European Civil Servants and by proportionately increasing the number of annual admissions into the statutory Civil Service.

Says that the limit of age for the competitive examination for the Indian Civil Service held in England should be raised and the constitution of the statutory Civil Service should be improved.

In alluding to the telegram received by the London Times from its Calcutta correspondent that Lord Ripon is desirous of increasing the limit of age of candidates for the Indian Civil Service to 21 years in order to give facilities to Indian students to compete at the examination, the Jáme Jamshed (101) of the 9th November advances the usual arguments in condemnation of the present limit of 19 years, and hopes that His Lordship will obtain the concession, which, if granted, will not fail to stamp his name indelibly in the grateful memory of the Indian people. The Jáme also hopes that the Viceroy will alter the present defective constitution of the Native Civil Service, substituting in its place the system of competitive examinations in India. The successful candidates should then be sent to England for the purpose of improving themselves and for obtaining an insight into English manners and customs. The raising of the limit of age for the entrance examination in England will enable the sons of well-to-do parents to enter the Civil Service by the door of competition, and an improvement in the mode of electing statutory Civil Servants will afford a similar opportunity to poor students.

Requests Government to take measures to improve the pay and position generally of the soldiers of the Native army.

The Military Instructor (135) of the 3rd November states that the Native soldier is not so well cared or housed as the English soldier. In every respect the condition of the former is inferior. The pay of the Native soldier is very small. From it he has to maintain himself and his family. Even the money required for clothing him is deducted from his small allowance. The Instructor is of opinion that rations should be served out free to Native soldiers as is done in the case of European soldiers. Additional funds, if necessary, should be voted in order to improve the status and position of Native soldiers. The loyalty of Native soldiers is undoubted and their entire devotion to the service to which they belong must also be admitted. It is unaccountable that Government should act in a niggardly manner where the interests of the Native army are concerned. Promotion in the Native army is also very slow. Most soldiers never advance beyond the position of privates. It is no wonder if crime is rife in the Native army on account of the poor prospects which it holds out.

Approves of the views of Sir Evelyn Baring on recent events in India except in the matter of the increased employment of Natives in the public service.

In an article headed "Sir Evelyn Baring on recent events in India," the Indu Prakásh (9) of the 5th November says:—In an article on recent events in India in the Nineteenth Century for October Sir Evelyn Baring gives an excellent exposition of the policy of Lord Ripon's administration, of the true character of the Anglo-Indian opposition to that policy, and of the just claims and aspirations of the natives of India to a share in the government of their country. He points out with peculiar felicity and emphasis that what has been characterised as Lord Ripon's policy is really the policy of His Lordship's predecessors and of successive Secretaries of State, both Conservative and Liberal, and of the Imperial Parliament. Even among Anglo-Indians themselves there are not a few who admit the justness of the principles which regulate that policy but who cannot brook to see those principles put into practice. Sir Evelyn shows conclusively that Lord Ripon is not the revolutionary Viceroy the champions of the Anglo-Indian cause make him out to be, but is really an honest follower of the policy he inherited from his predecessors and a sincere worker in the interests of both India and England.

Such a certificate coming from the late Finance Minister will no doubt be altogether lost upon the extreme antagonists of the Jurisdiction Bill, who probably regard him as an accomplice in crime; but to those who are willing to read events in the light of history and truth, Sir Evelyn's explanation will be eminently satisfactory. His account of the origin and the true character of the Anglo-Indian opposition likewise substantially corroborates the view held by us in common with many of our contemporaries. Sir Evelyn shows that while misunderstanding may in part, but to a very slight extent, have caused the opposition, the real cause is the general disapprobation of, and the deep-rooted antipathy to, Native preferment. The politicians who lead the counsels of the Anglo-Indian Defence Association, and who give vent to their thoughts in the columns of the Englishman, base their opposition to what they call the revolutionary policy of the present Government of India on principles which raise an uncompromising claim to political superiority on behalf of Anglo-Indians and totally deny any right in Natives for consideration or advancement. To these the whole policy of admitting Natives into the Civil Service or any other service, of educating them and instilling into their minds the ideas of liberty and constitutional government, of giving them a share of political power and training them to habits of self-government, is thoroughly distasteful. To them the Jurisdiction Bill was the last straw that broke the camel's back. The outcry against this Bill, says Sir Evelyn, must indeed be regarded as the explosion at last of long pent-up discontent. The Criminal Jurisdiction Bill was the spark which set the mine on fire. Local self-government and some other acts of Lord Ripon's administration precipitated the explosion, as also did the fact that the Liberal party is in power in England. Anglo-Indian society is, generally speaking, Conservative. But the explosion must in any case have taken place before long. It has been preparing for many years, and is due to the resentment felt by a portion of the Anglo-Indian community at the philo-Native tendencies of successive Viceroys, Secretaries of State, and Parliaments. Of these tendencies the constant pressure kept up to extend the sphere of employment is perhaps that which has created the greatest amount of resentment. There are some circumstances,—for instance, the reduction in the salaries of the Calcutta Judges and the Roorkee resolution—which have contributed to increase the discontent, but for which the Viceroy is really not responsible. In the main it is the resentment at the philo-Native tendencies of Government, as Sir Evelyn puts it, that raised the storm which has been shaking all India since February last. On the subject of the treatment of Natives Sir Evelyn's views are catholic. We do not entirely agree with him as to the extent to which Native agency may be employed by Government in the work of administration. Sir Evelyn seems to think that the proportion of European and Native elements in the public service is at present nearly equal, and that any greater employment of Natives will not be conducive to economy. In regard to the first point we apprehend that though the proportion may be equal in numbers there is a very considerable disproportion in the ranks and salaries of the respective classes of officers. For obvious political reasons the highest executive officers must be Europeans. But we venture to think that in the judicial, the educational, the public works and other services there is yet considerable scope for the employment of Natives, which while it will be not wanting in efficiency will result in an appreciable saving of expenditure. We have the highest respect for the opinions of such an eminent statesman as Sir Evelyn Baring, but on this subject we venture to dissent from his views. Among the recent events noticed by Sir Evelyn, the chief are the Criminal Jurisdiction Bill and the scheme of local self-government. In regard to the first he answers successfully the now stock arguments about anomalies, investment of British capital, inexpediency and so forth. Sir Evelyn's refutations and arguments pro and con have a freshness and vigour of their own, but we shall not weary our readers with a recapitulation of them. It is very gratifying to note that Sir Evelyn emphatically declares himself against a withdrawal of the Bill. It appears to me highly desirable on public grounds, says Sir Evelyn, that whatever alterations may be made in the details, the essential principle of the Bill should be passed into law. We have here an assurance of the temper of the Government of India in respect of the Bill. Sir Evelyn was within a few months back a prominent member of that Government, and may be regarded as the most trustworthy exponent of their views. In Sir Evelyn's departure from India the Bill has lost a most able, influential, and conscientious advocate; but we trust his successor will not give us cause to regret Sir Evelyn's loss. Sir Evelyn's observations on the effect of the withdrawal of the Bill are very valuable, and ought to convince all but the most violent and blind enthusiasts on the side of the opposition. But the most important part of the article is the remarks on the local self-government scheme. Here Sir Evelyn lets us into the secret history of the measure, and we know for the first time to whom we owe the initiation of the self-government scheme. We have been in the habit of bestowing all our praises for the introduction of this measure on the noble Lord at the head of the Government of India, but now we must learn to reserve a not insignificant part of them for his not less noble coadjutor. It was Sir Evelyn who first suggested to the Viceroy the desirability of extending Lord Mayo's scheme of decentralization. It was at his suggestion that information was called for, the opinions of local Governments solicited, and the celebrated resolutions of September 30th, 1881, and May 18th, 1882, were written. Thus whatever we owe to the firmness, liberality and practical statesmanship of our noble Viceroy, we also owe deep debt to the late Finance Minister for his foresight, singleness of purpose, and remarkable industry. The opposition which first ostensibly broke out in consequence of the Jurisdiction Bill soon spread to the local self-government scheme along with every other measure of Lord Ripon's administration. We have already indicated Sir Evelyn's views in regard to the character of this opposition. Sir Evelyn shows the utter hollowness of the position taken by the antagonists of the policy of Government, and establishes that a curious despotic government must take into account the forces set into motion by the introduction of western culture, western arts and manufactures, and western ideas of freedom and government, and must adapt its administration in accordance with those forces. We trust the sound views expressed by Sir Evelyn Baring will carry weight with the English public, and will meet with proper consideration at the hands of Government.

Comments in connection with the address delivered by Sir Richard Temple as President of the Social Science Congress.

The Indian Spectator (1) of the 4th November, in an article headed "Sir Richard Temple as a social reformer!" refers to the address delivered by him as President of the Social Science Congress at Huddersfield, and remarks:—That in years to come we may have visitations from social philanthropists, there is not the least doubt. Anyhow it will be a happy augury when Sir Richard Temple himself can make it convenient once more to revisit the scenes of his official career but for the higher and nobler purposes on which he so eloquently descanted at Huddersfield. Meanwhile it may be more interesting to note a few omissions from the long list of reforms for India which Sir Richard mentioned. No doubt the lowly dwellings of the poor need sad reform. Who has not observed that in villages the peasants pen up the cattle inside their huts? Did Sir Richard ever deign to ascertain during his tours the reasons that compel Indian peasantry to live and sleep in the same room with their beasts of burden or domestic cattle? When the impoverished agriculturist goes half-starved all the year round, when he has hardly sufficient means to make both ends meet, when State demands for revenue assessments are so rigid and so exacting, can any hopes be entertained that the Kunbi will have a spare acre of his own outside his dwelling place? On the contrary, is it not a fact that during the famine of 1877-78 Sir Richard, with the view to chime in the policy pursued by Lord Lytton, recorded a long minute in which it was stated that every pie of the suspended revenue, though delayed, would be eventually recovered! We suppose Sir Richard had then no such glorious vision of improving the condition of the peasantry on which he dwelt with some emphasis in his new-born zeal at the Huddersfield meeting. Speaking of drainage, he observed that in India "the capital cities have drainage works constructed in the manner which has approved itself to engineers at home." Is that not rather an exaggerated statement? Drainage works in a complete state are only to be seen in Calcutta, and even there they have been pronounced more or less a failure. We are far from having drainage complete in Bombay, and we think Madras has not done so much even as to make a serious beginning how to find the ways and means for drainage. Besides, is it quite correct to assert that these Indian drainage schemes have had the approval of engineers in England? We thought there was a diversity of opinion on the subject. When great sanitary engineers in London are not at one as to the safety of underground drainage, when the Paris Municipality has appointed a roving commission to enquire into the merits of the so-called scientific scheme, when the people of Berlin have universally condemned their drainage works, is it not somewhat rash and misleading to talk of "approval"? Sir Richard then speaks of Native prejudice to western sanitation, and remarks that typhoid fever has been on the increase. He is here speaking facts and we should like to know how he would reconcile these with his previous statement as to drainage. It would have been better had he explained at length his own arbitrary acts in connection with the drainage of Bombay and the controversy that is still actively raging as to the problem of its ultimate success. As to sanitation in minor cities, towns and villages it is curious he forgot to tell his audience that by virtue of an autocratic edict as Governor of Bombay all mofussil municipal budgets were so framed for seven years in anticipation as to enable district officials to spend as much as they liked of local funds on useless public roads and other works of so-called "public utility" to the neglect of the prosecution of works having for their object increased safety to public health. How consistent are his gubernatorial acts, when he had the power to put his latent philanthropic instincts to a practical test, with the bright sparkling sermon he preached at Huddersfield in his position as a social reformer! Again, the whilom famine delegate had not a word to say as to the theory of famine ration and to the fatal character of famine fever. He could not have better enlisted the sympathy of the philanthropic servants assembled at that meeting than by pointedly alluding to the two topics. There are many other omissions. But we can only refer to one more of these. He waxed eloquent on the political education of Natives, to which he alluded in the concluding part of his address. May we ask if he ever did anything to advance it in his capacity as Governor of Bombay? Whom did he nominate to the Legislative Council? It is unnecessary to say that he appointed those whom he thought subservient enough to register his autocratic decrees? Is this the sort of civic duty he is anxious, as a social reformer, that Natives should learn? Then again, what did he do for mofussil local funds committees, what about elected local bodies, and so forth? It is superfluous to remind him that in all these matters he strove his best rather to depress than elevate Natives. His talk of advancing them in political education is simply so much cant. No honest man can believe in his sincerity. In fact sincerity is a virtue which he possesses the least. Such being the case, we must take for what it is worth the address at Huddersfield in which he attempted to pose as a social reformer for India. May heaven save us from a reformer of his type! He has left enough of mischievous administrative legacies; but to thrust on the soil his new-fangled social nostrums will be an evil far more intolerable—an evil from which it is to be hoped India may be kept aloof. Social reformers of the type of Sir Richard would be too dear even at half-pence for this country.

Criticises Sir Lepel Griffin's views on Native princes as divulged in his article in the Nineteenth Century.

The Indu Prakásh (9) of the 5th November observes that if the condition of Native States is as bad as it is depicted in Sir Lepel Griffin's article on Native princes in the Nineteenth Century, then the state of things must be serious indeed. Sir Lepel Griffin, however, writes in a general way. His accusations are of a vague character, and hence considerable deduction must be made from his statements before they can be received as absolutely true or reliable. The Indu Prakásh does not believe that there is so much oppression in Native States as Sir Lepel Griffin supposes. It must also not be forgotten that a government under which no tyranny is practised does not exist on the surface of the globe. Again if the kind of misgovernment which Sir Lepel Griffin alleges really exists, then the people from Native States would migrate into the neighbouring British territory. But such a phenomenon is not observable anywhere. The answer which Sir Lepel Griffin gave to a Native prince who said that he was in the habit of raising twice as much revenue from his kingdom as the British Government realised in its own territory of equal extent does not show much wisdom. The Native States are not of recent origin. They existed here long before the advent of the English and they were excellently managed without English guidance or supervision. Sir Lepel Griffin thinks that the permission given to Native princes to adopt heirs has worked much mischief. Was Lord Canning, who inaugurated this policy, a fool? asks the Indu Prakásh. Lord Canning extended to Native princes the right of adoption in case of failure of lineal heirs in order to strengthen and confirm their loyalty to the British Government. Sir Lepel Griffin asserts that in Native States there is no regular administration of justice; bribery and corruption prevail everywhere. But even in British territory it will be difficult to prove that oppression of any kind is not practised on a large scale. The police is primarily kept to preserve order. But how little satisfactorily is this work performed in British territory? The Bombay policemen are notorious for their lawless behaviour. Several instances of misconduct have been brought home to them. A European officer can do anything, and although his misdeeds may be known in the highest quarters, yet no notice is taken of them. Political Agents often inflict fines on Native princes for trifling reasons. The fact is that the British Government only sees the faults of Native rulers and does not notice its own shortcomings. Sir Lepel Griffin expresses contempt for the armies of Native princes. If the armies of Native princes are a mere rabble, the fault lies with the British Government. When Native princes were independent their armies were kept in a high state of discipline; but now they have no need of highly disciplined forces, and besides the British Government will not allow them to keep them so. Sir Lepel Griffin should not indulge in useless invectives. He would have been an admirable councillor to Lord Dalhousie. It is a fortunate circumstance for Native rulers that Sir Lepel Griffin's views are not in the ascendant just now.

The selection of men for the judicial branch of the Civil Service and remarks in connection therewith.

The Indu Prakásh (9) of the 5th November, in an article headed "Our Judicial System," alludes to the appointment of a Law Commission and says:—We have very good grounds for stating that the defect of the present judicial system has not escaped the attention of either the Government of India or the Government of Bombay. Less than a year ago the Government of Bombay, at the instance of the Supreme Government, contemplated taking the sense of the High Court on the question. The authorities have realised to themselves the absurdity of getting inexperienced Civilians, fresh from the revenue line and with a very imperfect study of law, to hear appeals from suits disposed of by legally better educated and more experienced Subordinate Judges. What has been the result of the step taken by the Government we are not in a position to know; but it is certain that they did ask for opinions on the question as to whether it would not be more conducive to the administration of justice if Civilians entering the judicial line were given original cases to try for some time after their entrance into the judicial line, and the appeal work now generally entrusted to them given to experienced Subordinate Judges that might be declared competent for the work by the High Court. We are led to infer from this that the Bombay Gazette's information that the Government of India intend doing something in the matter is not perhaps altogether incorrect. We are however far from entertaining the view that because the present system is unsatisfactory the higher judicial appointments ought to be wrested from the Civil Service and thrown open to outsiders, such as barristers. Such a change will open the door to jobbery and patronage, and give us for inexperienced Civilian judges, with imperfect legal training, barrister judges of equally doubtful ability compelled to resort to Government service by their inability to rise at the bar. There is another consideration which ought to weigh with Government in deciding against such change. The Civil Service gets fresh accessions every year, and so long as it exists it must have ensured to it good prospects, both in the revenue and the judicial line. The higher appointments in the revenue line will be blocked ere long if the higher branch of the judicial service is thrown open to others. The Government ought to make best of the service which the Parliament has created, and the way to do it is to require Civilians wishing to enter the judicial line to pass a more searching examination in law than they are at present required to do. It is on this point that the Government of India should invite the opinions of those able to speak with the voice of authority on the subject. Now, seeing that the majority of Civil Servants choose the revenue line and that judicial business requires superior intelligence and ability, Government should for one thing make a distinction between the revenue and judicial branches of the service by giving those selecting the latter higher pay than to those confining themselves to the former. At present the scale of salary is equal in the case of both, though it is well known that a judicial career is selected by men of exceptional abilities and intelligence. Then again the present system of promotion according to seniority and length of service in the higher grades of the judicial service should also be modified. Messrs. Melvill and West were promoted to the High Court bench over the heads of several District Judges who were their seniors, and their promotion was rapid, because their ability and diligence had brought them to the favourable notice of the High Court. Why should not promotions to the office of District Judges be made on the same principle? That would encourage the Civilians in the judicial line to work hard and give us something better than fourth or fifth rate judges in the mofussil.

Observes that Government should not sell the land on the Back Bay for building purposes.

The Lok Mitrá (78) of the 4th November observes that the Bombay Municipal Corporation will render an important public service if it succeeds in preventing the threatened destruction of one of the lungs of this overcrowded city. The intention of Government to sell an important portion of the Back Bay foreshore for building purposes will, if carried out, inflict a serious injury upon the hundreds of the poor who at present find in the Kennedy Sea-face not only a source of health-giving enjoyment but a means of preserving for the city the limited supply of fresh air which even now the crowded dwellings of the masses who live in the thickly populated parts of the city behind the Queen's Road hardly get. The action of Government seems altogether inexplicable when it is remembered that there is a large amount of space available not only in the immediate vicinity but in other parts of the city sufficient to meet any pressing demand of an increasing population. But it is feared the Government is acting in this matter with a sole regard to filthy lucre, and, like a grasping landlord, is more bent upon making money out of its property than in leaving to the large mass of its subjects the means of recreation and health. The end of this fine sweep of open foreshore will be worthy of its beginning if a portion of this remnant of the money-making fever of 1864 is to be sacrificed to the greedy propensities of the present successors of the Back Bay Reclamation Company.

Prays Government not to sell land on the Kennedy Sea-face for building purposes.

In alluding to the advertisement for the sale of the vacant ground on the Back Bay, the Bombay Chronicle (75) of the 4th November observes that the question of the intended sale is of vital importance to the health, comfort and convenience of the citizens of Bombay. The only advantage which will result from the proposed sale will be, besides bringing some money into the coffers of Government, to afford some additional facilities to a class of people consisting of Europeans and Natives who are well able to command the comforts and luxuries of life. On the other hand, the disadvantage will be the loss of one of the very few desirable sites of public resort of recreation to the public generally, and especially to the dense mass of population located in the neighbourhood. When the Back Bay reclamation scheme was floated a special promise was given to the city by Government that a portion of the reclaimed ground falling to the share of the State would be set apart for public purposes of the citizens by way of compensation to them for the loss of the open ground on the then esplanade taken up by Government and sold for building purposes since the demolition of the old ramparts. The census report of the Municipal Health Officer shows how very dense is the population and how some parts of the city are extremely overcrowded. It is to be hoped that the Corporation will strongly advocate the necessity of leaving the Kennedy Sea-face open as it is, and that Government will grant the prayer of the citizens of Bombay.

Complains of the way in which European officials dispose of appeals relating to license tax.

The Mahárashtrá Mitrá (39) of the 8th November says that the European officials charged with the duty of hearing appeals in cases of over-assessment in the collection of the license tax do not do their work properly. They never take the trouble of examining the books which appellants bring with them in order to show their exact income. Twenty to twenty-five appeals are decided in the course of half an hour. Each appellant is not allowed more than three or four minutes to explain his case. The appellate authorities belong to the Civil Service, but unfortunately they rarely show any civility to appellants. The Mahárashtrá Mitrá has not heard or read anywhere of Civil Servants being enjoined to abuse the natives of India and to turn a deaf ear to their complaints. It would seem as if Civil Servants were inspired by Providence to ill-treat Natives the moment they set their foot on the soil of India. These sáhebs do not permit Natives to sit in the compound of their houses. Appellants are often obliged to sit under the shade of a tree by the side of the public road. If the above state of things is enacted in Sátára itself, what must be the sufferings of the people far from head-quarters? The Mámlatdárs assess people to the license tax on mere hearsay evidence. If Government were to order each individual to pay a certain portion of his earnings into the public treasury, there would be much less oppression and no necessity for appeals.

Remarks in connection with the hours of work in the Bombay mills.

The Indian Spectator (1) of the 4th November, in writing on the endeavours which Mr. Janárdan Rámchandraji is making to enlist the sympathy of the enlightened classes in Bombay towards the amelioration of the physical and intellectual condition of operatives employed in the local mills, remarks:—The Legislature alone must interpose to hold an equitable balance between the rich and influential capitalists on the one side and the voiceless and uninfluential working classes on the other. Under the present circumstances we consider that nine hours a day are quite sufficient, exclusive of course of full one hour for mid-day recess. The present arrangement, whereby the poor operatives are allowed half an hour, is simply an imposition on the credulity of the public. Nominally the operatives are allowed half an hour's vacation, but they rarely enjoy more than a brief respite of fifteen minutes in practice, and that too on the open road. There is hardly anything like shelter or shade to be found in factories where exhausted nature, after five or six hours' work at a stretch, may refresh itself. So that for that matter the mid-day half-hour recess might as well be foregone. The selfish capitalists would welcome such an arrangement with alacrity. But what is wanted in the interests of the work-people is, nine working hours, full one hour's afternoon recess, and shelter and shade on the mill premises where operatives can freely disport themselves and get refreshed. When the Legislature insists on these three conditions being carried out in their entirety, we may then realise the accomplishment of the noble object for which the Theistic Association is now labouring, but labours in vain. Again, if it be the object of our city philanthropists to see a rising class of tolerably well educated operatives in future, the law's aid must be further invoked to make the employment of any young person under fifteen years prohibitory. For all these benevolent objects active agitation is wanted. A strong memorial to the Government of India, if adopted at a large public meeting, will soon bring about the desired end.

Complains that Bávdekar, the bangi clerk in the Ratnágiri post office, was unjustly treated in that his house was searched during his absence on account of the supposed abstraction of a paper-cutter from a bangi parcel.

The Bakul (16) of the 4th November in its local news states that the Superintendent of Post Offices, Mr. Chhotálál Motirám, searched the house of Vishnu Anant Bávdekar, the bangi clerk in the Ratnágiri post office, on the mere suspicion of the latter having abstracted a paper-cutter of the value of two annas from a bangi addressed to Miss Symonds. It is now nearly two months since the bangi was delivered to Miss Symonds, and at the time of the delivery there was no indication or complaint that it had been tampered with. On Miss Symond's recently complaining that a paper-cutter from the bangi was missing, the house of Vishnu Anant Bávdekar was searched during his absence, without his knowledge and without hearing his explanation. Strictly speaking the post master is responsible for the safe custody and delivery of a bangi parcel, and it is therefore unaccountable why Bávdekar should be held responsible for the missing article. That the actual weight of the bangi parcel was less than the weight stated on the outside was known to the post master at Khed, where Mr. Symonds was when the bangi parcel was delivered for despatch. The treatment to which poor Bávdekar has been subjected is most harsh and unjust.

Remarks in connection with the prosecution of some officers of the Bombay police on a charge of assault by certain Borah shopkeepers.

The Káside Mumbai (105) of the 5th November, in writing on the recent affray between the police and the Borahs near Nal Bazár, says that it is good that the Borahs have come forward to seek justice for the assault committed and the oppression exercised by the police on them; but it cannot be understood what object the Police Superintendent and Inspectors could have had in assaulting the Borahs for nothing. The sepoys may have had a spite or malice against the Borahs, but it is doubtful whether the Superintendent and Inspectors were actuated by the same questionable motives. It is possible that a senseless police sepoy may have given rise to this affair with a view to gain his object or to revenge himself for some long-existing enmity; but no wise man would ever believe that highly-paid police officers would become the tools of such ignorant, senseless and lowly-paid sepoys and would take part in the affray or even think of behaving in the way they are said to have done. The proportion of truth and falsehood in this case cannot be made out. The Kásid is of opinion that if the European police officers had been excluded from the present prosecution and if the illiterate and stupid sepoys had only been prosecuted by the Borahs, the case would not have brought ridicule on both the prosecution and the defence.

Legislation.

Condemns the agitation made in England by the zamindárs of Bengal against the Bengal Rent Bill.

In alluding to the agitation that is being raised in England by the Bengal zamindárs against the Bengal Rent Bill, the Bombay Chronicle (75) of the 4th November observes that it is strange that the party in India that has been constantly foremost in sympathising with the Irish agitation against the English policy of conducting the public affairs of Ireland, especially in the matter of Irish land tenure and the rights and relations of the landlord and tenant in that country, should now invoke the aid of the supporters of that policy to help them to ground down the miserable Bengal peasant. If the zamindárs really hope to be able to attain their purpose of keeping to themselves what they have unlawfully seized or improperly withheld from their tenants by enlisting in their favour the sympathy of the section of the English landlord class, they would find in the end their efforts meeting with no better success than those of the English opponents of reform in Ireland. The zamindárs may for a time succeed in setting by the ear the portion of the English public imperfectly acquainted with the real merits of the Bengal Rent Bill; but in the end truth will triumph and then the opponents of the Bill will not fare better than the adversaries of Lord Ripon's other measures. The English nation has no sympathy with the sort of outcry which the zamindárs have been raising against the Bill. The reasons in support of their complaint have long been discarded from every intelligent English circle. Modern social sentiment and legislative wisdom have been quite unable to accept the doctrine of landlords fattening by hook and crook on the sinews of their tenants. On the other hand, the friends and supporters of the Bill do not rest their case on mere assertions and idle declamations in the manner of its opponents, but upon indisputable facts in the history, legal and moral, of the country—upon the consideration of the sad condition of the Bengal peasantry as brought about by the unlawful encroachments of the zamindárs—upon what should belong to their tenants. When, therefore, sensible and intelligent British people come to understand the real merits of the Bill they will unhesitatingly support it. The best course, therefore, for the zamindárs will be to give up the unseemly agitation and to trust to the proper representation of their grievances to the Viceroy in Council. [The Rást Goftár (111) of the same date expresses sentiments to the same effect.]

Education.

Remarks in connection with the system of grants-in-aid pursued in the Bombay Presidency.

The Mahrátta (2) of the 4th November says:—It is stated that the much-vexed question of grants-in-aid is likely to be settled on a basis satisfactory to all parties by simply carrying out the rules laid down in the despatch of 1854, from which there had been many departures in most of the provinces. Setting aside the consideration of the illiberal spirit in which the existing grant-in-aid rules have been framed in the Bombay Presidency, we find that they are not observed in practice even as they are. The greater portion of the grants are given, if we are rightly informed, to the missionary schools in the Presidency, none of which have till this time acquired reputation either for numbers or efficiency, while Native schools, which do more substantial work, get little or no aid. We fear that as long as Mr. Chatfield continues to be at the head of the Bombay Educational Department private schools will have no hope of equal justice being done to them, however liberal may be the Educational Act. Generally the funds will not be available, and even if they were, it would be more proper to spend them on the extension of primary education than to give them as grants-in-aid "to ephemeral mushroom private schools," although they may have pulled on for years together without receiving a single farthing from Government and established their superiority over Government schools in point of teaching, efficiency and examination results. The grant-in-aid system will do the greatest possible good, provided grants are given without seriously interfering with the management and the method of instruction adopted in private schools. It is from such institutions under able superintendence that thoughtful educational reforms mostly proceed. The hard-and-fast rules of a centralised system make the experiment of every innovation or a proposed scheme of education exceedingly difficult and stupid, and absurd practices are handed down from generation to generation without the slightest modifications. This miserable state of things can be cured only by giving liberal grants to well conducted private schools and colleges.

Does not approve of the imparting of instruction in morality in Government colleges and schools.

The Bakul (16) of the 4th November says that in a lecture recently delivered by Sir Richard Temple in England he stated as his opinion that the moral tone of students educated in Government colleges and schools in India had deteriorated and was deteriorating, and he attributed this unfortunate state of things to the omission to impart instruction in morality. The Education Commission seems to be of the same opinion, since a suggestion has been made in its report that instruction in morality should be systematically given in educational institutions managed by Government. The missionary bodies also consider that instruction in morality ought to be imparted to young students. The Bakul does not understand in what respects the conduct and behaviour of students educated in Government colleges and schools are inferior to those who have received their education in missionary institutions, where instruction in religion and morality is given. If the mere reading of books on morality and the hearing of moral lessons were calculated to make people better, then all readers of the Bible would have been like Jesus Christ and St. Paul. But such a phenomenon is not observable, and hence the utility of instruction in morality is extremely doubtful. Moral instruction is inseparably bound up with religion, and any attempt to inculcate it systematically will result in a conflict with the religious sentiments of the hearers. The Bakul trusts that Government will not allow its colleges and schools to become the arena of religious conflicts.

Comments on the system of making appointments in the Bombay Educational Department.

The Indian Spectator (1) of the 4th November says:—It is satisfactory to read that Professor Selby reverts to his substantive appointment of Professor of Logic and Moral Philosophy at the Deccan College. The students of that institution will be delighted to get back their favourite and accomplished Professor. It is a great mistake to send educational officers, especially in the highest grades, from pillar to post. The bureaucratic system when carried into the Educational Department is anything but beneficial. Unfortunately it is treated as if it were a great military department where officers are ordered backwards and forwards on general or staff duty. Government ought to know that colleges and schools cannot be treated as barracks, where any officer, be he clever or its reverse, can be posted regardless of the interests of those over whom he is placed. A radical change in the system as at present administered in the Educational Department is necessary. Our idea is that when good Professors are to be had they must be made to stick to their respective chairs, of course on salaries commensurate with their work and length of service, so that they may have no inducements to hanker after more remunerative places. Again it is a mistake to pitch the square man into the round hole. To order one man proficient in one branch to teach another of the elements of which he may be blissfully ignorant is simply ridiculous. But this is what the Local Government very often has done in matters educational. It is no wonder if students sometimes rebel against a hopelessly incompetent tutor. We had thought that the accession to the Executive Council of so able and accomplished an educationist as Mr. Peile, once a Director of Public Instruction himself, would have put an end to the wholly vicious principle on which educational appointments at schools and colleges, especially acting ones, have been made. It is to be hoped that he will find leisure to reorganise the Department on a sounder basis. We might have seen our Educational Department quite a model for all India had the accomplished Principal of Elphinstone College been appointed to the Directorship years ago when he had a right and claim to it. But it is the curse of Indian service that promotion and preferment can only come through backstairs or other equally questionable influences.

Expresses gratitude to Government for the cancelling of Mr. Selby's appointment as tutor to the Thákor of Gondal.

The Mahrátta (2) of the 4th November says:—It will be a source of delight to many, especially to the students of the Deccan College, to learn that Mr. Selby's appointment as tutor to the Thákor Sáheb of Gondal is cancelled, and that he reverts to his appointment as Professor of Logic and Moral Philosophy at the Deccan College. This will relieve Mr. Barrett from his duties of Professor of Logic and Philosophy and virtual Professor of English at Poona and restore him to the English chair at Elphinstone College, where Mr. Oliver has been acting as English Professor. We must thank Sir James for having shown good sense in complying with the desire of the public in this instance. We hope the Sárvajanik Sabha will try to learn something about the Professor and his principles in order that it may not fall into the suicidal infatuation of recklessly attacking a good man a second time.

Railways.

Complains that the authorities of the G. I. P. Railway do not pay any attention to the comfort and convenience of fourth class passengers.

The Subodh Patrika (11) of the 4th November complains that the authorities of the G. I. P. Railway do not pay any attention to the comfort and convenience of third and fourth class passengers. Third class carriages are now attached only to mail trains, and with the ordinary passenger and mixed trains fourth class carriages only run. This omission to run third class carriages with ordinary passenger and mixed trains causes serious inconvenience to respectable Natives, who prefer to travel third class instead of fourth class. The recent reduction in fares has not benefited fourth class passengers, the poorest portion of the community whose interests ought to have been consulted first. This policy is most unjust. Again in fourth class carriages there are no urinals. The sufferings to which poor passengers are subjected on account of the above omission are really fearful. Fourth class carriages are often crowded to suffocation. The Subodh Patrika has been informed by a correspondent that on the 22nd October in the neighbourhood of Bombay about sixty passengers were thrust into a fourth class carriage. Not only had they no place for sitting, but there was no room for them even to remain standing. The Subodh Patrika trusts that Government and the authorities concerned will take speedy steps to remove the causes of complaint from which fourth class passengers are suffering.

Suggests the erection of fencing by the side of the Dhond and Manmád Railway.

The Nagar Samáchár (41) of the 3rd November says that although the Dhond and Manmád Railway was constructed many years ago, and although goods and passenger traffic is carried over it, yet it is strange that fencing has not been erected by its sides for so long a time. Instances of cattle straying on the railway line have frequently occurred owing to the want of fencing, and their owners have had to suffer on account of the inability of the railway authorities to supply this defect. Many cattle have been run over by trains and killed. The Samáchár hopes that no further delay will be made in constructing the fencing.

Municipalities.

Want of a steam fire-pump for Broach.

The Broach Samáchár (88) of the 8th November points out the necessity of having a steam fire-pump for Broach. The local municipality derives an annual income of about one lákh of rupees, and when thousands of rupees are spent every year on comparatively less important works, why should not a steam fire-pump be kept in the city? The plea of narrow streets should not come in the way of the purchase of a steam pump, for heavy losses from fire will thereby be prevented. If the local funds committee were to provide every táluka with a steam fire-pump, disastrous fires like the one that occurred at the village of Jhanor would be easily checked. Frequently whole villages are devastated by fire on account of the want of means for extinguishing it. On such occasions the steam pump can be taken from one place to another, and thus the local funds committee will be able to protect the interests of poor villagers and ryots. The local funds committee and the municipality ought speedily to attend to this matter.

Native States.

Says that the Junágad State is not right in levying revenue assessment on the land held by the Maiyás.

A correspondent of the Gujaráti (97) of the 4th November observes that the Junágad State has represented to the Bombay Government and the Secretary of State for India that no tax was levied in former times on the lands held by the Maiyás because the holders thereof were required to render service. No such service is now exacted from them and therefore there is no reason why they should be allowed to enjoy the lands rent-free. But it ought not to be forgotten that under former governments gifts were made to the descendants of persons who had rendered important services to the State; the Maiyás enjoyed the lands rent-free for several generations under the late government, and it would be an act of ingratitude on the part of the Junágad Darbár to refuse to let the Maiyás enjoy their old rights. Granting for the sake of argument that Junágad has a right to assess the lands because the Maiyás are not required to render service, why should that State continue to levy the "Jortalpi" tax from its feudatory princes and chiefs in Káthiáwár when it retains no army and renders no protection to those principalities as it did in former years? All States of the province are under the protection of the British Government, and therefore the Junágad State has no right to levy the tax; and if it gives it up, then alone would it be justified in assessing the lands of the Maiyás, but not otherwise.

Notes.—A. The notices from the different Newspapers have been collected in the Report under different heads, which are printed in italics.

B. The names of Newspapers are printed in the body of the Report in italics, and the number of the Newspaper in the above list is printed in brackets after the name.

C. The proprietors of the Newspapers marked * have not given information as to the number of copies issued. In these cases an estimate has been made by the Reporter.

D. The system of spelling vernacular words followed by the Reporter is the same as that adopted in the Official Spelling List of the Bombay Presidency. One peculiar feature of this system is that when the long a (आ or á) is the last letter of a word, the accent is left out, and the short a (अ = u in gun) is, to prevent confusion, never placed at the end of a word. This rule has been strictly followed, except that when the short a appears to be absolutely necessary to complete the pronunciation of a word, as in Arunodaya or the well known Mitra, it is printed with a mark over it to indicate that it is short, thus—ā.

Politics and the Public Administration.

Says that the coming of the Duke of Connaught should be celebrated by conferring some new privilege on Natives.

The Native Opinion (10) of the 11th November says that the visits of the Duke of Edinburgh and the Prince of Wales to India were of short duration. The case is otherwise with the coming of the Duke of Connaught, who is going to serve in this country for some years in high military capacity. His arrival here is a matter of great importance to Natives, and therefore something must be done to signalise the advent of this prince in India. The Native Opinion asserts that the loyalty of Natives is undoubted and unquestionable, and hence Government should show their appreciation by granting them some new privilege on the auspicious occasion of the Duke of Connaught's arrival in India. The Native soldiers fought gallantly with their European comrades in the last Egyptian Expedition and their valour was the subject of universal praise. The Native Opinion suggests that a beginning should be made in enrolling Natives in volunteer corps. This privilege has been abused by Europeans, as is evident from their conduct in regard to the Ilbert Bill. That Bill has confirmed and strengthened the feeling of loyalty on the part of Natives to the British power. The advent of the Duke of Connaught should be made memorable by allowing Natives to enrol as volunteers like Europeans. This concession on this occasion will be accepted with peculiar gratitude by the people.

Does not approve of the appointment of royal personages to positions of great trust and responsibility.

The Indu Prakásh (9) of the 12th November observes that it is extremely doubtful whether the country will gain anything by the employment of royal personages on public duties. The work of administration is difficult and requires continuous exertion to perform it satisfactorily. Royal personages are usually brought up in ease and luxury, and hence they will hardly possess the requisite strength and skill to do it as it ought to be done. Again in case they do not perform their duties satisfactorily they cannot be dealt with like ordinary individuals on account of their near relationship to the sovereign. If the public service is inefficiently performed, the people will have to bear the consequences. It is stated that the Duke of Connaught is now to be in charge only of a division of the army at Meerut, but his ultimate destination is the post of Commander-in-Chief of the Bombay army. The Indu Prakásh is not sorry that the Duke has been appointed to a high military post, but the appointment of a royal personage to a high administrative post will be simply disastrous. Administrative work is extremely difficult and laborious, and requires high intellectual capacity. On his appointment to the Governor-Generalship of India Lord Canning thought that the duties of his station would be light and easy, but on assuming the reins of government he admitted that the work was of an extremely arduous nature, requiring immense personal exertion. On an occasion of war it is well known that persons in the position of Governors do not get more than a couple of hours' rest in the course of a day. Royal personages must as a matter of course be selected to fill the highest offices, and hence considering the training which they have received it is impossible to conceive how they can satisfactorily discharge the duties appertaining to them. Such appointments will not conduce to the public benefit. Already the Governors-General and Governors act as if they were kings, and, if in addition to the privileges of their high station they are closely related to the sovereign, the power which they will wield will be something tremendous. The Indu Prakásh trusts that the Duke of Connaught will distinguish himself in the public service.

Remarks in connection with the articles that appeared in the Pioneer and the Englishman newspapers on the subject of the separation of India from England.

The Native Opinion (10) of the 11th November, in an article headed "The Pioneer and the Englishman on the separation of India from England," says:—It will scarcely be credited that a separation of India from the British Empire is actually being discussed quite seriously by two Anglo-Indian papers, which have prognosticated all kinds of evils from the passing of the Ilbert Bill. That consummation is to be brought about in consequence of the support the Radicals of England are giving to the Criminal Jurisdiction Bill, and their cry of "India for the Indians" is met with the counterblast of "India for the Europeans and its separation from England." The Pioneer is quite in earnest on the subject of separation. We are not told whether the separation is to be brought about peaceably, but we are informed that the growing tendency of the two extreme parties in the Empire—the advanced Radicals in England and the ultra-British or Jingo party in India—will effect it. We need not, however, be afraid that the separation is to take place ekdam as a punishment to the English Government for passing the Ilbert Bill, because, says the Pioneer, that which to us is a distant and vague possibility in 1883 will be a pressing and serious political danger to the Anglo-Indian of 1983 unless the Radical party in England save us all trouble by losing the country or cutting it adrift long before that time comes. According to the Englishman, which is infatuated enough to imagine that the handful of Anglo-Indians are actually a power in this country, the separation may be the result of a conflict between the Anglo-Indian community and the Home Government; it may come about also as the result of a conflict between the Anglo-Indian community and the self-governed Native; and, most ridiculous of all, by the anarchy certain to be caused by the attempt to govern India on Radical principles. "Anglo-Indians are to strain every nerve to increase their numbers, and, as a means of doing this, their permanent interest in the country; throughout the great tea districts, and wherever possible, let them import labour on which they could depend in a political struggle—let them leave no stone unturned to improve their organization. Let them seek to establish a solidarity of interests between themselves and the landed aristocracy of the country, who will not be long in discovering that radicalism aims at their destruction quite as much as at the degradation of Englishmen." How chimerical this advice is must be known too well to everyone who considers for a moment that not one among a hundred Europeans ever thinks of making India his home, and therefore takes no permanent interest in the country; and a solidarity or community of interests between foreigners and the aristocracy of the country is equally impossible. According to the Englishman the cry of "India for the Indians" has ceased to be the shibboleth of a mere clique of doctrinaires. It has become the avowed policy of the Radical party as regards India, and it has the support even of men who have been hitherto considered moderate Liberals. Everything points to the domination of Radicals at an early date; and when once they are in power, nothing short of a civil war is likely to oust them!!! The consequence will be that the European community will have to decide at no very remote date whether they will acquiesce in the surrender of the fruits of their labours in India at the beck of the caucus, or whether they will stand up to defend these fruits. Of course they must stand up and defend these fruits, but let us see how: "With proper preparation the Anglo-Indian community would be able to spare at least 40,000 men in an emergency, for with such preparation they ought to be able to raise at least 30,000 volunteers to maintain British authority here. These 40,000 men, on reaching British shores, would be available as a moving force, and their arrival would mean the immediate collapse of the worst form of rebellion." Thus the Anglo-Indian community will first get India altogether into their own power, and will be able to spare not less than 40,000 men of their army, who will sail to the British shores and will at once put down the rebellious Radicals—in fact, crush them, because by aiming to curb the spirit of the Anglo-Indian community they are aiming a blow at Imperialism, and "in resisting that determination the British community in India will not only be upholding its own interests and honour, but fighting the cause of order and the constitution at home." This is what the three tailors of Tooley street are prepared to do!!!

Remarks in connection with an observation of the Pioneer regarding the superiority of European over Native officials.

With reference to the remark made by the Pioneer in connection with the riot created by the goldsmiths at Almora that had there been a European officer on the spot the goldsmiths would not have dared to commit a breach of the public peace, the Bombay Samáchár (87) of the 13th November observes that the Pioneer's remark is not supported by previous experience. Many cases have occurred in which disturbances which happened in the presence of European officers have been put down by the exertion of Native officials. Whether the officer is a European or a Native, the legal powers which he possesses will enable him to keep order. Rioters are no more overawed by the presence of European officers than of Native officers. It is therefore wrong to say that rioters are emboldened to commit disturbances in the presence of a Native official, and are checked in their reckless course when a European officer is present.

Some remarks about filling up high judicial posts.

The Mahrátta (2) of the 11th November says:—The opponents of the Ilbert Bill fight against it on the ground that proper justice will not be done to Europeans by Native magistrates, because they cannot have that acquaintance with the varied ways of thinking and doing of the accused that is indispensable for the sure and certain administration of justice. If this be true, on what plea can Europeans maintain that they make good judges and magistrates for us? As a rule we know more of the language and law and manners of our rulers than they know of ours; and therefore Native judges and magistrates, who have to pass through the ordeal of severe University examinations, are naturally more qualified to try Europeans than Europeans can be to try Natives after passing nominal departmental examinations. An unbiassed foreign observer will be tempted to think that our District Courts and High Courts are huge shams. In a District Court, although the judge is an English gentleman, the pleaders plead and the witnesses depose in the vernacular of the district. The judge charges the jury in his own language, of which most members of the jury are entirely ignorant. The language of the High Court is English, but the judges and the barristers, having to deal with Natives in nine hundred and ninety-nine cases out of a thousand, find it impossible to move an inch without the assistance of an interpreter. Add to this the general ignorance of the Native character and Native society on the part of the judges, and the causes of the extreme dilatoriness and expensiveness of our judicial courts and the constant failure of justice consequent thereon become at once plain. In the Kolhápur Defamation Case a European judge and a European jury had to decide whether certain letters written in the modi hand, and on which turned the whole case, were genuine or forged! No wonder then that the whole Maháráshtra should have felt dissatisfied with the judgment of the Court and the jury. While Tilaks and Bánnerjis are made to suffer the full punishment of the law for using strong language against the Kárbháris and Nyáyádhishas, Fullers and Hewetts escape with little or no punishment for the offences of murder and assault on the plea of rashness, intoxication, bad spleen or lunacy, though eminent doctors may have declared it to be pretended. There is a failure of justice in all such cases, and it is the duty of every lover of justice to find out and to propose means for its early removal. It has been universally acknowledged that Natives make good judges and good barristers and pleaders. Why not then use them for duties for which they are most qualified? Covenanted Civilians are appointed Assistant Judges after answering half a dozen or a dozen judicial questions at the time of the departmental examination and are promoted to District Judgeships within a short time. Men that have not obtained special legal training can never cut a good figure in the judicial line, and the general character of our Civilian Judges fully justifies the assertion. Only those of them that had the advantage of acquiring liberal culture have gained a good name; but their number is so small that one can count their names almost on one's fingers. The rest are generally unfit to do their duty. Such Judges, however, have to decide appeals on cases tried by Native Subordinate Judges, most of whom are men of sound legal training and liberal culture. We are told that in the majority of cases the decisions of the Native Subordinate Judges, though they are often reversed by the District Judges, are confirmed by the High Court. Though such are the open facts, ninety-nine Subordinate Judges out of every hundred have to begin and end their career as Subordinate Judges. Every Assistant Judgeship or District Judgeship that falls vacant is filled by the appointment of one of the troop of Covenanted Civilians that is booked from England to India every year; and thus all doors of promotion are practically shut against Native Subordinate Judges. In the interest of justice and economy this deplorable state of things must not be allowed to exist for a long time. We are sorry that the rumour of the appointment of a Law Commission does not yet meet with an authoritative confirmation. Let the current rumour prove true or false, we would conjure our noble Viceroy to investigate this matter and to put it on a more solid and firm footing than at present. We are aware that there are one or two difficulties in confining the judicial line exclusively to Natives, but they are not insurmountable.

Comments on the decision of the suit brought by the Secretary of State for India against Mr. Byrámji Jijibhái.

In alluding to the decision of Mr. Crowe in favour of the defendant in the case of the Secretary of State for India vs. Mr. Byrámji Jijibhái, the Jáme Jamshed (101) of the 14th November observes that though the Court has decreed that the defendant should be paid the costs in the case, yet he will get only a small portion of the actual expense incurred by him. It is said that Mr. Byrámji's costs will amount to nearly Rs. 40,000; but under the rules for the Mofussil Civil Courts he will obtain only 4,000 rupees. The difference between the actual cost incurred and the latter sum will be a dead loss to him. Since the plaintiff's side was represented by counsel, Mr. Byrámji could not defend himself with the aid of ordinary pleaders, but was forced to engage the services of barristers. Mr. Byrámji is a wealthy gentleman and can therefore afford to bear the loss of such a sum with equanimity; but it would have been complete ruin to an ordinary landholder. This is a fearful state of things. The Government officials have nothing to lose and in trumpery cases might unnecessarily harass people. Before filing such suits against landholders Government ought to ascertain from their Solicitor the equity of the claim and then act on his advice. If not for his own sake, at least for that of the landholders in general, Mr. Byrámji should submit the question of costs to Government or seek the opinion of the High Court.

Disapproves of the policy of allowing the erection of buildings on the Kennedy Sea-face.

The Indu Prakásh (9) of the 12th November, in an article headed "Building Sites in Bombay," refers to the protest of the municipal authorities against the proposal of Government to sell the land reclaimed by the Back Bay Company between the Charni Road and Marine Lines stations on the west of the railway line, and says:—On the solution of this question will depend the future well-being of a large mass of our population. If the land is let out or sold for the erection of buildings it will give increased healthy accommodation to the well-to-do classes. If, on the other hand, the land is reserved for purposes of recreation as at present, it will continue to give health and strength to a large number of people in the middle condition of life and in poor circumstances. The question is then narrowed to this: which of these courses will tend to the greatest happiness of the greatest number? The sort of buildings that will be raised on the proposed sites will unquestionably be very dear, and will be altogether unsuitable on the score of rents for either the middle or the poorer classes,—the very classes which, according to the census returns, are at present most in need of increased accommodation. It is the wealthy people alone, the aristocratic part of the community so to say, who will be able to avail themselves of the new opportunities, whether for building or hiring houses, and for them the present aristocratic quarters on the Malabár Hill, the Cumbála Hill, Mahálakshmi, Parel and Chinchpugli are not insufficient,—at all events, the proposed sites will not be a great addition to their accommodation. Much is said about the rise of rents, but we venture to doubt if the present rate of rent will be appreciably lowered by building a few additional houses on the Back Bay. The rise of rents is an inevitable consequence of the increase of population. The available area for building purposes in Bombay is comparatively circumscribed, and the house-owners enjoy a sort of monopoly. We are not sure how far that monopoly will be broken by the construction of half a dozen structures on the spot in question. Further, the available area for building purposes in the above localities and at other places, such as Chowpáti, Marine Lines and Colába, is not yet exhausted. In fact the space at the three last-mentioned places is much greater than the one now proposed to be disposed of, and will be open to none of the objections that attach to the present scheme. Khán Báhádur Mancherji Kávasji Murzbán, who posed himself as a staunch advocate of the scheme at the Corporation meeting on the 2nd instant, put the case for Government as strongly as possible, although he disclaimed being a representative of Government. The Executive Engineer eloquently dwelt upon the evils of crowded living, the want of suitable house-sites, and the necessity of having large open courts in the midst of crowded thoroughfares. But he altogether omitted to consider which were the classes most affected by dense living, and which classes are the most likely to be benefited by converting Back Bay into a little town. He repudiated the idea that the city could admit of expansion on any other side than the west, and he fixed upon the land at Back Bay as the only available spot on that side suitable for the purpose. We fail to see why the city should not expand on the Mahálakshmi, the Varli and the Parel sides, and why the land at Back Bay should be the only site available for new buildings. With respect to the sites on the west, we think those at Chowpáti, Marine Lines and Colába may be more advantageously utilized first than those at Back Bay. As regards the sites on the north, we know there are at present some unsavoury associations connected with those parts, but it is impossible to believe that those associations will be permanent. Already endeavours are being made to explore the Byculla Flats, and we may expect that within a few weeks the committee which visited the place last Tuesday will suggest some modus vivendi as regards those noisome quarters. The mills that have arisen and are rising there may be expected to attract large numbers of settlers in those parts, and if the mill-owners adopt the suggestion of some benevolent people with respect to building cháls and so forth for the accommodation of their operatives, they will be giving real relief to those very people who at present live in crowded localities and on whose behalf the present question is ostensibly raised. If it is intended to relieve poor people from the pressure of dense living and on whom the pressure is the greatest, Byculla and Varli are in our opinion better fitted to serve the end than Back Bay. If, on the other hand, the intention is to widen the scope of accommodation for the rich, who are said to be pressed with high rents, Back Bay will give very small relief. The picture painted by the Executive Engineer of Malabár Point and Colába being joined and a small flourishing suburb with broad roads and large courts stretching along the plain is to our mind purely imaginary. The Back Bay reclamation is a Herculean task. Our former experiences in connection with it have not been altogether happy. That a second attempt will ever be made to finish the enterprise of the Back Bay Company seems to us not within the bounds of probability. Mr. Murzbán is sanguine, and so is our local contemporary, the Times, that under more favourable auspices and with better management the task may be accomplished. We should cry, Amen. But let us wait until that work is done. When we get an accession of all the expanse of the Back Bay to our little island, there will be time enough to think what use should be made of it. At present the small space that is in our possession we can ill spare for the purposes proposed, and in so devoting it we do but a small service to the richer classes and no service at all to the middle and the poorer classes. Nay, we shall be doing a positive disservice to the latter two classes by snatching from them their evening draught of pure air and recreation. If in our anxiety to provide increased accommodation for living we give away the land at Back Bay to be built upon, we shall not only not relieve the sufferings of those classes who most suffer from the evils of crowded living, but we shall take away from them one blessing, we mean, their evening resort for free open air. Their misery from crowded living will thus be aggravated, while the only class which will be benefited by the concession will not be very grateful for it, because the concession will not be large enough. We fully admit the necessity of finding out new building-sites, but, we think, so long as other sites are available our poor people should not be deprived of the land which they have been accustomed to look upon as their own. On the contrary, we would suggest that on the land proposed to be given away for building purposes a fine garden should be laid out like the one behind the Charni Road station. The people frequenting the spot will then have veritable enjoyment. We think with Messrs. Geary and Javerilál that the sites at the Marine Lines and Colába should be first utilized, and that the Back Bay should not be trenched upon until all other sites are exhausted.

The Bombay Samáchár (87) of the 12th November observes that the complaint made about the want of space for erecting new edifices for providing airy houses for the well-to-do and wealthy classes may be removed by utilizing the numerous vacant spots that are scattered in different parts of the island. Between the New Secretariat and Lower Colába there is considerable vacant ground forming part of the esplanade and of the Back Bay reclamations, and this space, if utilized for building purposes, will provide room for a large number of bungalows for the habitation of Europeans and wealthy Natives. The thatch-roofed bungalows in the Marine Lines may be removed and conveniently replaced by pucka-built houses. In Girgaum considerable space is occupied by the cocoanut plantations; there is much vacant land on the Chowpáti along the foot of Malabár Hill, and on the hill itself many more bungalows can be built. On both sides of the Pedder Road on the Cumbála Hill extensive plots of ground are lying vacant; and in parts of the Malabár Hill and Breach Candy seashores land can be reclaimed from the sea at a trifling expense. All these localities will provide more than ample ground for building sites for those who desire to live in airy houses. For the poor classes the Byculla Flats will, if properly reclaimed, furnish extensive accommodation for erecting buildings. Two things, however, prevent the moneyed classes from utilizing the vacant localities, namely, the high price of Government land and of building materials. Government ought to reduce the exorbitant price at which they propose to sell land. If this is done the owners of private properties would be compelled to lower the value of their land. Government should also ascertain through their officers whence cheap building materials can be procured and should publish the information for the benefit of the public. If these two things are done, capitalists will come forward to erect new buildings for the accommodation of well-to-do as well as poor classes. [The Jáme Jamshed (101) of the same date expresses some of the above sentiments.]

Building sites for new houses, and remarks in connection therewith.

The Arunodayá (14) of the 11th November alludes to the manner in which the land tax is increased on a revision of the revenue settlements, and observes that it is glad to learn from a reliable source that the present Survey Commissioner has written to Government that constant revision of the land revenue assessments is neither good nor desirable. He has also suggested that the Survey establishments should be done away with and a few measurers only should be retained in each táluka to settle boundary disputes. The Arunodayá states that Natives believe that the Survey Department is kept up merely to give employment to a certain number of Europeans who are appointed by nomination. The people will rejoice when the Survey Department becomes a thing of the past. The land will then regain its fertility and India will then really become what it once was—a very rich country. The Arunodayá strongly advocates that the land tax should be settled in perpetuity.

Approves of the abolition of the Revenue Survey Department as suggested by the Survey Commissioner.

With reference to the death of a child and the dangerous wound received by its mother from the shots fired by some sepoys of the 23rd N. I., who were at target practice at Ahmedabad on the 12th instant, the Bombay Samáchár (87) of the 15th November asks, who was it that made the arrangement for the target practice near fields which were frequented by people? Did the civil authorities notice the carrying on of the practice at the objectionable spot? If there was no other appropriate place, was any man placed to warn the people not to come behind the target within range of the shots? Wherever target practice is carried on, the authorities of that place ought to take due precautions to prevent such sad accidents as recently occurred at Ahmedabad.

Says that due precautions should be taken to prevent the recurrence of such sad accidents from target practice as recently occurred at Ahmedabad.

The Native Opinion (10) of the 11th November says that during the Diváli and the Moharram the police authorities used their power rather too strictly. During the Diváli police peons entered the compounds of dwellings and dragged to the police stations several men of respectability and position. If people are liable to be apprehended merely for letting off fire-works, then it is unaccountable why licenses should be given to open an immense number of shops for the sale of those articles. Are licenses to open shops for the sale of fire-works given freely because of the money which they bring into the treasury of Government? The Native Opinion considers that the action of the police in freely allowing the opening of shops and afterwards seizing people for letting off fire-works, which are sold in those shops, is most tyrannical. It is to be hoped that Government will interfere on future occasions and place a curb on the policy of the Bombay police.

Says that the conduct of the Bombay police in freely allowing the opening of shops for the sale of fire-works and afterwards seizing people for letting them off in their compounds is most tyrannical.

Complains of an increase of burglaries at Bandora.

The Akhbáre Sodágar (82) of the 14th November observes that compared with the large population of Bandora there are few policemen to protect the property of the people, and the consequence is that burglaries on dark nights have become common. The residents have been complaining of this state of things for some time past, but the authorities do not appear to have paid any attention to their complaints. Highway robberies also sometimes occur. It is to be regretted that though the municipality of this town earns a large income, yet it has done nothing to remove the complaints.

A case of police oppression at Vengurla.

The Vengurla Vritt (70) of the 8th November publishes in its columns a letter signed by one Párvati, wife of Shiva Zima Navár. Párvati states that on the 12th October last she was going by the "Ubhádánda Road" to the market to sell fish. When near Dábholkar's Váda she was asked the price of the fish which she had. On not coming to terms she put her basket on her head and was proceeding, when the police pátil, Ganesh Pándurang Dábholkar, put up one Bábáji Khanduji Pharjan to lay a complaint against her of having used abusive language to him and ordered him to take away the basket forcibly. In addition to this tyranny she was convicted without being allowed to make her defence and sentenced to twenty-two hours' imprisonment. The police pátil further sent the basket, with fish in it, to the third class magistrate (Aval-Kárkun) as property without an owner. The basket and its contents were ultimately thrown away as rubbish. The woman bitterly complains of the ill-treatment to which she has been subjected and asks for redress.

Requests the police of Surat to ascertain the cause of the sudden death of a Pársi lad.

A correspondent of the Bombay Samáchár (87) of the 17th November states that last Tuesday one Pársi boy teased another Pársi boy named Pálanji, the son of Kávasji Shápurji Veláti, a resident of Rastampara in the city of Surat, and took him outside the Mán gate. On the mother of Pálanji receiving some information from the lads who had accompanied the two boys, she went in search of her son and found him lying near the Mahomedan burial-ground in a half-conscious state. The boy was brought home and remedies were applied for his recovery, but he died the next day. Enquiries were made by the parents of the boy, but the latter could not say what caused his illness. The police ought to enquire into the matter.

Careless conduct of the police patel of Ránder in the matter of a corpse.

The Gujarát Mitra (76) of the 11th November observes that the corpse of a young Hindu woman having been recently discovered near the Mofussil Company's factory at Ránder, the engineer of the factory gave information about it to the police patel. The coroner's jury who viewed the corpse recommended that it should be subjected to a post-mortem examination, but the police patel did not order this, nor was the doctor who was to make that examination to be found, as he had gone to Surat. At 11 o'clock at night the corpse was carelessly interred, but was dug out by dogs and other animals before day-break the next day. The corpse emitted a foul smell. The patel was informed of this, but he again had it carelessly buried. The authorities concerned ought to call upon the patel to give an explanation of his conduct in this matter.

Says that Colonel Barton did not deserve the address presented to him by the Native Chiefs of Káthiáwár.

In noticing the congratulatory address presented to, but not accepted by, Colonel Barton by the Native Chiefs of Káthiáwár, the Yajdán Parast (124) of the 11th November observes that the Colonel did not do any such meritorious act in the capacity of Political Agent as to deserve the address. Most of the Chiefs who signed that document probably did not know its contents. The most interesting part of the farce is that though the persons who wished to present the address and the gentleman to whom it was to be presented met together with the intention of carrying out their respective objects, and though the address was read and a reply to it was given, yet Colonel Barton refused to accept it on the plea that it could not be received by an officer of Government without previously obtaining its sanction. How was it that the Colonel did not remember the Government prohibition until after the address was read to him and his reply was given? It seems that he wishes the public to infer that he did not receive the address though it was read to him and his reply was given and although a report of the proceedings appeared in public print. Government ought to take due notice of the Colonel's conduct. [The Kaiser-i-Hind (104) of the same date is also of opinion that the Colonel did not deserve the address.]

Legislation.—The Native Magistrates' Jurisdiction Bill.

Does not object to the modifications suggested by Lord Northbrook in the Native Magistrates' Jurisdiction Bill.

In noticing the compromise suggested by Lord Northbrook in regard to the Native Magistrates' Jurisdiction Bill, the Bombay Samáchár (87) of the 16th November observes that the modification suggested by His Lordship that the power to try Europeans should be conferred upon Native District Magistrates or Session Judges alone is unobjectionable in so far as it leads the way to the further extension of the concession. The other change mentioned by His Lordship would give the right to a European or a Native to get his case transferred from a Native to a European magistrate or to the High Court; but since the concession is proposed for the purpose of pacifying the excited Europeans, Natives would forego it if the Jurisdiction Bill be passed without any modification. However, Natives would not hesitate to accept both the modifications if the Viceroy and the authorities in England desire that the Bill should be modified. The people will be glad if notwithstanding the modifications the principle of the Bill is allowed to remain intact. [The Jáme Jamshed (101) of the same date expresses similar sentiments.]

Education.

Says that the Senate of the Bombay University ought to conduct its business with open doors.

The Jáme Jamshed (101) of the 13th November observes that the Senate of the Bombay University ought no longer to carry on its business with closed doors and ought to admit the press reporters to its consultations. The publication of University discussions, in which the educated Natives take so much interest, cannot but prove beneficial to the public, and ought no longer to be withheld. The Senate of the Madras University conducts its business with open doors, and interesting reports of its work are published in the newspapers of that presidency.

Objects to the appointment of Professor Pedraza as an examiner in French at the coming Matriculation Examination of the Bombay University.

The same of the 12th November observes that Professor Pedraza teaches the French language in the Cathedral High School, John Connon School and the Scottish School, and four students of these institutions will, it is said, present themselves at the coming Matriculation Examination. If this be true, it is not right that the Professor should examine his own students in French as one of the examiners at the Matriculation. Though the Professor's impartiality be beyond question, yet it would be unjust to other candidates than the Professor's pupils that he should be their examiner. It is desirable, therefore, that his nomination as examiner in French should be cancelled and some other gentleman appointed in his place.

Railways.

Finds fault with the arangements made on the Church Gate, Marine Lines nd Charni Road stations

A correspondent of the Bombay Samáchár (87) of the 16th and 17th November describes at great length the various inconveniences suffered by the travelling public on the B. B. & C. I. Railway at the Church Gate, Marine Lines and Charni Road stations on account of there being very of the B. B. & C. I. Railway in connection with the booking offices and receipt of parcels and luggage.

few persons to issue tickets and receive passengers' luggage, parcels and goods, and requests Colonel Bonus, the Consulting Engineer to the railway, to increase the number of luggage or parcel clerks at each of these stations. The correspondent recommends the arrangements made on the G. I. P. Railway in these matters to the favourable consideration of Colonel Bonus.

Native States.

Recommends the deposition of the Chief of Nándod.

After alluding to the misunderstanding that has arisen between the Chief of Nándod and his eldest son Chhatrasing, the Gujarát Mitrá (76) of the 11th November observes that the Chief is said to have recently employed some persons in his service from each of whom he has received a nazrána of about two thousand rupees. Since several complaints have been made against the oppression practised by the Chief, it seems but just that he should be deposed and Chhatrasing put on the gádi. The young prince should then be sent to the Rájkumár College to be educated, and in the meanwhile the paramount Government should administer the State.

Complains of the scarcity of water at Tharád.

A correspondent of the Hitechchhu (77) of Ahmedabad of the 15th November points out the great misery suffered by the people and cattle of Tharád owing to the scarcity of water, and remarks that while the State was under attachment Mr. Nabhulál Nahánálálbhái, the attachment officer, constructed a reservoir in connection with the only well in the State and thus greatly reduced the sufferings of the people. But as no care was taken of the reservoir after the State came into the hands of the Thákor, it has become useless and the inhabitants are again suffering from the same want. The people do not mind wearing dirty clothes, but they have to put up with a great deal of inconvenience and trouble in procuring water for their cattle. The ryots take their cattle to Malupur, a village situated at a distance of two miles from Tharád. Many persons also go to this village to wash their clothes. It is much to be regretted that the Thákor should pass his days in pleasure, while his subjects are suffering. The Thákor and his advisers ought to attend to this matter.

Berár Affairs.

Says that the High School at Akola should be removed to a building near the town.

The Varhád Samáchár (67) of the 12th November points out the great inconvenience and trouble which the students of the Akola High School living in the town, who form about three-fourths of the entire number, suffer on account of the school building being far away from the town, and remarks:—We cannot for a moment suppose that a man with any common sense in him would not revolt at the idea of young boys having to walk a long distance at midday. Government should not look only to the education of the boys but should attend to the preservation of their health also, without which nothing can be expected from a man. The Director of Public Instruction can now without any trouble secure a building sufficiently good and spacious for the High School and much nearer to the town than that in which it is at present located, and especially at a time when Government seems inclined to have the school permanently located in the barracks, as it has been turning them into rooms convenient for the school. We hope the Head Master of the school will take up the subject and represent the grievance of a large number of his pupils to the Director of Public Instruction. If that officer declines to move in the matter, we hope he (Mr. Aitken) will carry the matter before the higher authorities and afford relief to the distressed dumb creatures.

A grievance of the uncovenanted servants of the G. I. P. Railway Company.

The same refers to the rules recently framed by the Traffic Manager of the G. I. P. Railway Company for granting leave to the uncovenanted servants of the company, and remarks:—A mere glance at them not only surprises us but makes us laugh outright. Instead of ameliorating in any way the condition of the railway employés, these rules have made matters worse. In the whole year the employés, who enjoy no holidays whatever, are to be allowed only ten days' leave! It is truly a marvel and a quite adequate reward to those who often have to work at the expense of their health, the staff being inadequate! We do not know how long the railway company means to try the patience of its servants. If the Manager does not attend to this grievance, we are afraid a large body of the employés will betake themselves to other lines that have some regard for the interests of their servants and that treat them as human beings. We hope Mr. Keily will mend matters before it is too late. The adoption of the leave rules made by the B. B. & C. I. Railway Company will satisfy the employés and remove their discontent. We advise the railway servants not to become so reproachfully submissive. They should shake off their accustomed lethargy and represent in a body their grievance to the Manager,—nay to the highest authority,—and ask for redress.

Notes.—A. The notices from the different Newspapers have been collected in the Report under different heads, which are printed in italics.

B. The names of Newspapers are printed in the body of the Report in italics, and the number of the Newspaper in the above list is printed in brackets after the name.

C. The proprietors of the Newspapers marked * have not given information as to the number of copies issued. In these cases an estimate has been made by the Reporter.

D. The system of spelling vernacular words followed by the Reporter is the same as that adopted in the Official Spelling List of the Bombay Presidency. One peculiar feature of this system is that when the long a (आ or á) is the last letter of a word, the accent is left out, and the short a (अ = u in gun) is, to prevent confusion, never placed at the end of a word. This rule has been strictly followed, except that when the short a appears to be absolutely necessary to complete the pronunciation of a word, as in Arunodaya or the well known Mitra, it is printed with a mark over it to indicate that it is short, thus—ā.

E. Berár papers are received in this office for report under the Resolution of the Government of Bombay in the General Department, No. 1795, dated 8th June 1881.

Politics and the Public Administration.

Some remarks on Indian political questions in connection with Sir James Stephen's opinions on government in India.

In noticing Sir James Stephen's article on "The Foundations of the Government of India" in the Nineteenth Century, the Native Opinion (10) of the 18th November says:— No man with a sane head on his shoulders will doubt that a representative government in India on the scale of the British Parliamentary government is for many years to come an impossibility; but this does not afford any warrant for saying that on that account the political progress of a nation should be allowed to stagnate. Sir James Stephen indeed seems to think that the surest means of keeping things as they are for an indefinite period of time is to keep the natives of this country in perpetual ignorance about political matters. He regrets that instruction in politics should have been injudiciously introduced into the education of a Baboo. Such an illiberal and selfish policy, had it been pursued a quarter of a century ago, might have perhaps produced the wished-for result; but under the present circumstances, when people have tasted the sweets of Western civilization, any such attempt would be certainly unwise, as being far from likely to meet with success. Indeed the most effective way of achieving this object would have been, as Lord Macaulay said, to have shut the door of Western education to the natives of this country from the beginning. But if, as is pretended, the introduction of Western civilization be the chief task of the English in India, it is difficult to see how the principal item of that civilization can be permanently withheld from the sons of the soil. If Natives show in any distinct way that they really and on their own account wish for representative institutions, Mr. Justice Stephen would let them have them by all means; but he would spare no efforts to keep the Natives away from such a wish as if it were a curse. The consistency of the two views is not quite obvious to our mind. If the Government of India be progressive, the time is not far distant when representative powers on a moderate scale may be safely granted to Natives. Mr. Justice Stephen sees extreme danger in the communication of the disposition characteristic of the English to the natives of India. This does not appear to be a proposition which everyone can accept without a demur. If English literature and history is to be taught to Indian youths, it is impossible to do so without dissipating a part of their inactivity and infusing a craving for scope for action. If the change be gradual, the danger of such a change of national instinct seems to us chimerical. Sir James Stephen is opposed to any gratuitous change in the government. So are we; but we differ from him when he advances the complacent hackneyed view of the party of ascendency that the present change is not called for by the people at large. We may assure him that the few Baboos that he speaks of are not the only persons who take interest in political matters, and that the demonstrations of a wish for change on the part of Natives are not likely to be wanting. As for the ignorant masses, we do not think that they form the whole population of the country, nor are we hopeless of their improvement. Our readers may have some idea of how public opinion is formed even in a country like England from an article in the October number of the North American Review headed "Some aspects of Democracy in England." As the writer himself tells us of England, the majority of electors are ignorant people, and it is indeed the educated minority that have anything to do with politics in any country. Mr. Justice Stephen is never tired of telling us that the main task of the English in India is the welfare of the community, but this welfare according to his idea must always be subordinated to the interests of the rulers. In conclusion, Sir James Stephen gives a few words of advice to his injudicious brethren and winds up with an answer to the argument that the cause of the helpless masses of India must be taken up in England as against the tyrannically disposed Anglo-Indians. In the presence of the English voters and their leaders, says he ingeniously enough, the Englishmen in India are weak and helpless if the voters in England differ from them, and that is why they ought to have support from the mother-country, apparently without any regard to the justice or otherwise of the cause of the helpless Anglo-Indians. We do not know what to make of such an argument, and will leave it to our readers to follow it as best as they can.

The Arunodayă (13) of the 18th November says that it was stated in some newspaper that Messrs. Hermann and Jones were deprived of their property by robbers while travelling through the territory of the Rája of Dhrol in Káthiáwár, and on the two merchants complaining of their loss to the Political Agent that officer fined the Rája in the sum of one thousand rupees on account of the inefficiency of his police. If this statement be true, says the Arunodayă, then it is quite evident what tremendous power is wielded by political officers in charge of Native States and to what degradation Native princes have been reduced. But in these civilized times it is the fashion to bring into prominence the faults of others and to hide one's own shortcomings. In English territory innumerable robberies are daily committed and immense loss of property is suffered by people. But of course no one ventures to blame Government for the inefficiency of its police or to demand compensation for the deprivation of property. The Native princes are however fined for a similar fault.

Contrasts the policy of the British Government in regard to its own shortcomings and to the shortcomings of Native princes.

The Surat Akhbár (80) of the 19th November says that from the Administration Report of India for 1881-82 the London Times considers India prosperous and the majority of the people happy. But according to the recent census returns half the population of India is without employment. It appears that the Times has given a rosy account of the condition of the people with a view to show that India was prosperous only before the advent of Lord Ripon to power in this country and thus to disparage his administration. No one can deny that Lord Ripon has the welfare of the people at heart. It entirely depends upon His Lordship whether he will leave the country covered with honours or not, but the statement put forward by the Times that the poor were happy before he became Viceroy is untrue. Though the English have prevented dire famines, increased trade, and given security of life and property, and though they deserve thanks for all these blessings, they have brought about a great change which should not be left unnoticed. Articles of food were very cheap before the British rule began in this country, and hence even people without employment were able to maintain themselves. But now thousands of poor and unemployed men starve. This state of things has been brought about during the last quarter of a century by the great changes that have taken place, by the enactment of various laws, and by the imposition of numerous taxes. Though dire famines have been prevented, there is now a perpetual scarcity in the land. Articles of food, such as grain and ghee, have become dear. The poor are the sufferers.

Says that during the last quarter of a century articles of food have become very dear.

The Indian Spectator (1) of the 18th November says:—To those who have carefully studied Sir Evelyn Baring's paper in the Nineteenth Century on "Recent events in India" it will be clear that the portion most open to adverse criticism is that in which he expresses his belief as to the impossibility at present of effecting any large economy by employing Natives in the place of Europeans. In one of our previous issues we have pointed out that there is no real danger or difficulty in the extended employment of Natives in high offices. Sir Evelyn is of opinion that the economy to be effected by substituting Native for European agency is often much overrated. In the first place Sir Evelyn attempts to show by statistics that the number of Europeans and Natives employed at the present moment is about equal. The table of figures is the same that was put into use when expounding his financial statement for 1881-82. Now we must say it is rather misleading to inform the British public that the Government of India finds employment for Natives and Europeans in equal numbers. It is surprising that in the face of the table such a statement should have been made. When there are only 12 Natives in the covenanted service to 861 Europeans, the facts stands revealed as to what encouragement Government has offered hitherto to Indians competing for the covenanted service, though the system of competitive examination commenced 28 years ago. But Sir Evelyn's new theory becomes even more misleading when we compare the number of Europeans and Natives in the uncovenanted service. It is true that the number of the latter is nearly double that of the former. But it must be remembered that the majority of the 2,012 Natives are on salaries averaging Rs. 2,000 per annum. In fact, had Sir Evelyn furnished a detailed analysis of those earning a salary of, say, from 2,000 to 6,000 rupees and those between 6,000 and 12,000 rupees, and lastly those above Rs. 12,000, the impartial public might have seen at a glance how far the employment of Natives in higher offices is a fact and how far a figment. On the other hand an equally detailed analysis of the 1,197 Europeans might have shown what salaries they get compared with the Natives. Nay, even the aggregate amount of salaries respectively earned by the two classes would have put the whole case in a better light. So far then the table of statistics furnished is misleading as well as unfair. The return which was presented to Parliament in 1879 on the motion of Mr. Bright ought to have been freely quoted. A comparison of that authoritative analysis with Sir Evelyn's bald table of statistics would show at a glance the justice of our observations. The next point is Sir Evelyn's statement that the pay of Europeans in India is no doubt high but not higher than warranted by circumstances. He is of opinion that by reducing their salaries India will not get competent men. He is obliged to confess that the pay is high, yet he would not make a reduction, inasmuch as he thinks less able men might get into the service. He observes that the question of salaries of Europeans is simply one of demand and supply. Is it not a fact that the demand is limited while the supply is illimitable? Is it not so all over the civilized world? Are not competent men, perhaps more competent than the competitionwállás who are annually imported from England, to be had from Europe and America on lower salaries than those which are now paid to our heaven-born hierarchy? Do not competent and well qualified Civilians accept posts of Governors of colonies and dependencies on less remuneration? That such is the fact may be learnt from the salaries allowed to the Governors of Ceylon, Canada, Australia, the Cape of Good Hope, Mauritius and other places. Surely if Sir Bartle Frere thought it worth while to serve as Governor of the Cape, having a large native population like that of India, on Rs. 7,000 per month after having served as Governor of Bombay on Rs. 10,000 a month, can there be the least doubt that if the supply of European agency in India is obtained on the principle of free trade we might get equally good men on reduced salaries? Look at the Ceylon service. Ceylon has almost an Indian climate and a population that is essentially Indian. Are Civilians in that island paid anything like the salaries in India? Again all over the world there is a struggle for existence, and the best educated ability is to be had for reasonable pay, even after making fair allowances for Indian climate and expatriation and so on, though even the last theory is already exploded. The Suez Canal has revolutionized Indian trade and Anglo-Indian society. What with regular daily telegraphic service and a weekly mail, there is nothing like the privation to which English Civilians were subject 50 years ago. Further, are they not at their wits' end in England as to what to do with their boys? Surely, when all these considerations of supply are borne in mind it will be rash to deny that there is room for reduction. Suppose the Government of India revised the salaries all round by making reduction by one-third, are we to understand that competent men,—as competent as those now to be had,—would not be forthcoming? If only the Americans were asked to compete, we should find that for one vacancy there would be as many as a dozen competitors at the least. According to Sir Evelyn's own dictum, the law of supply and demand will bring men to India on reduced salaries, and that without the least fear of incompetency. As has been said by Mr. Knight in his supplementary memorandum on India, no error could be more fatal than the prevailing one that the Indian Civil Service may be regarded as an epitome and reflection of the English nation. That is simply a delusion. A time will come when the question of effecting a reduction in salaries will force itself on the attention of the Supreme Government. Every evil brings its own cure. And the evil of overgrown civil and military expenditure will certainly tell on the finances of the empire. What we say then is that, apart from the question of the salaries enjoyed by Europeans, there is every reason from the point of economy that the limit of one-sixth for the Statutory Civil Service should be extended to one-half. We say, by all means have a European agency, but only up to a reasonable limit. Let them be paid as high as you please. But at the same time do not commit so grave an injustice as almost to debar the children of the soil from aspiring to high offices. Let their reasonable aspirations be satisfied. And for such satisfaction we think one-half a fair limit. The very law of demand and supply should teach our Government to look to Native agency for carrying on the administration of the empire. It will not do to say 2,000 Natives are employed on an average monthly salary of Rs. 200 when 2,000 Europeans are employed on an average monthly salary of Rs. 1,800. This would be grievous and intolerable injustice. Pay the 1,000 Europeans Rs. 1,800 as now; but it is unjust to keep up for any considerable length of time the present anomaly. It may here be profitably observed what the Government of India thinks about the civil expenses of the empire and the general poverty of the people. The Spectator gives extracts from the letter of the Government of India to the Secretary of State for India dated 1st September 1882 with regard to the cost of the Indian contingent for the Egyptian Expedition, and proceeds:—Have the circumstances of India so far changed within the short space of 14 months that Sir Evelyn Baring, who has put his signature to the above despatch with his colleagues, could write with so light a heart that with the view to economy European agency should not be reduced to a moderate limit? Again, if his theory of supply and demand is to be considered, can it not be safely asserted that competent Native agency will not be forthcoming in sufficiently large numbers to take the place of the one which it may supersede? And yet Sir Evelyn would now deprecate any economy. While replying, in its despatch dated Simla 8th June 1880, to the memorandum on the condition of India submitted by Mr. Caird to Lord Hartington, the Government of Lord Lytton observed as follows in connection with the Civil Service and extended employment of Natives:—"In accordance with the orders of Her Majesty's Government, rules have been passed and published whereby about one-sixth of the higher appointments in the Covenanted Civil Service will be gradually filled by natives of India. It is estimated that the saving secured by this reduction in the higher European staff will, if the scheme comes fully into operation, amount to 22 lákhs of rupees." Is this saving to be despised in the present condition of India? Did not Lord Ripon's administration point out only 14 months ago how people were situated and how Government were handicapped for want of funds to improve the condition of the masses, to spend more on primary education, to increase the annual outlay on productive public works, and so forth? Has it not again pointedly drawn the attention of the home authorities to the danger to which some important sources of Indian revenue are exposed? And in the teeth of these gloomy declarations we are told by Sir Evelyn Baring that any additional economy in the higher European agency would be a mistake! According to the suggestion we have made for limiting the number of annual admissions to the Statutory Civil Service to one-half instead of one-third, the total saving on the basis of the estimate formed by Lord Lytton's Government may come to Rs. 61,00,000 when the scheme is in full operation. Is the sum of half a million sterling immaterial to the Indian Finance Minister, who often congratulates the public when he has even half this amount to announce as a surplus? What cannot half a million do for some of the purposes for which the Supreme Government says it is now famished? Is it statesmanship in the present condition of India to discard the saving of half a million which will ultimately result by the reform we are urging? The fact is, as we have said over and over again, that there is a deep rooted reluctance on the part of the powerful bureaucracy which environs the Government of India to do anything more for the extended employment of Natives in the higher offices of the administration. All their talk about present inexpediency and danger is unreal and hollow.

Points out the necessity of extensively employing Natives in the higher offices of the administration and of increasing the number of annual admissions to the Statutory Civil Service.

Says that cooly labour should be utilized in colonising waste or sparsely populated tracts in India itself instead of supplying it to foreign countries.

The Native Opinion (10) of the 18th November, in writing on the emigration of coolies from India to foreign countries, remarks:—It is the duty of Government, which suggested emigration as a remedy for overpopulated and poverty-stricken districts, to see that coolies are protected after they leave this country and are not reduced by heartless planters to a state of slavery, which makes their return impossible after the expiration of their contract. Unfortunately it would require a far more extensive machinery than the mere appointment of a Protector of Emigrants in each colony to guarantee the coolies from ill-treatment and from a position not different from actual slavery. Interested persons are very fond of now and then publishing accounts in newspapers of the sums of money brought back to India by the returned Indian coolies, but they are entirely reticent about the thousands who continue in the colonies to drag out a miserable life of poverty, from which death alone relieves them. In Mauritius restraints have been imposed upon planters inclined to act in an oppressive and illegal manner, but only after it had become necessary to appoint a royal commission for investigating the tyranny of the planters which had been brought to the notice of the Home Government. The labour ordinances were altered to relieve the most crying evils the coolies suffered from, and made their employers only more circumspect. The case was, however, far worse in the island of Reunion, and the Indian Government having to deal with a foreign power could effect no change; accordingly Lord Ripon totally suspended the supply of Indian labour to that island, because the French authorities would not listen to the representations of the Protector of Emigrants. Thus it would appear that if coolies emigrate they ought at any rate to prefer to go to British rather than to French colonies. The time is perhaps not very far distant when the Indian Government will perceive that the throwing away of so much labour in foreign parts is a great loss to this country, and that large tracts of waste land are waiting in many parts of India to be broken up by the plough. British Burmah, Assam and the Central Provinces have so scanty a population that they could easily absorb the many thousands of coolies who now spend their energies in foreign parts and suffer great hardships. As it is probably impossible to devise in practice a scheme of absolute protection from oppression in foreign countries, it would be more profitable for the coolies and also for the revenues of Government if it could set on foot a scheme for colonising the waste or sparsely populated tracts in India itself. It is a mistake to suppose that this country is overpopulated when extensive tracts of it, which might be made to supply food and to yield revenue, are lying uncultivated.

Remarks in connection with the question of what should be considered the flashing point of petroleum oil imported into India.

The Indian Spectator (1) of the 18th November says:—In the Gazette of India of the 10th instant there appears a long series of papers embracing the results of the investigations instituted by the Supreme Government in consequence of the controversy last year touching the definition of what should be considered as the flashing point of petroleum oil imported into India. We fear the results will scarcely be considered satisfactory or as finally settling this vexed question. It seems that the importers and dealers are of one opinion, while the scientific experts are of another. It will be recollected that Government referred the test controversy to the Secretary of State for India. Sir F. Abel was again requested to give his opinion, bearing in mind the hardship and loss inflicted on Indian merchants by adherence to the scientific standard test. Dr. Lyon of the Grant Medical College at Bombay, who happened to be on privilege leave in England, assisted Sir F. Abel in his investigations. But it seems the great chemist adhered to his former recommendation to raise the standard to 78° Fah. This, however, is objected to by the Indian committee of commercial experts, while two of its members dissent from the general conclusions arrived at by it. The committee is of opinion that no undue precautions need be taken while cargoes of petroleum oil are being landed and stored away. The trade, which is increasing in volume by leaps and bounds, should not be hampered. Mr. Keefe is very strong on the point. But we are afraid he "protests too much." No doubt real hardships to which the trade may be exposed by a too rigid adherence to the higher standard recommended by Professor Abel should be mitigated so far as is consistent with public safety. The resolution proposes that the 73° standard be maintained. At the same time we are of opinion that the Supreme Government should take every precaution against being imposed upon by what is an open secret touching the "tricks" of the petroleum trade. Importers are selfish and sometimes their zeal for their own interest is far too inconsistent with mercantile morality; and therefore there is much of truth in what Mr. Warden has observed. We like his plain language albeit a trifle too strong. We agree with him that claptrap and verbiage regarding killing the trade, depriving the teeming millions of Hindustan of light by demanding an oil which shall fully satisfy the requirements of our Indian Petroleum Act may be taken for what they are worth. Fresh legislation now to be introduced will revive the controversy. The different Chambers of Commerce are sure to lead a combined attack upon Government. By all means let the trade have additional facilities for testing the oil to the legal standard degree. Let all real hardships involving pecuniary loss be obviated. But the authorities should make a determined stand against the provisions for storage. These must be made stringent enough in the interests of public safety, which alone necessitates adherence to the higher test standard in this country.

Strongly recommends Government to relax the stringency of the Arms Act.

The Native Opinion (10) of the 18th November, in a paragraph headed "The Arms Act once more," says:—Will Government do anything by way of relaxing the stringent restraints put upon the possession of arms by the natives of the country? The last issue of the report on the destruction of wild animals shows no perceptible decrease in the number of persons killed by tigers and other beasts of prey. With the increase of forests their number must also increase, making the safety of people, particularly agriculturists, living in the remoter corners of the country quite precarious. It is in the interests of these people that the stringency of this wretched enactment requires to be removed. In cities or large towns the ferocity of these creatures cannot be felt; but in remote villages they often carry away sheep and cattle, to the great consternation of the inhabitants, even before sunset. Such a state of things cannot be passed unnoticed; morally, socially and even politically the disarmament of a people is inexpedient. Will Government, we again ask, look into this question and feel its way towards the solution of this great difficulty?

Some remarks about the ill-feeling caused between Europeans and Natives by the agitation consequent on the discussion in regard to the Native Magistrates' Jurisdiction Bill.

The Subodh Patrika (11) of the 18th November says that since the introduction of the Native Magistrates' Jurisdiction Bill into the Supreme Legislative Council the Europeans in India have become perfectly wild with excitement and have been speaking all manner of evil things of Natives. They have, however, not stopped here but have dared to use opprobrious epithets to such good men as Lord Ripon and Mr. Bright. They have also been predicting the happening of all kinds of evils to the perpetuation of the British Government in India. They have even not hesitated to express their desire to oppose the Government under certain contingencies. If such opinions as those which have appeared in English newspapers in connection with the Ilbert Bill had appeared in journals conducted by Natives, the result would have been that the offending parties would have been punished by transportation or hanging. But the expression of strong views by Europeans is not considered insulting or criminal. In 1857 the Europeans spoke ill of Natives most bitterly and did them the utmost harm in their power, but during that time there was some excuse. On the present occasion Natives have done nothing to offend, and hence their denunciation by Europeans is causing uneasiness. If the feeling of bitterness between the two races increases, the sufferings of Natives will know no bounds. There are about forty-five thousand Europeans and Eurasians in India exclusive of those who belong to the regular army. Most of these have joined volunteer corps. The Englishman of Calcutta has been uttering all manner of threats to Government on behalf of these volunteers. If they should act up to their word in the event of the passing of the Ilbert Bill, the result would be fearful and the Natives would be the greatest sufferers. Perhaps the condition of Natives will be similar to that of the American Red Indians. The Subodh Patrika is, however, confident that England will not repeat the mistake which was committed in America. The pride of race which characterizes Englishmen has never been exhibited with such intensity before. Natives should by all legitimate means endeavour to protect themselves against the onslaught of Europeans.

Remarks about the conduct of Europeans as regards their opposition to the Native Magistrates' Jurisdiction Bill.

The Mahrátta (2) of the 18th November says:—The antagonists of the Ilbert Bill seem to consider Indians as a nation of perjurers, forgers, and bribe-givers and bribe-takers. Every attempt to disprove these filthy charges against a people whose just, loyal, grateful, and law-abiding character is perhaps surpassed by no other nation in the world must prove fruitless as long as unprincipled, irresponsible and hot-headed mad-caps like Messrs. Branson and Atkins continue to poison the ears and the hearts of the good-natured people of England by their shamelessly false and inordinately intoxicating harangues. Systematic lying, more than any other thing, seems to be the peculiar vice of the Anglo-Indian oratory now hired or employed to empty itself in England in order to drown the unwary simple-hearted men of England in its floods or to drive them to the side of opposition by the irresistible force of its powerful currents. Such sinister attempts, however, will not long bear the dazzling light of truth, and a single official contradiction from the Government of India will bring about their total discomfiture. These inebriated rhetoricians have brought the most shameless charges against the Government and the people of India. We have no room, nor desire, to quote them here. We hope, however, that Mr. Lál Mohan Ghose, who made Mr. Branson repent of his wild and intemperate attacks against the Bengalis, will pursue him there and show him of what metal the Bengali Baboo is really made.

Considers the Governor right in the matter of the misunderstanding between him and the Judges of the High Court concerning their place at His Excellency's levée.

In noticing the disagreement which has arisen between the Governor of Bombay and the Judges of the High Court in the matter of the place assigned to the latter at the levée, the Bombay Samáchár (88) of the 21st November observes that it is to be regretted that this petty matter should have given rise to a misunderstanding between such high officials. The explanation tendered by His Excellency to the Chief Justice is satisfactory. Sir James Fergusson stated that he was compelled to make the arrangement to which the Judges have taken exception in order to avoid inconvenience, and has acted in accordance with the practice observed at the levées held by Her Imperial Majesty the Queen and His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales. It is to be regretted that after the receipt of this explanation the Judges should have persisted in the position they have taken. They say that the place assigned to them at His Excellency's last levée lowers them in the eyes of Natives. This objection is, however, worthless. The high position of the High Court Judges can never be lowered by their standing at a certain distance from His Excellency on a public occasion, nor are Natives such fools as to show them less respect simply because they (Judges) do not now stand near His Excellency at the levée. Natives show respect to the Judges in proportion to the satisfaction rendered by them in the discharge of their duties. His Excellency's action in this matter is supported by prescribed rules of precedence, while the objection of the Judges is not based on any sound principle.

Considers the Judges of the High Court right in the matter of the misunderstanding between them and His Excellency the Governor concerning their place at His Excellency's levée.

In noticing the little disagreement that has arisen between the Governor and the Judges of the High Court in the matter of the place assigned to them at His Excellency's levée, the Jáme Jamshed (102) of the 21st November observes that Sir James Fergusson has not succeeded in justifying his action. It is not right to make a distinction between the officers who enjoy the right of private entrée. If His Excellency thought that there was an inconvenient crowd near him, more space should have been allotted to the persons standing about him. Sir James should also have shown patience and kept the cause of the misunderstanding secret until a decision on the question was received from the Secretary of State for India. It is to be regretted that the Judges should not have been present at Government House when the Duke of Connaught was in Bombay. [The Akhbáre Sodágar (83) of the same date expresses similar sentiments.]

The same of the 19th November complains that information regarding the Governor's movements, intimations of the day on which the levée is to be held, and copies of printed selections from the records of Government are furnished to the English newspapers in Bombay but not to the vernacular newspapers. The Native community is more anxious than the European to obtain timely information about these matters, and the non-supply of the abovementioned documents and records to vernacular newspapers is a slight on that community. The Supreme Government observes no such invidious distinction between the English and the vernacular press. The Press Commissioner supplies public information and copies of printed records to the English and the vernacular newspapers indiscriminately, and it is to be hoped that Sir James Fergusson will not observe the distinction that is now made between these classes of public journals.

Complains that an invidious distinction is made by the Bombay Government between the English and the vernacular newspapers in the supply of public news and printed copies of public records.

The Gujarát Mitrá (77) of the 18th November complains that copies of the report of the Education Commission, the local self-government blue-book, the opinions on the Native Magistrates' Jurisdiction Bill, the gazetteers for the different districts, the Local Self-government Bills and the proceedings of the Legislative Council have not been supplied to the Native press. The Mitrá observes that if the opinions of the vernacular newspapers are valued, these papers ought to be furnished with copies of important public documents; for in the absence of such records they cannot subject Government measures to vigorous criticism.

Complains that the vernacular newspapers have not been supplied with copies of certain Government publications.

The Lok Mitrá (79) of the 18th November recommends that the Shrievalty of Bombay for the next year should be conferred upon Professor Wordsworth. There is not, observes the Mitrá, one citizen in Bombay on whom that favour could be more worthily conferred than on the distinguished Principal of the Elphinstone College. Though the distinction is one purely within the patronage of the Governor, the learned Professor would not fail to esteem it as a recognition of his services in the cause of education and progress among the Natives, and His Excellency's selection of him would be attributed to a sense of his public services. The citizens of Bombay have always regarded the Shrievalty as the reward of civic eminence, though the appointment is altogether out of their control; and there is no doubt that if conferred upon Professor Wordsworth it would be almost like a response to a popular call, so great is the esteem and affection with which all the prominent citizens of Bombay regard him.

Recommends that the Shrievalty of Bombay for the coming year should be conferred upon Professor Wordsworth.

The Arunodayá (13) of the 18th November, in alluding to the decision of Mr. Crowe in the suit in which the Secretary of State was plaintiff and Mr. Byrámji Jijibhái defendant, observes that Government and its officers are of course perfectly justified in protecting the interests of the State, but such a policy should be pursued in moderation and in a reasonable spirit. Of late, however, it would seem as if Government and its advisers have lost their balance in dealing with the rights of the subjects. The consequence of such conduct will be simply disastrous. Government should be as vigilant in keeping good faith as in protecting its own interests. If the people once come to know that the word and promises of Government and its high officers are not to be relied upon the utmost confusion will ensue. In the present case Government seems more bent on increasing its income than in keeping good faith. The boundary of the estate was settled by Colonel Francis, who held the high post of Survey Commissioner. He had ample authority to decide the question. To disown his acts is equivalent to telling the people not to place any reliance on the decisions of the high officers of Government. If it be asserted that Mr. Byrámji acquired nine hundred acres of land in an unfair manner, it will have to be admitted that Colonel Francis either committed an egregious blunder Condemns the conduct of Government in bringing an action against Mr. Byrámji Jijibhái on account of certain lands.

or did not act in good faith. It is most extraordinary that Government should be ready and willing to disown its own acts, which no respectable private individual would think of repudiating. The costs which Mr. Byrámji has had to incur in defending this suit amount to about forty thousand rupees. Private individuals will not be able to protect their property if they are subjected to a similar drain. They will be simply reduced to beggary. The Arunodayá trusts that Government will not give its subjects cause to complain of such conduct hereafter.

Censures the Bombay Government for bringing a suit against Mr. Byrámji Jijibhái for the recovery of some lands.

In noticing the decision in the suit brought against Mr. Byrámji Jijibhái by the Secretary of State for India for the recovery of some lands, the Lok Mitrá (79) of the 18th November observes that it is impossible not to sympathise with Mr. Byrámji in the harassing treatment which he has received from the Bombay Government and from which he has just emerged with success, but at the cost of a heavy lawyer's bill. The Government of Bombay sought to oust him from the possession of certain valuable property, which had been guaranteed to him by one of their highest officials, on grounds which a court of law has shown to be utterly untenable; and Mr. Byrámji has now the melancholy satisfaction of having repelled an attempt made with all the energy and resources at the disposal of Government at a cost which would certainly have deterred a less wealthy opponent from contending with so powerful an antagonist. Mr. Byrámji gains nothing by his success, while the Government has succeeded in mulcting him in a heavy sum for the luxury of showing that some over-zealous official was wrong in doubting his title to the disputed land. The public ought to demand from Government the grounds which induced them to decide upon an attack which fortunately has met with a complete discomfiture.

Want of house accommodation in Bombay.

The Native Opinion (10) of the 18th November, in alluding to the discussion in the Bombay Municipal Corporation on the motion of Mr. R. N. Kábráji that a remonstrance should be sent to Government against the sale of the reclaimed ground on the Back Bay, remarks:—The want of sufficient house accommodation is evident enough in the crowded and badly-ventilated parts of the native town, but the people living in them are not in a position to purchase building ground on the Back Bay reclamation. The wealthy classes have not only plenty of room, but they surround their houses with gardens, as may be seen in the pleasant localities of Malabár Hill, Byculla, Mázgaon, Parel and Colába. Numbers of persons live in Máhim, Bandora and other villages and come in daily by rail, but poor labourers and artizans are crowded in the town itself with 759 persons to the acre, whilst in London the extreme pressure is only 442. The engineer to the municipality ought to prepare a scheme for enlarging the existing thoroughfares and for improving the ventilation of the crowded parts of the town. The outlay ought not to be grudged, as it will be productive of immense advantage not only to us but also to future generations, both as regards sanitation and communication. We have now not less than thirty thousand labourers engaged in mills only, and their employers would consult not only their own interests best but also those of the labourers by erecting buildings for their accommodation near their scene of labour instead of allowing them to go to their work from long distances and unhealthy localities. The thousands of poor labourers who are engaged in the harbour ought to have a number of large and healthy cháls on the Mody Bay reclamation so as to be near their work. The rich can easily take care of themselves in every way. It is the duty of the municipality to consider the wants of the poor more than of the wealthy classes. As Bombay is daily increasing in population, chiefly of the poorer sort, which is attracted here by the means of employment and sources of industry, the municipality should give increased attention to sanitary matters, including ventilation, commodiousness and cleanliness of houses.

The Satyá Shodhak (57) of the 18th November says that there are at present four Judges at Ratnágiri with power to hear appeals from courts of first instance in civil cases. The people of the Ratnágiri District are so poor that they can hardly afford to engage even one pleader; but just now on account of the multiplicity of appellate courts they are put to the expense of engaging the services of two and even three pleaders in order to ensure one being present when the appeal is called up for hearing. Owing to the vigour with which the Judges have been doing their work most of the appeals have been decided, and there are very few now remaining for disposal. The Satyá Shodhak is of opinion that there is no necessity for keeping an Extra Assistant Judge in Ratnágiri, and the powers of the first class Subordinate Judge to hear appeals should be withdrawn.

Suggests the transfer of the Extra Assistant Judge from Ratnágiri, as there is no work for him.

In noticing the decision in the case of the charge of assault brought by three Bohora shopkeepers of Bába Dhabn street against two European officers and three Native policemen of the Bombay police, the Bombay Samáchár (88) of the 20th November observes that Mr. Cooper dismissed the case on the ground that the charge was not proved. He admitted that the prosecutors were beaten, but observed that it was not proved which of the police officers had committed the assault. He has not expressly stated that the police officers must have beaten the prosecutors, and it has not been shown that other persons than the police officers could have beaten the Bohoras. There is no doubt that the prosecutors were beaten. They did not receive injuries by falling on the ground, since two doctors have deposed to that effect. The statements made before the Magistrates in the Fort and the Girgaum Police Courts in connection with this case ought to induce Sir Frank Souter to make due enquiries on the subject. [The Akhbáre Sodágar (83) of the same date and the Yajdán Parast (125) of the 18th November express similar sentiments.]

Disapproves of the decision given by the Senior Magistrate of Police in the case of the charge of assault preferred by three Bohora shopkeepers against some officers of the Bombay police.

A correspondent of the Satyá Shodhak (57) of the 11th November states that in the village of Kalusta in the Chiplun Táluka of the Ratnágiri Collectorate there is a customs office close to the creek. In front of the office building is a parapet wall, which was constructed two years ago. Between this wall and the office there was formerly a public road. But within the last three months the space between the wall and the compound of the building has been converted into a garden for growing vegetables by the sepoys belonging to the customs office, and fencing has been erected round it and the old road has been closed so that people cannot pass over it. The reason given for closing the road to the public is the fear of people pilfering the vegetables. The correspondent considers this excuse extremely lame and unjustifiable, and trusts that the authorities of the Customs Department will take measures to leave the road open to the public. People travelling along the road have been put to great inconvenience and trouble since it was closed.

Complains of the closing of a certain road in the village of Kalusta in the Chiplún Táluka of the Ratnágiri Collectorate.

The Kaiser-i-Hind (105) of the 18th November regrets that no steps should have been taken by the police of Bandora for the removal of the complaint that has been made for some time past that robberies have become frequent in that village. No delay ought to be made in increasing the police force of that place. A correspondent complains that the houses of some of the rich people are guarded by two policemen, while in the quarters inhabited by other people scarcely a single policeman is to be found.

Reqnests Government to increase the police force of Bandora.

The Bakul (15) of the 18th November in its local news states that when Mr. Symonds heard that the house of Vishnu Anant Bávdekar was searched without any adequate cause he came to the post office at Ratnágiri and expressed his regret that such an occurrence should have taken place. It now appears that Miss Symonds never complained about the abstraction of the paper-cutter from the bangi parcel, and hence it is unaccountable why Bávdekar's house was searched at all upon a warrant. The postal authorities should be cautious in acting in such an irregular manner without any adequate cause.

Praises the late Dr. Harkness for his educational labours in the Bombay Presidency.

The Native Opinion (10) of the 18th November, in alluding to the death of Dr. Harkness, says:—As the first pioneer of higher education in this Presidency, the results of his educational labours have been marvellous. Without meaning offence to anyone, we may be permitted to remark that as educationists Professor Harkness and his compatriots differed radically from the educationists of the present day. The formation of character and individuality in a student was the prime aim of their teaching. Servile submission on the part of students to their official authority was what they never encouraged. With parental care the young intellect was nurtured and the students were led by the hand to the goal of their educational ambition. The result was a sympathy between pupils and teachers of a degree and kind which is rarely met with in these days. His services in the cause of education have been simply invaluable, and his name will long be remembered as that of a friend and benefactor. It is to be hoped that the high place which Dr. Harkness occupied in the estimation of the public will induce his successors to follow in his footsteps. [Almost all the papers received in this week express deep regret at the death of Dr. Harkness.]

Legislation.

Disapproves of the Bengal Tenancy Bill, and makes suggestions for the amelioration of the condition of the rayats and for the prevention of loss by zamindárs.

The Quarterly Journal of the Poona Sárvajanik Sabha (4) for October 1883, in an article headed "Prussian Land Legislation and the Bengal Tenancy Bill," gives the history of Prussian Land Legislation, and says:—The Prussian nation, in the early part of the century, found itself burdened by a cumbersome feudal system and writhing in the agonies of serfdom. Prussian statesmen accordingly set themselves to a manifold task, which in sixty years was fully accomplished, —the task of converting the feudal serf into a free proprietor, of removing the restrictions which the privileged owners of land felt so heavily, and of making them unencumbered lords of their properties, of abolishing all the confusion of tenures, charges and services of relaxing entails, of commuting rights of common, and of encouraging improvements with state help and state compulsion, and facilitating the free exchange of land. All these great reforms have been carried out without imposing any serious burden on the state's resources, without any violent disruption of the economic relations of different classes of society, and without the shock of revolution or internecine class struggles. Here in India we sadly need the help of similar statesmanship. With a growing population and limited resources, the struggle for existence is already being felt as a strain on the social system. Meanwhile the experiments that have been undertaken to remedy these disorders are not suggested by any broad view of the future or any just consideration for vested rights. We refer especially in these remarks to the proposed legislation in the Lower Provinces of Bengal and Behar, which present the strongest resemblance to the condition of Prussia in the early part of this century. There, as here, the old customary rights of property have suffered a depression from long disuse, and the rise of moneyed and privileged class of landlords, who have invested in land on the faith of solemn pledges and are naturally anxious to turn their bargain to the best advantage, and often press heavily, as in Behar, upon the peasant majority of the population. There can be no doubt that remedial legislation is urgently required to check these evils, and quite independently of the saving clause contained in the law of 1793, which extended the permanent settlement to these provinces, there can be no doubt that the Government, in its capacity as sovereign, has every right to undertake legislation intended to remove admitted and general grievances. We cannot, however, approve of the direction and spirit of the legislation embodied in the proposals which will soon come on for discussion before the Supreme Legislative Council in respect of this Bengal Tenancy Bill. The proposed legislation is based on lines which are diametrically opposed to the principles we have described above as having influenced the great Prussian Chancellors. While the one sought to disencumber land and encourage the growth of absolute property both in the landlord class and in the peasantry, the proposals embodied in the Tenancy Bill are intended to increase these mutual encumbrances and the existing complexity of rights and interests. While the Prussian legislation was guided by the principle of allowing compensation for the abolition of all rights, services and charges which were not of the nature of personal slavery, the Bengal proposals reject all idea of compensation. While the Prussian statesmen tried their best to minimize executive interference in the settlement of class relations, the theory underlying the Bengal Bill is that the State executive and judicial machinery must prescribe and regulate every little incident of the relations between the owners and tenants of land. The only result, and to some extent the intended result, will be that the existing confusion will still more increase, class will be set against class, the sacredness of former pledges will be violated, the landlords ruined without compensation and reduced to the class of rent-receiving pensioners, and the rayats taught to look more and more to the State as their sole landlord, without acquiring the training necessary to raise them to a sense of their position. We shall try to make our meaning more plain in the sequel of this paper. We shall only premise here, with a view to prevent all possible misunderstanding, that we do not side with the optimist advocates of the existing condition of things. We freely allow that an urgent and a radical reform is called for, but our contention is that the lines on which the Legislature proposes to proceed are radically mistaken and will never lead to any real settlement of the present disputes. After stating the provisions in the Bengal Tenancy Bill intended to protect the interests of the rayat classes, the writer proceeds :—Our objection to the change is not based on any indifference to the interests of the rayats. These rayats number more than 10 millions in all and pay a rental of 21 millions to the zamindárs and tenure-holders, and, as we have said, they hold 90 per cent. of the lands owned by the zamindárs. Such stupendous interests claim all the protection which foresighted statesmanship can confer on them. Our principal contention is that the landlord's rights, sanctioned by usage and by law, will be adversely affected by these changes without providing any compensation to these classes, and that the permanent peace and advancement of the country will not be promoted by provisions which at every step set class against class and compel resort to the courts or to the Collector's agency. The interest and ownership in land will still continue to be as divided as before between quarrelsome partners and no real improvement will take place. Our own proposal is that as far as possible the entanglement of private relations should be simplified and the occasions of conflict and subdivided ownership should be minimized. We would confer full proprietary rights on the rayats of whatever degree who hold rayati lands, but these full rights should extend only over a limited portion of the estate so held, and will have to be purchased for a proper equivalent in the shape of resigning in the landlord's portion all rights over the other portion not so reserved. The liabilities and the rights of the rayats and the landlords must be duly weighed one against the other, and on the principle of a sliding scale we would apportion the land between the two classes, assigning one and the large part absolutely to the rayat and another to the landlord, and if a balance is still left due, we would provide compensation in money rent charges, by which means all conflict will cease and both the rayat and landlord will be made to feel increased interest in their absolute properties. The more practical question relates to the way in which this liberation of the land from its present entanglements can be brought about. Our own proposals are based on the recorded experience of similar undertakings which have been successfully carried out in other countries. In the first instance we would encourage the redemption of rent and other charges paid by the rayats to the zamindárs and revenue-free and tenure-holders. The present value of the payments made by them to these classes comes to about 21 krors. These 21 krors paid to the zamindárs and tenure-holders are on an average one-fifth of the gross value of the annual agricultural wealth of Bengal, which has been roughly estimated by Major Baring at 100 krors. As there are about 10 millions of rayats, this represents an average gross production of Rs. 100 for each cultivating rayat's family, out of which he has to pay at present Rs. 20 or one-fifth share. Estimated in acres, and taking the yield per acre to be Rs. 10, it follows that each rayat cultivates about 10 acres and pays Rs. 2 an acre out of produce worth Rs. 10 per acre. In the case of occupancy rayats we would divide his holding into three parts, make two of these parts over to him in absolute right and hand over the third as absolute Khamar land to the landlord. In the case of other rayats we would divide the holdings half and half. As this arrangement will not settle the account of their mutual rights and liabilities, the balance will have to be made up by money rent charges. The rayat, left in possession of his half or one-third holding, should be required to pay his old rent on the reduced holding for a period of 30 or 40 years, so as to repay balance of the purchase money with interest. If the parties cannot be made to agree to this slow method, Government could easily render them this help by advancing the money wherewith the rayats might be enabled to purchase out their landlords' claims. The capitalized value of half of 21 krors will be about 200 krors, and that of one-third of 21 krors will be 140 krors. Government could safely float any loan at 4 per cent. and pay off the zamindárs for the loss of their rights over the reserved portions of the rayats' holdings, and recoup themselves by levying 6 per cent. interest from the rayats for a term of 35 years. Purchase on these terms will be compulsory, and the landlords will more easily be reconciled to it than consent to see themselves deprived of a valuable property without any compensation, as the present Bill proposes to do. Thrifty rayats might be allowed the option of redemption at an earlier period by the inducement of a considerable reduction in the total capitalized value. This latter plan has been successfully adopted in Russia in respect of the serfs who received one-third of their masters' lands in free-hold right. The other plan will set off the mutual liabilities and rights of the two classes, and according as the balance inclined in the zamindár's favour, an equivalent allotment of land made once for all, or a rent-charge created for a term of years with a provision for a sinking fund, would have to be arranged. This was the principal feature of the Prussian plan of enfranchisement, and it has this advantage that no liability is thereby thrown on the Government. Even under the Russian plan the liability of Government is only nominal, as it only intervenes in place of private money-lenders because its credit is exceptionally good and its powers of levy are proportionately more effective. In this way we could achieve the liberation of the rayats in Bengal in a generation or two without any violence to vested rights, and our plan would above all train and educate the people by a slow discipline of thrift to retain their newly acquired status. The present proposals of the Bill simply confiscate the interests of one class to benefit another, and can only be justified on socialistic or communistic principles. The elements of national prosperity are wanting in a country whose principal resource is agriculture, and that agriculture is in the hands of a thriftless and poverty-striken peasantry, who are weighed down with heavy charges and whose life and labours are not cheered by the charm and strength inspired by a sense of property. If this country sadly wants an independent yeomanry as the back-bone of its strength and prosperity, it no less equally needs the leading and the light of propertied men. A complete divorce from land of those who cultivate it is a national evil, and no less an evil is it to find one dead level of small farmers all over the land. High and petty farming, with an upper ten thousand of the holders of large landed estates, and a vast mass of peasant farmers, this mixed constitution of rural society is necessary to secure the stability and progress of the country. The Bill under consideration robs Peter to benefit Paul, and at the same time it creates an hostility of interests where entire union should prevail, and it clogs the land with a variety of interests and ownership and entangles mutual relations in such a manner as to drive both parties constantly into civil courts. We know our suggestion is so far out of the lines within which the discussion has been hitherto conducted that it is not likely to attract favourable attention on the part of the extreme advocates either of the rayats or the zamindárs. Our perception, however, of the perilous nature of an obstinate persistence in a laisez faire policy is so keen, and our disapprobation of the revolutionary proposals now made is so radical, that we have deemed it necessary to roll this ball on the field of discussion and wait to see if the seed falls on good soil. A settlement based on the plan advocated by us will successfully accomplish all the ends that the Government has in view, and the zamindárs will not be in a worse position than they are now. They will get full compensation for the loss of their rights over one portion of their estates, and their dominion over the other half will be of a character which could never hereafter be questioned. On the other hand, if the present Bill passes into law, the restraints on the landlord's power in the matter of enhancements and evictions, in the levy of rent, in the claim for improvements, and disturbance, will soon succeed in gradually lowering the status of the zamindárs to the level of pensioners. Such a state of things will keep up and intensify all the elements of strife, and just as the riots and disturbances in Eastern Bengal have paved the way for the present legislation, further disorders will suggest more drastic and retrograde remedies in the future. It is above all important to put an end to this irritation, and this can only be done by the adoption of one or other of the alternative plans of settlement which we have ventured to propose. Let each man's land be as much his absolute property as his house or clothes, and things will settle down themselves agreeably to the interests of all parties concerned. The British Government in India, powerful as it undoubtedly is, cannot command the power to retrace its steps in such matters and throw the country backwards a hundred years. This attempt to revolutionize in a retrograde direction is bound to fail, and will fail only to suggest a further repetition of the same unsuitable remedies. The present Bill makes no provision for the rights of the Government tenants in Khas Mahals. There is no indication that the Government is prepared to bind itself by the restrictions it so generously imposes upon zamindárs to receive less than one-fifth of the gross produce as rent, or to refrain from ousting tenants without resort to the courts, or from doubling the rent at once, or to pay for improvements, or give ten years' rent as compensation for disturbance. The condition of the rayats in these Khas Mahals does not compare favourably with the zamindárs' rayats in Eastern Bengal. The rayat's advocates in Bengal should certainly not content themselves with partial legislation which makes it possible for Government to refrain from dealing towards itself the same strict measure of equity which it proposes to deal to others. And as we are on this part of the subject, we may well ask whether, under the periodical assessments, the State landlord is prepared to concede as against itself the same measures of restriction and moderation which it is so anxious to provide for the tenantry of the zamindárs. Here in this Presidency Government doubles and trebles, in many cases quadruples, the assessment at a leap, the assessment has to be paid punctually on pain of forfeiture of all interest in land, there is no limit that the assessment in all cases shall not exceed one-fifth of the gross produce, and no payment is made for improvements or disturbance when a rayat is ousted from his ancestral lands. In all these respects the revenue administration in other parts of India must be put on a more equitable footing before Government can with clean hands ask the zamindárs in Bengal to surrender the property rights guaranteed to them by one hundred years' continuous possession, and on the faith of which most of the settled estates have changed hands to such an extent that the idea of depriving the present race of landlords of their advantages, without compensation for the loss thus thrust on them, savours very much of a communistic revolution, than which in a country circumstanced as India is nothing can be more disastrous and perilous alike to the people and to their foreign rulers.

Remarks in connection with the modifications suggested by Lord Northbrook in the Bill relating to the jurisdiction of Native Magistrates over Europeans.

The Native Opinion (10) of the 18th November, in referring tc the compromise suggested by Lord Northbrook in the Native Magistrates' Jurisdiction Bill, remarks :—Lord Northbrook seems to be prepared to remove the disability attaching to Native Civil Servants, but in such a way as to leave a loophole wherewith to neutralise all its intended good results. According to His Lordship the jurisdiction is to be confined to District Magistrates and Sessions Judges, of course including the Statutory Civilians if we understand His Lordship aright. And His Lordship proposes amendment of Section 526 of the present Criminal Procedure Code so as to give the accused, whether he be a European or a Native, the power of applying to the High Court to transfer his case to another Magistrate or Sessions Judge. As the law now stands there is already the power of appeal to the accused, but were the law to be amended on the lines of the Chief Justice of Madras, the disability of a Native Magistrate or Sessions Judge is likely to be re-affirmed, confining the new jurisdiction in his case to regions of theory only. The stoppage of all further proceedings on appeal before a Magistrate or a Sessions Judge may be an improvement upon the present law, but if such unqualified freedom of appeal were allowed, there are chances that often a criminal sessions may be rendered barren either by a stoppage of proceedings until the disposal of appeals or by a transfer of cases to another court. Such modification will not elevate but reduce the dignity of our courts, giving all the benefit to the European accused and all the risk to the Native. If the opinions of the officialdom were the right gauge of their future conduct, out of one hundred Europeans accused ninety-nine will succeed in getting their cases transferred to courts presided over by European Judges, while in the case of those Natives who will not succeed in obtaining the desired transfer, they will have to bear the consequences of the offended dignity of a Judge whose qualifications to judge their cases they had the audacity to question. We believe the suggested modification of the law will not prove a happy element in the proposed compromise. We hope, however, that before any decided step is taken the Supreme Government will duly consider the proposed amendment of the law. Finally, the matter will rest with the Secretary of State if the Bill is not to be taken up to the House of Commons. Lord Ripon has behaved like a man, and like a man he will have the courage to advise his official superiors. The matter has passed out of His Lordship's hands, and our hope entirely rests on Lord Kimberley, who will not forget what he recently told a deputation of Anglo-Indians as to the outcome of this Bill.

Approves of the modifications suggested by Lord Northbrook in the Native Magistrates' Jurisdiction Bill.

With reference to the modifications suggested by Lord Northbrook in the Native Magistrates' Jurisdiction Bill, the Lok Mitrá (79) of the 18th November observes:—It has been known for a long time that the Cabinet has decided that the Bill should be passed at all hazards, reserving intact its main principle but with such modifications as might appear necessary to prevent injustice or hardship. In accordance with this decision it is proposed to restrict at present the extended powers to such Native Magistrates and Judges as may attain the position of District Magistrates or Session Judges. The only new light thrown upon the question in Lord Northbrook's speech is what relates to the suggestion made by the Chief Justice of Madras. The suggestion is that the prosecutor or accused should have, on showing sufficient cause, liberty to get the case transferred to a European Magistrate's court by an order of the High Court. The privilege will extend to Natives as well as Europeans, and thus the inequity of allowing Europeans exclusively the power to choose their own tribunal will be mitigated to a great extent. It will be remembered that a large number of opponents of the Bill who despaired of its total withdrawal were in favour of nullifying its effect by according such a privilege to Europeans alone. But this would have been a direct violation of the principle of the Bill, and would have met with indignant opposition from Natives of all classes. The suggestion consequently met with little favour from those who were capable of calmly considering the subject. Though the extension of the same privilege to Natives has destroyed most of the objections to a course which would have seriously embarrassed the administration of justice, it is still to be regretted that even so mild and guarded a concession has been made. The favour might be construed, as indeed it has been construed by many, into a surrender to mere clamour on the part of the immoderate section of the European opposition to the Bill. Though this concession is coupled with a confirmation of the principle at stake, and now ensures the passing of the Bill and the bestowal thus of a great boon upon the Natives, it is useless to conceal the fact that the natives of India do not look with complacency upon any attenuation of the principle of equality of races asserted in the Bill. They are so sensible, however, of the obligations which they owe to Government and its supporters in England that they will loyally submit to any resolution which their combined deliberations may result in. The Natives still rejoice that Government has decided to maintain unflinchingly the principle that no person can on account of any supposed superiority of race claim exceptional treatment as a subject of Her Majesty, and that there is no vested right or privilege which prevents natives of India from ranking on an equality with their English fellow-subjects. They will continue to honour Lord Ripon and be grateful to him for his firm adhesion to that principle, and they will still recognize in the Bill the affirmation of the fact that the natives of India are as competent and fit to judge between Natives and Europeans or Europeans and Europeans as any Judge of European extraction. The practical test of this assertion will for some time be limited within narrow bounds; but there can be no doubt that in course of time the general application of the principle and extension of its scope will be accomplished by the efforts of the Native community by the proof of competency which even this limited experiment will enable Native Magistrates and Judges to give. It is now devoutly to be hoped that the Bill will be passed without further delay, and the Government left to grapple with the various important questions affecting the country awaiting final decision. [The Bombay Chronicle (76), the Yajdán Parast (125) and the Gujaráti (98) of the same date express similar sentiments.]

Disapproves of a portion of the modifications suggested by Lord Northbrook in the Native Magistrates' Jurisdiction Bill.

In noticing the modifications suggested by Lord Northbrook in the Native Magistrates' Jurisdiction Bill, the Rást Goftár (112) of 18th November observes that the suggestion to restrict at present the extended powers to such Native Magistrates and Judges as may attain the position of District Magistrates or Sessions Judges is unobjectionable in so far as it preserves the principle of the Bill. But His Lordship's other proposal that any European or Native prosecutor or accused should have, on showing sufficient cause, liberty to get his case transferred to a European Magistrate's Court by an order of the High Court is tantamount to the withdrawal of the concession which the Bill aims at granting. The Bill proposes to enact that a Native Judge is not incapacitated from trying a European offender simply because he is a Native; and the modifications suggested by His Lordship would concede to the offender the liberty to apply for a transfer of his case from the Native Judge and nullify the principle of the Bill.

Education.

Disapproves of the recommendation made by the Education Commission to introduce religious and moral instruction in Government schools and colleges.

The Jáme Jamshed (102) of the 20th November observes that one of the recommendations made in the Education Commission's report is that for the purpose of giving religious and moral instruction to the students in colleges a work specially prepared with that object should be taught in those institutions; but it must be remarked that the course of neutrality in religious matters hitherto followed in Government schools and colleges is safe and wise. The students belong to different religions, and it is quite impossible to give them unobjectionable moral and religious instruction from a common book. Any person, howsoever liberal-minded, will never be able to produce a work which would answer the purpose. Again, there are differences between the tenets of different religions, and it is therefore impossible to compose a work which will be unobjectionable to the professors of those religions. For these reasons Government ought not to depart from its course of neutrality and ought not to introduce the imparting of religious education into the State schools and colleges. The Christian missionaries appear to have a hand in the recommendation made by the Commission, because they have been long complaining that State education has made young students irreligious. To this accusation Mr. K. T. Telang has given in his minute an effective reply. Native parents ought to provide for the religious instruction of their children by opening schools for imparting it, and Government should render due aid to these institutions. The other recommendation of the Commission which is also objectionable is that the principals and professors of Government and private colleges should give lectures to their respective students on the duties of man as a citizen. The suggestion seems very good, but what guarantee is there that the lecturers will not try to impress on the young students the principles of their own religions?

However these lectures would be shorn of their defects if they were delivered in public. If the two suggestions of the Education Commission are adopted, Natives will view the education imparted in State schools and colleges with distrust and higher education will not be taken advantage of by the public. If professors and heads of schools heartily wish to make their students moral and good citizens, they can do so without acting on the suggestions made by the Commission.

Reformation of the Bombay Law School and remarks in connection therewith.

In a paragraph headed "The Law Classes in Madras," the Indu Prakásh (9) of the 19th November says:—Here is an example which Mr. Chatfield, our Director of Public Instruction, may usefully copy. Mr. Greg, the Director of Public Instruction in Madras, has come to the conclusion that the Government Law School there is very much of a farce and has been of no real use to its students, however useful it may have been to the Professors employed in it. He has therefore determined to put it on a better footing by making some changes, one of which is that the Professor of Law should adopt the tutorial system of instruction instead of merely delivering lectures to the students. The Bombay Law School has also been very much of a farce. Could nothing be done to reform it too?

Complains that masters of some Government Gujaráti schools in Bombay mercilessly cane their pupils.

The Yajdán Parast (125) of the 18th November observes that the teachers in some Government Gujaráti schools in Bombay mercilessly beat their pupils either with a cane or a ruler or a flat piece of wood for not preparing their lessons or for doing some mischief. The punishment is cruel and ought to be prohibited.

Railways.

Complains of the harshness and illiberality of the authorities of the G. I. P. Railway Company in the matter of leave rules affecting their Native servants.

The Indu Prakásh (9) of the 19th November complains bitterly of the manner in which the authorities of the G. I. P. Railway Company treat its Native servants in the matter of leave. The European servants are treated with liberality, but the case is otherwise with the Native employés. During the time of the late Traffic Manager no leave rules were promulgated and consequently the Native servants of this company used to obtain leave from their superiors without any difficulty; but since the accession to power of the present Acting Traffic Manager leave rules of great severity have been published, which leave little or no discretion to the high officers of the G. I. P. Railway Company to grant leave to their subordinates. The granting of casual leave is now strictly prohibited, while the privilege leave which is allowed during the year is limited only to ten days. The B. B. & C. I. Railway Company allows forty days' privilege leave to its Native servants in the course of a year, and in case of sickness extra leave is freely given. This is liberal enough. The leave rules recently promulgated by the authorities of the G. I. P. Railway are most harsh and illiberal. There is no reason why this company should not assimilate its leave rules to those of the B. B. & C. I. Railway or to those which obtain in Government offices. Some alteration in them is absolutely necessary. But who is to move in the matter? The remonstrances of the Native servants will not be heard and the European authorities will not care to interfere inasmuch as their interests are not affected. The Indu Prakásh is of opinion that the G. I. P. Railway Company of its own accord should alter the leave rules recently published, but if it declines to do so the Government should at once interpose its authority in the public interests, for which it possesses ample justification. The ten days' privilege leave which the Native servants of the G. I. P. Railway Company are entitled to claim once in a year is absurdly inadequate. The company should endeavour to keep its servants of all nationalities contented. Contented servants perform their work with zeal and alacrity, while discontented ones shirk work and do their task lazily. The Indu Prakásh trusts that the authorities of the G. I. P. Railway will not give cause to its Native servants to complain about bad treatment.

A correspondent of the Bombay Samáchár (88) of the 20th November complains that the employés of the G. I. P. Railway, who are paid from 10 to 20 rupees a month and are employed at Vádi Bandar and other localities in Bombay for the despatch of goods to stations in the mofussil, have been for several years past made to work from 6 o'clock in the morning to 8 o'clock in the evening, and are required to do duty on Saturdays till 2 A.M. The railway authorities ought to be prevented from thus oppressing their subordinates.

Complains of the practice of oppression by the G. I. P. Railway authorities on certain railway employés.

Municipalities.

The Hitechchhu (78) of Ahmedabad of the 22nd November refers to the action of the Bombay Government in the matter of the misappropriation of the trust money of the Ranchhodlál Dispensary at Ahmedabad by Mr. Fernandez, the late permanent chairman of the local municipality, and the purchase and sale of the building known as Rádhanmiya's Haveli, and remarks that it is to be regretted that the Government of Sir James Fergusson should have laid aside its own laws and acted unlawfully in some matters pertaining to Ahmedabad. Though the Government may have been misled by its own subordinates in those matters, as long as they have been performed in the name of Government the former is to blame. In the first place, Government made a great mistake in nominating Mr. Fernandez permanent chairman of the municipality on the recommendation of Mr. Richey. Is it not surprising that Government should have quietly passed over the reply given by Mr. Reid to the petition presented by the people of Ahmedabad against the improper acts of Mr. Fernandez and not gone deep into it, and that Government should have disregarded the frequent strictures made against him in connection with some of his improper and unlawful acts pertaining to the municipality? Government has committed an unlawful act in ordering the municipality to hand over the trust money to the Accountant General. The donor even is not empowered by law to take back his trust money, and none of the trustees can use it for any other than the purpose for which the trust was made. The trustees cannot give the trust money to any person save by the permission of the District Judge. But it is a matter for regret that the Collector and the municipal president and the municipality should have handed over the trust money to Government without having any regard to principles of law and morality. Government should have visited its defaulting servant with the strictest punishment and thus assured the public that it would not connive at the unjust acts of even its favourite subordinates. But it has not occurred to Sir James Fergusson and the members of his Council to act in this way. The public has been disappointed in the expectations formed by it of Mr. Peile on his nomination to the Executive Council. If Government wanted to take into its own charge the trust money of the dispensary, it should have obtained a decree from the District Court against the municipality to that effect. It is to be hoped that Government will still reconsider the matter. As regards the Rádhanmiya's Haveli, it is said that Government has sanctioned its sale by the municipality. Now the first question is that neither the municipality nor any of its officers can buy landed property without the sanction of Government. Then why should Government have given its sanction to the purchase of the haveli which was bought without the permission either of the managing committee, the general committee, or Government? Moreover, the municipality has no power to sell the building and again buy it on a mortgage deed, and Government also has no power to sanction such a transaction. Act VI. of 1873 permits nothing of the kind; on the contrary, it forbids a municipality from engaging in any trade. It cannot be understood, therefore, on what principles of law and morality the Government of Sir James Fergusson could have given its sanction to such a transaction. When in the matter of the abolition of the house-tax in the suburbs of Ahmedabad Mr. Reid, the president of the municipality, wrote to Mr. Sheppard, the Revenue Commissioner, that it would not suit the views of Government to abolish the house-tax, though the people of Ahmedabad and the general committee of the local municipality had adopted a resolution to that effect, why did he not write that Government was acting unlawfully in ordering the trust money to be paid to the Accountant General? Why did he not also state in his application regarding the Rádhanmiya's Haveli that the municipality was not empowered to carry on such a trade? In so doing he would have exposed Mr. Richey, Fernandez, and Co., who have acted unlawfully and absolutely. As regards the repeal of the house-tax in the suburbs of Ahmedabad he wrote to the Revenue Commissioner because the resolution was adopted by a majority of the municipal commissioners against his wishes. Whatever may be the views of Government in the matter of the repeal of the tax, what right has it to unlawfully enforce them without the approval of the people? When Mr. Sheppard does not care for a first class potentate like the Gáikwád of Baroda, why should he care for the poor people of Ahmedabad? Mr. Sheppard relied on the opinion expressed by Mr. Reid regarding the repeal of the house-tax and sent back the resolution to the municipality without submitting it to Government. It is no wonder that such officials should recommend Government to sanction things which are injurious to the interests of the municipality and which are done in opposition to the law. When the Bombay Government, the Revenue Commissioner, and the municipal president sanction such unlawful acts, it is no wonder that the chairman of the municipality should take courage and hesitate to give for publication a copy of the proceedings in connection with such unjust deeds.

Remarks in connection with certain matters pertaining to the municipality of Ahmedabad.

Native States.

Requests the Bombay Government to exercise strict supervision over the Native States of Káthiáwár.

The Gujarátí (98) of the 18th November observes that oppression is practised in almost every Native State in Káthiáwár either because the minister or kárbhári of a State is a foreigner, or because he belongs to one of the two parties into which the subjects of a State are invariably divided. He acts arbitrarily but takes care to please the political officer in whose charge the State is placed. When the officer in charge of the State comes within the boundaries of that State he is treated sumptuously at the expense of the Rája and his subordinates also meet with a liberal treatment. This state of things has led political officers to reply to complainants against Native administrations that they should seek redress from their own Governments. All persons that are wronged in Native States do not appeal to the paramount power for redress, and hence the number of oppressed persons in Native territory is much greater than is usually supposed. The Bombay Government ought to exercise strict supervision over the States of Káthiáwár.

Instances of mismanagement in the States of Gondal and Sáyla in Káthiáwár.

The same observes that one Dámodar Manji preferred some criminal charges against the Superintendent of Police of the Gondal State, and in that case the latter was made to pay back certain sums of money which he had forcibly exacted from certain parties. Notwithstanding this, the Superintendent applied for the payment of the expenses which he had incurred in conducting his defence and the Chief Kárbhári of the State strongly opposed the application. But Major Nutt, being kindly disposed towards the applicant, ordered the payment of Rs. 1,500 to him. Properly speaking the State ought not to have been made to pay this sum. The Superintendent is a worthless man. He was not able to detect the plunder committed in Ganod and the robberies perpetrated elsewhere, as well as the carrying away of the postal bags of Dhoráji. Another case of mismanagement is that of Balvantráo Éknáth, the ex-Faujdár of the Jhálávád Pránt. Balvantráo once visited Sáyla and the authorities of that State accused him of rape and of abusing and intimidating the Chief. The Faujdár was a British subject and ought to have been tried by a British court of justice; but the political officer either from carelessness or some other cause had him tried by the Sáyla authorities. The Faujdár had been instrumental in inflicting a fine of Rs. 1,500 on the Darbár for failing to give aid in an enquiry regarding a case of highway robbery, and the latter found it a good opportunity for taking revenge on the former. The Faujdár was convicted of all the charges and sentenced to fine and imprisonment. The rape was alleged to have been committed at night on a female servant of the Darbár, but this charge appears to have been trumped up, for had the female made opposition and cried aloud when the alleged force was exercised upon her, somebody would have rendered her assistance and released her from her distressing position. Colonel Barton, however, turned a deaf ear to the representations of the accused, and he was improperly convicted and sentenced to nine months' imprisonment and fine. The Darbár was afraid that if the accused appealed against the conviction there would be a shameful exposure of its conduct, and therefore it released him before the expiry of the sentence after getting from him a written agreement that he would not prefer an appeal. The unfortunate man has now appealed to the Government of Bombay, and it remains to be seen whether or not he will get justice.

Misrule in Nándod.

The Samsher Báhádur (113) of the 16th November says that it has received several complaints against the Rája of Nándod. As the Rája and his son are not on amicable terms, dissensions prevail in the family. The Gujarát Mitrá complained that intrigues are being carried on to murder the prince Chhatrasinhji. This statement is not worthy of credit and it is not possible that a Rája would behave in this way towards his favourite son. But this much is certain that the Rája is surrounded by a clique of evil persons, who mislead him. The prince Chhatrasinhji has, it is said, telegraphed to the Agent at Godhra that he is very much oppressed. Upon this the prince was sent for by the Agent, who was followed by his parents without their being asked to do so. The duration of these squabbles is not known. It is not likely that the State will improve as long as the intriguers, who mislead the Rája and prey upon the revenues of the State, are not removed by Government. There is need of an independent kárbhári for the proper guidance of the Rája. The Samsher trusts that the dissensions prevailing in the royal family will cease. [The Surya Prakásh (81) of the 17th November expresses regret at the present state of things in Nándod and attributes it to the want of a good kárbhári. Government will have to interfere if the state of things is so very bad as is reported.]

Says that some ancient temples have been unearthed at Pátan in the Gáikwád's territory.

A correspondent of the Bombay Samáchár (88) of the 20th November, writing from Pátan in the Gáikwád's territory, states that near the Amthol gate of this town there is a temple of the Amther goddess. In the neighbourhood of this temple are some hills. A Bráhman reported to the late Mahálkari that within those mounds treasure was buried. After obtaining permission from Kadi the hills were dug and searched for the treasure, but none was found. However a number of small temples have been unearthed.

D. The system of spelling vernacular words followed by the Reporter is the same as that adopted in the Official Spelling List of the Bombay Presidency. One peculiar feature of this system is that when the long a (आ or á) is the last letter of a word, the accent is left out, and the short a (अ = u in gun) is, to prevent confusion, never placed at the end of a word. This rule has been strictly followed, except that when the short a appears to be absolutely necessary to complete the pronunciation of a word, as in Arunodaya or the well known Mitra, it is printed with a mark over it to indicate that it is short, thus—ā.

E. Berár papers are received in this office for report under the Resolution of the Government of Bombay in the General Department, No. 1795, dated 8th June 1881.

In noticing the appointment of Mr. Narsingráo Bholánáth Divetiya, B.A., to the Statutory Civil Service of the Bombay Presidency, the Jáme Jamshed (102) of the 29th November observes that Mr. Divetiya is likely to turn out an able officer, but notwithstanding this the mode of choosing Native Civilians is objectionable. What guarantee is there that other nominations will be as good as that of Mr. Divetiya? It is desirable that the existing mode of selection should be abolished and that the appointment should be given by a competitive examination, which should be held annually in each presidency town. University graduates and others should be freely permitted to compete at this examination, and the successful candidates should be sent to England to complete their education. After passing through a severe course of study in that country they should be admitted into the Civil Service. Such an arrangement alone will make the natives of India efficient Civil Servants in their own country. [The Hitechchhu (78) of Ahmedabad of the 29th November approves of the selection, which satisfies the conditions of the service as regards education and high birth. It congratulates Mr. Narsingráo and the Gujaráti community for the honour done to them by Government, though for the first time since the creation of the Statutory Civil Service.]

Suggests an improvement in the Statutory Civil Service.

The Subodh Patrika (11) of the 25th November says:—Bombay may well be proud of the reception which in the spirit of true loyalty it has accorded to their Royal Highnesses the Duke and Duchess of Connaught. In the short space of two days Bombay tried to make everything about her grand and attractive, and the rich as well as the poor, non-officials as well as officials, left nothing undone to mark their deep sense of loyalty and attachment to the Empress of India by receiving in their midst Her Majesty's third son. The greeting with which their Royal Highnesses were received as they passed was of the most enthusiastic character, illustrative at once and most remarkably of the fact that with all their differences of custom, religion, dress and even manners the natives of India readily join in response to the calls of their duty to their Empress. The Duke and Duchess were probably quite prepared for this joyous ebullition of the loyal sentiment. But the acclamations with which they were greeted on their way to Government House from every class of people in the city must have struck them as something quite wondrous of its kind. The readiness with which the law-abiding Native heart is known to express itself has found a vivid illustration for the third time, and this repeated assertion of our attachment to our Empress will not only confirm her in the strong sympathy with which she has ever followed the fates of her Indian subjects, but will assure her English subjects that the natives of India, against whom so much has been said of late, are not wanting in respect and affection for the Throne. [All the papers of this and the previous week express similar sentiments.]

Reception accorded to the Duke and Duchess of Connaught in Bombay.

The Bombay Samáchár (88) of the 30th November observes that the people of Bombay have given one more instance of their regard for Lord Ripon. While their Royal Highnesses the Duke and Duchess of Connaught were being driven along the road to Government House at Parel, they were greeted with loud cheers by the people who had assembled in the streets, who now and then loudly cried out "We like Lord Ripon best," "We want Viceroys like Lord Ripon." Inscriptions to the same effect were also to be seen among the numerous house decorations that were made in honour of the Duke's arrival. [The Broach Samáchár (89) of the 29th November refers to the regard manifested by the people of Bombay towards Lord Ripon and expresses satisfaction with it.]

Says that expressions of regard for Lord Ripon were heard from the people of Bombay when they were cheering the Duke of Connanght.

Comments in connection with Sir Lepel Griffin's article on "Indian Princes at Home."

The Mahratta (2) of the 25th November says:—In his article on "Indian Princes at Home" Sir Lepel Griffin thinks it impossible to compare the judicial administration of Native States with that in British India. He admits, though reluctantly, the weakness and unpopularity of the latter consequent on the existence of civil courts and the intricacy of the Civil and Criminal Codes; yet he tries to defend his position by saying that they are the work of singular genius, and if their benevolent and noble aims have been frustrated it is simply because they are too complicated and enlightened for the present state of the country. A very fine specimen of defence indeed! If they are practically the reverse of what they are described to be, the proud mention of the genius and aims, howsoever commendable, is certainly inopportune. Sir Lepel holds that an English judge is more popular than a Native judge, but has no evidence to adduce in support of his contention. Conscious of this defect, he supplements his assertion by giving his own experience that if a petitioner had a good case which should honestly win on its merits, he would beg, even grovel, that it might be sent for trial before an English in preference to a Native judge. This is not an independent testimony and cannot therefore be believed. For no one is capable of forming a true judgment of the opinion of outsiders regarding the merits or demerits of the office which he holds. However, granting for the sake of argument that the generality of people prefer an English to a Native judge, we will enquire into the causes of this strange preference. Most of the English judges will be found to be Civilians, a class looked upon in India with the utmost terror and detestation and inspiring little or no love or reverence. So soon as they are imported into this unhappy land, these unfledged raw youths, thoroughly inexperienced in the ways of the world, are placed in responsible posts with unlimited powers. They are ignorant not only of the proper application of the law which they are appointed to interpret, but also of the manners and customs of the people to whom they are to administer it. Those that might gain experience by long standing think it below their dignity to associate themselves with Natives and to become familiar with their ways. The veterans as well as the novices are thus almost on a par as regards knowledge of this important branch of practical jurisprudence. The people therefore naturally enough feel inclined to take the fullest advantage of this ignorance of the English judges, and it is not at all surprising if suitors contrive to have their cases sent for trial before them. In connection with the administration of justice in Native States, Sir Lepel falls foul of the judges and observes that they are corrupt and uneducated. It is admitted on all hands that want of education is the mother of all vices, and uneducated judges, if such there be, are no exception to the rule. But the contrary cannot be established from this, viz. that the superior class, the educated of whatever creed or caste, ever remain clear of a dirty charge. Humanity being the same everywhere, corruption like other kindred faults must necessarily exist even among persons of the ruling race. If there were in our vicinity a power equally strong with the British to whom the subjects of the latter could safely go with complaints against their rulers, just as the subjects of the Native princes do to the neighbouring British power, thousands of cases of deceit and fraud on the part of the party complained against would come to light. A person discovers by close attention and intimate contact certain faults in his elders and heartily desires to have them corrected. But yet from the peculiar nature of his position he dare not utter them to their face. He grumbles and sits quiet. Such is the case in this matter. In the course of his review of the revenue administration of Native States, Sir Lepel Griffin admits the fact that the peasantry there is generally less indebted to moneylenders than in British territory, but his explanation regarding freedom from debt of the peasants in Native States has not even a shadow of truth and the fact remains as indisputable as ever. Really the peasants in British India, possessing as they do proprietary rights in land, ought to fare a hundred times better than those in Native States, where they have no such rights to boast of. But these, on the contrary, are observed to thrive, while those are sinking down day by day. Evidently then there must be some serious fault in the British revenue system which has brought about this deplorable result.

Disapproves of the action of the Government of Bengal in selecting three of the principal Native newspapers of the province to make good the charge of disloyalty preferred against them.

The Indian Spectator (1) of the 25th November says:—We are afraid the Government of Bengal has adopted a mistaken policy in selecting three of the principal Native papers of the province to make good the charge of disloyalty against them. Disloyalty, sedition and treason are very vague terms. It would be idle to discuss a question before these terms have been clearly defined. Of this, however, there is no hope while some of the officials and Anglo-Indian journals continue in their present mood. Is the Bengali a disloyal paper? We read it week after week and find nothing to sustain such a charge. It is conducted by an able and well-informed writer. It may have a tendency to assume too much, to take things for granted where the official has to be judged, to think too highly of the past and too poorly of the present and the future. But under the circumstances we believe that these conditions are more or less inseparable from Indian journalism. We may add that it rests quite as much with European officials as with Native journalists to mend matters in this respect. The Reis and Rayyet too we read every week but not a trace of treason do we find in its writings. It is true that our contemporary is a little too fond of giving tit for tat; and he sometimes hits with the precision of a practised shot. As to the archtraitor, the Amrita Bazar Patrika, he is an old favourite of ours. Whatever his faults, we must say again that one journal like the Patrika is necessary in India. Let officialism abuse and condemn it ever so loudly, we have a strong belief that it is read none the less carefully in many quarters. But we should be obliged to anyone who would point out a single article from the Patrika that could be construed into treason proper. Now it must be remembered that the Native press of India is forced generally to be on the defensive, that it has to remain in an attitude of perpetual protest. Not unless our foreign administrators learn to conciliate honest Native journalists, to treat them as friends and to acknowledge their services cheerfully and to point out their faults in a kindly spirit,—not until then will the relations between the two powers become satisfactory. There is another point which must not be overlooked, namely, that Native journalists have to write in a foreign language and that at times they are apt to give offence where none is intended. Anglo-Indian officials and journalists must be more charitable. As Sir George Birdwood truly says, loyalty is the badge of Native journalism. It is our interest, no less than our duty, to be loyal in the true sense. But we cannot afford to be loyal, that is, subservient to every official in power. And this is what the official wants. The citizen who fawns upon the local magnate in office is reported by the sáheb as loyal, notwithstanding whatever this rascally johukum may say or do against Government. What has loyalty to do with the antics of an arrant hypocrite? In the interests of Government let us have a frank, vigilant, outspoken Native press and community of thinkers. Woe be to India and to England if English officials and journalists lean upon hypocritical loyalty!

Remarks in connection with the difference that has arisen between His Excellency the Governor of Bombay and the Judges of the local High Court.

The Indian Spectator (1) of the 25th November says:—The public aspect of the difference that has arisen between His Excellency the Governor and the Judges of the High Court is of grave importance. To an outside observer the question will suggest two alternatives—either that the Governor should put up with a slight inconvenience at his levée, drawing the line somewhere after the Puisne Judges, or that these latter functionaries should suffer ever so little in public estimation by a readjustment of position. Here, we must confess, there is a wide margin of discretion for any unbiassed observer who wishes to make a choice. He has to see that for many years on State occasions a certain position was assigned to the Judges of the High Court. Personally it would have made little difference to them whether they stood on one side of the Governor or opposite to him. Personally they have never attached undue importance to tedious State ceremonials, nor thought unduly of their own personal dignity. But a certain position was assigned to them at State ceremonials, in which they represented not themselves personally but the majesty of the Law. They represented indeed one branch of the Government itself. It would be folly to suppose that the Gov ernment could really identify itself with the executive at the expense of the judicial branch of the administration. We may go a little further and say that in a certain sense the law expressly causes the Government to identify itself for the announcement of its higher will with the courts, not with the executive officers. Regulation XVI. of 1827, for instance, expressly subjects Collectors to the jurisdiction of civil courts. It is obviously important that the true relation of our courts of law to the other branches of the administration should be recognised, and that no act of the executive affecting the independence of the courts should be acquiesced in, if it is desired that the country is to be subject to a reign of law and not to a rule, however beneficent, which can act independently of law. A people may be happy under a pure despotism, if that despotism is pure and good; but a despotism tempered by the presence of civil courts is much more likely to secure practical freedom in the enjoyment of private rights. Thus considered, we cannot guard the honour of our High Court too jealously. To lower the Judges who preside at the Court in public estimation by assigning them a place at State ceremonials lower than people had been accustomed to see them occupy would, even where no personal discourtesy was intended, be clearly a step in the wrong direction. Unfortunately the tendency of the executive has for a long time been to exhibit a certain jealousy of the authority of the courts. There may be no great danger to apprehend so long as Sir James Fergusson remains at the head of the Government. But a less conscientious ruler may not scruple to take advantage of any concession the Judges might make now on personal grounds. This will be a misfortune, and so far we are bound to uphold the action of the High Court Judges. But the less said and done to accentuate the difference between the executive and the judiciary the better. In the interests of good government it is necessary that there should be harmony between all branches of the administration. In spite of what has occurred, we have every reason to believe that both parties are anxious that matters should be brought to a speedy settlement. Something has been said during the week as to the Judges having threatened His Excellency because they said or hinted that they could not attend the levée except on the old footing. Now every intimation of a disagreeable purpose may be called a threat, but the mere name is nothing. To menace a man with a thrashing is a gross insult, to threaten that you won't buy his photograph is no proper ground of offence. The threat proper is of some injury or disgrace, and thus considered it is His Excellency alone who appears to have played the part of a wolf, though certainly not to the meekest of lambs. Arguments of general considerateness and courtesy are advanced in vain in order to refute or excuse specific acts of rudeness or arrogance. That our Governor is well-meaning and conscientious, and in manners a polished gentleman, no one for a moment will doubt. But that at times he betrays an arbitrary temper is equally certain. As a fact, His Excellency in the present instance fulminated a decree of what amounts to social ostracism against seven gentlemen who differed from him on a point of ceremonial. It was their duty to maintain the honour of the High Court, and having a strong opinion on the position assigned to them, it would be absurd to say they committed a crime against the State or against society in trying to get an evil remedied, stating exactly what their view was and what it bound them to. When circumstances threatened which would prevent their attendance, it was infinitely more courteous and considerate to say distinctly what they meant than to simply abstain without any reason given, like a child in sulks.

Remarks in connection with the difference between the Governor and the High Court Judges regarding the position assigned to the latter at the Governor's levée.

The Indu Prakásh (9) of the 26th November says:—Quarrels between the executive and the judiciary have not been rare in India, but the one which has just now become the absorbing topic of discussion amongst us is a little peculiar. The differences which have arisen between Sir James Fergusson and the Judges of the High Court are sufficient to adorn a tale and point a moral. But what makes the case peculiarly interesting is that they have originated in what looks a very small matter. The Governor may have the sympathy of some, but the Judges share the sympathy of the larger portion of public opinion

The Governor argues by analogy that he was quite justified in dislodging the Puisne Judges from the place assigned to them on his right on the occasion of his levées. The Judges contend that the right, so far from being unfounded, has subsisted for a long time and was exercised under successive Governors till Sir James in 1880 commanded his Aid-de-camp to summarily eject them from their usual places and ask them off-hand to stand in front of the Governor. This is a reasonable contention; at all events Sir James ought to have in justice to the Judges given them an opportunity of explaining their position. But that was not done, and the summary, though in a way courtly, injunction to the Puisne Judges to leave their old places and be content has grown into serious differences, any hope of settling which amicably and without loss of dignity to either party seems for the present remote. Sir James is not willing to give way; on the other hand, His Excellency is resolved to stand by his opinion and even justify it according to the rules of precedence. The Judges are equally bent upon doing their best for their self-preservation. They look upon the affair as an insult to the dignity of the bench—as an attempt on the part of the Executive to make the judiciary look small in the eyes of the public. To this the Governor replies that if they care not to attend his levées he will shut Government House against them, by which His Excellency probably supposes that they will look smaller in public estimation when they are treated as socially excommunicated from the parties at Government House. Matters stand in this unfortunate condition. Neither party can now recede from the position to which it has committed itself, and everybody is at a loss to know how the quarrel is to be made up. The highest of functionaries are the combatants, and that makes the case peculiarly difficult, though at the same time amusing. The Secretary of State may, and probably shall, have to intervene, but official intervention will for a certainty end in the humiliation of either the Governor or the High Court, and neither can afford to bear it.

Disapproves of the action of the Governor in the matter of the position assigned to the High Court Judges at the Governor's levée.

In an article headed "The Governor and the High Court Judges" the Native Opinion (10) of the 25th November alludes to the several mistakes which have been made during the administration of Sir James Fergusson, and says:—His last blunder has now brought him into collision with the Judges of the local High Court. Contrary to previous practice Sir James placed the Puisne Judges in front of him instead of placing them by his side at his levée. In the correspondence that has passed between him and the Acting Chief Justice, he intimates that the arrangement he made was supported by precedent and also by the practice in England observed at Her Majesty's and the Prince of Wales' levées. The former excuse is altogether unsustainable. Whatever authority is derived from the former custom goes to support the contention of the Judges and weakens his own case. As to the observance in England, we think Sir James arrogates to himself too much. The distance that exists between the Queen and the Judges, who hold commissions from her, is obviously greater than that between the Governor and the Judges here, both of whom obtain their commissions from Her Majesty. The Governor, though he be the representative of the Queen, is neither the sovereign nor her viceroy, and cannot expect to occupy the same relative position which Royalty occupies in England. Again if Sir James represents the majesty of England, the Judges equally represent the majesty of the Law, and stand in a sense even on a higher platform. Sir James not only fails completely to justify his action with reference to the High Court Judges, but in his letter makes the weakness of his own case as plain as could have been wished by the most violent partizan of the injured side. For ourselves we generally are indifferent to storms in teapots when they relate to matters of etiquette only and do not influence any more important considerations. But the present question is of a far higher import. Taking the circumstances of this country into consideration, we hold that the judicial bench ought never to be allowed to be lowered ever so little in public estimation, and everything which lowers its dignity even in appearance ought to be avoided with the most scrupulous care. The executive here is already overstrong and the people feel it, and the judiciary is the only counterbalance to it both in the eye of the public and by the constitution of the Government. For ages past we have been accustomed to look up to the bench in this country as the champion of the people's rights against their invasion by an ardent and pushing executive, and whenever danger clouded the horizon the people one and all instinctively as it were retired behind this bulwark. If this august body, occupying such an important place, is treated by the head of the executive in this shabby fashion, the people will begin to lose their faith in the dignity and independence of the bench, and the dangers which the Acting Chief Justice anticipates are by no means the only ones which will arise. It is therefore to be hoped that Sir James may now perceive his mistake and alter a course full of peril to the cause of good government in India.

Comments regarding the difference between the Governor and the High Court Judges regarding the place assigned to the latter at the Governor's levée.

The Subodh Patrika (11) of the 25th November says:—This little difference between the Governor and the Judges of the High Court is very much to be regretted, especially because the indiscretion of which both the sides have been more or less guilty has gone too far to make reconciliation possible. Many think that the Governor as well as the Acting Chief Justice could have smoothed over the rough waters in which they now find themselves by throwing a little of charity into their imaginations and not rushing to quarrel without foreseeing the consequences. In the first place it was quite injudicious on the part of the Governor to have of a sudden, in hot haste, and on his own responsibility and for the first time in his regime, broken through the long established usage which allowed the Puisne Judges of the High Court to stand to the right of the Governor at his levées. Even assuming that the usage was contrary to the recognised rules of precedence, Sir James ought to have refrained from giving sudden effect to his views when he knew that the opposite view had gained the sanction of many years. In the second place, the Acting Chief Justice ought to have, we think, taken care not to make the last of his letters to the Governor sound like a threat. The Acting Chief Justice was undoubtedly justified in standing up for the dignity of the bench. In India the tendency is to set the rule of the thumb over the rule of law. The executive officials are often known to turn their noses at judicial decisions and judicial comments upon their acts, and none are greater sticklers for dignity and place than the executive. So far no one can find fault with the part played by the Acting Chief Justice in the matter. But his mistake was that he precipitated a quarrel by so wording his letters as to be misunderstood and misconstrued. The result is that the Governor is at open war with the High Court, and the war cannot end in peace without putting either the one or the other to shame and humiliation. This is not an edifying spectacle to behold; but it is amusing and instructive. Perhaps it is better from a certain point of view that the Judges should not attend the Governor's levées and court the smiles of the very powers upon whom they are set to sit in judgment. If so, the present dead-lock will continue.

Considers His Excellency the Governor to be in the right in the matter of the disagreement that has arisen between him and the Judges of the High Court about the place assigned to the latter at His Excellency's levée.

In alluding to the little disagreement that has arisen between the Governor and the Judges of the High Court in regard to the place assigned to the latter at His Excellency's levées, the Bombay Chronicle (76) of the 25th November observes that this affair has caused sincere regret to all those who for the sake of the public interest wish that harmony should prevail among the principal functionaries of the State. On a close scrutiny it appears that, as the head of the State, His Excellency, when ordering the arrangements and assigning places to the heads of departments under his Government, was acting in strict conformity with established usage and well known English practice. The Acting Chief Justice as the head of his department was assigned his proper place and the other Judges theirs in the order of their rank. Thus there seems nothing in this arrangement to justify the objection taken to it on the score of its tending to lower the Judges in public estimation, as has been alleged. It is a pity the Acting Chief Justice gave an unhappy turn to the discussion, very probably without meaning it, and forced His Excellency, in justice to his own position, to resent it as mildly as he could under the circumstances. It is a great consolation to all, however, that matters were after all not suffered to go to that extreme which they at one time threatened to do. The little disagreement or difference of opinion that has now arisen will, it is to be hoped, be so arranged to the satisfaction of all concerned as to preclude the possibility of any further disturbance in the amicable relations which have so long characterised the attitude towards one another of His Excellency the Governor and the Judges of the High Court. [The Yajdán Parast (125) of the same date expresses similar sentiments.]

Finds fault with both parties in the dispute between His Excellency the Governor of Bombay and the Judges of the local High Court concerning the place assigned to the latter at the Governor's levée.

The Lok Mitrá (79) of the 25th November observes that the serenity and good feeling which otherwise marked the festivities held in connection with the arrival of the Duke of Connaught were somewhat marred by the disagreeable quarrel between the head of the Government and the Judges of the High Court. The occasion chosen for raising a question which had been laid by for months was singularly inopportune, and the Duke and Duchess would not have had a very flattering impression of the social amenities which could make this tempest in a teapot possible. They must have seen how small are the men of whom Indian society as laid down by the Chief Justice is mainly composed, and the idea of the Governor and the Judges quarrelling over a certainly indiscreet act of the Governor must have given them much amusement. The Governor was certainly very hasty in threatening the Judges with ostracism unless they complied with his ideas of precedence, and the Judges perhaps were equally hasty in pressing the Governor to come to a decision without giving him sufficient time and at a moment when nothing ought to have been done to ruffle the smooth course of the hospitalities in progress for the honour of the royal visitors. [The Gujaráti (98) and the Gujarát Mitrá (77) of the same date express somewhat similar sentiments.]

Disapproves of the proceedings of Government in the suit brought by them against Mr. Byrámji Jijibhái for the recovery of certain lands.

In noticing the result of the suit brought by the Secretary of State for India against Mr. Byrámji Jijibhái for the recovery of certain lands, the Rást Goftár (112) of the 25th November observes that this case shows very clearly how over-zealous and wilful officials in the mofussil sometimes magnify matters, allow themselves to be led away by false reports, and bring the good name of English justice into disrepute. But the courts of justice are the great bulwarks of liberty. Mr. Byrámji has obtained justice, but he has got it at an enormous sacrifice of money. In order to defend his cause he was obliged to engage three barristers, three pleaders and a solicitor; but according to the rules of the mofussil courts he will scarcely be paid one-tenth of the actual cost incurred. A ridiculous feature of this case is that the officials who in 1863 tried to wrest the lands from Mr. Limji were in doubt about the extent of the land which they claimed and the Government village to which the claimed property should be attached; and similar doubts were entertained while the recent suit was going on. In the plaint the lands claimed were alleged to have belonged to two Government villages, but while the suit was proceeding the plaintiff's witnesses asserted that the property belonged to one village only, and an attempt was made to prove by documentary evidence that it formed part of another village. It is surprising that such discrepancies as these should be found in a case conducted by Government with its immense resources.

Complains that information about the Governor's movements and levée is not supplied to Native newspapers.

The Yajdán Parast (125) of the 25th November wishes to be informed why the Governor's intended movements are notified only in the local English papers. The Native population is equally interested with the European in knowing the movements of His Excellency. The Native Chiefs have considerable business with His Excellency, but they do not read the English papers. It is therefore desirable that information about His Excellency's departure and arrival at different places should be communicated to the vernacular newspapers also. It is also incomprehensible why information regarding His Excellency's levées is not supplied to the vernacular newspapers also. It will be interesting to know if the Private Secretary has any solid reason for making this distinction. [The Jáme Jamshed (102) of the 27th November expresses similar sentiments. The Jáme of the 29th idem complains that the Bombay Government supplied only to the two local English dailies a copy of Lord Kimberley's telegram contradicting the report spread by Mr. Atkins that the English Cabinet did not support the Ilbert Bill. Fortunately for the vernacular newspapers they had received a copy of the telegram from the Press Commissioner with the Government of India on the very day on which the English dailies were favoured by the Bombay Government, and consequently the news appeared simultaneously in the English and the vernacular newspapers. It is to be hoped that Sir James Fergusson will not allow any distinction to be observed in supplying information to the English and Native press.]

Suggests the adoption of timely measures for the destruction of locusts in the Ratnágiri District.

The Bakul (15) of the 25th November in its local news states that locusts are rapidly increasing in number and that they are absolutely swarming in the Devgad Táluka. The cold season offers capital opportunities for destroying locusts, and therefore the operations for killing these creatures should at once be recommenced. If this suggestion is acted upon, the trouble of finding out the eggs of locusts will be saved hereafter. Will Government direct its attention to this matter? asks the Bakul.

Complains of the awkward and careless way in which Mr. Macpherson, Judge and Sessions Judge, dispenses justice at Surat.

The Vartamán Sár (122) of the 27th November says that although it had strong reasons to complain of the awkward and careless way in which Mr. Macpherson, Judge of Surat, dispensed justice, yet it kept quiet. But day by day some strange change is taking place in this hot-tempered Judge and it is now necessary to write against him. Mr. Macpherson is really a straightforward and impartial Judge and the possession of these qualities undoubtedly makes him fit for the judicial chair. But it appears from his behaviour that he is tired of Surat and is doing his duty without zeal. He has not given his decision in the civil appeal cases which were heard six months ago. He does not appear to think of the loss which may have been occasioned to the parties concerned by such delay. From the list of appeals he selects those the hearing and decision of which will occupy very little time, while he allows long appeal cases to remain. He is very unpunctual in attending the court. He comes at any time during the day, and after despatching business for a short time retires from the court. As the pleaders engaged in appeal cases do not know the time of his coming into court, he strikes out cases in the event of their non-appearance and thus involves their clients in great losses. He does not listen to the explanation which the pleaders may have to offer regarding their absence, and in conformity with his fiery temper only strongly censures them. The poor pleaders quietly put up with the insult. The case in which three persons were charged with the murder of a Bráhman named Jihinábhái alias Jatáshankar was to be tried before him at the criminal sessions beginning on the 5th November; but the sessions was postponed six times, as he was not ready to proceed with the work on account of the ábkári appeal cases. The inconvenience and trouble caused to the prosecutor, the accused and their witnesses by the frequent postponement of the sessions is apparent. Pleaders and experienced persons have not seen justice dispensed in this way by any of the former Judges. The High Court ought to take notice of such conduct. Does the High Court know of these delays, and has it asked for any explanation from him? The High Court will know the hardships suffered by the people from the way in which he dispenses justice and from his notes. It is said that Mr. Macpherson twice requested Government to transfer him from Surat, but Government could not comply with his request. For the good of the poor people of Surat a hardworking and cool-tempered Judge like Mr. Hosking or Mr. Cordeaux should be appointed. The Vartamán Sár prays Government to attend to this matter and earn the blessings of the people. [The Deshi Mitrá (93) of the 29th November expresses disapproval of the frequent postponement of the criminal sessions, which was to have commenced on the 5th November at Surat, and the inconvenience and trouble caused thereby, and asks whether there is nobody to attend to this matter.]

Requests Government to depute a doctor to prescribe for people who are suffering from fever and other diseases in the Khándesh Collectorate.

The Khándesh Vaibhav (35) of the 23rd November in its local news states that owing to the excessive and heavy rainfall this year ague, malarious fever, cough and other diseases have been making terrible havoc among the people of the Khándesh Collectorate. Thousands of people have already died and many are suffering from this visitation. The Vaibhav suggests that Government should depute a doctor to prescribe for the suffering population.

Recommends the construction of a canal for the supply of water to the town of Gogha.

A correspondent of the Gujarát Mitrá (77) of the 25th November observes that the town of Gogha is likely to suffer this year from scarcity of water. Government have constructed some water-works on the Sonáriya tank at a cost of about ten thousand rupees, but the expenditure has proved a mere waste. During a scarcity of water rich people get the necessary supply on carts, but the poor are put to great inconvenience from being required to bring it from a long distance. The course of the Kareda river can be diverted and its water made to flow into the Surkáta canal at a cost of about twenty thousand rupees. If this is done, Gogha will not have to suffer frequently from scarcity of water. Government ought to attend to this suggestion.

Complains that the water of the tank in the village of Karla is made filthy by the fishermen of Rájiwada, who wash their nets in it contrary to the orders of the district authorities.

A correspondent of the Bakul (15) of the 25th November states that in the village of Karla in the Ratnágiri Táluka there is a tank close by the principal road in which the cattle of the place and of the neighbouring villages are brought to drink. The water of this tank is, however, made filthy by the fishermen of the village of Rájiwada, who wash their nets in it. They have been repeatedly told not to spoil the water of the tank by washing their nets, for which a separate place has been assigned to them, but they persist in carrying on their work. The correspondent trusts that the Collector of Ratnágiri and the Mámlatdár of the Ratnágiri Táluka will take measures to prevent the fishermen of Rájiwada from spoiling the water of the tank.

Says that the police of Bombay ought not to prosecute the Bohora shopkeepers for giving false evidence in the case in which certain accusations were preferred against certain police officers.

The Yajdán Parast (125) of the 25th November observes that the public is dissatisfied with the decision given by the Chief Magistrate of Police, Bombay, in the matter of the prosecution of some police officers by certain Bohora shopkeepers. It is said that the police officers are trying to prosecute the Bohoras on a charge of giving false evidence against them. It will be unfortunate for the Bohoras to find themselves again in the prisoners' dock after having been beaten by the police officers and after having undergone considerable expense in prosecuting them. If the unfortunate Bohoras are again placed in this unpleasant position the people should assist them by a public subscription. If the police officers prosecute the Bohoras, the agitation which has been caused among the people by the conduct of the former will increase and expose them to the public indignation. It is to be hoped that Sir Frank Souter will prevent the officers from prosecuting them. He should duly punish policeman Ládu, whose illegal conduct gave rise to the fracas between the police and the Bohoras. Due notice ought also to be taken of the constables who supported Ládu. The public is confident that the Commissioner will not fail in his duty.

Says that adulteration of milk sold in Bombay ought to be punished by law.

The same observes that it was stated in a recent issue of the Graphic that some milkmen were fined in a police court in London for mixing water with milk and for selling the mixture as unadulterated milk. The milkmen of Bombay largely adulterate their milk with water and chalk, and yet they are not punished because the Indian Penal Code does not consider this kind of adulteration a crime. Hence the fraud is barefacedly practised. But it will be a great blessing to Bombay to apply to it the law which exists in London for punishing this fraud. An amendment of the Penal Code in this respect is desirable in the public interests.

Legislation.

Disapproves of the Select Committee's report on the Bombay Local Boards Bill.

In noticing the report of the Select Committee on the Bombay Local Boards Bill, the Bombay Samáchár (88) of the 27th November observes that it is disappointing that the Committee should not have recommended that the clause in the draft Bill for appointing the Collector president of the local board should be removed and the board authorised to elect its own president. The Bill not only insists upon the appointment of the Collector as president, but clothes him with powers that he ought not to possess. If the Collector wishes that a certain public work should be undertaken which the committee does not desire to execute, he can compel it to do so, and if he disapproves of a certain work which the committee wishes to carry out, he can stop the work. This arrangement will destroy the independence of the committee, nullify the advantages of popular representation, and leave all authority in the hands of the Collector. The managing committee is authorised to elect its own chairman, who is to carry on the business, and the Collector-president is not to interfere with his proceedings except on emergent occasions, and even then he is to inform the Commissioner and Government of his intention before making any interference, but these precautions do not remove in the least the objection taken to the Collector being made the president. Had the Select Committee recommended the removal of this objectionable clause it would have acted in accordance with public opinion. Another objectionable clause in the Bill is that which authorises Government to appoint such Government servants as it selects to work in the local board. But it ought to be remembered that the subordinates of the Collector will not like to raise objections to the proposals made by their official superior or to give an opinion contrary to his wishes. The Select Committee has suggested that Government should appoint private individuals and not Government servants on local boards and the number of these nominees should not exceed half of the total number of the members composing the boards. But it is quite natural that the nominees of Government should be inclined to the side of Government. Government has promised to remove gradually all these checks, but there is no need whatever for these precautions. Government is afraid without sufficient reason that if the whole authority is left in the hands of the people evil results will follow. If in spite of this protest the Bill is passed with the modifications suggested by the Select Committee, the so-called local self-government will confer no advantages whatever. [The Dátardun (92) of the 29th November is not satisfied with the suggestions made by the Select Committee appointed to report upon the Bombay Local Self-government Bills, and says that they remain very nearly what they were before.]

Disapproves of limiting the power of Native Judges and Magistrates over European accused persons to those Natives who may attain to the position of District Magistrates and Sessions Judges.

With reference to the modifications suggested by Lord Northbrook in the Native Magistrates' Jurisdiction Bill, the Bakul (15) of the 25th November says that the alterations sanctioned by the home authorities will only in theory empower Native Judges to try European culprits, but practically they will rarely get an opportunity of exercising that power. From the present temper of the European population in India it seems extremely unlikely that any European would willingly submit to be tried for a criminal offence by a Native Judge. Should a European accused move the High Court to transfer his case from the court of a Native Judge or Magistrate to that of a European, he stands the best chance of his application being granted. If the privilege which is to be granted to European accused persons is extended to Native criminals, the latter, who do not object to be tried by European Judges or Magistrates, would hardly ever succeed in inducing the High Court to transfer their cases from the jurisdiction of a European to that of a Native Judge or Magistrate. Even if the High Court grants the prayer of the applicant there is every likelihood that the latter will not have justice done to him. The only result of giving Europeans the power of claiming to be tried by a Judge or Magistrate of their own race will be that Native Judges and Magistrates will be lowered in public estimation. The Bakul is of opinion that no accused person, whether European or Native, should have the power given to him of questioning the right to try him by a Judge or Magistrate on account of the latter's colour or nationality. If accused persons are dissatisfied with the decision of the Judge trying them, they have the power of appeal to the High Court. The Bakul thinks it unlikely that Lord Ripon will acquiesce in the modifications suggested by Lord Northbrook. If His Lordship really wishes to put Europeans and Natives on a footing of equality, he ought not to agree to the alterations proposed by the Home Government. [The Shiváji (61) of the 23rd November also disapproves of the modifications suggested by Lord Northbrook and expresses sentiments on them somewhat similar to those of the Bakul.]

Education.

In noticing the recommendations of the Education Commission, the Native Opinion (10) of the 25th November says:—

Does not approve of the transfer of Government colleges to the management of the people and gives reasons.

The position of the Commission that the people are not at present fit for the higher responsibilities is sound, and it recommends therefore to confine all transfers of institutions to the management of the people to secondary educational institutions. As time advances men may be found to put their shoulders to the task, but the great drawback in the beginning will be the want of funds. We are not, however, hopeless of our secondary schools being taken up sooner or later by private managers. But as to Government colleges, their transfer to private enterprise is altogether inadvisable at present, first because their existence is necessary to turn out young men to take charge of secondary institutions, and secondly because as efficient models to private managers their existence is equally necessary. Competition is the very soul of efficiency; to keep collegiate institutions conducted by private managers up to the present standard will necessitate the existence of such institutions as the Elphinstone and the Deccan Colleges. The closing of these institutions will lead to the deterioration of other similar seminaries. The primary object of missionaries is not the education of our people but their conversion, and so soon as Government institutions are closed their present but forced alacrity in the cause of education will necessarily lag behind. The coolness of the latter may equally damp, though not destroy, the educational zeal of private managers. It may be urged, however, by some that the cooling down of the willingness of missionaries is no reason why the alacrity of others should damp also. In considering this side of the question it is not to be forgotten that private managers do not and cannot command every possible means of keeping an institution in full working order like the State, and it is quite possible under the circumstances that private managers may fail to keep up to the mark. It is to avoid this falling off and to incite them to put forth every effort in the direction of efficiency that the existence of Government colleges is of paramount importance. In considering the transfer of Government institutions to private managers the Commission insists upon Government not to allow the plea of shortness of funds to weigh with them.

The Satyá Mitrá (115) of the 25th November is glad that the Education Commission has among other recommendations suggested that moral and religious instruction should be given in every Government educational institution. The Satyá Mitrá has many times complained against the absence of such tuition and the evils caused thereby. It is gratifying that the Commission has come to the same conclusion. Moral and religious instruction should be introduced into private schools and colleges also. There can be no doubt that this step will prove beneficial not only to the people but to Government also.

Is glad that the Education Commission has recommended the introduction of moral and religious instruction into Government schools and colleges.

The Vartamán Sár (122) of the 27th November complains of the mismanagement of the Fardunji Sorábji School of Art, which is under the superintendence of the Surat Municipality, refers to the unfitness of Mr. Dáhyábhái, the present Superintendent of the school, for the post he occupies, as evidenced by the petitions presented against him, and says that the school has been reduced to such a bad condition that a few boys only now study the work of fitters. It is desirable that the school should either be placed on a sound footing or entirely abolished, and the money saved by its abolition should be utilized in giving scholarships to boys of poor parents in order to enable them to join the School of Art in Poona or Bombay. It is useless spending about four or five thousand rupees per annum on this institution and maintaining it in this wretched condition. But the best course is that out of the income from the funds of this school prizes should be given every year for the best specimen of Native artizanship.

Complains of the bad condition of the Fardunji Sorábji School of Art at Surat.

Railways.

In a paragraph headed "The Chánda Railway Scheme" the Native Opinion (10) of the 25th November says:—Mr. J. Seymour Keay deserves the thanks of the subjects of the Nizám for his disinterested and timely protest against the scheme. Apart from the statistical details showing the inexpediency of the measure, he denies pointblank the statement that the Chánda Railway scheme received the approval and sanction of the late minister, much less that of the present Council of Regency. Such bold contradiction, coming as it does from an Englishman, is rather a hard nut to crack for those who have been saying all manner of things about the present and past Hyderabad Governments having accorded sanction to the proposal. Mr. Keay's memorandum is full of facts and figures, showing that the Nizám's treasury is not in a position to meet any demands that may be made upon it when the scheme will be taken in hand. Since the late minister is now no more, his approval of the scheme requires to be proved, nor do we believe that the Hyderabad finances are in a more flourishing condition than they were under the late Sir Sálar Jung so as to enable the Regency to accord their sanction to the project. We beseech the Supreme Government to reconsider the question in the interests of the young Nizám.

The Chánda Railway project and remarks in connection therewith.

Native States.

A correspondent of the Gujarát Mitrá (77) of the 25th November states that three years ago a notification from the Government of Bombay was posted in the town of Cambay that persons dissatisfied with the decision passed by the Political Agent and desirous of appealing to Government should send their appeal in the form of a brief statement of the case and the relief sought for written in the English language. But there are few or no persons in this town who can write their appeals in English. The rich people go to Bombay and get their appeals written there, but there are several poor persons who cannot send in their appeals in English. For the benefit of the latter, Government ought to permit the writing of the appeals in the Gujaráti language.

Requests Government to permit the people of Cambay to write their appeals in the Gujaráti language.

The Vartamán Sár (122) of the 27th November hears from a reliable source that a petition is being got up and signed by the principal bankers and merchants of Cambay with a view to present it to the Political Agent. The petition contains a good description of the intrigues of Mahádevbhái and of the matter pertaining to imposts. It will all end well, as the Diván has made the clever, learned, popular Mahádevbhái his adviser, who was also a favourite of the preceding Political Agents!!! Cambay will now be rid of misery!

Cambay affairs.

The Hitechchhu (78) of Ahmedabad of the 29th November describes the miseries suffered by a young Nágar of Ahmedabad, who was recently on a visit to Mount Abu and was plundered there along with seven other Hindus by robbers belonging to the Mina tribe and otherwise Complains of the prevalence of robberies in the Native State of Sirohi.

maltreated, and remarks that though such cases are of frequent occurrence in that locality no measures are taken to prevent them. The Sirohi State does nothing to put a stop to them. It is to be regretted that the Political Department does not move in the matter. It is to be hoped that such ravages will be speedily put a stop to.

Berár Affairs.

Says that a Native gentleman should be appointed Director of Public Instruction, Berár, when the present Director retires from the service.

The Pramod Sindhu (50) of the 26th November, in referring to the probable retirement from service of Ráo Báhádur Náráyan B. Dándekar, Director of Public Instruction in the Berárs, remarks:—Mr. Dándekar was the first Native who was placed at the head of a department. The appointment was made with the express purpose of seeing how a Native would manage a department. The experiment has proved a complete success. His detractors even cannot deny that he has given signal proof of his capacity for administrative organization. It is therefore only natural that the Native community should consider that the appointment now belongs to it and that it should be conferred on one of its own community. Again there are many weighty reasons why the place should be given to a Native rather than to a European. Over and over again it has been declared during the last fifty years and more that Natives should receive a fair share of the higher appointments under Government. Both Conservative and Liberal ministries have laid down that for political and economical reasons Native agency should be utilized to a greater extent than heretofore in the superior grades of the various services. It was in pursuance of this wise policy that the Directorship in the Berárs was given to a Native in 1875. It could not be supposed for a moment that what was considered expedient and just then has ceased to be so now. We have no fears on this head. If when the matter goes up to the Government of India the reasons which led to the appointment of Mr. Dándekar are brought to the notice of Lord Ripon, His Lordship would, we feel confident, confer the place on a qualified Native gentleman. Nor have we any misgivings regarding the good sense either of the Commissioner or the Resident. Both of them are known to hold liberal and enlightened views, and we can at any rate count upon their not advocating a reactionary policy. The Pramod Sindhu then advocates the claims of Mr. S. B. Jatár, Educational Inspector, to the Directorship, and adds that his claims have been already partially acknowledged. It is to be hoped that he will get the promotion he so richly deserves. There is no appointment which will give greater general satisfaction. [The Varhád Samáchár (68) of the same date expresses similar sentiments.]

Notes.—A. The notices from the different Newspapers have been collected in the Report under different heads, which are printed in italics.

B. The names of Newspapers are printed in the body of the Report in italics, and the number of the Newspaper in the above list is printed in brackets after the name.

C. The proprietors of the Newspapers marked * have not given information as to the number of copies issued. In these cases an estimate has been made by the Reporter.

D. The system of spelling vernacular words followed by the Reporter is the same as that adopted in the Official Spelling List of the Bombay Presidency. One peculiar feature of this system is that when the long a (आ or ा) is the last letter of a word, the accent is left out, and the short a (अ = u in gun) is, to prevent confusion, never placed at the end of a word. This rule has been strictly followed, except that when the short a appears to be absolutely necessary to complete the pronunciation of a word, as in Arunodaya or the well known Mitra, it is printed with a mark over it to indicate that it is short, thus—ă.

E. Berár papers are received in this office for report under the Resolution of the Government of Bombay in the General Department, No. 1705, dated 8th June 1881.

Politics and the Public Administration.

Requests Mr. Gladstone to repeal the duty levied on silver plate imported into England.

The Hitechchhu (80) of Ahmedabad of the 6th December requests Mr. Gladstone to abolish the duties levied on silver plate imported into England. Mr. Gladstone has somewhat lost the confidence which the people of India had placed in him when he was in Opposition and was advocating their cause. He threw on India a portion of the expenses of the Afghan War, which while in Opposition he said that India should not be made to pay. India was also made to defray a portion of the expenses of the war in Egypt, which was solely undertaken for protecting the interests of England. He allowed the repeal of the Indian cotton duties, which has caused a great loss to the Indian treasury, and the continuance of the odious license tax. The promise to repeal the silver duty levied in England has been allowed to lie dormant for the last two years. It is however to be hoped that Mr. Gladstone will not allow his high character for justice and impartiality to be sullied by not abolishing the silver duty in the interests of the people of India. If he attends to the matter now, he will be able to do something regarding it in the next budget. His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales has announced that an exhibition of the industrial works of India and the Colonies will be held in England in 1886. In order to enable the poor artizans of this country to prepare their silverware and to profit by their sale at the exhibition, the Government of India should put themselves into communication with the Secretary of State for India and through him should urge the Home Government to abolish the duty on silverware imported into England. [The Ahmedabad Samáchár (84) of the 5th and the Broach Samáchár (91) of the 6th December also point out the advisability of repealing the silver duty levied in England.]

Points out the inadvisability of maintaining only a European volunteer force in India.

The Indian Spectator (1) of the 2nd December refers to the publication of Major Collen's prize essay on the volunteer force in India, and remarks:—We are not one of those who grudge any reasonable expenditure from the revenues of India for purposes of the defence of the empire by volunteers in India's hour of need. But what does the maintenance of volunteers imply politically? It means one thing only, namely, that the British Government mistrusts the loyalty of Natives. Can real sympathy increase between the two races so long as such palpable want of confidence actuates our rulers? If the people at large are to be kept contented and loyal, we must say that the present policy of maintaining only a European volunteer force at the expense of the natives of India is a great blunder. It is a humiliation for Natives which must always rankle in their hearts. Are Europeans alone able to defend the empire? Is not their own country dear to the natives? Whose interests are more permanent? Of the natives, of course. Then why not ask Natives to march shoulder to shoulder with Europeans? Assuming that the four lákhs of rupees that are annually spent at present on the maintenance of the volunteer force of 12,000 men are well spent, what guarantee is there that the force distributed at various strategic points will be of real use in times of danger? It must be remembered that a few hundred volunteers, all congregated in their respective presidency towns, cannot resist a formidable force while the regular troops are withdrawn for service elsewhere. Even these few hundred may be required to be told off for duty in small detachments over different parts of the country. Can a few volunteers in any given place defend it for long against heavy odds? British pluck may work wonders. But pluck even has its limit against solid battalions. It is one thing to have a large volunteer force numbering over 200,000 men in the United Kingdom with a population of 3½ krors, all British, burning to defend hearth and home against foreign aggression: it is another thing to have a small force of 12,000 aliens in India having no permanent interests or ties here, scattered far and wide over a million and half square miles with 210 millions of population. There is also another aspect of the matter. Suppose that those expected to defend fail in their duty at the proper hour—that at a time when India is threatened from without something or other happens which creates or leads to the sort of agitation we are witnessing to-day in connection with the Jurisdiction Bill—that a few ardent volunteers excite regular European soldiers to mutiny, and that they march down the Viceregal palace and defy Government—that they throw off allegiance to the Secretary of State, as some have already threatened, and proclaim themselves independent Britons sworn to maintain British ascendancy, a new order militant based on solemn league and covenant,—has the Government of India given thought to this contingency? We admit it is a very remote one; but after what is now happening and after the new creed of British ascendancy which some of our contemporaries are so sedulously preaching, is it not necessary to take thought of every such contingency?

Remarks on the present condition and position of the class of educated Natives.

With reference to the educated Natives the Subodh Patrika (11) of the 2nd December says:—This class of men has not been for some time past in favour with anybody. Although whatever activity is displayed in the onward movement of the Indian nation in the various departments of public life mainly springs from this class of men, yet it is a fact that educated Natives as a class do not find favour with anybody. They are despised and disliked by the high classes of their uneducated countrymen as being unpatriotic, denationalized and given to the newly imported vices from the West. Their half-educated brethren join chorus with the uneducated and embitter their attacks on them with impotent malice and ill-disguised jealousy. The Christian missionaries dislike them as being strongly opposed to their work of religious propagandism, both with reference to themselves and also with reference to the masses. They lament that the days are gone by when they could bring within their fold neglected and straying sheep from the Hindu community without being hindered by the spread of liberal and cosmopolitan ideas by the educated classes. They regretfully look back upon those days when their own evangelizing educational institutions were all in all and when they themselves were looked upon as the source of all light and life, and they naturally hate the increasing numbers that are being educated in Government institutions for their utter indifference to the Bible and missionary preaching. They are looked upon with scorn and hatred, often scarcely disguised, by the majority of the Anglo-Indians, whether official or non-official, for seeking social, official, and political equality with them. They cannot realize the fact that the altered circumstances of this country and of its public services do not any longer admit of the old má-báp system, under which almost every Native stood with low submission in the presence of an Anglo-Indian, and when the latter could always treat the former with a patronizing air. One might suppose that the educated Native would strongly defend himself against the combined attacks and aspersions of the Anglo-Indians, the missionaries, and their own half-educated countrymen. But their own successes in the various departments of public activity being as yet small as compared with their aspirations, they have no heart for a profitless controversy with the various classes of their detractors. Conscious of the rectitude of their aims, conscious also of the inadequacy of their efforts to any sudden realization of their great aspirations, and not blind to those shortcomings which they necessarily share to some extent in common with their other countrymen, they prefer, it seems, to leave the task of defending themselves to time and to results. Under these circumstances we are glad to see that the Education Commission in its report has pronounced a verdict which is on the whole favourable to the educated Natives.

Censures the Englishman for charging the vernacular press in Bengal with disloyalty.

In a paragraph headed "Tone of the Bengal Vernacular Press," the Native Opinion (10) of the 2nd December says:—Along with the right of being tried exclusively by European Magistrates some of the Englishmen in Bengal are pleased to consider, it seems, the right of abusing others peculiarly their own. We wish them joy for all that, but at least the Englishman should not have shown quite a want of taste when he himself has been the most flagrant of delinquents in this respect in pointing out a mole in another's eye when there is a beam in his own. It is said that the Englishman has taken upon himself the task of drawing the attention of Government to the tone of the Bengal vernacular press.

Extracts are published giving instances of the seditious character of Native writing; and we could have showered encomiums upon him for impartiality had he but included in those extracts cuttings from his own paper abusive of the representative of the Empress out here. But as he has not done this, he cannot but be regarded as a partizan in the matter. Before fixing a seditious character upon others, we would ask him to consider his own position in respect to the law of defamation.

Approves of the recent nomination to the Statutory Civil Service of this Presidency.

The same says:—We are glad Government have selected the son of Ráo Báhádur Bholánáth Sárábhái for this year's prize in the Native Civil Service. Mr. Narsingráo is a graduate of the local University, and was always a marked man while at college. Against him the Anglo-Indian press cannot raise the objection which they try to hurl against others. Coming as he does from a respectable family, he fairly claims all those educational advantages which a Covenanted Civil Servant ought to possess. Let Government exercise such judicious discretion in the matter of these appointments and then no special provision will be found necessary to make the Statutory Civil Service what it ought to be. [The Rást Goftár (114) and many other papers approve of the nomination.]

Says that too much reliance should not be placed on the returns furnished by village accountants regarding the quantity of mortgaged lands in each village belonging to peasants.

The Arunodayá (13) of the 2nd December says that on the requisition of Government the village accountants have furnished returns of the lands of peasants in each village which have been mortgaged. Such information will be extremely useful if accurate and reliable; but it is extremely unlikely that the village accountants will be able to furnish returns which will be correct and satisfactory. It is of course very creditable to the village authorities that they are able to give the statistics when called for, but too much reliance should not be placed on them. They are not competent to prepare in a thorough and business-like manner the immense variety of information and returns which they are called upon to furnish. The Arunodayá trusts that in making use of the returns called for regarding the mortgaged lands in each village Government will not place too much reliance on their accuracy.

Comments in connection with the memorial presented to His Excellency the Governor of Bombay by the Bráhman inhabitants of the village of Waduth in the Sátára District regarding the annoyance suffered by them at the hands of certain Mhár converts to Christianity.

The Mahrátta (2) of the 2nd December remarks:—It is only a few weeks ago that Lord Ripon issued a resolution regulating the use of pistols by shikáris, and we fear His Excellency will be soon put to the necessity of issuing another resolution regulating the conduct and movements of the missionaries and their disciples, the Native converts to Christianity. We have heard that missionary work has been a source of pain and anxiety to many of the heathens in different parts of the country; but the case detailed in the memorial to the Governor of Bombay by the Bráhman inhabitants of the little village of Waduth in the Sátára District appears to be the crowning piece of the series of missionary troubles. From the memorial it appears that certain Mhár converts, though very few in number, have proved even more than a match for the Bráhman inhabitants of the village. The Bráhmans have been fighting out their case in no less than three courts but have not been able to get justice. They have therefore run to the highest authority in the Presidency. The memorial, we are sorry, is not well drawn up, inasmuch as it contains certain statements which, we think, it will be very difficult to substantiate, even if true. The memorial states that a certain Magistrate was influenced by a particular individual to give his decision in a particular way. We have no faith in such statements. Our inference in such matters always is that the complaining party has failed to produce evidence which can be considered as conclusive against the facts advanced by the opposite party. The facts stated in the memorial are, however, too clear, and we have every hope that the Government of Bombay will mete out justice to the oppressed people.

Disapproves of the appointment of Mr. David Watson as Sheriff of Bombay for the ensuing year.

The Yajdán Parast (127) of the 2nd December expresses surprise that Mr. David Watson should have been appointed Sheriff of Bombay for the ensuing year. Mr. Watson has never rendered such services to the public as to deserve the honourable and lucrative office of Sheriff. Of late the Bombay Government has been in the habit of bestowing honours and offices on persons who command influence and bring recommendations, and perhaps the shrievalty has been given away on the same considerations. It is to be regretted that the high officers of Government should succumb to flattery and bestow honours and lucrative offices on flatterers. There are several European and Native gentlemen in Bombay who have rendered valuable services to Government, and one of them ought to have been selected for the post of Sheriff of Bombay.

Heartily supports the founding of St. John's Ambulance Association in Bombay.

In noticing the public meeting recently held for the purpose of founding St. John's Ambulance Association in Bombay, the Bombay Samáchár (78) of the 2nd December observes that the aims of the association are worthy of the support of all nations, especially of the natives of India, whose religious men are so well distinguished for charity and mercy. The institution seeks to afford to humanity suffering from accidents that timely relief and treatment which experience has proved to be of invaluable importance in assuaging pain and preventing permanent deformity or decrepitude, as also death. From its multifarious industries Bombay stands in great need of this charitable institution, and it is to be hoped that the public spirit and liberality of her citizens will carry out the commendable work. [The Yajdán Parast (127) and some other papers of this week express similar sentiments.]

Local Self-government.

Remarks in connection with the report of the Select Committee appointed to report upon the Bombay Local Boards Bill.

In an article headed "The Report of the Select Committee on the Bombay Local Boards Bill," the Indu Prakásh (9) of the 3rd December says:—It is very gratifying to observe that the Committee have treated with deference and respect the representations of such public bodies as the Bombay Branch of the East India Association, the Poona Sárvajanik Sabha and the Sind Sabha, and have to a certain extent adopted their suggestions. If the Committee have not gone as far as these bodies or the Native press desired them to go, they have done so advisedly and on principle, and we are not on the whole inclined to quarrel with their conclusions. The Committee have declined to increase the minimum number of elected members on the boards further than that given in the Bill. It seems to be feared that election being an exotic in Indian soil, it may take some time to take deep root and to attain a healthy growth, and that it is uncertain how it will work in the first instance. It follows, therefore, that it is necessary to proceed cautiously in applying the elective form of government to the districts. It is impossible to say these fears are altogether groundless, and on the whole the solution arrived at by the Committee, coupled with the assurances of Government contained in the Honourable Mr. Badrudin's minute, must be accepted as satisfactory. The same observations apply to the much-vexed question of the official or non-official president. But in respect to the total number of members on each kind of board, we wish the Committee had acquiesced in the proposal of Mr. Badrudin to fix the number at 16 for the táluka and 32 for the district boards. The honourable mover of the Bill has indeed given an assurance that the arrangements which Government intend to make will secure approximately the number proposed by Mr. Badrudin. In spite of such declaration, we think it is highly important that the number of members should be once for all fixed by statute. It is not desirable to leave it indefinite and at the discretion of the executive. It is much better, we think, that the total number, like the number to be elected by each constituency, should be declared by law, and that the executive Government should make their arrangements in accordance with the law. We have the highest confidence in the individual members of the present Government, and we fully believe that the assurances held out by the Honourable Mr. Peile will be carried out. But the successors of the present Government will be guided in their action by the letter of the law. The intention of the framer of an Act is rarely taken as a guide in its interpretation beyond the express words of the enactment. It is therefore necessary that the various assurances should in one form or another be incorporated in the Bill itself. On the subject of qualifications and disqualifications of members and voters there is yet some ground for dissatisfaction. We are glad to see that the disqualification arising from a criminal conviction has been limited to convictions for non-compoundable offences. The limit of age may, we still think, be advantageously lowered to 18, and the disqualification attaching to a Subordinate Judge should be removed. The Subordinate Judge is frequently the best informed and the best cultivated man in a táluka. He will be a valuable counsellor to the boards, and they should not be deprived of his assistance. The ground on which the Subordinate Judge is excluded is that he will have to try cases in which the board will be concerned. But this difficulty may, we think, be obviated by either empowering him, if he should be a member of the board, to transfer the case to another Judge, or enacting that the cases should be tried by the District Judge, as in those cases in which a Government officer is a party. Among the qualifications the tests of education and profession are still ignored. The Honourable Mr. Badrudin has, it appears, fought in vain to persuade the Committee to adopt these tests, but, we trust, he will be more successful in the Council. Government no doubt possess under clause (7) of Section 10 the very wide powers of declaring any person eligible they may think fit, but we are afraid such discretionary use of power will not always secure the franchise to those who by their education and experience richly deserve it. On the subject of the duties of the boards the Committee have proposed a very valuable amendment. They have divided the duties into necessary and optional, and have placed in the latter class all those works of famine relief and experimental farms and so forth to which we objected in a former issue. The construction of water-works has been explained not to include works of irrigation, and the measures for the preservation of water from pollution are declared to mean works for that purpose and not police regulations. Making provision for primary education is among the necessary duties, while that for secondary education is left at the discretion of the boards. The vague provisions as to the transfer of Government roads and buildings to the local boards have been modified. The transfer cannot now be made without the consent of the boards. The provisions as to revenue and expenditure have received very considerable modification. The district board is now the chief controlling and disbursing authority, and the táluka boards have been reduced to a very subordinate position. The control of the local funds, the employment of servants, the payment of their salaries, the initiation of local public works and sanctioning of annual budgets are all vested in the district boards. The táluka boards are to look after primary schools and other local institutions. One-third of the total local fund has to be appropriated to education. In regard to the construction of public works a new provision is added, by which works which will cost more than Rs. 500 are required to be constructed according to plans and estimates prepared or approved by the Government Executive Engineer of the district, and Government have reserved to themselves the power of requiring the boards to get such works done by the Executive Engineer and his staff. We think the arrangement proposed is gravely objectionable. The small works that have usually to be done by local boards, such as building school-houses, dharmashálás and so forth, are, we think, such as require no engineering skill or experience and are likely to be done more economically and efficiently by the local authorities themselves than by the Public Works Department. The Public Works Department is notoriously wasteful and expensive. Its officers are mostly ignorant of local wants, and are too often inclined to sacrifice convenience and accommodation to architectural elegance and effect. Professional advice and aid will be useful in the construction of such works, but to make it incumbent on the boards to seek professional assistance in every case in which a work will cost more than Rs. 500 is, we think, an unnecessary interference with the independence of the boards, and is sure to be highly injurious. The old limit of Rs. 2,500 is much to be preferred, and may, we think, be advantageously retained if not increased. Thus while the amendments show a considerable improvement on the Bill, there are yet certain matters which require alteration. As compared to the old law of 1869 the Bill as amended will give quite a new life to the local boards. They will be composed of at least one-half nominated members, and half of the latter will be non-official. They may have a non-official president, but if the president be an official they will have a non-official vice-president, who will in all matters be nearly equal to the president, and the latter will be instructed to leave the work of administration as much as possible in the hands of such vice-president. The boards will have absolute power over their funds. They will make their own budgets annually, and execute such works within their local areas as they think proper. They have thus been relieved of the seven years' budget system and of the fear of abstraction of their funds to provincial purposes as in the time of Sir Richard Temple. Complete liberty of action is reserved to them. The bludgeon provisions no doubt remain, and they will be a standing threat to them; but, we trust, like the provisions in the Bombay Municipality Act they will never have to be enforced. If after the publication of the law, says the Honourable Mr. Badrudin, "the legitimate aspirations of the people of this Presidency are not satisfied, it will be the fault not so much of the law as rather of the misapplication of the law, and the remedy for this,. as for all other matters, must ultimately remain with the people themselves." The present legislation is expressly intended to be tentative. Any defects that may be found to exist after an experience of its working will be cured in after years. It is on this account that the suggestion to consolidate the whole law on the subject of local self-government has not been adopted. The honourable mover has however promised that "the old and the new Acts be published by Government in such a form as to exhibit the law both in regard to the municipal as well as the rural boards at one glance without inconvenience or difficulty."

Does not approve of the retention of official presidents for local boards.

The Native Opinion (10) of the 2nd December says:—That part of the report of the Select Committee appointed to report upon the Bombay Local Boards Bill which deals with the question of official presidents is rather more ingeniously than solidly reasoned out. The fact of this question being mixed and considered together with that of the minimum number of elected members has rather obscured its importance. The influence of the elected members in the boards is not the same as, nor akin to, that of the elected presidents, and we wish the Committee had kept these two considerations apart and had viewed them separately. We make a great distinction between the two. For securing the ultimate end which the review of a sympathetic policy has evidently set before us, the election of the president is of greater importance than that of the members constituting the board. If the official presidents are to be retained, we think that no material advance in the direction of liberty can be achieved over the condition in which our boards are at present. Hitherto the boards have been only the nominal administrators of the local funds, and hereafter, we are afraid, they will be very much the same. The Committee accept the position that one strong-minded and high-handed official, with a consciousness of wielding plenary power, can make his influence felt for good or for evil throughout the whole length and breadth of the district, and yet they talk of the boards being really independent bodies with such a strong-minded official president. All know what the fear is which a Collector inspires into those over whom he rules, and nobody gifted with impartial judgment can ever bring himself to believe that members of the local boards can ever gather sufficient courage so as to go against his wishes. Every class of people has large estates in the Collector's hands, and it dare not tempt misfortune by voting against him. This impossibility of his official position being forgotten makes him at best an unsafe teacher of political liberty to the people. He is too much feared to inspire confidence. He alone will do the whole work, leaving the members the only not very dignified duty of giving their assent to his proposals. We do not for a moment maintain that the Collector-president will always mismanage the local funds. Nay, in the majority of cases he may administer them even more ably than the boards without him can. But what of that? The chief object of the measure is to teach the people to administer their own affairs, and unless that work is exacted from them they will never learn it. The Government of India have given the official the proper position in these matters. He must guide the people only from outside and not do their work for them. The Committee in considering this point fall into an error. They suppose that those who are against official presidents mean that the influence of the Collector should cease altogether. Far from it. What we wish is not that the Collector's influence should cease, but that it should not be all-absorbing as it has been up to this time. He must indeed serve as the friend, guide and philosopher of these boards. But he should do his friendly offices from outside. Labouring under this mistake, the Committee apparently think that the Government of India themselves are in favour of official presidents. But the resolutions of the Government of India on this subject have plainly intimated that as far as possible boards should be made free from their mental thraldom to official presidents. We wish the Committee had dropped this reference to the Government of India. They will find that the support they have sought out of their wording is unreal. After the notorious blast and counterblast of resolutions between the Bombay Government and the Government of India, we had thought that such allusions would never be made. The Government of India mean that the experiment to be tried now should differ from all former trials in one great particular. The Governor-General in Council observes that the true principle to be followed in this matter is that the control should be exercised from without rather than from within. The Government should revise and check the acts of the local bodies, but not dictate them. These and such other expressions leave no doubt as to the intentions of the Supreme Government. [The Hitechchhu (80) of Ahmedabad of the 6th December disapproves of the retention of official presidents and the large powers vested in them of spending money from the local funds and the nomination of half the members of boards by Government, and remarks that the noble views of Lord Ripon on the subject of self-government appear not to have been heeded. The people of the Bombay Presidency are unfortunate in Sir James Fergusson's regime. He does not appreciate the rights and aptitude of Natives, and is guided by the advice of others. The people have been disappointed in the expectations formed by them of Mr. Peile. The Select Committee have made slight changes in the Bill, leaving the principal objections raised by the people against it untouched. The selection of persons composing the Select Committee did not leave room for expecting a better result than that arrived at by it. In the opinion of the Hitechchhu the Bill is not worth passing with the modifications proposed in it. It is still to be hoped that the Bombay Government will remove the objectionable clauses in the Bill. The Ahmedabad Samáchár (84) of the 5th December expresses sentiments similar to those of the Hitechchhu.]

Legislation.—The Native Magistrates' Jurisdiction Bill.

Says that the Statutory Civilians should not be excluded from the exercise of the jurisdiction proposed to be conferred on Native District Magistrates and Sessions Judges by the Ilbert Bill.

The Indian Spectator (1) of the 2nd December, after remarking that the Ilbert Bill is quite safe with the amendments proposed and that the agitators against it would best consult their own interests and reputation as honest Englishmen or even as British European subjects by accepting the inevitable with grace, for if they are sound politicians they will easily understand that the Bill is purely a logical sequence of events that have happened and is simply a consequence of the policy of Parliament declared fifty years ago, says:—It is worth while to consider the outcry that has been again raised in certain quarters regarding the exclusion of Statutory Civilians from the exercise of the jurisdiction which the Bill proposes to confer on District Magistrates and Sessions Judges. It is true that at the present moment few of these have come up to the standard and qualifications which would command the respect of Europeans and Natives. The latter have unhesitatingly declared that they have but little faith in those whom good fortune or the accident of birth has forced into the sacred precincts. Natives have uniformly condemned the system of admission under the rules of 1879. But because the nominations made during the last four years have been unsatisfactory, is it to be understood that all who may hereafter be appointed to that service will be found equally unworthy? The opponents forget that the system, which has been generally condemned, is about to be reconsidered with the view to make future admissions as good as those to the other service. If Victoria 33, Chap. 3 of 1870, is to be remodelled on a basis to give general satisfaction and inspire confidence, what is there to deter Government from now conferring on a Civilian under the revised statute or its rules the criminal jurisdiction whenever the Government of the day finds him fully qualified to exercise it, and especially with the safeguard now proposed on the basis of Sir Charles Turner's suggestion? We think the Government of India would stultify itself,—nay make itself the laughing-stock of all impartial persons, both here and in England,—were it to exclude Statutory Civilians from the proposed jurisdiction. The principle of the Bill is to remove the disqualification. If Statutory Civilians are exempted, the removal will only be a qualified one. That might vitiate the principle on which the Government of India has boldly taken its stand. But we have every faith in Lord Ripon and his colleagues. The principle is that whenever a Native, let him belong to any one of the three branches of the Civil Service, is found qualified to be made a District Magistrate or Sessions Judge, the jurisdiction must be conferred on him. He will not be qualified to act as a District Magistrate or Sessions Judge if Government has no confidence in him. Surely the agitators do not mean to say that a qualified Native belonging to the Statutory Civil Service, when he is ripe for the post, should be done injustice to by being studiously kept out of it, more especially when there will exist the right of appeal to the High Court as proposed by Sir Charles Turner? We emphatically insist on the inclusion of Statutory Civilians in the body of the Bill as persons on whom the jurisdiction should be conferred whenever found qualified. Government must be prepared to recognize the situation, however uncomfortable it may be to the opponents of the Bill. Government is bound to look back to the past and the policy in vogue for the last half a century. It must again look to the future by the light of that past. The agitators seem to be concerned only with the present. But the vision of a Government cannot be so bounded. Guided by the experience of the past and the light thrown by the present, it must legislate for the future, if that future is to be made logically consistent with the policy adopted by a succession of wise statesmen and British Parliaments in years gone by. [The Native Opinion (10) of the same date expresses similar sentiments.]

Disapproves of the compromise suggested in the Native Magistrates' Jurisdiction Bill authorizing a European criminal to petition the High Court to transfer his case from a Native to a European Magistrate or to itself.

With reference to the compromise proposed in the Native Magistrates' Jurisdiction Bill that a European accused brought up before a Native District Magistrate or Sessions Judge should be permitted to submit a petition to the High Court praying for the transfer of his case to a European Magistrate or Sessions Judge or to the High Court itself, and that on his furnishing satisfactory reasons for making the prayer his case should be accordingly transferred, the Rást Goftár (114) of the 2nd December observes that the compromise ought never to be accepted, inasmuch as it nullifies the very principle of the Bill, which is that a Native Magistrate is not incompetent to try a European accused simply because he is a Native. To clothe the Native Magistrate with jurisdiction to try a European criminal and at the same time to permit the latter to claim the transfer of his case to a European Magistrate is tantamount to making a concession with one hand and withdrawing it with another. The High Court is to decide whether the transfer should be made; but since the Judges of the High Court have disapproved of the very principle of the Bill, there is no prospect of that principle being upheld by them. The proposed compromise requires that sufficient reasons should be furnished in order to authorize the transfer, but it is difficult to decide what are sufficient reasons and what are not. There is no safeguard against a European criminal stating that a certain Magistrate is a Native and as such is incompetent to try him, and against the High Court considering the statement sufficient for transferring the case to a European Magistrate. The compromise is not therefore acceptable and it is better to reject the Bill itself. The counterpoise has been brought forward to please European opponents of the Bill, but since even they are displeased with it it is useless to pass it in that shape. Government ought to reject the compromise and pass the Bill in its original form.

Comments in connection with Mr. Atkins's representation regarding Lord Kimberley's statement about the Jurisdiction Bill.

With reference to Mr. Atkins's representation regarding Lord Kimberley's statement about the Ilbert Bill, the Subodh Patrika (11) of the 2nd December remarks:—Mr. Atkins is not a slow hand in misrepresenting matters Indian. In his very first speech delivered at the conference of the delegates of British workmen held in Edinburgh soon after his arrival he made many erroneous statements, one of which it is impossible to suppose he did not know to be erroneous, seeing that he has been in India for many years and has known a good deal about the administration of the country. For instance, he said to the British delegates that the Government of Lord Ripon was appointing Natives to posts in Government service without requiring them to pass any examinations or after requiring them to pass very simple examinations, while the policy of Government in the case of Europeans and Eurasians was quite the reverse. Everybody knows that no statement could be more perversely inaccurate. Lord Lytton's resolutions of 1879, which professed to reserve certain branches of the uncovenanted service for Natives, practically excluded them from such departments as the police, forest and others. When Mr. Atkins in the same strain puts certain words into the mouth of the Secretary of State, which words if as a matter of fact uttered by him would only make him ridiculous in the eyes of serious statesmen, how are we to accept them as correct versions of what the Secretary of State said? Mr. Atkins's familiar tactics have, however, had one very desirable effect, namely, that they have given the public an opportunity of knowing that Lord Ripon's policy has the sympathy of the ministry, and that the idle visions of His Lordship's aspersers must be dismissed by them as the visions of blind partizans doomed to disappointment. [The Hitechchhu (80) of Ahmedabad of the 6th December expresses disapproval of the conduct of Mr. Atkins in misrepresenting the statement made by Lord Kimberley, and remarks that the conduct of Europeans with reference to the Jurisdiction Bill has made the people of India conversant with their bad qualities, which they hitherto only knew imperfectly. The Europeans will preserve their honour and position only by giving up their useless obstinacy and by abstaining from making an exhibition of themselves. The Hitechchhu deeply regrets the insult offered to Lord Ripon by a clique of Europeans on his return to Calcutta on the 1st instant and expresses satisfaction with the reception given to him by Natives on that occasion. If Natives had behaved in the way in which Europeans are reported to have behaved, writers like those in the Englishman would have called them rebels and would have recommended their being blown away from the mouth of guns. But how can they do so in the case of Europeans? Praise is due to Lord Ripon for his magnanimity in pardoning them.]

Remarks in connection with the modifications proposed in the Jurisdiction Bill.

The Indu Prakásh (9) of the 3rd December says:—That the proposed modification of the Jurisdiction Bill does not satisfy the more determined opponents of the measure does not strike one as novel; but it is the gullibility of the representation which they rashly make as to the Natives also not being satisfied with the modifications proposed that excites indignant surprise. It is alleged with a presumption which is marvellous that the Bill, if modified, will not please the Europeans or satisfy the Natives —the former, because it will legalise, in spite of its changes, the principle that a Native Judge can try a European criminal; the latter, because it will not go far enough, but restrict the jurisdiction to a select few of the Native Magistrates and Judges. But if the principle be recognised, the extent to which in practice it will be made to work will be a matter of secondary importance, and the Natives are not likely to cavil at it. They are fully conscious that administrative changes are not the work of a day, and the declaration that the Bill will, before passing, be modified and restricted in its scope has not called forth disapproval from any organs of Native public opinion. The opponents of the Bill will do well to speak for themselves and rest contented. It is beyond their province to make surmises about the views of Natives on this question.

Education.

The Native Opinion (10) of the 2nd December says:—The Calcutta Statesman is quite hopeful that even at this time of the day private managers may be found quite willing to undertake the management of collegiate institutions. It might be the case with regard to Bengal, but so far as our presidency is concerned, we boldly say that the Statesman's views do not fitly apply to us. If the united opinion of the Education Commission is to be taken as the correct view of the present state of higher education in relation to private enterprise, one may safely say that even Bengal is not ready to part with its Government colleges. Possibly the Statesman represents this view from a missionary standpoint, and as solely representing private enterprise this section of the community may be all the more willing to undertake the conduct of collegiate institutions. But even granting that a very full complement of private managers are willing to undertake it, it may be asked, always keeping in view the point of efficiency, is the absolute withdrawal of Government from State education desirable? If not, what proportion of direct management in the field of education should Government keep to itself? We cannot look upon mere outward supervision and control as Government's direct share in this branch. As responsible rulers of the country, they are in duty bound to spend a proportionate share of the annual revenue upon the education of those from whom they draw the sinews of government. If the state of education in other countries be taken into consideration, we are persuaded to believe that our administrators do not spend on our education anything more than they ought or might do. Those who have read Mr. Lethbridge's paper on education in India will be convinced that expenditure on higher education in this country is not greater than what is spent in England on the same branch. It may perhaps be shown that at present expenditure on higher education in England has been considerably reduced. But it must not be forgotten that the cause of reduction of this expenditure is the endowment of higher institutions by a series of British monarchs for centuries from the crown lands and other public sources. We have yet to reach the stage of British higher education, and therefore the present expenditure on it can in no sense be considered extravagant. Compared with the vast population of India the population of the United Kingdom is infinitesimally small, and yet nobody there seems to consider the expenditure incurred thereon as extravagant. If these facts be borne in mind, those who are so much influenced by a sentiment for private enterprise will be persuaded to think otherwise. As a compensation for the closing of Government colleges, the Statesman proposes the foundation of University professorships. Such foundations may give a greater impetus to the cultivation of knowledge, but we fail to see how they can be made available at all the centres of education unless the professors are made to go on lecturing circuits. Under present circumstances much cannot be said in favour of such foundations if they are to supplant the existing institutions. In their place such foundations must ultimately fail. We do not say that private enterprise has no scope in Indian field of education. What we mean to enforce upon our Government is that the too-much-to-be-desired time has not yet arrived. Let us reach the present state of higher education in England, let private enterprise claim its own, and then there will be ample time for our rulers to think of withdrawing from State education.

Disapproves of the suggestion made by the Calcutta Statesman that Government should retire from the management of collegiate institutions in India.

In noticing the Government resolution for providing medical education for ladies in Bombay, the Lok Mitrá (81) of the 2nd December observes that the scheme appears in all respects to be an admirable one, and there is no doubt that it will tempt young ladies aspiring to a professional calling to try the experiment for which so many facilities have been provided by the generosity of Government and private individuals. It is proposed to admit into the intended special classes young women of the age of 18 years; and considering the nature of the studies to be prosecuted and the dispensing with any severe preliminary test the limit of age has been most appropriately fixed. The necessity of passing any entrance examination of the University, which is a sine quâ non of admission into the Medical College in the case of males, has not been insisted on in the case of female candidates, and this is a very wise proceeding, as it would otherwise have been very difficult to obtain students from the class for whose benefit the proposed measures have been taken, namely, the Native ladies of India. The test of qualification according to the sixth standard will afford a sufficient guarantee of ability to follow the course of instruction in medicine; and though in the beginning but few will be found even qualified according to that test, the measure of proficiency testified by the passing of the sixth standard appears to be the least that ought to be expected from those who mean to study medicine in a regular and scientific manner. The course of instruction is to extend over a period of four years, which seems to be sufficient, considering that five years' study is required of male candidates for the medical degree of the University. The only objectionable feature of the new arrangements appears to be the contemplated abolition of the special class of midwives. The women qualified under the present rules for this branch of medical practice have a usefulness of their own, which will not in any degree be diminished or affected by the introduction of the new class of qualified lady practitioners. In simple cases the midwife proper will still be in request in spite of the existence of female doctors, who would naturally consider their attendance in such cases somewhat derogatory to their position, and who, even if they were willing to establish a general practice in that line, would be considered too expensive to be called in to assist at a confinement, in which medical skill is not required. The result will be that patients will be reduced to the alternative of calling in the ignorant nurses, who will supplant the useful class of trained midwives that are generally consulted on account of their moderate fees. For difficult cases the new female practitioners will always be in great requisition; and it appears to be a great mistake to restrict the useful class of less trained female attendants, who are now more generally and frequently consulted than the old-fashioned midwives. It would perhaps be unreasonable to expect great results at once from so novel an experiment, or to demand at once greater facilities for its fair trial. Yet its success will only then be beyond question when instead of the arrangements, at present inevitable, of imparting instruction to male and female students together under male teachers, special classes for young ladies under female supervision are organised. The movement for encouraging female practitioners of established reputation to settle here, and institutions like the Cama hospital aided by discriminating philanthropy such as that shown by Mr. Pestanji Hormasji, will all tend to bring about a result so desirable; but in the meantime no effort should be spared to attain that end.

Approves of the proposed arrangements for providing medical education for Native ladies, but disapproves of the contemplated abolition of the special class of trained midwives.

Complains that the Arts College at Ahmedabad has not been given a fair trial.

The Gujarát Mitrá (79) of the 2nd December observes that the Arts College at Ahmedabad has not been given a fair trial. One of its very efficient professors has been serving in other institutions to suit the convenience of the Educational Department. Again, the College and the local high school are located in the same building and entrusted to the same management. This arrangement has benefited the school and effected a saving of money to the department; but the interests of the College have been sacrificed. There is an absence of any development of a sturdy sense of independence and self-help in study amongst the College students—the marked characteristic of more favoured and advanced institutions. The long and frequently promised Government contribution has never been made to the full amount, so that the teaching staff, the library and the laboratory of the College have been crippled. The building in which the College and the school are located does not afford sufficient accommodation to both. It is therefore to be hoped that these shortcomings of the College will be soon removed by the authorities concerned.

With reference to the Matriculation Examination, the Subodh Patrika (11) of the 2nd December says:—We hear loud complaints from candidates who have appeared at this year's Matriculation Examination with reference to some of the language papers. The Sanskrit paper is pronounced even by experts to be both stiff and lengthy, and there is likely to be a very unusual falling off in Matriculation results this year, as a large number of the candidates usually take up Sanskrit for their second language, unless the Syndicate take timely notice of the matter and instruct the examiner in Sanskrit to so lower the standard as to make the Sanskrit Examination as fair as it ought to be both absolutely and relatively. Some of the grammar questions are so out of the way and so lengthy that even the best students must find it hard to get the requisite percentage of marks in that subject, considering the time that they have at their disposal, while the passages for translation, instead of consisting of short sentences, are extracts from such works as Bánabhatta's "Kádambari" and Goldsmith's "Vicar of Wakefield," both of which books are admittedly difficult to translate into foreign languages. We think the Matriculation papers in Sanskrit of Dr. Kielhorn and Mr. A'thalye are models of what such papers ought to be; fairly testing the student's knowledge of elementary Sanskrit grammar and idiom, and not repelling him by questions on obscure grammatical forms and too lengthy compounds. Even Professor Bhándárkar's papers (although he expected from Matriculation candidates somewhat more knowledge of Sanskrit than, we think, could be fairly required of them) are by no means so hard or so lengthy as this year's Sanskrit paper. The same examiner set the Sanskrit paper at the Matriculation two years ago, which was on the whole a fair one, and we cannot understand why he should have suddenly raised the standard this year so as to spread such consternation amongst the candidates. Sanskrit can only occupy a secondary place in the studies of an ordinary school and exclusive attention cannot be paid to it. This fact ought to be borne in mind in drawing up a paper in Sanskrit. Look at the paper in Maráthi, for instance. With the exception of one or two questions on obscure points it is a fair and sensible paper; but it is not half as difficult as the paper in Sanskrit, which is a highly difficult classical language. If it is necessary to encourage the study of Sanskrit, though not to the utter neglect of the vernaculars, raising the standard of examination disproportionately will not by any means lead to the desired result. With reference to the Gujaráti paper the Patrika quotes the English passage for translation into idiomatic Gujaráti and remarks:—Now we seriously ask whether expressions such as "the discipline of real life," "nature of theory," "hard facts of existence," "touch of truth," "contact with the broad instincts of common men," "cloistered virtues" can be expected to be satisfactorily rendered into Gujaráti by little boys, who possess only the most elementary knowledge of English and Gujaráti. We trust the Syndicate will look to this matter without the least delay. In connection with this subject we have also to remark that such words as अंतरिक्षमार्ग, तपस्विनी, व्याधिग्रस्त, समग्र are out of place in Gujaráti passages for translation into English when a large number of the Gujaráti candidates are Pársis. We know as a matter of fact that even many grown up Pársis of University standing are unable to make out anything of such words as these.

Criticises some of the papers set at the Matriculation Examination of the Bombay University.

The Dnyánodayá (7) of the 6th December says:—As the Director of Public Instruction is soon to go on leave and the important recommendations of the Education Commission are soon to be considered, it is essential that the best man for the place should be appointed to act. The recommendations of the Commission will require a radical change in some directions in the policy of the Educational Department here. The relations of local boards to the department have to be regulated and judiciously managed. It will not be easy to modify the predilections and habits of the whole department to meet the new circumstances. Is it then probable that a member of that department would be the best man to be at the helm at such a time? This would be like substituting a liberal for a conservative policy, and then leaving the conservatives who have resisted the new policy and do not believe fully in it to try to carry it on. In public estimation no member of the department has such a marked fitness for the peculiar duties of the post as to point him out as the man for Acting Director. Hence we believe that both the department and the public would gain by the appointment of a superior Civilian. If Mr. Lee-Warner, with his ability and with his knowledge increased through his work in the Education Commission, were available, we should think him the best man for the place. But he is said to have entered the Foreign Department of the Government of India and may not be available. At any rate no one's alleged "claims" but the claims represented by the educational interests of this Presidency should by all means be considered first and last at this juncture.

Suggests the appointment of a member of the Civil Service to act for Mr. Chatfield in the event of his going on leave.

Advocates the claims of Mr. Jatár, Educational Inspector, Berár, to the Directorship of Public Instruction in that province.

With reference to the probable retirement from service of the Director of Public Instruction in the Berárs, the Kesari (35) of the 4th December remarks that Mr. Jatár is the most competent man to succeed him. In the Berárs there is no educational officer who is Mr. Jatár's equal in ability and experience, and even in the Bombay Presidency it is doubtful whether anybody can be found who will be superior to him. As Mr. Dándekar's appointment has proved a great success, the vacant Directorship should be given to a competent Native. There is one European, Mr. Aitkin, in the Berár Educational Department. He is, however, a man of inferior capacity. Everybody knows how he has reduced the Akola High School into its present wretched condition by his mismanagement. If he is appointed in the place of Mr. Dándekar simply because he is a European, the ruin of the Berár Educational Department in the course of a short time may be safely predicted. The Kesari trusts that the Resident of Hyderabad will reward the long and meritorious services of Mr. Jatár by promoting him to the Directorship.

Railways.

Advocates the extension of railways in India.

After expressing gratitude to the Secretary of State for India for sanctioning the construction of a railway line from Poona to Belgaum, the Jáme Jamshed (104) of the 4th December observes that the Bombay Government has again done injustice to the vernacular press. The Private Secretary to His Excellency the Governor recently communicated to the two local English dailies that the Secretary of State had by telegram informed Government of his sanction for the construction of this line, and that the work would be soon commenced. But no such communication was made to the vernacular newspapers. The Jáme then points out the advantages of railway extension in India and advocates their construction on the broad gauge. It particularly pleads this time for the construction of a direct line from Nágpur to Calcutta, and prays Government to sanction it without delay.

Municipalities.

Supports the prayer of the Bombay Municipality for the transfer from Government to itself of the work of licensing liquor shops in the city and the income derived therefrom.

In an article headed "A'bkári Licenses in Bombay," the Indu Prakásh (9) of the 3rd December says:—There can be no two opinions that the municipality is clearly entitled to obtain the relief it is praying for. Considering the arbitrary and hasty manner in which the Government of 1878 dealt with the matter, Sir James Fergusson's Government will, we think, be justified in revising the inequitable abstraction of funds and restoring the income to its rightful owner. The municipality had enjoyed the income for more than thirty years and had been performing its part of the contract, though it had become more onerous than formerly. There had been no abuse which could have justified a resumption. When all of a sudden it occurred to Mr. Ashburner that the fat revenues of the Bombay Municipality could easily be pounced upon. Why the honourable gentleman should have fixed upon the average of the proceeds for ten years it is impossible to say. Probably it would have been more convenient to him to have taken the average for the previous thirty years, when the figure for compensation would have been smaller than the one fixed in the Act, or, for the matter of that, an entire resumption of revenues might have been made and justified as an act of State. But it is useless to speculate. It is quite clear that the figure of compensation arrived at by taking an average for ten years is, when the revenue is increasing, very arbitrary and unjust, and, as subsequent events have shown, is altogether incommensurate with the actual net proceeds of the revenue. If compensation is allowed to the municipality in consideration of its title as the grantee of the revenue, it stands to reason that the municipality should be given a sum equal to that actually realized. If in the interests of general administration Government think it expedient that the collection of the revenue should be in their hands, they ought properly to stand in the position of mere agents and ought not to seek to make a profit by the bargain. But we deny that it was expedient to transfer the management of the department to the Provincial Government. As Mr. Pedder observed, the fees for licenses are not a tax upon the commodity, but one simply upon the monopoly of shopkeepers in the city. The revenue arising therefrom would not be an object of the general ábkári administration. On the other hand, being the result of consumption of liquor within the municipal limits, it would more appropriately be a part of municipal revenue, and the power of collecting it ought to be vested in municipal authorities. The practice in England has uniformly been to vest such power in the justices, and these latter or the corresponding authorities here, viz. the municipality, would, we think, be peculiarly fitted to exercise the power. The Municipal Corporation would use the power with an eye for public convenience and safety, and not merely for revenue. A liberal grant of liquor licenses has increased the number of liquor shops, the immediate effect of which is increasing drunkenness—a vice to be greatly deplored. The administration of the A'bkári Act by Government seems to have been carried on regardless of such consequences. The Corporation, on the other hand, as the representatives of the city, would be directly interested in checking any tendencies subversive of public morals. Mr. Servai on Monday last argued that this view conflicted with the expectation of an increasing revenue. But he failed to observe that it is not merely for the sake of increased revenue that the Corporation ought to seek to have the management of the licenses. If the Corporation succeeds in reducing the vice of drunkenness, that will be as good a gain to the city as an increase of revenue. In any case it will be conducive to the benefit of the people if the granting of licenses be vested in the Corporation itself. Mr. Kemp's objection, which has been favoured by the Times of India, would, it seems to us, put a stop to all progress. If because one thinks one's request may not be granted that therefore the request should not be made, one may, we fear, wait for ever without his wishes being fulfilled. No harm can, we think, come of an unsuccessful request. It seems to have been admitted all round that the right of the municipality to receive additional compensation is unquestionable, and must be conceded, but it is feared that Government will not part with their power of administration. For our part we think that part of the Corporation's prayer which requires the parting of hard cash will occasion greater difficulty than a mere administrative detail. In fact if the whole of the income is to be enjoyed by the municipality, Government may well think it proper to disencumber themselves of the troubles of administration. There is no magic in having to bear a burden without its benefit. If on the other hand Government should covet the power even without the emolument, there will be no difficulty, we venture to think, in granting one part of the prayer and declining the other. Under these circumstances the Corporation has, we think, done well to ask for the restoration of both the power of working the department and the profits arising therefrom.

Complaints against the municipality of Bombay.

The Telagu Mitrá (69) of the 3rd December says that in the corners of certain lanes in Kámáthipura rubbish is collected in heaps and is burnt there. It is strange that the rubbish of Kámáthipura should be burnt in that locality when the municipality pays cartmen to carry the rubbish of Bombay outside the city. The annoyance caused to the inhabitants from the smoke which issues from the burning of the rubbish is something fearful. There is also considerable chance of houses catching fire when the heaps are burning. No effort is also made to remove the ashes. From the first lane of Kámáthipura to the Two Tank road there is not a single lamp. The want of light causes serious inconvenience to pedestrians. The Mitrá trusts that the municipal authorities will take action without delay in attending to the above complaints.

Disapproves of the practice of the municipality of Surat in not advertising the time of the meetings of the general committee.

The Vartamán Sár (124) of the 4th December disapproves of the discontinuance of the practice of giving advertizements regarding the holding of the general meetings of the Surat Municipality in the local papers, and remarks that it is an economy in the wrong direction. Recently many persons came to witness the proceedings of the municipal committee and to judge of the way in which the representatives of the people performed their duty, but it cannot be understood why the practice of advertizing the time of meeting has been abandoned. The people grumble at this mode of effecting economy. It is no use posting advertizements in different quarters, for they are not much read. The authorities concerned ought to attend to the matter.

Municipal affairs at Ahmedabad.

The Indian Spectator (1) of the 2nd December says:—Our remarks touching the alleged gross maladministration of the funds of the Ahmedabad Municipality under the regime of the late official president are, we are sorry to see, not yet officially contradicted. We had hoped that for the reputation of the principal servants of the State involved in that ugly affair the Bombay Government would take immediate steps to put an end to the grave public scandal created in that city. In a matter of this nature we take it to be a dereliction of the duty which Government owes to the public to hush up matters, especially when the citizens have in a public meeting demanded the production of all correspondence, including proceedings and minutes recorded, with a view to appeal to a superior tribunal for full investigation. The agitation is said to be the direct outcome of arbitrary refusal. Mr. Ranchhodlál is the only non-official chairman that has yet been elected to any city municipality outside Bombay. It passes our comprehension why he should have thought fit to refuse the papers, which are public property. He must have known this very well. The request was a perfectly reasonable and legitimate one. Has he already succumbed to official influence, or how? But we do not wish to condemn him in haste. Meantime it is our duty once more to protest against Mr. Fernandez's return to Ahmedabad. Without casting any reflection on him personally, we must say that the return of this official may once more inaugurate a reign of irregularities likely to impede the progress of local self-government at Ahmedabad. We have faith in Mr. Sheppard's judgment, though the Collector seems to have made up his mind to defy public opinion.

Native States.

Complains of the mismanagement of the State of Cambay.

The Gujarát Mitrá (79) of the 2nd December publishes a petition made by certain inhabitants of the town of Cambay to the Political Agent, Kaira, complaining about the excise duties, and observes that the debt of the State has increased, and though the Diwán is a good man he is unable to exercise strict supervision over the different departments. He is afraid of designing characters and is guided by them, and hence the people are discontented. Among the petitioners are some leading merchants and other respectable persons, and it is feared that if the Agent sends the original petition to the Nawáb, the Diwán and his advisers will oppress the petitioners. The Agent should therefore keep the petition with himself and carry on correspondence with the Nawáb on the subject. The people of this State have great confidence in Mr. Shámráo, the late Diwán. If he is called back and the Nawáb's brother, Najum Khán, is made to assist him after settling the quarrel between the Chief and his brother, the State would be satisfactorily managed. But before doing anything of the kind the petitioners mentioned above ought to have their grievances redressed.

Complains of misrule in Junágad.

A correspondent of the Gujaráti (100) of the 2nd December complains that Junágad still continues under misrule. In deciding the question of the massacre of the Maiyás the Supreme Government ordered among other things that Mr. Bápálál, the Deputy Diwán, should be dismissed from the service of the State. In spite of this decision he still performs all the duties of the office of Diwán, and Mr. Haridás, the actual Diwán, simply signs the papers prepared by him. Mr. Haridás has reported this state of things. After describing the oppressions practised by Mr. Bápálál on the Girásiás of the State, the correspondent observes that Messrs. Sále Hindi and Bávdin are too powerful to permit Mr. Haridás to administer the State with independence, that the judicial courts are compelled to pass decisions according to the dictates of Mr. Bávdin, and that misrule prevails throughout the State.

Complains that a gang of robbers have been plundering carts laden with goods in the territory of the Sávantvádi State.

The Vengurla Vritt (73) of the 29th November in its local news says that in the State of Sávantvádi between the villages of Adali and Kamler a gang of robbers have been for some time attacking carts heavily laden with goods passing along the road. The Vengurla Vritt trusts that the authorities of the Sávantvádi State will take measures to punish the robbers and prevent them from plundering.

Notes.—A. The notices from the different Newspapers have been collected in the Report under different heads, which are printed in italics.

B. The names of Newspapers are printed in the body of the Report in italics, and the number of the Newspaper in the above list is printed in brackets after the name.

C. The proprietors of the Newspapers marked * have not given information as to the number of copies issued. In these cases an estimate has been made by the Reporter.

D. The system of spelling vernacular words followed by the Reporter is the same as that adopted in the Official Spelling List of the Bombay Presidency. One peculiar feature of this system is that when the long a (आ or á) is the last letter of a word, the accent is left out, and the short a (अ = u in gun) is, to prevent confusion, never placed at the end of a word. This rule has been strictly followed, except that when the short a appears to be absolutely necessary to complete the pronunciation of a word, as in Arunodaya or the well known Mitra, it is printed with a mark over it to indicate that it is short, thus—ă.

E. Berár papers are received in this office for report under the Resolution of the Government of Bombay in the General Department, No. 1795, dated 8th June 1881.

Politics and the Public Administration.

Remarks on British rule in India.

In an article headed "The British Indian rule put to test," the Mahrátta (2) of the 9th December says:—India has almost continuously been under a foreign rule, and it is quite competent at present to say which of the several foreign rules she has had has been the worst. That rule is the best which is based on the affections and sympathies of the subject people, and the one in which these are utterly disregarded is evidently the worst. This being the test, let us see how far British rule in India comes up to the standard. What was it before the mutiny of 1857? It was pure despotism, a rule that rested on physical force alone without in the least caring for the good wishes of the governed. There was then the mischievous Inám Commission, which roused the indignation of the whole Indian nation. It was headed by Captain Cowper, a man with military antecedents and with no pretensions to political skill or administrative capacity. His very name had become a curse, and the all-absorbing policy which he pursued (not without instructions forsooth) left an indelible stigma on the character of the English nation. He managed to secure the co-operation of some of the distinguished natives of this country, and with their assistance carried on the hideous work, which might appropriately be likened to that of the butcher. It was this Inám Commission that relentlessly deprived the Inámdárs and Jághirdárs of their estates and swept much of the wealth of the Deccan into the Government treasury. Thousands of freeholds were thus swallowed up by means extremely ungenerous and unbecoming, and the rightful owners and possessors thereof driven into a state of utter destitution. This mean behaviour on the part of the Commissioners very naturally excited the feelings of the Indian subjects and prepared their minds for a general commotion. Almost coeval with the proceedings of the Commission was the working of the more disastrous policy of the then Governor-General, Lord Dalhousie. His annexation scheme was then in its full swing. State after State was annexed in spite of strong opposition from the disinterested lovers of truth in England. The mode of so doing was an easy one. The rulers of the annexed States were found fault with on the score of their inability to govern, and the arch-annexationist with all pomp of disinterested zeal for the welfare of the States volunteered to help them out of the difficulty on behalf of Government. In this way many of the Native Princes and Rájás were mercilessly dethroned without cause, and their kingdoms attached to the British dominions to augment their legitimate extent. This evidently made room for the increasing population of England, but certainly not without immense loss to those who suffered by the encroachment. The Dalhousiean policy thus added fuel to the already kindled fire, and it is no wonder that the whole country was set up in a blaze all of a sudden. In order to quench the fury of the exasperated millions our noble Empress, out of kindness and affection towards her subjects in the East, drew up the memorable Proclamation of 1858, which has since been the Magna Charta of our rights. This Proclamation caused a radical change in the policy of administration in India. Physical force, which was formerly the basis of British rule here, has been entirely abandoned, and its associate, the more dangerous political stratagem, has been the order of the day. The rulers that have come since the mutiny to govern this vast empire have adopted this new policy almost without exception, and the result has been as unsatisfactory though not so fearful as before. As to the numerous benefits enjoyed by our people during the short tenure of office of these rulers we must make a grateful acknowledgment. Virtually speaking these benefits are so many oasis in the desert; for they are also attended with evils too numerous to mention. Civil courts have admittedly become a standing disgrace to the ruling nation. The great Proclamation of 1858 has remained a dead letter in the annals of Indian administration, and a heavy drain of about twenty krors a year has imperceptibly been forced upon the subject nation. "All India," says Mr. Haggard of the Bengal Civil Service, "is held in the iron grasp of Europeans. All Natives are excluded from any important part in the administration. District Magistrates, District Judges, Secretaries to Government are rarely or never natives of the country." These are some of the glaring instances of mal-administration given birth to by the newly inaugurated policy of our rulers. Add to this the former associations of the people regarding British rule which we have described at the outset and which have not yet been completely wiped off from their hearts, and the inevitable conclusion will be that the foreign rule expected to be the best of the lot we have had is also a bird of the same feather, inasmuch as it is not based on the sympathies and affections of the governed. But this unhappy career may fairly be said to have closed at the present day and a glorious new era dawned upon us. The change in the ministry of England has fortunately for this country been a very happy change; and it was chiefly owing to this that we got in the Marquis of Ripon the best and the most successful ruler that we ever possessed. He has most astonishingly won the hearts of the millions over whom he rules. During the few years that he has been in this country he has so much endeared himself to the people of all classes and creeds, and has so completely gained their confidence, that it is impossible now to shake him from the stronghold which he has so meritoriously won. It is to be hoped that India will get rulers like our present Viceroy in future, and we may not have cause to remind the people anew of the past.

Makes some incoherent remarks upon the British Indian Government.

In an unfinished leader headed "Who are the Wolves?" the Kesari (35) of the 11th December tries to disprove the censure passed upon the Native Princes and Chiefs of India by Sir Lepel Griffin that they are a set of wolves who plunder their subjects. The Kesari observes that it has several times before exposed the oppression suffered by the subjects in Native States at the hands of their respective Chiefs, but that oppression has never been so great as to make it right to condemn the Native Princes as a set of wolves. The condition of these Chiefs is just the same as that of the Princes of Europe in the 17th and 18th centuries, but they have never oppressed their subjects so heavily as to induce them to depose or behead their rulers—occurrences so common in European history. Dissensions were going on among the Hindu kings at the time the English commenced the conquest of India, and hence, as Mr. Bright says, the latter succeeded by their nefarious schemes in benefiting themselves, as did the shrewd monkey arbitrator in the fable of the two cats fighting with each other for the share of their booty. It is not proper for the English, therefore, to boast frequently of their bravery in conquering this country. Of all people the Hindus are most grateful and loyal, and persons acquainted with the history of the Indian mutiny of 1857 must admit that the Hindus are quite regardless of their lives in their attempt to free themselves from their miseries when they are oppressed for a long number of years and to take revenge upon their oppressors. It is well known that the persons who in time of peace speak lightly of war and bravery and condemn the patient and law-abiding Hindus as cowards and simpletons are themselves much agitated by a small disturbance in any part of the country. Notwithstanding the railways, telegraphs, artillery, and large bodies of infantry, cavalry and police, uncommonly great exertions had to be made to apprehend and transport a half-mad Bráhman dacoit. It is very shameful that military men, who are political officers, should abuse the Native Princes when they themselves have never seen war and performed any acts of bravery. Those Englishmen who know from personal experience or history how brave the Hindus are when they are once excited never abuse or run down the people of this country; and it is because there are large numbers of such Englishmen in India and in England that India is so well ruled by England. In support of his condemnation that the Native Princes have no feelings for their subjects and shear them mercilessly, Sir Lepel Griffin observes that the Chiefs exact a land tax double of that levied by the British Government from its own ryots, and that the cultivators of Native States are not in debt because they have no property on which they can obtain loans. Sir Lepel has given no instances in support of his first assertion; but even admitting it to be true, it cannot be inferred from it that the ryots of Native States are necessarily poor. The people of England, France and the United States of America pay heavier taxes than are paid by the people of India, but they cannot be said to be oppressed with the burden. The land tax in the Native States may be double of that imposed in British territories, but in the former there are not as many diverse taxes as there are in the latter. Sir Lepel has forgotten that a large portion of the Indian revenues is sent to England without India getting any adequate return for it. Almost all the income of Native States is spent in those States, and hence the subjects thereof are on the whole wealthier and happier than the subjects of the British Government.

Says that the British should grant more political rights than hitherto to the natives of India and treat them kindly if they wish to retain a permanent hold of the country.

In a lengthy article headed "Permanence of the British Government in India," the Nibandh Chandrika (44) for the month of September describes the way in which the English became masters of India, the evils resulting from the introduction into the country of the subsidiary alliance system, how Bengal, the Panjáb and other kingdoms were fraudulently acquired, controverts the theory that India was conquered by the sword and should be retained by the sword saying that the English got possession of this vast country simply because fortune favoured them, and remarks :—The British have become very powerful by the acquisition of India. Their wealth has increased and commerce and arts have flourished. The people of India have also benefited by the British rule in many respects. It has given security of life and property and the Indian nation lives united under its happy sway. But if the English wish to make their hold of India permanent, it is not likely that they will attain that object by treating the Natives like slaves. As regards the political ability of the Natives there is not the slightest doubt. Our people formerly ruled over great States and repelled the attacks of the powerful English. Look at the British administration. There are district Collectors and other officials who pass their time in hunting and other amusements. The whole office work is left to the sole care of the Native shirastedárs, head clerks and others. What does this show? It shows that by a little instruction and encouragement the Natives can do any work given to them, and that they possess in a considerable degree the aptitude for competing with their rulers. Our people, therefore, do not in the least deserve that condition to which the inhabitants of America and other countries were reduced by their European conquerors. Now-a-days we hear of such exclamations as the following from the lips of Europeans: that they are conquerors and the people of India are their subjects, and that therefore they are entitled to more privileges than the Natives; that they have won India by the sword and must retain it by the sword. But the sword will not be of any use in this country. Conciliatory measures and unity are necessary. It is a mistake to suppose that a kingdom won by the sword can be retained by the sword. The present state of Ireland is an instance in point. To govern any kingdom for a long time the sword is of no use whatever, be the kingdom either won by the sword or by any other means. Nay, if the sword is used to keep a kingdom after its conquest, the sword proves fatal and the country is lost within a short time, which by conciliatory measures would have been retained for a considerable period. From their way of living in this country it does not appear that the English think that their rule will be permanent. The Chandrika then gives a description of the future condition of India as foretold in a recent publication entitled "India in 1983," and proceeds :—We do not know when the talked-of golden age is to appear. The present state of the country is such that the people are crushed down under a heavy burden of taxation; the confidence placed in us by our rulers is such that it does not even permit us to have a stick in our hand. Though we are so poor and weaponless, large Native armies under the superintendence of European officers are maintained at a heavy cost as a check over us in case we may create a disturbance. After having taken so much pains to open to us the sweet fountain of learning, no sooner does some generous heart think of giving us some voice in political matters than a general cry is raised against it by Anglo-Indians. The hopes of the golden age in future held out to us may be true. But in anticipation of future happiness the present troubles cannot be avoided. We have greatly profited by the present administration. To rule India permanently the Eng-

The hopes of the golden age in future held out to us may be true. But in anticipation of future happiness the present troubles cannot be avoided. We have greatly profited by the present administration. To rule India permanently the English should teach us the western principles of government, and it is not necessary to tell them that we shall gain proficiency in them within a short time. We shall stand every test. Nay, we shall be able to compete with them in every respect. If after imbibing the principles of politics thoroughly well we are gradually entrusted with the responsibilities of government, there is no doubt of our being able to conduct the government. This will not be useful to us only when the English retire from India and leave us alone, but will be equally useful for the permanency of the present rule. Howsoever wise and powerful we may become, nobody will ever think of domineering over those from whom our power and wisdom have been acquired; but if our wisdom is not allowed to be used for our good, then our rulers would be justified in entertaining the fear of our rising against them. There is no use of imparting solid education to us when we are treated like slaves. The education given to us by our rulers will prove fatal to them if we are treated like slaves. The concession of political rights will do good to them and to us. If our rulers treat us mildly we shall at times stand by them with sword in hand to face the enemy; but if we are always discontented on such occasions we shall be of no use to them, and consequently they will require armies both to defend themselves from the attacks of enemies and to keep restraint over us. If our rulers treat us properly we shall have domestic peace and shall defend ourselves under their shelter against any enemy; nay, on occasions we will help our rulers gladly. We pray God that he may inspire our rulers to do us good.

Requests the Home Government to abolish the duties levied on silverware imported into England.

With reference to the letter addressed by Mr. E. J. Wetherston, Chairman of the Goldsmiths' and Silversmiths' Free Trade Association, London, to the Times of India suggesting that the present is a fit time to agitate for the repeal of the duty on the imports of gold and silverware in England, the Indu Prakásh (9) of the 10th December remarks:—England is the great champion of free trade, and the Indian import duties were in a great measure sacrificed at the altar of that fetish. Why cannot rich England relieve poor India from this odious tax on her gold and silver industries? If the Indian exchequer has been mulcted in millions of her hard-earned money out of a regard for free-trade principles when really the principles were not contravened by the Indian duties, cannot England afford to spare a few of her superfluous thousands to relieve her great but poor dependency? The testimony of Mr. Wetherston that the duty is a great hindrance to trade is very valuable, and we trust Mr. Gladstone's Government will earn the gratitude of India by removing this obstacle to her trade.

Expresses regret at the non-abolition of the duty on gold and silver ware imported into England.

The Bombay Samáchár (90) of the 14th December regrets that the Home Government should have refused to abolish the English import duty on Indian silverware even after it had received recommendation from the Indian Government to give it up. Among the several trifling reasons given by the Home Government for the refusal is one to the effect that if the duty on Indian silver goods is abolished the silversmiths in England will suffer a heavy loss and the English treasury will have to reimburse them. Here a question arises as to why a similar objection was not raised when the Indian import duties on Europe cotton goods were abolished and why those duties were not allowed to remain. The people of India ought to memorialize the Ministry and Parliament for the abolition of the silver duties without loss of time.

Complains against the present system of holding the examination for the Indian Civil Service in London and suggests that it should be held simultaneously in London and Calcutta.

The Indian Spectator (1) of the 9th December says:—Considering the present progress of Native education and the still greater progress it is sure to make within the next two decades, it is ridiculous to have the Act of 1870 any longer on the British statute book. There should be only one door for entering the Civil Service of the country. Let the door be open to Englishmen and to Indians alike. No doubt, the door of competitive

Civil Service is so open. But, as we have pointed out, that door is as good as closed to Natives of India. Among the many anomalies that our bureaucracy has rendered flourishing in the country, that of open competition in England only is not the least. To tell Natives that the door is thrown wide open to those who choose to enter the portals of the Civil Service and at the same time to make it almost inaccessible is no better than hypocrisy. Neither in ancient nor in modern history is there an instance of such apparent inconsistency, such palpable injustice, as the holding of the competitive examination for Natives of India in London, which is removed from the capital of their country by six thousand miles! Is there to be found a parallel instance of such an arrangement, tantamount to virtual disability, in the history of the natives of any country in times past? In order that our countrymen may qualify themselves for entering the Civil Service they are told to travel six thousand miles, crossing two great oceans in their passage, stay awhile in a climate the very opposite of their own, and endure all the physical evils, apart from the heavy expenses which are unavoidably a sine quâ non. It is a melancholy reflection on British justice and love of fair play. If the children of the soil are really to be allowed to have a share in the higher offices of the administration, then why not change the venue of the competitive examination? Surely the country where the service is to be performed is the country where the examination ought most properly to be held. Or, if the anomaly is to be perpetrated for the benefit of the governing class, then why not hold simultaneous examinations in London and Calcutta? Why should the aspiring Indian be placed at an immense disadvantage? Is the competition at all fair under existing conditions? If examinations for the Gilchrist scholarships can be safely held at the same time in two cities distant from each other six thousand miles, what is there to deter one from safely conducting the Civil Service examination on the same principle? We see no insuperable difficulties in the way. Civil Service examiners can be easily told off for duty in India. What is the object of the present anomaly, if it not be to preclude Natives from competing in larger numbers? Once a radical reform is made with regard to the place of holding the examinations, there will be no further need of such a clumsy device as the Statutory Civil Service, which is now contrived as a sort of sop to the daily increasing Indian claimants. We appeal to the justice and wisdom of the present Government of India to pay their serious attention to this part of the Civil Service instead of revising the provisions of the Statutory one. The latter task is only a roundabout way of keeping off Native candidates. Once the bold step of changing the venue taken, all other difficulties will be removed. This is the principal task of the attack. Native politicians should agitate for a change. Once the point is gained, the rest will be smooth and easy sailing. Calcutta ought to be made the seat of future examinations. Agitation should be directed towards this most desirable end. The Statutory Civil Service meanwhile is a delusion.

Suggests the elevation of Lord Ripon to the dignity of a Duke.

The Jáme Jamshed (104) of the 10th December gratefully alludes to the important services rendered by Lord Ripon to India during his career, and observes that the people of India anxiously desire that His Lordship's name should be permanently connected with their country. They wish that His Lordship should be created a Duke and called the Duke of India. The natives of India would be highly grateful to the Premier if he should gratify their wish in this respect by creating Lord Ripon a Duke and thus permanently connecting his name with this country.

Condemns the conduct of the Europeans who offered insult to Lord Ripon on his return to Calcutta, and advises Protestant missionaries to join in the petitions asking for the prolongation of His Lordship's term of office.

The Dnyánodayǎ (7) of the 13th December says:—We must express our surprise and shame at the insult shown to the Viceroy by a few Europeans in Calcutta, and cannot understand how respectable journalists try to extenuate such conduct. In his late statement about the course of his Government Lord Ripon seemed to us to show a most commendable spirit. So much have we come to respect him, and so likely to promote the welfare of the country does he seem to us to be, that if it were wise for missionaries to take much part in such matters, we think it might be well for Protestant missionaries to join the petitions asking for the prolongation of Lord Ripon's term of office. We do at least ever pray the Lord to guide him and his Councillors in their very difficult duties.

Deplores the insult offered by the non-official Europeans of Calcutta to His Excellency the Viceroy.

The Bombay Chronicle (78) of the 9th December observes that every sensible person, European or Native, must deeply deplore the conduct of the non-official Europeans who treated His Excellency the Viceroy and Lady Ripon on their return to Calcutta in the outrageous manner of which painful accounts have been received here. The more intelligent leaders who directly or indirectly incited the low, ill-bred and unthinking mob of Eurasians, East-Indians and Europeans proper to acts of savage incivility, nay brutality, towards the Viceroy and his consort deserve the utmost condemnation. It reflects great credit on Lord Ripon that he should have shown by his noble bearing and dignified attitude that he was indifferent to the behaviour of the Pariahs who attempted to annoy him. The example set by the non-official Europeans to the lower orders of Natives might possibly beget a tendency to breed mischief, which, unless prevented in time by the care and attention of the better classes, none will have to deplore more than the fools who have set that most disgraceful example. [The Rást Goftár (114), the Yajdán Parast (127), the Kaiser-i-Hind (107), the Gujarát Mitrá (79) and the Din Bandhu (5) of the same date and many other papers express similar sentiments.]

Says that the Christian missionaries entertain no ill-feelings towards the class of educated Natives.

With reference to the allegation made by the Subodh Patrika in its issue of the 2nd December and reported at page 4 of the Report on Native Papers for the week ending 8th December 1883 that the Christian missionaries hate the class of educated Natives, the Dnyánodayá (7) of the 13th December says:—For one we utterly disavow any feeling even approaching what might be called hate of the educated classes of this country. Moreover we do not know any missionaries who have such feelings. We should very much like to have more intercourse with this class, and to sympathize more with them in everything that they and missionaries have in common. It is our earnest regret that it is our experience that because we cannot think it profitable or right to omit religious topics educated Natives avoid us. We will welcome them to our houses, we will gladly visit them at their houses, we will gladly converse and consult on other than religious topics, but to be true to our convictions we cannot omit religion. We earnestly and cordially invite the editor of the Subodh Patrika and other educated gentlemen to try in private or in public to see if other missionaries and if we will not heartily meet them on these terms. We have made many efforts to promote friendly relations and have been pained at the lack of any response. Will not some one write to us suggesting what missionaries can do to promote more friendly intercourse with the educated classes of the Native community?

Requests Government to dispense justice to the people of Waduth in the Sátára District who are annoyed by the conduct of certain Mhár converts to Christianity.

In reference to the memorial submitted to His Excellency the Governor in Council by the Hindus of the village of Waduth, in the Sátára Táluka of the Sátára District, praying for relief from the annoyance given to them by some Mhár converts to Christianity of the same village, the Shiváji (63) of the 7th December observes that it is very shameful that the district authorities should side with the converts and annoy the Hindus. If the present state of things continues it may not be long before something unusual happens. The hurting of religious prejudices gave rise to the mutiny of 1857, destroyed the Mahomedan empire in India, and might lead to a similar disastrous result in regard to British rule if the religious prejudices of the people are offended. The authorities should give up the foolish course if they wish that the British Government should continue to exist perpetually. They should treat impartially the followers of the different religions. The Hindus of Waduth never hitherto complained against the Mhár converts, and hence there can be no doubt that the latter are in fault.

Complains that Assistant Surgeons on the Bombay Medical Establishment are miserably paid.

The Lok Mitrá (81) of the 9th December observes that the Assistant Surgeons in the subordinate Medical Department are among the most miserably paid of all Her Majesty's responsible officers. An Assistant Surgeon in the subordinate Medical Department, whatever may be his qualifications and however conscientiously he may discharge his duties, has no cheering prospects before him but the drudgery falling to the lot of ordinary Assistant Surgeons. But this is not all. The pay in this unfortunate department has never been high, the highest pay ever allowed being Rs. 200 rising to Rs. 350, and this was reduced some time ago to Rs. 100 rising to Rs. 250. This sum is not such as would attract the most intelligent members of the profession, and though no reflection is meant to be cast on the ability and the steadiness of the Assistant Surgeons already employed, still it may be remarked that many more intelligent graduates avoid this department, and some of those who join it do it with a resolution to leave it as soon as a favourable opportunity offers itself. The inconvenience arising from this is felt by the Surgeon-General himself, who, it is said, always expresses his displeasure at the conduct of those who join his department only to leave it after serving for a short time. But apart from the inconvenience complained of by the Surgeon-General, the reduction policy of Government is sure to be a great hindrance to the progress of medical science in this Presidency. The fatal mistake committed by the Government of Sir Richard Temple in opening vernacular medical schools which must of necessity turn out men of inferior stamp, the reduction of the pay of Assistant Surgeons, and the monopoly of the best portion of private practice by the European members of the Indian Medical Department here as well as elsewhere, are sufficient to damp the spirits of any intelligent youth wishing to take to the medical profession; and the result will be that this line will swarm with persons of mediocre abilities quite unfit to do anything in the way of advancing this noble science.

Defends Mr. Macpherson, Judge and Sessions Judge, Surat, from the attack made on him by a newspaper of that city.

The Suryá Prakásh (83) of the 8th December disapproves of the attack made on Mr. Macpherson, Judge and Sessions Judge, Surat, by the Vartamán Sár newspaper and reported at page 10 of the Report on Native Papers for the week ending 1st December 1883. Recently some two or three important cases have come up to the Sessions which he was unable to proceed with without finishing the other cases he had in hand. True it is that inconvenience and harm is caused to the accused and witnesses by the frequent adjournment of the Sessions, but the Judge has to exercise great caution in giving his judgment in cases which he has already heard. The ábkári case took up a great deal of his time. It is creditable to him that he should carefully watch the interests of the accused placed for trial before him. The frequent adjournment of the case of one Gorji and two Bráhmans in the present Sessions is also owing to the ábkári case. Mr. Macpherson's judgment in the ábkári case has elicited praise from the public. The Suryá Prakásh feels confident that the great care which Mr. Macpherson bestows in conducting the trial of cases committed to the Sessions will not fail to be appreciated by the public of Surat.

Requests Government to put a stop to the fraudulent transactions of agents of public companies.

The Gujaráti (100) of the 9th December observes that Government ought to adopt some measures for improving the administration of spinning and weaving mills and other public companies. The agents of these concerns defraud the shareholders. They employ their own creatures in the management of the companies and then pilfer them most openly. The shareholders of the New Prince of Wales, the Coorla, the Parel and other spinning mills are unwilling to spend money from their own pockets for the purpose of removing the mismanagement that prevails in the administration of these concerns through fear of opposing the rich agents. The Public Prosecutor, however, ought to take measures to put a stop to the pilferings. The very practice of permitting the appointment of life-agents gives rise to the mismanagement of these companies.

Complains that the police of Ahmednagar have not been able to detect even one of the many thefts that have occurred of late in that town.

In noticing the theft of Rs. 3,000 which recently occurred at the residence of one Maganchand valad Kisordás, Gujaráti, in Kaparpura, in the town of Ahmednagar, the Jagadádarsh (30) of the 9th December observes that the police are enquiring into the occurrence, but it must be remarked that for some time past they have not been able to trace even one of the many thefts that have been committed. Government ought to pay attention to this state of things.

States that the article headed "Present Rulers and Past" which appeared in the issue of the Military Instructor of 3rd November last was an extract from the Deccan Herald.

The Military Instructor (138) of the 8th December states that through an oversight no acknowledgment was made that the article which appeared in its issue of 3rd November last under the heading "Present Rulers and Past" was an extract from the Deccan Herald of the 3rd ultimo. The writer promises not to allow such mistakes to occur in future. (The article in question has been noticed at page 3 of the Report on Native Papers for the week ending 10th November 1883.)

Local Self-government.

Makes remarks upon the report of the Select Committee on the Bombay Local Boards Bill.

In noticing the report of the Select Committee on the Bombay Local Self-government Bills, the Dnyán Prakásh (8) of the 10th December makes the following observations:—The Select Committee admits that the arguments advanced by the Sárvajanik Sabha in support of its recommendation are not without weight, and yet those recommendations have been dismissed with the remark that there is nothing to the contrary in the Bill and that it is left in the power of the executive Government to adopt this or any similar suggestion when it is recommended by practical experience. A similar discretionary provision existed in the Bombay District Municipal Act of 1872, but we all know from experience which we cannot afford to ignore how the executive Government, when it is composed of self-willed persons, is impervious to all advice and recommendations from non-official sources. It is therefore extremely desirable that the very least that can now be safely done should be ungrudgingly done, while the rest may be left to the discretion of the executive Government. It should be remembered that unlike the members of the táluka boards the members of the district boards will be elected by a very select constituency, half of which will be the nominees of Government. This circumstance alters the nature of the case in a very material degree. The Select Committee observes that it has come to the conclusion that as the elective system is novel and the quality of the elected members cannot be predicted, the elective minimum which may safely be made obligatory must be decided chiefly with reference to the powers placed by other parts of the Bill within the independent control of the new local bodies. It is no doubt true that nothing can be said as to the qualification of the members that will be elected by constituencies for the most part composed of miscellaneous and uninformed persons, who are as yet quite inexperienced in the exercise of their new rights; but we must say that we can predict more definitely about the quality of the members who will be elected by such select constituencies as the táluka boards, especially when full half of those constituencies are to consist of the nominees of Government, who will be themselves eligible as members of the district boards. In short, we fully agree with the Sárvajanik Sabha in holding that the elective minimum in the district boards which ought to be made obligatory by law should be fixed at three-fourths instead of at one-half as now fixed by the Select Committee. The Honourable Mr. Peile, as well as the other members of the Select Committee with the exception of course of Mr. Ráste, do not require to be told that it is one thing to guarantee the elective minimum by law and quite another to leave such an important matter to be entirely settled by the executive Government at its sweet will and pleasure. It is extremely painful to us to have to remind an officer like Mr. Peile of the fact, which is anything but creditable to the Bombay Government, that it allowed a similar provision in the existing Municipal Act to lie dormant for ten years. It will be remembered that the Government of India in its scathing despatch of the 4th October 1882 reminded the Bombay Government of the same fact while replying to the stupidly glowing picture which the Bombay Government had drawn in the second paragraph of its resolution dated the 19th September 1882 about the progress which this Presidency had made in the direction of local self-government under the existing laws. In the same manner we cannot afford to forget that the Government of Sir Richard Temple violated all the pledges which the framers of the Local Funds Act of 1869 had given and had practically fulfilled so far as they were concerned. This circumstance compels us to inquire whether the Government of Sir Richard Temple would have dared to act in the way it did, had the framers of the Act of 1869 embodied in the body of the law those pledges which they gave in the Council. Sir Richard could not have effected that without first attempting to change the law, in which he would most certainly have been defeated. What is then the moral to be learnt from this painful experience in the past? That moral is that whatever can be safely provided for in the body of the law should never be allowed to be left to the discretion of the executive Government. Now, as we have repeatedly observed in these columns, we have not the slightest doubt that like the framers of the Act of 1869 Sir James Fergusson and Mr. Peile will, while they continue at the head of affairs, fully act up to the pledges now given ; but what guarantee is there that a future Sir Richard Temple will not undo all the good work of his predecessors and throw back indefinitely the progress of years by doing nothing more than is absolutely required by the letter and not the spirit of the law? That similar things have come to pass in past years is the best possible argument in support of our view that the apprehended result will inevitably and as a matter of course follow. While we accept to the fullest extent the truth of the declaration made by Sir James Fergusson in the concluding portion of his speech in the Council on the 25th August last that nothing more than what is absolutely safe should be now assured by law, we must protest against leaving undone that which can be safely done at the present moment. As the Select Committee has not in any way attempted to meet the arguments advanced by the Sárvajanik Sabha in support of its recommendation that the elective minimum in the case of the district boards be fixed at three-fourths, but has on the contrary admitted that those arguments are not without weight, we trust that the Council will reconsider this question when it meets again.

Makes remarks upon the Bombay Local Boards Bill.

In again noticing the Bombay Local Boards Bill as amended by the Select Committee, the Dnyán Prakásh (8) of the 13th December writes as follows :—Section 27 of the Bill relates to the appointment of presidents and vice-presidents. It requires every local board to elect a vice-president whenever the nominated or elected president is a salaried servant of Government; but nothing is expressly stated in the section as to whether a salaried servant of Government can be elected as vice-president or not. It appears that the vice-president to be elected by the board must be a non-official member, as it is expressly provided that a vice-president shall be elected even when the elected president is a salaried servant of Government. There can scarcely be any doubt as to the intentions of the framers of the present Bill when we take into consideration the fact noticed above. But then we have our doubts whether under the section as it stands at present a salaried servant of Government can be elected as vice-president. Past experience teaches us that the original intentions of the framers of any given legislative measure are soon forgotten, and that the letter, and not the spirit of the law, is fully availed of afterwards. It is not therefore unlikely that when the intentions of the present Government will have been forgotten, and when the ruling principle will be the discouragement and suppression of local liberties—we say it is quite possible under such circumstances that both the president and the vice-president of a local board may be salaried servants of Government. It may be contended that the election of a vice-president will remain with the boards themselves, and that the members of these boards will be to blame if they so far forget themselves as to elect a salaried servant of Government for the post instead of electing a bonâ fide non-official member. Such a contention is no doubt true to some extent; but past experience shows very clearly that under the guidance of official members, who are averse to encourage local liberties and who themselves act under orders from above, non-official members of local committees have not unfrequently violated the spirit of the law. We have not to go far in search of an instance in point. The spirit of the Bombay District Municipal Act of 1873 favours the election of the managing committee of a municipality by that body collectively, and the practice in force in most of the municipalities was in accordance with that spirit. But in some of the most prominent municipalities, and notably so in the Poona Municipality, the municipal commissioners soon after their first nomination under that Act were induced to surrender that power into the hands of the official president. That the official president obtained this power not by fair means is evident to anyone who cares to even superficially read the history of that question. The Poona municipal commissioners soon became aware of their folly, and during subsequent years made repeated attempts to recover their lost power, and so far as they were concerned they repealed the old rule requiring the president to nominate the managing committee. But all their attempts proved futile, for under the same law every rule passed by a municipality to be valid required the sanction of the Divisional Commissioner, and in the Poona case the Divisional Commissioner, acting probably under the advice of the local district officer, invariably refused his sanction to the rule repeatedly passed by the local municipality, until in June last the altered attitude of Government on the subject of local self-government left no option to the Divisional Commissioner and forced him to accord his sanction to the altered rule. This particular case affords us an instructive moral, which, if experience can teach us anything, we must profit by. That moral is that as far as possible the law should be very precise and accurate and should not be equivocal; that, in short, the spirit should as far as possible be expressed in precise language. We accordingly propose that a proviso should be added to Section 27 of the Bombay Local Boards Bill distinctly requiring the local boards to elect as vice-presidents none but bonâ fide non-officials; in other words, salaried servants of Government should be by law declared ineligible as vice-presidents. We presume that the intention of the framers of the Bill is that the elected vice-presidents should invariably be non-official members of local boards. We believe that no reasonable objection can be urged to acting upon our proposal and to declaring salaried servants of Government ineligible as vice-presidents of local boards. We trust that when the Council meets again in Bombay towards the end of this month to consider the two Bills in detail, it will see its way to accepting our abovementioned proposal. In the constitution portion of the Bombay Local Boards Bill we find that several important amendments have been already accepted by the Select Committee, and this fact leads us to hope that the Council will yet see its way to make other important alterations in both the Bills before finally passing them.

Comments in connection with the report of the Select Committee appointed to report upon the Bombay Local Boards Bill.

The Mahrátta (2) of the 9th December, in commenting upon the report of the Select Committee appointed to report upon the Local Boards Bill, says:—We have no hope of influencing the opinion of the members of the Legislative Council, because from the published report it appears the Committee has not taken into account the suggestions made in connection with the Bill in the columns of the newspapers, for paragraph 3 of the report makes no mention whatever of the press; the only views which have been given careful attention to were those put forth by the Bombay Branch of the East India Association, the Poona Sárvajanik Sabha and other associations and individuals. Whose opinions then does the report of the Select Committee represent? It reflects and embodies the opinions of the official members, and official members only, as will be seen from the sequel. When the Select Committee was appointed we had hopes that the "dummy member" would rather go with the two non-official members Ráo Sáheb Mandlik and Mr. Badrudin; so that the report would essentially be a reflection of the views of the non-official members. But to our great surprise and regret, Mr.

Mandlik was absent and Mr. Badrudin has come to a compromise by inducing himself to rely upon the promises of the member in charge of the Bill. Every point which it appeared Mr. Badrudin would fight out, has been given in on the distinct understanding of a liberal and fair treatment; so that the vulnerable points in the Bill have remained as they were, and such changes only have been introduced as the official members deemed necessary. Anybody who knows Ráo Báhádur Ráste's learning, education, and character will at once agree with us that the honourable member could not have made any vigorous protest against any of the provisions. Even if he had shown a bold front he would have done so only to yield, for two against one is no proper match. The opinion of the Bombay Sabha appears to have prevailed nowhere, and the only views that have been acceptable are those of the Poona Sabha; even these have not prevailed to the fullest extent, but only to that extent to which they had been shaped so as to fit those of the officials exactly. The two important points in the Bill on which the whole frame of the scheme is to rest and to turn are the number of elected members and the appointment of the president. On both these points the Committee has not given an inch, so that it may safely be said that the Bill as it stood and as it stands are the same. We must admit that concessions on minor heads have been made; but so long as the number of elected representatives is not increased, and so long as the district rája continues to be the president, local fund boards, elected or not elected, will remain in statu quo. The elasticity of the provisions in the Bill is indeed a good position to which the member in charge retires when he cannot meet the arguments on the other side. We fully agree with Mr. Badrudin in reposing complete trust and confidence in the members of the present Government; but can Mr. Peile or Sir James Fergusson give us any guarantee that there will come no Ashburners or Temples into whose hands the rearing up of "this tender plant" of political education will fall? That what we contend for might be given us by the Fergusson-Peile administration we have no doubt. But what we doubt most is the continuance of this liberal spirit. And it was for this that we urged and that we now urge that the Act should lay down in unmistakable terms the standard of qualifications necessary for boards to enjoy particular privileges. In short, we want the Legislature to define the line beyond which the executive will have no power to dictate. We are quite willing to be for some time in the position in which the arbiters of our destinies may place us; but we cannot consent to be there until it pleases the executive to elevate us. What we want is powers to mould our own situation, of course consistently and in harmony with the policy of our rulers. The Collector or the official president will be instructed to leave the duty of presiding at meetings as far as possible to the elected vice-president. This means that under the provisions of the present Bill every board will be allowed to have an elected president, only that the name will differ. We do not much care if the elected chairman of the board is known as the president or vice-president. If instructions are to be given to Collectors, why not as well state in the Act that the official president will not ordinarily preside and do the duty of the president, but may do so on special occasions? Thus the provisions of the Bill are compromising enough, but too much is left to the sweet will of the executive, which ought never to be the case.

Remarks in connection with the report of the Select Committee appointed to report upon the Bombay Local Boards Bill.

The Native Opinion (10) of the 9th December, in commenting upon the report of the Select Committee on the Bombay Local Boards Bill, says:—The vagueness of Section 27 of the Local Boards Bill, coupled with the conduct and the sentiments of the Local Government, fill people with alarm, which no amount of insisting on the necessity of elasticity can remove. We are sure if our Government shows a determination to carry out the measure in the very spirit in which it was promulgated by the Government of India we shall have no cause to complain. But the utterances of Sir James Fergusson during the debate in the Council leave no room for imagining that the Bill will be worked in a liberal spirit and that Government dictation will be employed only in those places where successful popular action is impossible. This is further aggravated by the elaborateness with which the Select Committee has tried to prove the necessity of official presidents.

It is this illiberal spirit of which we complain. Nobody is so unreasonable as to expect that if full freedom of election be indiscriminately granted to all boards in the Presidency the result would be a beneficial one. Mr. Badrudin, we are sure, would have never consented to such a report as the other members have put their signatures to, were it not for the several assurances which, he says in his memorandum, he has received from the member in charge of the Bill. We wait to see these assurances put into actual practice. Until that is done we regret we cannot change our attitude of distrust, so many and so various have been our disappointments on diverse similar occasions. The first resolution of the Bombay Government is still ringing in our ears. We should again like to express our concern at the present Bill not being a consolidatory measure on the subject. We wish the Committee had recommended such a proposal and not left the people under the painful necessity of wading through more than one enactment to find out the true law. The assurance Mr. Badrudin has received on this head is amusing, but not comforting. The neglect of the popular demand for previous discussion of the rules to be published under this Act gives a finish to the disappointment one feels from a perusal of the report. The rules are a very important portion of the Act. They will guide and modify the whole thing, and so long as they are obscure we cannot say what the effect of the new measure will be.

Approves of the district Collector being made president of the local board.

The Shetakaryáncha Kaivári (62) of the 1st December observes that the report of the Select Committee on the Bombay Local Boards Bill seems to have been prepared after a thorough consideration of the Bill and of the important suggestions made by public associations and others. The Bill proposes that the Collector of the district should be the president of the local boards, but he would have to conform to all reasonable views of the majority of the members of the boards. This is a judicious arrangement for the present for the proper working of the local selfgovernment scheme and nobody ought to object to it.

Legislation.

Approves of the Bengal Rent Bill.

The Din Bandhu (5) of the 9th December approves of the Bengal Rent Bill, and observes that the measure is urgently needed in the interests of the Bengal ryots. The proposed law will never badly affect the relations between the zamindárs and their tenants so long as the latter get a fair remuneration for their work and toil.

Disapproves of the statement made by the Viceroy in the Legislative Council on the Native Magistrates' Jurisdiction Bill.

The Rást Goftár (114) of the 9th December observes that Lord Ripon's statement in the Legislative Council on the Native Magistrates' Jurisdiction Bill is disappointing in one particular only, namely, that he has shown extreme courtesy and mildness towards the opponents of the Bill. The substance of the statement is that His Lordship and his Government have respect for and are glad to please the assailants of the Bill. But these antagonists do not deserve so much courtesy. Among the opponents are several gentlemen of high standing and great respectability, but they have been so much blinded by caste prejudices as not only to magnify a trifling matter of administrative reform into a thing of great alarm, but have turned their backs latterly on the foolish complaints of low Europeans. They have moreover set a bad example by their personal conduct, and incited their low countrymen to adopt a disloyal and disorderly behaviour in carrying on the opposition. It is quite incomprehensible why so much weight should be given to the grovelling whinings of selfish Europeans after the Home Government had left to the Government of India the choice of acting as it liked. The Englishmen in England approve of the compromise suggested by Lord Northbrook and repeated by the Viceroy in his statement in Council; but the disloyal Europeans of Bengal reject even these modifications. Hence it seems best that Government should throw out the trifling variations in the Bill and should at once enact the measure in its original form. [The Dátardun (94) of the 13th December says that Lord Ripon committed a mistake in showing so great a regard for the feelings of the opponents of the Bill.]

Approves of Lord Ripon's statement in the Supreme Legislative Council on the Native Magistrates' Jurisdiction Bill.

The Lok Mitrá (81) of the 9th December observes that Lord Ripon's statement in the Legislative Council on the Native Magistrates' Jurisdiction Bill is a complete vindication of his silence hitherto on the subject. It must be remembered that no Indian statesman has the same opportunities or facilities for taking the public into his confidence as an English minister in England generally possesses under the peculiar institutions of that country. Lord Ripon could not have made the statement which he made on Friday outside the Council Hall when the Legislative Council first met at Calcutta after the adjournment of its sittings in March, and in the full statement made by him he has completely disposed of all the senseless accusations against him of undue reticence and contempt of all opinions opposed to his own. After the meeting of Council in March the Bill was referred to the various Governments for consideration and report; and as these opinions came in they were carefully examined by the members of Government. The opinions had been pouring in from all sides up to the 24th of July, and considering their volume and the elaborate character of some of them it must have been a really laborious task to study and form a judgment upon these opinions. As it is, it appears that by the 10th of August the Government were in a position to address the Secretary of State with reference to the mass of documents that had been collected, representing the most diversified views and containing a number of suggestions and observations that required a most careful examination. It is therefore really a wonderful feat that the Government had perused, studied and examined the various arguments for and against the Bill, discussed them in Council, and were prepared to submit their observations upon them to the Secretary of State all in the short space of seventeen days. The conclusion at which they arrived, with the single exception of Major-General Wilson, was that the principle of the Bill should remain intact, while modifications in its provisions should be permitted. These modifications were approved by the Secretary of State, and Her Majesty's Government declared the continuance of their unflinching support to the principle of the Bill. Lord Ripon was at the pains to evince an almost too tender regard for the feelings of the opponents of the Bill. No one will doubt his sincerity when he says that nothing could be further from his intentions, or more opposed to his own personal character and disposition, than to treat those opposed to him upon any public measure with a want of either courtesy or consideration. [The Indian Spectator (1) and the Yajdán Parast (127) of the same date and the Bombay Samáchár (90), the Jáme Jamshed (104) and the Káside Mumbai (108) of the 10th December, and many other papers express similar sentiments.]

Censures the Europeans for raising an unreasonable opposition to the Ilbert Bill.

In noticing the objection raised in India and England by Europeans to the Ilbert Bill, the Shetakaryáncha Kaivári (62) of the 15th December observes that numerous official and non-official Europeans have brought forward ridiculous arguments in favour of their position in India in relation to the Natives, and claim the trial of European British subjects by European Magistrates as their birthright. Europeans consider themselves highly civilized and profess a religion that is being preached throughout the world as the only religion that can improve the fallen nature of man and mould his conduct and character on the principles of justice and equality. But that religion has failed to a great extent to exercise its wholesome influence on their minds, otherwise they would never have tried to keep the Natives in a position of social and political inferiority. Notwithstanding their sneers and misrepresentations against Natives, it is gratifying that the liberal minded ministers of the State and other statesmen and numerous private individuals in England have taken a favourable view of the policy of the Indian Government, and have shown their willingness to support it on the principles of justice. The Kaivári then gratefully notices the exertions of the Indian Reform Association to consider impartially matters relating to India and to advance the interests of Natives as far as it lies in its power to do so.

In a paragraph headed "The London Times and the Ilbert Bill," the Native Opinion (10) of the 9th December says:—

Disapproves of the tone of the London Times towards the Native Magistrates' Jurisdiction Bill.

That a sedate and thoughtful journal like the Times should throw itself openly into the arms of the Bransonites may puzzle some, but to us it appears to be the inevitable result of the unfortunate position that journal took from the first with regard to the Ilbert Bill. Though there can be no family likeness between the Calcutta Englishman and the London Times, yet the latter has, by overshooting the mark of thoughtful journalism in the present instance, evidently shown that both are of the same kin. The Times may not approve of the Ilbert Bill, but what connection on earth can there be between the private religious opinions of the present Viceroy and an Indian legislative enactment that the former should be rudely dragged before the public gaze in order to make the latter ridiculous? A change of religion even at the ripe age of fifty only shows a manliness of character too high to be pooh-poohed as vacillation or weakness. We never felt staggered at the silly but vituperative utterances of a section of Anglo-Indians out here; but we feel shocked at the temerity of the Thunderer in refusing to duly weigh both sides of the question. We think the London Times has trusted too far its Calcutta correspondent to allow better counsels to prevail with it, and the result is pretty patent. The opponents may draw courage from this attitude of the Times, but surely the sober-minded will at once see who is in the wrong.

Education.

With reference to the probable retirement of the present Director of Public Instruction, Berár, the Mahrátta (2) of the 9th December says:—

Says that a Native gentleman should be appointed to succeed the present Director of Public Instruction, Berár, when he retires from service.

It is greatly feared that the Directorship may again fall to the lot of a member of the "singularly fortunate race of Europeans"; and we may say the fears are not quite groundless. When Mr. Kero Lakshman Chhatre retired from the Professorship of Mathematics in the Deccan College the place was filled up not by a Native but by a foreigner. This is not a solitary instance of its kind. The retirement of Mr. Dándekar has therefore most naturally caused us anxiety, and we think it is the duty of every well-wisher of the cause of education in Berár to fight out this legitimate battle with Government. The first object to be gained in this battle is an assurance from Government that the post will be conferred on a Native, and we have then to look to the interests of the proper claimant. Both these questions are not the less natural, because we have already declared war against the employment of foreigners to highly paid posts, and the fight for securing the Directorship to a worthy and competent Native is but one of those battles which must be fought for and won; and the latter portion of the work, as we have already said, relates to seeing that the proper claimant to the vacancy is put in. We know that favouritism often gets the better of legitimate rights, and this ought not to be allowed. The Mahrátta then advocates the claims of Mr. S. B. Jatár, and adds that he is a thorough gentleman and combines all the qualities that a Director of Public Instruction ought to possess.

Railways.

The Hitechchhu (80) of Ahmedabad of the 13th December complains of the want of fencing and gates along the sides of the Rájputána Railway. The gates are very few and are made in the vicinity of stations. In many places only two posts with a broken chain or cord between them form the gates, and owing to the want of gatemen at such entrances there is likelihood of cattle straying on the line. It is surprising that this railway should give handsome salaries to its European employés and not see the necessity of erecting well-made gates. Moreover there is no fencing whatever on either side of the line for several miles north of the Abu station, though nearly three years have passed away since the line was opened for traffic. This want of fencing gives rise to accidents. It is unaccountable how Government could have allowed the railway authorities to carry passengers and goods on such a badly constructed line. Some think that such a state of things is tolerated because it is a Government line. This belief is encouraged by the present order of things, which does not add to the good name of the British for impartial justice. It is to be hoped that hedge and wire fencing and gates will speedily be erected by the sides of the railway line.

Complains of the want of fencing and gates along the sides of the Rájputána Railway.

Municipalities.

Comments in connection with the debate in the Bombay Municipal Corporation on the subject of liquor licenses in the city and the income derived therefrom.

The Indian Spectator (1) of the 9th December says:—To those who are anxious to see a fair and equitable settlement of transfers of revenue and expenditure between the Bombay Government and the municipality under the proposed extension of local self-government in the city, the debate on the liquor license fees at a recent meeting of the local Corporation must have made it painfully clear how hollow are the professions of the local authorities to act honestly towards the city municipality. We have over and over again protested against the niggardly treatment which the rulers at "Bombay Castle" offer to the Corporation. This niggardliness is incompatible with the dignity of the great power they so poorly represent, while their attempts to take undue advantage of the powerless local self-governing body often remind one of the "sharp practice" of the petty-fogging attorney. Now, it must be clear to those who have carefully studied the exhaustive arguments, supported by statistics, which Mr. Nowroji Fardunji took the trouble to urge so well before his colleagues that a stronger case could not have been made out for demanding compensation for the annual loss of revenue the municipality has suffered owing to the juggling finance which the "zealous" Mr. Ashburner furnished to the Legislative Council in 1878 on the liquor license receipts collected by the municipality prior to the passing of that hateful piece of legislation known as the A'bkári Act. And though so shrewd a business-man as Mr. S. S. Bengali then pointed out the injustice of determining the contribution to be allotted to the municipality by taking the average of the receipts for the ten preceding years, the official majority as usual carried the day, and thus inflicted a loss on the municipality which now comes to about a lákh of rupees. This arbitrary method was of course characteristic of the Government of the day. It was of a piece with the absolutism of the Honourable Lionel Ashburner. It did not strike that Councillor that he could not have for a moment adopted the same principle of computation in any question of provincial finance having reference to the Imperial revenue. The scheme of decentralization inaugurated by Lord Mayo and improved upon by the Ripon-Baring administration is undoubtedly good per se. But it shows at the same time how it sometimes acts iniquitously on local finance, which is dependent on provincial revenue as much as the latter is dependent on the Imperial allotment. It is well known how manfully the Bombay Government has fought for its share of that allotment; how ably it has urged its claims; how it has left no fact or argument unnoticed with the view to force the Imperial Government to allow it its fair share. But what is sauce for the goose is no sauce for the gander. That is the principle on which the Local Government transacts its finance in connection with the powerless minor local self-governing bodies. But who can oppose the will of the infallible bureaucrats? None must dispute their sovereignty, much less impugn their honesty. Mr. Servai's arguments only betray his own inexperience, while they expose in a marked manner the weakness of the cause he espouses. Now, was it not ridiculous to urge that Government has given full consideration to the A'bkári Act before it was made universal in India, when all India to a man has universally condemned its oppressive provisions, enacted with the single object of enhancing the excise revenue, provisions that have increased smuggling to an extraordinary extent not only in this Presidency but elsewhere, which all the efforts of the powerful Government have failed to check in any appreciable degree? Is Mr. Servai aware of the loud outcry in Bengal, in Assam, in Burmah, in the Panjáb and in the N.-W. Provinces against this precious uniform system of ábkári which the evil genius of its authors has brought into existence? If he read the criticisms which from time to time appear in the public organs of the various provinces, he would discover for himself how mighty an evil for the morals of the masses this Á'bkári Act is. He would know how the Imperial Government and the subordinate administrations are primarily guilty of the increased vice of drunkenness their legislation has encouraged. The voice of the public is daily increasing in volume, and must sooner or later become sufficiently articulate to bring about a formidable agitation in every part of the country against an Act which is a blot on the statute book. The ruler of Bengal has just appointed a Commission of Inquiry with the consent of the Supreme Government. Again, is Mr. Servai aware how the Imperial Government has established its salt monopoly? Is he aware how the Native States have been coerced into accepting this harmonic "uniformity" which for a time deprived the half-starved forty millions of India's population of even a grain of salt, and which impoverished this poor country by destroying a minor source of wealth, namely, the domestic cattle? These are the results of "uniformity" in the collection of excise and salt duties. We are glad, therefore, that the majority of the Corporation has resolved to demand compensation for the loss of the annually increasing revenue from liquor license fees. Mr. Javerilál was quite right in urging the desirability of the municipality being allowed the control and regulation of the ábkári revenue in the city. It may not be generally known that we have as many as 452 retail shops for vending country spirits alone in the city, and that Government derives a revenue of Rs. 13,83,856 from the license duty. To realise the significance of these figures let the reader compare the total receipts of Rs. 27,43,007 from the four divisions into which the Presidency is divided. The latter amount is derived from a population numbering 15,681,218 or just twenty times that of Bombay City. The total number of retail licenses in the four divisions is 1,686, or 409 per each on an average. That is to say, each division, with an average population of 40 lákhs, has 409 retail licensed shops for the vending of country spirits to the 452 in the city with a population of 7½ lákhs! These figures tell their own tale as to the fearful extent of drunkenness in the city. Is not Mr. Javerilál right that with the view to check such vice the municipality ought to have full control of the ábkári revenue in the city?

Complains of the report of the Ahmedabad Municipality for the year 1882-83 being submitted to Government without the previous approval of the general body of the municipal commissioners.

The Hitechchhu (80) of Ahmedabad of the 13th December, in criticising the report of the Ahmedabad Municipality for the year 1882-83, remarks:—The report was, we are told, submitted to Government through the president by Khán Báhádur Edalji Dosábhái while he was acting permanent chairman of the managing committee in July last; but none of the municipal commissioners knew anything about it till a printed copy of it was supplied to each of them a few weeks ago by the present managing committee. Now we ask in the name of common sense and of the people of Ahmedabad, why was not this report placed before the managing committee for its approval and then submitted to a general meeting of the commissioners for adoption? As the municipality is conducted by the general body of commissioners, the report of its working should go to Government from them and not from a single commissioner. Mr. Edalji has signed this report as "Chairman, City Municipality, Ahmedabad." Is this correct? Was he appointed president of the municipal committee, and, if so, how can there be two presidents, Mr. Reid as well as Mr. Edalji? If he had signed the report as chairman of the managing committee, no one could have disputed his appellation; but as it was not prepared in consultation with the managing committee of the month, an honest doubt should have prevented him from assuming that designation in this case. It was also the duty of the Acting Collector-president, Mr. Reid, to lay the draft of the report before a general meeting of the commissioners for approval. It may be urged on behalf of Messrs. Reid and Edalji that they have followed the practice of their predecessors, and we must grant that the excuse is not altogether groundless. Most of the commissioners nominated by the Collector were considered to be mere dummies, who took little real interest in and understood less of municipal matters, and consequently they nodded approbation to all that was said by the Collector or his deputy. Under such circumstances it mattered very little whether their views on the annual report were taken or not taken. But things have changed now. A majority of the elected commissioners is dissatisfied with such arbitrary proceedings and doing business in underhand ways. They like to see things with their own eyes and take the people into their confidence. We see no reason why these reports should not be translated into Gujaráti, sent to the newspapers and distributed among the people. One or two hundred rupees spent for this purpose will greatly help the noble object of Lord Ripon. People should be permitted to know what the municipality has done and is doing. This knowledge is the first lesson in local self-government. We call upon the present managing committee to publish a Gujaráti version of the report made by Mr. Edalji. It may be distributed gratis or sold at a nominal price. Why keep it concealed? There is nothing private or secret in it.

Native States.

The inhuman treatment of certain servants of the Rája of Nándod.

A correspondent of the Gujarát Mitra (79) of the 9th December observes that a Mahomedan servant of the Rája of Nándod for many days used to visit the harem of the Rája in the dress of a female, where he was taken by his two sweethearts, who are servants in the Rájá's service. At last the Mahomedan servant was detected and information of the occurrence was despatched to the Rája, who was at that time away from his capital. In the meanwhile the Mahomedan and the two women were imprisoned. It is rumoured that after the return of the Chief the prisoners were severely beaten for three or four days. They were afterwards removed into the custody of the Rája himself. The Mahomedan was ordered to be expelled from the Chief's territory but has not been since seen. It is said that he was murdered, since nobody has seen him sent out of the territory. It is also alleged that the Rája caused both the female servants to be thrown from the terrace of his palace. They are both severely wounded. The Diwán was absent from the capital when these occurrences took place, having been sent by the Chief to Surat and other places in order to prevent him from interfering. The brother of the Mahomedan servant was made to pay a fine of Rs. 400. It is also said that the Rája clandestinely despatched Rs. 70,000 to Bombay, but the person with whom they were despatched has misappropriated Rs. 30,000 and the remaining sum is also likely to disappear.

Says that justice is not properly dispensed in the Junágad State.

A correspondent of the Gujaráti (100) of the 9th December observes that Mr. Ambárám has been appointed Superintendent of Police at Junágad with the consent of the Political Agent. Formerly Mr. Ambárám held the same office and then several robberies by house-breaking were committed and some of the robbers were discovered, but in none of those cases was justice dispensed to the unfortunate persons whose property was stolen. The people of Junágad do not appear to be pleased with Mr. Chotálál Bakshi of the superior court. He attends the court and leaves it at any hour he likes, while the parties to the suits are made to wait in the court the whole day. Sometimes he sleeps in a room of the court-house, and when he gets up and comes into court the case of the party whose name is called out but who does not answer the call is struck off the file. If the party protests against this procedure he is sometimes committed to the magistrate for contempt of court and fined for the offence. If he appeals against the decision of the magistrate Mr. Chotálál generally increases the sentence of the lower court. If the appeal is submitted to Vazir Bávdin, he makes a reference to Chotálál. The correspondent then cites a case in which a party to a civil suit was unjustly treated and fined in a magistrate's court for no fault of his.

Junágad affairs.

The Samsher Báhádur (115) of the 7th December says that it is to be regretted that the order of the Supreme Government for the dismissal from office of Messrs. Sále Hindi and Bápálál, the Diwán and Deputy Diwán respectively of Junágad, has not still been carried out. Mr. Haridás, the new Diwán, is a Diwán in mere name and is guided by the advice of Mr. Bápálál. The latter does everything. Mr. Haridás, tempted by the large salary of the post, accepted it, but he is unable to do anything. The Samsher had predicted from the very beginning that Mr. Haridás would be powerless in Junágad. He got the appointment through the influence of Mr. Mansukhrám. But Mr. Bápálál is also a favourite of Mr. Mansukhrám. Mr. Haridás daily goes to the residence of Mr. Sále Hindi to see him, and waits there if he is either engaged or asleep. Is this Diwánship or a farce? Junágad will improve then and then only when Mr. Bápálál, the favourite of Colonel Barton, is removed from it and when some independent and experienced man is appointed Diwán. The Samsher fears that Government will have one day to assume the reins of Government, and then only the necessary reforms will be introduced into the State.

Berár Affairs.

Makes observations in connection with the growth of the Khándesh variety of cotton in Berár.

In alluding to the growth of the "Khándesh variety" of cotton in Berár and the exertions made by the local authorities to discourage its growth, the Pramod Sindhu (51) of the 10th December observes that the Resident of Hyderabad properly disapproves of issuing a prohibition for the cultivation of this variety and correctly remarks that the action of Government need not go further than advice and the furnishing of easy opportunities to the cultivators for a return to the more far-sighted policy of preserving their good name in the supply of an unmixed staple. It would appear, however, that the Resident and many of the older officers in Berár assume that the Berár cultivator is ignorant and that he needs only to be told of the danger ahead. But the ryot is not ignorant: he cultivates the Khándesh variety, because, according to a reliable authority, it yields double the quantity of crop the indigenous variety produces, and while the latter fetches about Rs. 40 per candy, the former sells for only 5 rupees less; so that when a field upon which an indigenous variety is grown will give Rs. 40, the same field when it is sown with the Khándesh variety will give a return of Rs. 70. Though it cannot be said that the Khándesh cotton is grown solely for the purpose of adulteration, yet it will not do to revive the Cotton Frauds Act that has been unanimously condemned by the mercantile community. If other trades require no support to sustain them, why should this trade in particular stand in need of it? If Europeans want a longer-stapled variety the remedy is in their own hands. Let them refuse to buy the Khándesh cotton, or offer double the rates to Banni and Jadi; but they cannot well ask Government to regulate the production of crops. There is no doubt that the Khándesh variety is inferior as its staple is short. It is often difficult to distinguish it, particularly when there has not been an excessive rainfall as in the last season, and then the Khándesh variety presents a smooth and glossy appearance. It was in the beginning of March or April last that complaints came from Bombay that the cotton which the merchants had passed as Banni was in reality the Khándesh variety; for it is a characteristic of the latter that when exposed for some months it becomes yellowish, while the true Banni retains its bluish white colour throughout. It is to be hoped that the above facts will induce the authorities of the province to make a searching enquiry into the matter.

Notes.—A. The notices from the different Newspapers have been collected in the Report under different heads, which are printed in italics.

B. The names of Newspapers are printed in the body of the Report in italics, and the number of the Newspaper in the above list is printed in brackets after the name.

C. The proprietors of the Newspapers marked * have not given information as to the number of copies issued. In these cases an estimate has been made by the Reporter.

D. The system of spelling vernacular words followed by the Reporter is the same as that adopted in the Official Spelling List of the Bombay Presidency. One peculiar feature of this system is that when the long a (आ or ā) is the last letter of a word, the accent is left out, and the short a (अ = u in gun) is, to prevent confusion, never placed at the end of a word. This rule has been strictly followed, except that when the short a appears to be absolutely necessary to complete the pronunciation of a word, as in Arunodaya or the well known Mitra, it is printed with a mark over it to indicate that it is short, thus—ă.

Politics and the Public Administration.

Advocates the abolition of the duty on Indian silverware imported into England.

The Lok Mitrá (81) of the 16th December says that the Government of India deserves the thanks of the Indian public for strongly supporting the cry against the duty on silverware imported into England. With such influential support if India does not gain her point, one must despair of the removal of this inequitable tax on Indian trade. With the Madras Trade Association's lucid statement the Government of India has been able to make most of the arguments against the tax, and it has recommended to the Home Government the abolition of so pernicious a restriction, on the ground not only of commercial advantages, but the political benefits from the removal of the duty. Indian silver is liable to a duty of 1*s.* 6*d.* per ounce, and is besides subjected to most vexatious and inconvenient restrictions before it can be imported into England, and the result has been the affording a protection to the English article which is contrary to all the declared free-trade principles of the present Government. The only plausible ground for abolishing the customs duty on cotton goods in India was its protective character; but such an argument is not quite befitting when used by a Government which hampers the Indian silver trade by a tariff which serves no other purpose than that of protecting the home manufacture. It is to be hoped that the English Government will admit the equity and political justice of freeing Indian silverware from a most vexatious interference with its free importation into England. [The Bombay Chronicle (78) and the Gujaráti (100) of the same date express similar sentiments.]

Says that the restriction imposed by Parliament on the construction of remunerative public works in India should be removed.

The Bombay Chronicle (78) of the 16th December observes that it is gratifying that the Chambers of Commerce of London, Manchester and Liverpool have seen the necessity of urging on the attention of the home authorities the necessity of more rapid construction of railways in India. The movement has evidently for its object the rescinding of the resolution passed some years ago by the House of Commons, by which was imposed on the Government of India the moral obligation not to incur a capital charge from borrowed money of more than two krors and a half of rupees annually for the construction of remunerative public works. Officials and non-officials understanding anything about the wants of the country have been regretting with one voice the short-sighted policy by which unnecessary restriction was imposed on the borrowing powers of the responsible authorities in India. Everyone concerned in seeing timely provision being made for the population annually increasing in spite of the decennial famines and other causes, the carrying on of the Government efficiently at the ever-augmenting rate of charges, and the filling of the ever-yawning gulf of the home charges in spite of the unfavourable aspect of the exchange question as between England and India has emphatically condemned the said restriction as being highly impolitic and deserving of early repeal. This restriction exerts the most disastrous influence on the present and future well-being of the country. It not only checks the extension of railways as a means of intercommunication, but also retards the progress of agriculture, dwarfs commerce, cripples the resources of the country to feed well its people and to better their economic condition, limits the returns of the revenues of the State, and generally lends to mar the growth of happy relations between the governors and the governed.

Express regret at the insult offered by the European opponents of the Native Magistrates' Jurisdiction Bill to His Excellency the Viceroy.

The Gujaráti (100) and the Gujarát Mitrá (79) of the 16th December severely censure the Europeans of Calcutta for insulting the Viceroy in the public streets of that city in order to show their feeling of opposition to the Native Magistrates' Jurisdiction Bill, and observe that their conduct is a disgrace to European civilization and a bad example to the natives of India. The Native public are advised to communicate to His Excellency their condemnation of this conduct of the opponents of the Bill. [The Vartamán Sár (124) of the 18th and the Akhbáre Sodágar (85) of the 19th December express similar sentiments.]

Unfavourably criticises Sir Lepel Griffin's views on British and Native rule as disclosed in his article on "Indian Princes at Home."

The Kesari (35) of the 18th December, in criticising Sir Lepel Griffin's article on "Indian Princes at Home," says that from the fact that the Nizám, Holkar, Gáikwád and other Native princes rule over alien races it is difficult to understand the justification for exercising sovereign power over Hindus by the English nation. The conquest of Egypt by the English people would be no justification to the French to conquer the territory round Canton. If while two persons are quarrelling a third interfered, turned them out of their house, and took possession of their property, nobody would say that the conduct of that third person was just or proper. Sir Lepel Griffin's arguments for the justification of British rule and against the Native princes can be easily refuted. The attempt which he has made to show that British rule is more beneficial to Natives than the rule of Native princes is to their own subjects is absurd. The argument that the English are as much justified in ruling over Hindus as the Gáikwád is justified in reigning over the people of Gujarát is only worthy of an inmate of the Colába Lunatic Asylum. Does the Gáikwád carry away millions of rupees from the territory over which his sway extends? Have the inhabitants of Gujarát to pay to their sovereign even a thousandth part of the tribute which the people of British India have to pay to the British nation? When a highly civilized nation conquers a people who are inferior to it, there is great probability of the latter losing all the good qualities which they possess. Is not such a danger looming on the people in British India?

Says that Sir Lepel Griffin is not fit to superintend the management of Native States and recommends his employment elsewhere.

In criticising Sir Lepel Griffin's article on Indian princes in the Fortnightly Review for October last, the Indu Prakásh (9) of the 17th December says:—We categorically deny every count of Sir Lepel's indictment against Native States. We are not here concerned to dispute Sir Lepel's opinions about the state of administration in British India. We do not agree with him when he says that the administration of British India is probably as perfect a system of government as the world has ever seen. Sir Lepel himself admits that there are faults in British Indian administration. We cannot accept his views about taxation and the mode of applying the revenue. But we concede that the British Government is probably the best-intentioned Government India had in her own history. But the fact that the British Government is enlightened ought not, we submit, altogether to blind us to the merits of Native administrations. Comparisons are odious, but we venture to think many of our Native States, such as Baroda and Travancore, will not lose by comparison with their neighbouring British territory. Sir Lepel Griffin is a Panjáb-man and knows, we think, little of the States in Western and Southern India. Our limits will not permit us to answer Sir Lepel's charges seriatim. We shall content ourselves with referring to the well known opinions of men like Mountstuart Elphinstone as to the administrative capacities of the natives of Western India. Sir Lepel Griffin is a believer in the doctrine that the secrets of government have been confided by fortune to the Anglo-Saxon race alone, and lays down that Hindus like all orientals have no genius for government. It is unnecessary to refute these statements. Suffice it to say that the opinions of many eminent Anglo-Indians are against them. One thing is certain that if ever Native rulers are to be made good administrators it will not be by the advice or superintendence of men like Sir Lepel Griffin. Sir Lepel has by his own statements proved his utter incapacity for the post he fills. We deny that Native States are in the condition he describes them to be in. We should require much stronger evidence than his statements to believe that our Native rulers, watched as they are by the ever-vigilant and obtrusive Political Agents of the British Government, are sunk in such depravity, wickedness and incapacity as Sir Lepel ascribes to them. If the administration in Native States be really as bad as that described, we should have heard of wholesale migrations of Native subjects to the adjacent British territory, and before long the provinces under Native rule ought to have been depopulated and thrown waste. We cannot believe that the British Government will permit such a scandalous state of things to exist within its knowledge. If then what Sir Lepel Griffin describes is true, he is not fit for the place he occupies. It is obviously his duty as agent of the paramount power to see that the subjects of the allied States are not put to any hardship or misery. Instances of Government interference with Native States on the plea of mal-administration are probably fresh in the minds of our readers. What then should have prevented Government from asserting its paramount rights if the circumstances exist according to Sir Lepel's account? No instance has occurred of late in which Government thought it necessary thus to interfere, and we think we may safely infer from this fact that in the opinion of Government there is no such serious mal-administration in Native States as portrayed by Sir Lepel Griffin. The only conclusion we can arrive at is that Sir Lepel is a very prejudiced observer, and his imperious bureaucratic temperament has led him to imagine some defects and exaggerate others. It is obvious that Sir Lepel has no sympathies with, nor has he the desire of assisting and improving the work of, Native rulers. Under these circumstances the best service the Government of India can do to him is, we believe, to rid him of his odious charge. If his diplomatic services in the late Afghan War need to be rewarded, there is ample room for him elsewhere. But the superintendence of Native States is not, we think, fit work for him.

Does not approve of the sending of an Indian contingent to Egypt at the expense of India.

In a paragraph headed "India and the Egyptian Catastrophe," the Native Opinion (10) of the 16th December says:—The question of sending an Indian contingent to Egypt is gradually coming to the front. Reckless pedants like Mr. Maclean, who have not a pie to lose from their pockets and are always ready to secure cheap glory at the expense of others, may approve of such a proposal, but seriously is there the least connection between the Kartoum disaster and India? It may be urged that in the safety of Egypt the honour of England, and by a stretch of relationship the honour of India also, is involved. But if this be so, then, why the honour of India alone? The honour of all the British colonies and the British American dominions into the bargain is involved. Let the colonies and Canada come to the relief, and India will not be backward; but it is obvious impertinence always to be ready to call upon India whenever the rightly or wrongly supposed British interests are in danger. It is not to sending Indian troops to Egypt that we object. India is a field that like her never-ending grain supplies will provide even half a dozen States with fighting men. Let her be paid handsomely for her war material, and we shall be the last to object to sending our troops anywhere and everywhere.

Makes suggestions with respect to enhancing the popularity of stock-notes.

In an article headed "The Stock-notes System," the Indu Prakásh (9) of the 17th December says:—No Government, and least of all the Government of India, can expect the poorer classes to give up their old established habits and ways of saving, and even if the scheme of stock-notes could be made more popular than is at present deemed feasible, we doubt whether it would go a long way in inducing the poorer classes to give up investing their money in ornaments. In a matter like this the question with the people is not one of gain or loss, of safe or insecure investment, but one of old ways and new ideas. If the Government wish them to give up investing their money in trinkets and ornaments they must persevere, for no amount of safe and profitable means of investing money can influence a conservative people to break off their familiar methods of investments in the course of a few years. Sir Evelyn Baring was wise enough to note this fact when he first introduced the stock-notes system, and in considering the question it ought always to be borne in mind that for a long time to come the system ought to be worked more with a view to teach the people that it is safer to invest money in Government securities than to allow it to lie idle in the shape of ornaments, than with a view to bring immediate profits to Government. For this purpose it is essential that for some years to come the Government should limit the number of notes issued every year. If the number is so limited they will naturally rise in value, provided at the same time the Government take care to create a market for them by authorizing their sale by licensed brokers at the presidency and other important towns in the country. The Bombay Chamber of Commerce recommend the latter of these suggestions, but say nothing as to the desirability of limiting the annual issue of notes, probably because the Government of India in their resolution of the 10th August last seemed inclined to view the proposal with disfavour. But, we think, if the notes are to steadily gain in popularity they must be limited to a certain number every year till the poorer classes are enlightened enough to realise the advantage of investing their savings in the shape of notes over that of investing them in ornaments.

Expresses satisfaction with the extended employment of Natives in high offices in the State.

The Ahmedabad Samáchár (84) of the 19th December says that for some time past the number of officials who appreciate the worth of Natives has been increasing. Lord Ripon leads the list of such officers. It is owing to this good-natured nobleman that sympathy for the Natives has been manifested. Though several ill-natured Europeans look upon Natives with envy, this fact is certain that the latter are not as haughty and perverse as the Ilbert Bill has shown the Europeans to be. Many Europeans are of opinion that Natives will not stoop to that meanness which a clique of Anglo-Indians manifested on the occasion of the Viceroy's return to Calcutta. Government now looks upon the loyalty of the Natives as of a superior kind. Notwithstanding this the claims of Natives are ignored by some selfish officials. As the higher posts are filled by Europeans the credit of any good work done by their Native subordinates falls to their lot. Though Natives have been admitted to some high offices they for the main part have to depend upon the kindness of European officials. As the advancement of Natives chiefly lies in the hands of Europeans the former cannot but strive to please the latter, who many a time shirk their responsibility and transfer it to the shoulders of their Native subordinates in order to avoid censure. Still it is a matter for satisfaction that the rights of Natives are now being recognised, though late. If this state of things continues, Natives will be able to show their aptitude for administrative work, now that the scheme of local self-government is to come into operation.

Advises the reconstruction of the volunteer corps.

The Jáme Jamshed (104) of the 19th December observes that the Bengal volunteers have performed the worst part of the unreasonable and persistent opposition raised by the Europeans of that province to the Native Magistrates' Jurisdiction Bill. The volunteers insulted their officers, created disaffection around them, and offended the Natives. They set a bad example to the standing army of the country, showed that no confidence could be placed in them, and that they were a source of danger instead of being a pillar of safety. The trouble and expense incurred in forming volunteer corps is a mere waste. Under these circumstances it is desirable that new rules should be made for the formation of volunteer corps. Christianity ought not to be the sole passport for becoming a volunteer. As a rule all Government servants should be permitted to enlist as volunteers, and great discretion should be exercised in selecting them from among the non-official classes. The volunteer corps should also be subjected to strict military discipline and laws. If this is done the volunteers will prove a source of help not only in time of danger but in the event of the reduction of the regular army during peace.

Complains that the provision sellers had to suffer losses in supplying provisions to a regiment of Native cavalry which had halted at some villages near Bulsár.

A correspondent of the Gujarát Mitrá (79) of the 16th December, writing from Bulsár under date the 14th idem, states that recently a regiment of Native cavalry which came from Poona and was going towards Ahmedabad halted at Pálankhajuri and Undach successively. The police sent the provision sellers to furnish the necessary supplies. The shopkeepers suffered considerable losses. The ser weight used in this part of the country weighs 37½ rupees, but the militray men compelled the provision sellers to use a ser weighing 40 rupees. Some of the cavalry men used to collect in numbers and snatch away provisions and walk off with them. Apparently the police did not guard the provision sellers, and hence they had to put up with bad treatment and the attendant loss. It is also said that the police maltreated the provision sellers in order to compel them to carry provisions for the use of the regiment. [A correspondent of the Bombay Samáchár

(90) of the 17th December also states that the provision sellers complain of their having suffered losses because they were compelled to sell by the pound weight instead of the ser weight of Surat.]

Complains that jackals have become a nuisance in Surat.

The Gujarát Mitrá (79) of the 16th December states that a large number of jackals visit the city of Surat every night between the hours of 8 P.M. and 3 A.M. and disturb the sleep of the inhabitants by running about and crying through the streets. One of these animals is said to have bitten eight persons. The authorities ought to adopt immediate measures for their destruction.

Inability of the police of Ahmednagar to discover thieves and remarks in connection therewith.

The Jagadádarsh (30) of the 16th December says that within the last six years property to the value of Rs. 60,000 has been stolen in the city of Ahmednagar, but no trace has been found of the thieves. During the last week thefts to the value of Rs. 8,000 occurred in Ahmednagar. The police are trying to discover the thieves, but judging from the past it is not likely that they will succeed in tracing them. Thefts of small value are usually discovered, but of large amounts very rarely or never. The inefficiency of the police of Ahmednagar is a matter of public notoriety. It is said that the number of police peons in Ahmednagar is considerably less than is needed, and hence they are unable to maintain strict watch in all parts of the town. If this be so, the police peons do not deserve blame. But it is notorious that the police in Ahmednagar is not expert in detecting thieves. It would be well if detectives from other places were brought here for the purpose of detecting thieves and robbers. If the number of police peons is inadequate for all requirements, steps should be taken without delay to increase the strength of the police force. Government should not practise economy in this matter. There are various other ways in which this can be done.

Requests the local fund committee of Surat to repair the road of the village of Katargam.

The Gujarát Mitrá (77) of the 16th December complains that the roads in the village of Katargam near Surat are so bad that carts and bullocks passing over them are frequently injured. The recent floods in the river Tápti have almost destroyed these roads. The villagers several times petitioned the local fund committee of the district to repair them, but no attention has been paid to this crying inconvenience. The petitioners have been once or twice told that there were no funds to spend upon their roads, but the question is, what has become of the local fund contribution of the village? No large amount will be required to repair the roads, and the funds required ought to be found at once in order to remove the inconvenience suffered by the villagers. [A correspondent of the same expresses similar sentiments.]

Local Self-government.

Criticises approvingly some of the provisions of the Local Self-government Bills as amended by the Select Committee.

In an article headed "The Select Committee on the Local Self-government Bills," the Native Opinion (10) of the 16th December says:—The principal and the most important changes proposed are those relating to the qualifications and disqualifications of members. The suggested alterations as regards Sind and dropping the former special provisions with respect to that province are a very great improvement, and meet, we think, the popular demands in that respect most satisfactorily. The introduction of pensioned Government servants is also to be commended. But we are at a loss to understand why the Select Committee should not have introduced the adoption of the education qualification by itself. We should think that graduates, pleaders, and jurors ought to have been inserted. It cannot be denied that the whole scheme was partially at least introduced for the purpose of associating with Government the intelligence of the country in the work of local administration, and the omission of any express educational qualification is therefore much to be regretted. We do not think sufficient amends are made by the addition of the clause "such other persons, if any, residing within the táluka as the Governor in Council shall from time to time by notification in the official Gazette direct" to the qualification provisions. In Section 11 also some important and useful alterations are proposed, especially the one in clause (c). The present recommendation is one which will be gladly accepted by the people and contrasts very strongly with the original in point of principle and common sense. Likewise the insertion of the word "undischarged" before insolvent in clause (d) is an improvement. The next important suggestions we meet with after passing over some minor ones are in Section 30. Now the clauses pointing out the duties of local boards have been all recast and duties are very usefully divided into obligatory and discretionary. The original enumeration was made on no principle whatsoever, including as it did the establishment of model farms, relief-works in famine times, &c., which are unquestionably imperial works and which have now been included in the latter division. In Section 31, clause 3 is dropped and in its stead clause 10 is introduced, which is rather more convenient. By the former provision no business relating to the Department of Public Works or Education could be transacted without 7 days' previous notice to an officer of those departments, and thus howsoever emergent a question of that sort might be, the board was powerless to consider it just as it presented itself. The present modification gives scope for the boards to take such questions into consideration without any such notice, provided the business is in the opinion of the president an urgent one. It, however, increases the time of notice from 7 days to 15 in ordinary cases. In Section 32 the Deputy Sanitary Commissioner and the Civil Surgeon are added to the officers who are declared to have a right to be present at any of the meetings of the boards or of their committees. In Part III, some material changes are introduced whereby much independence has been taken away from the táluka boards. Under the amendments proposed it is the district board which is to engage for the táluka boards such servants as the former considers necessary. In the same manner the regulations as regards servants are to the prepared by the district and not the táluka boards. It appears that the committee intended that the táluka boards should be mere puppets in the hands of the district boards. What is left to the táluka boards is merely an insignificant portion of the local administration, and they have been made subject more than necessary to the discretion of the district boards.

Remarks in connection with the report of the Select Committee on the Bombay Local Boards Bill.

The Hitechchhu (80) of Ahmedabad of the 20th December points out the inadvisability of retaining official presidents for local fund committees. The district Collector, as president of the local fund committees, has never cared for the interests of the people who pay the taxes, but spent the money in the way he liked, thereby even benefiting Government. The Hitechchhu mentions several works of local utility which have been carried out from the local funds, and remarks that the application of the local funds in these cases was a misuse of the money, arising from the inordinate power exercised by the official president and members of the committee. Though the Bombay Government knows this fact, which has also been pressed upon its attention by members of the Legislative Council, it is a matter for regret that official presidents should still be retained. [The Vartamán Sár (124) of the 18th December says that the public is disappointed with the report of the Select Committee. It is much to be regretted that those clauses which were the subject of debate and were considered objectionable and calculated to thwart the success of the local self-government scheme should not have been amended. It is unfortunate that the Hon'ble Mr. Mandlik did not take any part in the work of the Select Committee. What more could be expected from Messrs. Peile, Ráste and Col. Merriman? It is very surprising that the Hon'ble Mr. Badrudin should have yielded to the assurances held out by the Hon'ble Mr. Peile. Of what use are these assurances? Mr. Badrudin ought to insist upon the assurances being expressed in the Bills themselves.]

Makes remarks in connection with the submission of annual reports by municipal bodies.

The Indian Spectator (1) of the 16th December says:—It may come as a surprise upon the friends of local self-government that the annual administration reports of municipalities are prepared and submitted clandestinely by the officials to Government, that is, without the knowledge and consent of the commissioners who may be presumed to be responsible for municipal work. According to the Ahmedabad Hitechchhu the report for the year ending 30th April last was got up and submitted to Government in the above manner by the Collector-president and his deputy. It must be admitted in justice that the same practice obtains more or less at Surat, Broach and other places. But that is no reason why it should continue under the present regime. In our opinion a draft should be prepared by the managing committee and submitted to the general meeting of commissioners for suggestions and final adoption. The officials may not like this course for fear of criticism. But if they work honestly they have nothing to fear. We beg Mr. Sheppard and the Honourable Mr. Peile to pay attention to the grievances we have from time to time ventilated, and to remedy the evils we have exposed and must go on exposing till the people of Gujarát have been given real self-government. The experiment must be fairly tried under these officers of culture and broad views, and full publicity and right of discussion should be afforded to the public. But the reverse has been the case at Ahmedabad until now.

Legislation.—The Native Magistrates' Jurisdiction Bill.

Remarks in connection with Lord Ripon's statement in the Supreme Legislative Council in regard to the Ilbert Bill and other cognate matters.

The Subodh Patrika (11) of the 16th December says:—Lord Ripon has treated the more unreasonable and vehement section of the opponents of the Ilbert Bill with a dignity which ought to command the admiration of all right-minded persons. His statement on the Bill made from his place in the Legislative Council will go far to convince public opinion in England of the tact and temper with which he has striven to settle this burning question, and we have every hope that its moderation will lend considerable weight to the cause of the Bill. There are some who read in the statement a desire to make a retreat on His Excellency's part; but these are the very men who have so long done enough to bring discredit upon the opposition. It has fallen to the lot of equally situated Viceroys in the past to have their motives questioned and their generosity mistaken for timidity and feebleness of purpose. In the dark days of the mutiny, when the Anglo-Indians in a body raised an uproar against Lord Canning for his refusal to gratify their thirst for revenge on the natives, His Lordship was the victim of the same aspersions and attacks that are now levelled at Lord Ripon. Lord Canning's generous determination not to publish the documents in his possession which bore marked proofs of the character of his opponents was interpreted as a sign of weakness, but, nothing daunted, His Lordship remained firm and till the last declined to act upon the suggestion of the more intimate of his advisers and friends that he should reply to the attacks of his opponents and publish such proofs of their evil acts as were in his possession. Lord Ripon's conduct at this crisis has been equally magnanimous, and it is clear that the calm and dignified statement which he made but a week ago will, while increasing his popularity with the natives of India, raise him in the estimation of the more sensible politicians and public in England. The people of India are not at all displeased because His Excellency has dealt with his opponents in a spirit of charity, and the evident satisfaction with which His Excellency's statement has been unanimously received by the Native press, whether here or in other parts of the country, unmistakably shows that His Excellency's dignified attempt to make such concessions to the Anglo-Indians as reason and policy may demand has the sympathy of our countrymen. But the contrast between the Viceroy's conduct and the feelings of the Natives on the one hand and the rabid opposition of the more excited portion of the anti-Ilbertites on the other suggests painful reflections to those who are interested in the good name of the British administration in India. But India has seen many such crises, and we have hopes that sounder counsels will yet prevail among those who continue to be hostilely disposed towards the Viceroy. There are already signs that many of the sympathisers of the opposition are willing to accept the concessions proposed by Lord Ripon and condemn the recent insults and indignities offered to him on his arrival at Calcutta. In the meantime it is to be wished that Lord Ripon will try to bring the question to a speedy settlement instead of deferring it to an indefinite period. The Secretary of State having left him the discretion to dispose of the Bill, no time should be lost in passing it with the proposed modifications. The controversy has raged long enough, and it is to the interest of all alike that it should be closed without any further delay by the Bill being carried through the Legislature.

Says that the inhabitants of India are not indifferent to the great importance of the Native Magistrates' Jurisdiction Bill.

In noticing the large number of important meetings held in support of the Native Magistrates' Jurisdiction Bill in various parts of the Bengal Presidency, the Lok Mitrá (81) of the 16th December observes that the natives of this country have not been behindhand in confounding their enemies with their own tactics, and though they have done the utmost until now in setting up a counterblast to the blustering uproar created by the discomfited opponents of the Bill by holding immense meetings and sending monster petitions in favour of the principle of the Bill, it is as well that they should not rest upon their oars, now that the Anglo-Indian faction has renewed its activity in view of the decided fate of the opposition. A fresh uproar has been created by the opponents of the Bill since the nature of the Government ultimatum became known to them, and they are trying to make out by redoubling their efforts and publishing broadcast the accounts of every little conclave of a score or more of railway guards, mechanics and engine-drivers held to express its righteous indignation at the iniquity of the Government, that while Natives are indifferent to the boon which is being thrust upon them the whole country is agitated by the discontent and distrust of its Anglo-Indian population. To refute this assertion and give no room for such an impression the growing number of the Native demonstrations in favour of Government is very useful and opportune, and all concerned ought to admit the desirability of making similar demonstrations in this city and in every other city and town in this Presidency. These expressions of Native sentiment will be doubly useful. They will unmistakably show the British rulers and the sensible portion of Englishmen which forms the great majority in favour of the Bill, that Natives are not indifferent to the issue of the great contest which is now raging between justice and right on the one hand and intolerance, bigotry and hatred on the other hand, and they will afford a very suitable occasion for the display of affectionate loyalty and sympathy towards the Viceroy and disgust at the blackguardly treatment given to him by some of his own countrymen. Addresses of gratitude and sympathy must pour in from all sides and show the noble Englishman who is entrusted with the destinies of India that even if some so-called Englishmen may think fit to insult him for this unswerving devotion to the high principles he has set before himself, the natives of this country to a man hold such conduct in detestation. This is an undertaking that requires to be immediately taken up in right earnest.

Says that Statutory Civilians ought to be clothed with the extended jurisdiction contemplated by the Ilbert Bill.

With reference to the opposition offered by the Calcutta Defence Association and its partizans to the proposal to invest Statutory Civilians with jurisdiction to try Europeans, the Bombay Samáchár (90) of the 17th December observes that the Native Civilians selected under the nomination system must possess the confidence of Government, and if they are not invested with the extended powers under the Native Magistrates' Jurisdiction Bill what purpose can they serve? If they are kept out of the pale of extended jurisdiction their presence in the Civil Service must be considered an absurdity, and the supposition that this branch of the service was created in order to keep the Native Civilians in a position of subordination to European Civil Servants will be confirmed. It is to be hoped that Government will not consent to exclude the Statutory Civilians from the extended jurisdiction proposed by the Ilbert Bill.

Education.

Takes exception to the power of the Syndicate in matters relating to the granting of grace marks at the University examinations.

In an article headed "Our University Bye-laws," the Native Opinion (10) of the 16th December says:—The examiners have no authority to give any grace marks to any candidate, and this discretion has been taken from them by the Syndicate, which is at present the only authority that can pass candidates by grace. The examiners declare the result, but reserve doubtful cases for the deliberation of the Syndicate, which grants or withholds that mercy as it thinks fit. Now we venture to question the correctness of such a procedure. It certainly stands to reason that those who are entrusted with the work of examination ought also to be vested with the discretionary power of giving grace marks. The former practice was according to this principle, and we fail to find any authority in the constitution of the University which ordains otherwise. By the Act of Incorporation the examiners are expressly authorized to declare the name of every candidate whom they shall have deemed entitled to any degree. This authority to declare is absolute, and necessarily implies their power to give grace marks which is now denied to them most unjustly. True it is that the same Act empowers the Senate to pass any bye-laws or regulations they deem fit. But in none of the bye-laws can there be found anything which relegates the authority of giving grace marks to the Syndicate. Bye-law III. defines the duties of the Syndicate, and in that declaring the results as they bear on degrees, honours and rewards are included. But there is nowhere an express mention made that the Syndicate alone and not the examiners shall have the authority of passing candidates by grace. On the contrary the clause of the Act which deals with the examiners expressly lays down that the candidates declared by them entitled to any of the said degrees shall receive from the Chancellor a certificate, &c. This means that the candidates on whom degrees are to be conferred are to be selected by the examiners and by nobody else. This express declaration cannot be overridden by the clause "and declare the results as they bear on the degrees" to be found in Section II. of Bye-law III. which lays down the duties of the Syndicate. Had the power of the examiners been limited in the matter of grace marks, nothing is more likely than that there would have been some specific mention of such a limitation either in the Act or in the bye-laws made under it. The present procedure on this subject is thus not only unwarranted by any legal authority, but is positively ultra vires. Nor can it be defended on the argument of expediency. Not only is no convenience promoted by the intervention of the Syndicate in this matter, but we think that on the contrary great inconvenience and annoyance is caused to the candidates by this procedure. When the result of any examination is declared, there has invariably been a list of doubtful cases to be adjudicated upon by the Syndicate. This causes great perplexity, not to say actual pain, to the candidates who have not the good fortune of coming out in the first declaration. Suspense is worse than disappointment, and in charity at least to the examinees this cruel procedure will, we hope, be given up, especially as it is not sanctioned by the Act, but is contrary to the spirit of its provisions. Again the matter of grace marks is certainly very hard to decide. It is a thing that cannot be carried out by a rule and must always depend upon opinion and impression, and we should therefore think those best capable of deciding upon it who have realized the ability of the candidate by going through all his answers. We hope this matter will speedily be taken into consideration by the University authorities and an early return made to the former practice as being more just, charitable and legal.

Says that the proceedings of the meetings of the Bombay University should be conducted in public.

The Jáme Jamshed (104) of the 17th December regrets that the last annual meeting of the Senate of the Bombay University should have, as usual, been held with closed doors, and observes that there seems no good reason for the continuance of this practice. The system of conducting University business with closed doors may have been thought desirable during the infancy of the institution, but now that the public has learnt to take an interest in the proceedings and consultations of the University these should be conducted with due publicity. Moreover, the step would lead to a discussion in the public press of important matters relating to the University and would furnish an opportunity to draw out public sentiments upon them. Thus the public would take greater interest in the University than it does at present, and for this reason the proceedings of the University meetings should be conducted without secrecy. The Madras University proceedings are discussed in public, and the Bombay University should follow suit.

Railways.

Complains of the harsh treatment which is accorded to their Native servants by the authorities of the G. I. P. Railway Company.

The Dnyán Prakásh (8) of the 20th December complains bitterly of the manner in which the authorities of the G. I. P. Railway Company treat their Native employés in the matter of leave rules. The Native servants of this Company are allowed only ten days' leave in the course of a year. The B. B. & C. I. Railway Company is much more liberal in this respect although its profits are not so enormous, and therefore it is unaccountable that the authorities of the G. I. P. Railway should pursue an extremely niggardly policy in granting leave to their Native subordinates. Now it may be contended that if the service of the G. I. P. Railway Company is not agreeable to Natives they need not accept it. But such an argument is hardly fair. The area for earning their livelihood is limited to Natives and therefore they are forced to accept service where there is great demand for servants as on these Indian railways. But because Natives willingly take service on railways, the railway companies would not be justified in treating them cruelly. Government was recently meditating interference in the management of cotton mills in Bombay in order to secure the labourers working in them from oppression or cruelty. This being so, there is equal justification for the interposition of Government when it is discovered that railway companies do not treat their servants properly. They ought to be granted at least one month's leave in the course of a year. Railway servants are obliged to work on Sundays and holidays, and hence 30 days' leave in a year is not too much. The G. I. P. Railway Company should consider the propriety of granting pensions to its Native employés. The Agent of this Company is a kind-hearted man, and it is therefore to be hoped that he will do all in his power to accord liberal treatment to the Native employés under him. In conclusion, the Dnyán Prakásh says that the complaints about the ill-treatment of passengers on the G. I. P. Railway line are due to the young European ticket-collectors. They are mostly ignorant of the vernacular languages, and consequently do not understand what Native passengers say. If Natives were largely employed as ticket-collectors, there would be no ground for complaint.

Complains that the G. I. P. Railway Company treats its Native employés harshly.

The Rást Goftár (114) of the 16th December observes that the Native servants employed on the railway stations are made to work ten hours a day, but the employés in the goods department are required in the working season to be at their work from 12 to 14 hours and are sometimes kept engaged for 16 hours. It is quite usual with the authorities of the G. I. P. Railway to make the employés in the goods department to work from 7 in the morning till 9 or 10 at night. The Native guards on the goods trains are required to work for two days and two nights consecutively without any recess, and if they are detected dozing while on duty they are heavily punished. Notwithstanding the exaction of such heavy duties, the Native employés are allowed very few rights. If they fall sick they cannot remain absent from their duties without producing a certificate from the medical adviser to the railway, and if they stay away without such certificate their pay for the number of days they remain absent is cut. In the case of those who produce a medical certificate half pay is allowed. Ten days in a year are allowed as leave, but sometimes absence on sick leave is deducted from the above period. The subordinates do not get leave on Sundays or on holidays. On the other hand, a larger number of Europeans than are required is employed by the G. I. P. Railway Company and receive large salaries. They are required to work for a small number of hours everyday, and are permitted to go on leave of absence for several days. Besides this they get one month's privilege leave in a year and are allowed casual leave at times. Many of them are allowed to absent themselves on Sundays, and yet the days on which they stay away on account of sickness are not deducted from the period for which they are allowed privilege leave. Thus injustice is evidently done to the Native employés, which ought not to be allowed to continue any longer.

Says that the Jhánsi-Mánikpur Railway ought to be constructed on the broad gauge.

The Bombay Chronicle (78) of the 16th December observes that from the moment the public heard of the mischievous influence of the party favourable to the hobby of the ever-active, ever-meddling Strachey Brothers as being likely to prevail in inducing Lord Kimberley to decide in favour of the metre gauge as the system to be adopted in the construction of the Jhánsi-Mánikpur line, the general feeling has been of unrest and regret. The public voice has been unanimous in asking for the proposed railway on the broad gauge. The Bombay Chamber of Commerce has given in the memorial submitted by it to the Bombay Government on the 8th instant only formal and authoritative shape to the views of the general public on the subject. The Government of Bombay would be only doing its duty to the true welfare of not only the presidency under its care but also the country generally by strongly supporting the same, and the Government of India would be acting in the only way that it ought if it were to back with its powerful aid the representation of the Bombay Chamber. The Secretary of State for India would be held as deliberately trifling with some of the most vital concerns of this country if he should persist in disregarding the reasonable and important representation of the Chamber.

Municipalities.

Complains that members of the Bombay Municipal Corporation are not sufficiently mindful of the interests of the rate-payers.

In a paragraph headed "Our Tramways and Street Improvement," the Native Opinion (10) of the 16th December says:—It is of no use spending one's virtuous indignation over spilt milk; the inconveniences that are now being caused along the Girgaum Road by the tram road are not a new grievance, and were brought before the Corporation when permission to lay down the rails was granted. But the Corporation, with some honourable exceptions, was then in such high spirits over Mr. Kittredge's scheme that the least show of opposition to it was set down as opposition to improvement. Since it has granted the permission with the full knowledge of the now patent inconvenience, the only remedy in the case is the widening of the street, which may possibly mean increase in municipal taxation. The way in which municipal business has come to be transacted lately shows the amount of care individual members have for the interests of the rate-payers. The Corporation has come to that pass when some severe measure will have to be adopted with regard to the attendance of the members at its meetings. Cannot a rule be adopted that a member of the Corporation not attending the meetings without proper reason for a certain number of days should lose his seat?

A complaint against the Surat Municipality in connection with the recent fire near Máchhlipit.

The Deshi Mitrá (95) of the 20th December, in referring to the recent fire in the butchers' quarters near Máchhlipit at Surat, says that though the cry of fire was raised at 8-30 P.M. the municipal fire-engines were not on the spot till 9. As a long time elapsed before the engines could be brought into use the buildings in the vicinity of the scene of fire stood in imminent danger of being burnt, but were saved by the intervening high wall and the constant pouring of water on them from the adjacent houses. The want of water was severely felt, and the servants of the municipality as it were tantalized the people for water. None of the municipal commissioners or officers were seen on the spot save Mr. White, the Executive Engineer. Cannot the commissioners remedy the laziness displayed at times on occasions of fire by their servants? As the bugles in the different sections of the city were not sounded on this as well as on the occasion of the fire in Nánpura, the people in several of the suburbs only knew of the fire the next day.

Remarks in connection with the management of municipal affairs at Ahmedabad and other cognate matters.

In an article headed "The Municipal Scandal at Ahmedabad," the Indian Spectator (1) of the 16th December says:—The public meeting recently held was of opinion that a thorough investigation, very much after the manner of Mr. Hope's Bombay Committee of 1870, should be instituted. There is nothing wrong or unreasonable in this public demand. It argues real public spirit in the second city of the Bombay Presidency. Such spirit needs every encouragement if the plant of local self-government is to grow in Gujarát. It argues that the people of Ahmedabad are self-reliant and able enough to insist on their rights and privileges. If the provincial Government fails to help them in their cause, it is fair that they should ventilate their grievance publicly. That is the only way to enforce enquiry. It is far from creditable to the public spirit and independence of the present non-official chairman to attempt to withhold the records of proceedings from the public. We protest against this arbitrary ruling. Is Mr. Ranchhodlál oblivious of the fact that the neighbouring municipality of Surat has done better? Is he unaware that the members of that local body have compelled the Collector-president to furnish the press with copy of proceedings? Surely if a less advanced town municipality like that of Surat has acquitted itself creditably, Mr. Ranchhodlál, as the elect of independent non-official representatives, ought to know better how to maintain the reputation of his own municipality. We cannot but attribute his present attitude to official inspiration. Does he resist the reasonable demand of the inhabitants of Ahmedabad in order to screen the wrong-doings of his official predecessor in the chair? If so, we are ashamed of the part he is playing. At every stage the instruments of the Collector have left no stone unturned to swamp the independent minority of elected representatives. So that there is nothing like honest administration. We have all along apprehended this mischief. The influence of the district autocrat must be minimised. His overshadowing presence is disastrous to the energy and public spirit of non-officials on local boards. Now in the instance in question we are told that the Mámlatdár and other paid officials and a pleader, who is reputed to be a staunch partisan of the late official chairman, support an illegal and arbitrary refusal of Mr. Ranchhodlál. There is yet another ugly feature in the municipal proceedings at Ahmedabad which must be noticed here. The minutes of proceedings of meetings of the committee, instead of being then and there settled, are allowed to be framed at leisure. So that it may happen that the wording of the resolutions assumes a different significance from that originally intended to be expressed by members! And inasmuch as the minutes of one meeting are neither read nor confirmed as it is customary elsewhere, at the subsequent meeting independent members are deprived of the opportunity of either protesting against possible cooking up or having them altered so as to admit of their representing a correct record of actual proceedings. Can the Government of Bombay be proud of such practices? Are these to be called specimens of highly successful administration of local business? For our part, the sooner the practice of writing minutes behind the back of the committee is proscribed, the better for the reputation of all concerned. Well may such revelations make one altogether distrust official interference in the new scheme of local self-government. These revelations seem to derive additional weight from the expression of opinion to be found in Mr. Javerilál's second contribution on the Local Boards and District Boards Bills. He justly insists on extending the number of elected representatives to two-thirds instead of a half as proposed in the Bills. He fears that otherwise the officials will always swamp the non-official body, so that virtually the supersession of one regime by another will simply mean king stork for king log. And yet, with strange inconsistency the Select Committee of the Legislative Council declare in their report recently published that it is undesirable to have such extension! But be this as it may, we repeat there are grave reasons why the provincial Government should look into the scandal which now agitates the second city in the Presidency. It will not do to burke inquiry. The Government will in that case be guilty of having screened official wrong-doers, and local self-government will come to be so far discredited. The Government of Bombay has a reputation to care for, and for the sake of that reputation it ought no longer to blink at facts.

Scarcity of water at Ahmedabad.

The Hitechchhu (80) of Ahmedabad of the 20th December says that though the local municipality spends Rs. 10,338 every year on its water-works, a sufficient supply of water is not to be had. Owing to the scarcity of water, several of the water-pumping stations frequently become crowded and quarrels ensue. Though several of the pumps are not worked, a considerable amount of money is spent on the working of one pumping engine. Notwithstanding this large expenditure women have to wait at the pumping stations till a very late hour in the night before they are able to get water. It is a matter for surprise that this state of things has not attracted the attention of the municipal chairman. It is said that the expenditure on candles only for carrying on the work at night amounts to Rs. 100. This is an extravagant expenditure of the municipal money, for why cannot kerosine oil be used instead, when railways and manufactories use it? It is necessary that the expenditure on the working of the municipal engine should be looked into and compared with that of other engines of the same power. The time the engine works at night and the regularity of its working should also be made public.

Disapproves of the levy of the house-tax in the suburbs of Ahmedabad.

The same, in referring to the sanction given by the municipal commissioners of Ahmedabad at their last general meeting to the levy of the house-tax in the suburbs of the city at the solicitation of Mr. Reid, their president, remarks that about 3,000 houses will be liable to the tax, which is likely to yield an annual income of about Rs. 6,000. Now about 300 persons are quite unable to pay this tax, though its incidence may average from 4 annas to 8 annas per head annually. The object of poor people in living in the suburbs of the city is to escape from the liability to pay municipal taxes. Writs of attachment will now have to be executed against them and their pots will have to be sold by auction. It is true that the rich cannot fully appreciate the condition of the poor. The municipal chairman and the Mámlatdár have expressed their opinion in favour of the issue of writs of attachment. If these officers think that the tax is a burden on the poor, their present attitude is attributable to the pressure exercised by high Government officials or to the displeasure of the latter. Municipal affairs will not be properly managed so long as the commissioners stand in fear of Government officers.

Native States.

Affairs at Cambay.

The Ahmedabad Samáchár (84) of the 19th December says that the new Diwán of Cambay is unable to do anything for the people. The reason is that he is guided by those who created the recent disturbances. He is afraid of the intrigues of Mahádev Parjárám, who took a prominent part in them, and the people have to put up with delays in obtaining justice. The officials have very little authority, and no work can be done without bringing it to the notice of the Diwán, who spends most of his time in pleasure. The city is declining owing to the unsatisfactory condition of trade. [A correspondent of the Deshi Mitrá (95) of the 20th December also complains of the power exercised by those who caused the recent disturbances.]

Berár Affairs.

Condemns the present mode of nominating Natives to the Civil Service and makes a suggestion.

In an article headed "Native Civil Servants," the Pramod Sindhu (51) of the 17th December says:—The system of giving Civil Service appointments by nomination is obviously open to abuse and it is no wonder that it has been violently attacked. The boon of reserving for Natives a small number of appointments in the Civil Service was gratefully accepted, but it was thought, and not without reason, that the system might be worked to the permanent disadvantage of the people. Our aristocracy have not been known for their love of letters, and if the appointments were to be conferred only on them, it was justly feared that able men might not be secured. Natives wondered why, when competitive examinations were found to do well in England, Government should think they should not do as well in this country. As it is, the system has not been found to work well. Some of the Native Civilians appointed under these rules, though they have passed departmental examinations, have been found wanting even in ordinary times. They cannot write intelligent reports on questions submitted for their opinions, and cannot do justice to the parties that come to them. They may do the routine work of office, but this an intelligent clerk can do and often does. Surely they are not to be remunerated with such high salaries for doing clerks' work, and yet some of them are no better than clerks. The rules under which these appointments are made must be modified. If they have been taken up for consideration by Government, they have not been taken up too soon. If Government think in the interest of the country that these places cannot be thrown open to competition to all Natives, they must at any rate, if they wish to have able men, enlarge the sphere of selection. People here do not bear ill-will to the aristocracy, but they do want able and qualified men to perform public duty. Government cannot mince matters. If public service must be honestly done they must secure able men, and if able men cannot be found in the small circle of the aristocracy they must enlarge the circle till it includes the great middle class, from which the other departments of the public service are recruited. But under any circumstances an intellectual qualification must be insisted upon. We would propose that no person should be nominated who has not taken a degree in some university. If among the graduates Government find a man who can boast of proud ancestors, we should not object to Government preferring him to others. We insist upon this condition, because we have very great faith in the humanizing influence of liberal education. We believe that daily contact with professors of the stamp of Mr. Wordsworth cannot fail to remove the illiberal narrow spirit of those whose notions have never travelled beyond their house or their class. And we also believe that breadth of views is a sine qua non for everyone who would rule. Under these circumstances we hail with delight the recent selection by the Government of Bombay of a distinguished graduate of Elphinstone College as it recognizes the spirit of the times. Our own province is apparently shut out from these influences; indeed it would appear as if non-regulation districts were intended to be kept as "preserves" for such persons of gentle birth as could get no entrance in the regulation districts; how else could the appointments of some of the "attachés" be defended? We earnestly call upon Government not to treat these provinces in this matter as if they were step-children. It is the interest of both the Government and the people that those who form public service should command respect by their abilities and good conduct.

Notes.—A. The notices from the different Newspapers have been collected in the Report under different heads, which are printed in italics.

B. The names of Newspapers are printed in the body of the Report in italics, and the number of the Newspaper in the above list is printed in brackets after the name.

C. The proprietors of the Newspapers marked * have not given information as to the number of copies issued. In these cases an estimate has been made by the Reporter.

D. The system of spelling vernacular words followed by the Reporter is the same as that adopted in the Official Spelling List of the Bombay Presidency. One peculiar feature of this system is that when the long a (आ or á) is the last letter of a word, the accent is left out, and the short a (अ = u in gun) is, to prevent confusion, never placed at the end of a word. This rule has been strictly followed, except that when the short a appears to be absolutely necessary to complete the pronunciation of a word, as in Arunodaya or the well known Mitra, it is printed with a mark over it to indicate that it is short, thus—ă.

E. Berár papers are received in this office for report under the Resolution of the Government of Bombay in the General Department, No. 1795, dated 8th June 1881.

Politics and the Public Administration.

Disapproves of the present mode of admitting Natives into the Covenanted Civil Service and makes suggestions.

In an article headed "The Statutory Civil Service," the Indian Spectator (1) of the 23rd December says:—We have already stated that the Statutory Civil Service, as at present constituted, is a mockery. It is a cunning device contrived by men in power to thwart the attempts of Natives to reach the real service by the door of fair and open competition. Our countrymen have with one voice condemned the statute of 1870 and the rules made under it four years ago. The country has declared that there should be but one door for admission into the Civil Service for Natives and Europeans alike, and that that door should not be so ingeniously guarded by limitations of age and other conditions, so difficult for Natives to cope with, as to make access almost impracticable. Once our rulers have the moral courage to do what is honest in the interests of India by having the Act which has brought into existence this sham Civil Service repealed, we think there will be a fair chance for our countrymen to rise to higher offices of administration by sheer merit and intelligence. Let the statute of 1870 be repealed and let the other Act for competitive Civil Service be simultaneously amended so as to admit of the annual examination being held in the Presidency cities of India. This done, the political advancement of Natives will only be a question of time. But so long as our rulers fail in that moral courage to stand by the children of the soil,—so long as they only try to palter with the existing statute and tinker the rules made under it,—so long as they delay to fulfil the promises made to them in the gracious Proclamation of the Queen,—so long, in short, as the ruling class, which for the present clutches with an iron grasp all place and power and opposes, openly or insidiously, every attempt to offer Natives increased share in the administration, there can be no hope of anything like substantial progress. But while it remains in force it may not be quite useless to consider how far this Statutory Civil Service can be improved so as to make it a reality instead of the sham that it is. If such a service must be perpetuated, then let us by all means try to make it worth the while of really able Natives to enter it. Let its inherent faults be remedied. If it has to be at all put up with, then it must be so far modified as to make it bearable. We think the scheme drawn up some seven or eight years ago by a disinterested official then connected with the Government to be at once a feasible and an equitable one. The so-called wise men of the day discarded this scheme. They could not bear to think of a system that had for its chief feature a regard for the true interests of the people. The leading feature of that admirable scheme may be briefly recounted here:—(1) That one-third—mind, not one-sixth—of the civil appointments be competed for yearly in India by all persons who could obtain nominations. (2) That the nominations be open to all natives of India in the legal sense of the word, that is to say, to all persons without distinction of race, creed or colour, born in the country of parents domiciled here. (3) That every civil officer of and above the rank of chief civil officer of a district have the right to nominate as many candidates as he desired, in regard to whom he could certify on his word of honour that to the best of his belief they possessed the undermentioned qualifications:—(a) That they were not above 20 years; (b) that they were of unblemished conduct and character; (c) that they were sprung from good respectable families; (d) that they were of thoroughly good physique and able to ride well, hardy and of active habits, and whose parents or relations or guardians were willing to execute a bond pledging themselves to pay a sum of Rs. 7,200 to Government in the event of the candidates being selected at the competitive examinations for appointments in the service. (4) That the examination be held simultaneously at Lahore, Allahabad, Calcutta, Madras and Bombay. (5) That the examination be specially designed to test the possession by the candidate of a thorough knowledge of his own vernacular and a good knowledge of English and of mathematics. (6) That half as many more competitors be selected as there were appointments available. (7) That all selected candidates be then carefully examined by professional experts as to strength of constitution, soundness in wind and limb, and fully tested by a committee as to their proficiency in riding and capacity for walking, running, &c., any who failed in passing these tests, or whose parents or guardians failed to pay the required sum of Rs. 7,200, to be replaced by men taken from the extra number selected who had passed these tests, in the order in which they stood in the examination. (8) That the full required number being thus obtained, they should receive a free passage to England from Government and Rs. 500 for outfit, &c., and should be sent there, all to one college, at either Oxford or Cambridge, where they should remain three years, the Government allowing them £200 per annum from the Rs. 7,200 paid by their parents or guardians, and further, itself granting them £50 each half-year during which their conduct and attention to their studies (which would have a special reference to the requirements of their future career) were alike satisfactory. (9) That rules be made for eliminating and sending back to India any whose want of steadiness or inattention to their studies proved their probable unfitness for the positions for which they were designed, as also for repaying to their parents or guardians any unexpended portion of the Rs. 7,200 less the cost of their return passage, which in such cases they would not receive gratuitously from Government. (10) That all who had successfully and satisfactorily completed their university career would receive a free passage out to India, and being admitted into the service would be dealt with at once on arrival precisely as the present European competition civilians are. These were the main outlines of the scheme as submitted to the Government of Lord Lytton by Mr. A. O. Hume. But because it was so thoroughly businesslike and based on principles friendly to Natives, it was at once pigeonholed. The impartial reader will have seen from the chief details how fully worthy the scheme is of consideration. We cannot say we approve all the details, but we do say, and that emphatically, that most of the recommendations are practical and based on broad principles, which are a guarantee of success and a guide for our material improvement and our political progress. We reserve further remarks for the present, earnestly drawing the attention of the Government of India to the scheme. Its main feature is to obtain good materials, good in body and in mind, subject to the best of fashioning influences, those of an English university.

Deprecates the introduction of European luxuries into India.

The Native Opinion (10) of the 23rd December says:—We must enter our protest against the assertion made by the Statesman that the true cause of the poverty of India is to be found in the character of the people. To support this assertion the Statesman says that the peculiarity in their character which must strike every observer is the insensibility, the indifference, of all classes not merely to the luxuries and refinements of Western life, but to the common conveniences of life, the things which are absolutely necessary to what an Englishman means by the word comfort. It is a peculiarity not confined to the rude homestead of the ryot, or the surroundings of the Native shopkeeper. The house of the wealthy Native merchant or banker and the palace of the Native prince himself are marked by the same peculiarity. There is not merely an absence of all desire for the luxuries, refinements and elegancies of life, but an insensibility to its ordinary conveniences and comforts. To this long indictment we can only oppose the well known saying that where ignorance is bliss it is folly to be wise. Conveniences and comforts are only relative terms. When a European arrives in a dilapidated traveller's bungalow, which has either broken chairs and tables or none at all, he will curse and swear, but a Native habituated to sit on the ground will not be put out of temper, and an Arab seeing a Feringhi using spoons and forks in consuming his food will only burst out into immoderate laughter and ask him whether he is not satisfied with the fingers Allah has given him. An Englishman ridicules the over-refinement of the Chinese, who make eating an art and consume their dinner with chopsticks, whilst the Celestials consider Europeans to be uncouth barbarians, who know neither how to prepare nor how to eat their food. Thus it will be seen that the standards of comfort in the East are not the same as in the West. Our contemporary asserts that if one were to go into almost the poorest home in England one will find the innate impatience with which every Englishman and Englishwoman submits to the deprivations of poverty expressing itself in fifty ways. We believe we are not wrong when we assert that if the abovenamed impatience were inborn also in the native of India it would only make him miserable, as we may sometimes perceive in those who have acquired some European habits when they are not able to gratify them. Our contemporary may be perfectly right when he says that it is in this impatience of poverty that the true secret of the great and growing wealth of the Western nations is to be found. But when he wants us to adopt European conveniences and comforts, he in reality means artificial wants, not known and consequently not coveted before, and the universal introduction of which would indeed bring wealth, but not to India. It is well enough known that some of us wear only English shoes, English clothes, and drink English liquors, &c., and it is easy to guess what the consequence would be if the craving after foreign importations were to become universal. There are patriotic associations in some countries of Europe the members of which bind themselves to encourage home industries and not to use foreign goods; with us, however, the case appears to be quite the contrary, even when the articles manufactured here are as serviceable as those imported from abroad. The English are so wonderfully ingenious and productive that their goods are known all over the world and they are quite right in looking for a market also in India; but it is a little too much to expect that the people will change their habits in order to purchase luxuries they never dreamt of, although there is no telling what may take place in course of time when their tastes and wants in that direction become more developed. Gas, a luxury never known before, is largely used in Bombay when marriage ceremonies take place in Native families, and at no distant date the same will be the case with the electric light. But how much better would it be for the country if these and all other commodities could be produced by the natives themselves? Then indeed the poverty of India would generally disappear. Foreign articles of every kind are being used daily more and more by the educated and wealthy classes in towns, but the introduction of such luxuries (to which people become gradually so much accustomed as to consider them to be necessities) among the people of the country generally, and especially among those who can scarcely afford them, is highly to be deprecated, because it would beget more discontent than comfort, more trouble than pleasure, and more poverty than wealth.

Remarks in connection with certain observations of Sir Lepel Griffin regarding Native princes published in his article on "Indian Princes at Home."

The Kesari (35) of the 25th December, in an article headed "Who are the Wolves?" says that the British Government is principally responsible for the unsatisfactory condition of Native States. The degraded state of Native princes has been brought about by the misplaced and mistaken kindness of the British Government. They would not have reached their present deplorable condition if the English had not come to India. The Native princes ought to be brought up with a proper sense of their immense responsibilities. When this is not done, Sir Lepel Griffin is not justified in finding fault with them. Since it is believed that all people have descended from Adam, it does not become Sir Lepel Griffin to speak ill of the ancestry of the present Native princes. The blood of a worker in leather is said to run in the veins of English kings. It is a notorious fact that the mother of William the Conqueror was the daughter of a worker in leather. Although caste distinctions prevail in India, yet Natives are not so jealous in observing them as the English are. No people of any caste in India look down upon their lower caste fellows as the English look down upon Natives. Several noble families in England are illegitimately descended from English sovereigns. Very few English sovereigns have borne respectable character. One English king spent his time with concubines; another complained to Parliament about the unfaithfulness of his wife; a certain English queen who remained unmarried during her life is said to have borne several children; the father of this last personage kept several mistresses. Upon the whole the Kesari considers that Native princes are vastly better than English sovereigns.

The Mahrátta (2) of the 23rd December says:—The last floods at Surat attracted attention, and owing to the heavy loss sustained by the second city of this Presidency, a project of embanking the Tápti is under consideration. It appears Government has of late been ill-advised or that it has gone mad, for evidently enough the engineer in these days appears to be looked upon as the best specific for all evils. Sanitary improvements are entrusted to him, so is the work of preventing famines and floods. We regret this state of things. In these matters the engineer cannot be consulted with safety. He will apparently set matters to right in a moment, and lákhs and krors of rupees will be wasted without in the least checking the real evil. In all such matters the attempt should be to restore the equilibrium of nature. The reckless denudation of the country has begun to resent upon us, and unless arrangements are made to stop it and restore to nature what we have wrested from her, neither Surat nor Khándesh can be saved from the ravages of the torrent of water. Embankments will stop the flow of the current and Surat will be saved, but only to destroy Ránder on the other side. We trust Mr. Hope will not confine his care to his favourite district, but will try to move Government to look elsewhere as well.

Disapproves of the work of sanitary improvements and of preventing famines and floods being entrusted to the engineer.

A correspondent of the Jáme Jamshed (104) of the 26th December, writing from Bulsár under date the 24th idem, observes that on the 13th idem 900 British cavalry came and encamped at the village of Pálankhajuri near Bulsár. The provision sellers who supplied provisions to them suffered severe losses, because the soldiers bought provisions from them at the rate of a ser weighing 40 rupees and would not allow the Surti ser of 37½ rupees to be used. The shopkeepers also suffered great inconveniences on account of the police having made over to the military the carts in which the shopkeepers had brought the supplies and in which they were to take back the unsold articles. On the 22nd about 150 men of European artillery came from Poona and encamped at the same village. On this occasion also the provision vendors, who were obliged to supply provisions at the strong pressure of the police, had to bear losses.

Losses and inconveniences suffered by the provision vendors in supplying provisions to the cavalry and artillery encamped at the village of Pálankhajuri near Bulsár.

The Gujaráti (100) of the 23rd December states that recently a European soldier at Ahmedabad broke the head of a Native, as he gave him water to drink that was a little muddy. Mr. Younghusband sentenced the soldier to one month's imprisonment and a fine of Rs. 50. The District Judge on appeal revoked the sentence of imprisonment. A Native has no value, exclaims the Gujaráti.

Disapproves of the reduction of the sentence passed upon a European soldier who assaulted a Native at Ahmedabad.

Local Self-government.

The Indu Prakásh (9) of the 24th December in a leading article in Maráthi says that the Bombay Local Self-government Bills are considered by those most competent to judge to be the best of their kind, and Mr. Peile deserves credit for bringing them into their present shape. The Bills have been framed with the object of leaving to the people without any distinction of class as much as possible the management of their own local affairs. But considering the condition of the various classes of the inhabitants of Mahárashtra, it is pretty certain that for some years to come the work of local self-government will have to be done for the most part by Bráhmans. They are the most educated of the various communities which compose the Marátha nation, and hence it is natural that for some time to come the business of local self-government should fall on their shoulders. This being the fact, it is somewhat surprising that a writer in the Times of India

Says that Bráhmans have been foremost in carrying on the agitation on the question of local self-government because of their superior intelligence and not because they wish to oppress the other castes.

should insinuate that the views of Lord Ripon have become extremely acceptable to Bráhmans, because they expect by the scheme of local self-government to regain their power over the other castes in Mahárashtra which they have lost by the impartial and just character of British rule. The Bráhmans have not the slightest idea of engrossing to themselves the power of local boards by trying to diminish the authority of British officials. If the true history of the rise of the British power in India were written, it would be found that the Bráhmans have helped to bring about this state of things much more than any of the other castes in India. The charge of self-aggrandizement which has been brought against them because they have been foremost in agitating in the cause of local self-government is utterly untrue. If they had not taken the foremost part in the agitation regarding local self-government, the present advanced state of things in the matter would not have been reached. Experienced European officers will themselves admit that the people other than Bráhmans are not fully competent to manage local affairs of towns and villages. The idea that Bráhmans try to profit themselves by oppressing the other castes is most absurd and is entirely of recent origin. This ridiculous notion has been started by Christian missionaries. From the time of Shiváji to the time of Sháhu the principal ministers in the Marátha kingdom were Bráhmans, who possessed the complete confidence of their masters. History will testify to this fact. The other castes never thought that the Bráhmans were their oppressors. It does not become an eminent journal like the Times of India to give currency to ideas calculated to set class against class.

Legislation.

Is glad that the Government of India has refused its assent to the Bombay Fishing Stakes Bill.

The Bombay Samáchár (90) of the 25th December is glad that the Government of India has refused to give its assent to the Bombay Bill relating to fishing stakes in the port of Bombay. The Supreme Government has justly observed that the existing arrangements are quite sufficient for the free sailing of ships arriving at and departing from Bombay, and unless the Bombay Government can show better reasons for the enactment of the Bill its passing cannot be sanctioned. No better reasons than those already given by the Bombay Government can be advanced in support of the Bill, and hence it is right that the fishing stakes should not be interfered with.

The Native Magistrates' Jurisdiction Bill.

Points out the inconveniences caused by not giving to Native Magistrates power to try European British subjects.

The Indian Spectator (1) of the 23rd December says:—Here is a case for the anti-Ilbertites. Some European soldiers from Ahmedabad camp went shikaring the other day to a neighbouring village. One of them feeling thirsty, they entered a private field, and finding three cultivators at their simple meal, with an earthen pot of water near them, asked for a drink. The cultivators respectfully explained to the sáhibs that as the water could not be served out without polluting the vessel, they might go a little further and drink out of a cistern. This annoyed the soldiers, and with their usual chivalry they wanted to break the pot before leaving. To this the khedus objected, and then followed a scuffle in which one of the soldiers broke the head of a khedu with the butt end of his musket. The khedu, who knew that the chhota sáhib (Assistant Collector and Magistrate) was somewhere near, ran up to him. That officer, Mr. Morrison, at once went to the spot, apprehended the soldier who was struggling to get away, tried him formally and sentenced him to a month's imprisonment and a fine of Rs. 50. But the soldier appealed to the Sessions Judge, who remitted the sentence and reduced the fine to Rs. 5, no doubt for valid reasons which will be made known. But would not the soldier have gone scot-free had there been no European Magistrate on the spot in the first instance? A Native Magistrate could not have tried the man. And this is the reason why the people of India, ignorant though they may be, want the Ilbert Bill to pass. It is nonsense to assert the contrary, and equally so to magnify the opinion of a few thousand Europeans into "public opinion."

Disapproves of the agreement arrived at between the Government and the European Defence Association in regard to the final settlement of the Ilbert Bill.

The Dnyán Prakásh (8) of the 27th December refers to the agreement arrived at between the Government and the European Defence Association, and observes that a great blunder has been committed in making this concordat and in disappointing the just expectations of Natives. Up to this time the European community was greatly agitated; now the Native community will follow suit. It is discreditable to Government to excite the feelings of one class of people and then try to pacify them by displeasing another class. Mr. Gladstone gave out in Parliament that the Ilbert Bill was brought forward to check the ascendancy of Europeans. How different is the policy of the Government of India from the above declaration? That the Government should have yielded to the clamours of the community which abused and insulted Lord Ripon and heaped opprobrious epithets on Natives, and which charged the Secretary of State for India with making false statements, is a most discreditable proceeding, and the result of such a policy is sure to be disastrous. The Government has not acted unwisely in granting the right of being tried by a jury to European criminals, but that the majority of such juries should be composed of Europeans is not proper. Owing to the exceedingly small number of Europeans in India there is considerable chance of European criminals being tried by men of their own acquaintance or by their relations. This is extremely likely to come to pass on railway lines and in places where indigo is grown. There is every probability of miscarriage of justice happening where European culprits are tried by juries the majority of which are their own countrymen and acquaintances. If European soldiers are now acquitted of the charge of killing Natives on the excuse that in firing a gun it did not clearly appear whether the object was man or beast, it is not difficult to perceive what pleas will satisfy European juries. There is no justification why the majority of a jury should be Europeans. If all the people in India are the subjects of the Queen, it is not right to observe distinctions between them. It must be admitted that the Europeans have succeeded in their object on account of the fearful agitation which they created. The Natives should not remain inactive, but should hold meetings and point out to Government the dissatisfaction which its action has created in the Native community in regard to the final settlement of the Ilbert Bill.

Says that the concordat arrived at between the Viceroy and the Defence Association is not approved in Native circles.

The Indu Prakásh (9) of the 24th December says:—This "concordat," as it is called, between the Government and the Defence Association seems very much like a sudden rebound on the part of Lord Ripon. We are not yet in a position to say under what circumstances the understanding was arrived at, and it is to be hoped Lord Ripon will take the public into his confidence by throwing light on the subject. In the meantime, it is only fair to His Excellency that we should suspend our judgment. We cannot, however, conceal from our readers the fact that in Native circles here the compromise is not considered satisfactory. There appears to be a general impression that Lord Ripon has not only given way very suddenly, but has surrendered the principle and everything for which there has been so hard a fight, keeping the Bill alive only in form. It was certainly desirable that before settling terms with the Defence Association Lord Ripon should have allowed the public an opportunity of discussing them. There is of course this thing to be said in favour of the concession of jury trial that the tendency of all criminal legislation in India is to introduce it in the case of the Natives also. But in any case a concession so vast should not have been made hastily, and what we particularly regret is the form of an agreement with a body whose insulting treatment of the Viceroy and blasphemous language against the Natives have been the cause of much irritation and annoyance. On the nature of the concessions themselves we reserve our opinion for the present.

Makes remarks on the concordat arrived at between the Viceroy and the Defence Association on the subject of the Native Magistrates' Jurisdiction Bill.

The Indian Spectator (1) of the 23rd December says:—However much we may condemn this European agitation against the Ilbert Bill, we cannot help congratulating the opponents on the result of their perseverance. They have wrenched concession after concession from the executive during the past few months, and finally they are assured that European criminals under trial may have fresh privileges to proclaim their superiority of race! There seems to be no one to put in a word for the Native Magistrate or the Native criminal. The native of India has no feelings. He is bound to put up with any reflection on his race, or he will be denounced as disloyal. Well, whatever his loss, the Native has no doubt learnt a lesson. He has known the nature and value of organised opposition. We only pray that the experience may not prove in his case what the first taste of blood does to the young tiger. For our part we will not repine so long as the principle of the measure holds good. If the Christmas "concordat," which however we are extremely doubtful about, restores peace to the land and opens a happy new year for Christians and non-Christians alike, far be it from us to oppose it.

Says that Lord Ripon deserves no blame in the matter of the concordat in connection with the Native Magistrates' Jurisdiction Bill.

The Jáme Jamshed (104) of the 26th December observes that replies received by itself and the Bombay Branch of the East India Association to telegrams despatched to Calcutta relating to the concordat arrived at in the matter of the Native Magistrates' Jurisdiction Bill show that Lord Ripon deserves no blame in the matter. It is said that His Lordship intended to enact the Bill with such changes only as were indicated in the compromise suggested by Lord Northbrook, but it is believed that the Viceroy has been obliged to give way because he was convinced that the members of Council on whom he trusted hitherto for support would oppose the measure. If this had been allowed to occur and the Bill thrown out, Lord Ripon would have been compelled to resign, and to avoid the calamity that would befall India under such circumstances he took the appropriate step of accepting the concordat. The above information must sadden the hearts of all Natives, who must sympathise with the Viceroy who has done so much for them, not only in the matter of this Bill but in several other important respects. The blame of not being able to enact the Jurisdiction Bill in its original form attaches to the Premier and his Cabinet and not to the Viceroy. If the Premier had been a strong man, the Bill would certainly have been enacted in its original form. Lord Ripon's administration has been really beneficial to India, and it would therefore be a great misfortune to lose his services so soon on account of the Jurisdiction Bill. Past experience has proved that juries composed of Europeans are incapable of dispensing impartial justice, and hence the concession now made to them will have to be withdrawn sooner or later. It is to be hoped that when a few more partial decisions are given by these juries the authorities will not delay to withdraw the concession which has been now made.

Accepts the concordat said to have been arrived at between Government and the Calcutta Defence Association in connection with the Native Magistrates' Jurisdiction Bill.

In noticing the concordat arrived at between the Government and the European Defence Association of Calcutta in the matter of the Native Magistrates' Jurisdiction Bill, the Bombay Samáchár (90) of the 24th December observes that the information already received about the compromise is so meagre and one-sided that it is not right to express any opinion on the subject until a full and impartial account of it is received. The little information that is forthcoming shows that the Bill will be passed without ignoring the main principle on which it is based; but the changes that will be introduced will be opposed to that principle. The concordat states that Native District Magistrates and District Judges alone will be invested with the extended jurisdiction to try European accused British subjects. This change was previously announced, but it remains to be seen whether the Statutory Civil Servants who attain the same rank will be entrusted with the extended jurisdiction. Government have already resolved not to exclude this class of Civilians from the extended jurisdiction, and it is to be hoped that the proposed changes in the Bill will not stand in the way of carrying out the resolution. The other change agreed to in the concordat is that European British subjects in every case are to be entitled as of right to be tried by a jury the majority of whom shall consist of European British subjects. This proposal appears to do away with the suggestion made by Sir Charles Turner and accepted by Government that the case of a European British subject may by an application to the High Court be removed from the court of a Native District Magistrate or District Judge to a court presided over by a European District Magistrate or Judge. The proposal that the majority in such a jury should be European British subjects will be beneficial to an accused European, but it is highly desirable to know whether a Native District Magistrate or District Judge will have authority to convict or dismiss the accused when he happens to differ from the verdict of the jury. If he is invested with such authority it is all right; but if he is not clothed with it, the extended jurisdiction conferred upon him will be merely nominal. In the district courts the trying Judge can convict or acquit an accused whenever he differs from the verdict given by the assessors, and at the presidency towns the judge can order a retrial by a new jury whenever he differs from the verdict given by a majority of the jury. With reference to the Native Magistrates' Jurisdiction Bill either the Native District Magistrate or District Judge should possess similar authority, or the proposal to allow the majority of the jury to consist of European British subjects should be dispensed with. The rest of the changes proposed by the concordat are of no importance. The Europeans of Calcutta insisted that the Jurisdiction Bill should be rejected, and yet they are obliged to accept it, though in a modified form; they claimed it as their natural right to consider the natives of India as their inferiors for all time, but they have been obliged to give up this claim. Though the concordat makes the concession of the Jurisdiction Bill very limited and weak as regards Natives, yet they will be satisfied with what they have got and will be thankful to Lord Ripon for what he has done and suffered to gain this much even for them. The concordat was not a surprise. On seeing that Government had resolved to pass the Bill the Europeans of Bengal showed signs of submission. Most of their speakers and advocates showed an inclination to accept the changes proposed in the Jurisdiction Bill, and hence the second proposal as regards the jury was an easy step to them to move backwards. The little that they have obtained in the matter of this Bill they owe to Lord Ripon's kindness, which they have done nothing to deserve. The Natives trust that Lord Ripon will permit only such changes to be made in the Jurisdiction Bill as will not make the concession merely nominal.

Strongly condemns the concordat said to have been arrived at between Government and the Calcutta Defence Association in connection with the Native Magistrates' Jurisdiction Bill.

In noticing the concordat said to have been arrived at between Government and the Defence Association, as notified in a telegram from Calcutta which appeared in recent issues of the Times of India and the Bombay Gazette, the Rást Goftár (114) of the 23rd December observes that the Europeans have at last won the day in the contest in connection with the Native Magistrates' Jurisdiction Bill. The result of the incessant opposition made to the Bill has been that a strong-minded Viceroy like Lord Ripon has been induced to yield to the clamour of the European public. The concordat has given the Bill a form quite different from that which it originally bore, and was resorted to in order to enable Government to keep up its prestige, which would not have been done had the Bill been withdrawn. But, on the other hand, the Europeans have been conciliated by the concession of rights which they never claimed, and thus they have indirectly gained a victory. In addition to the results of the concordat pointed out in the telegram received from Calcutta, it may be remarked that the Europeans will obtain more rights than they asked. They will enjoy the privilege of being tried by a jury in provinces the natives of which do not enjoy that right, and thus a new distinction will be created in the law and in the mode of dispensing justice between Europeans and Natives,—a distinction founded upon a difference of colour between the two. Moreover, the Europeans will get the new concession that the juries convened for trying them should consist solely of their own countrymen,—a right which the Natives have not hitherto enjoyed. The accused European already enjoys the right to challenge jurymen and by that means he succeeds indirectly in getting a jury of his own countrymen, but Natives also enjoy the right of challenging a juryman. It would be highly objectionable to allow accused Europeans juries of their own countrymen, since past experience has proved beyond a doubt that in such jury trials 75 accused persons out of every 100 escape the punishment which they richly deserve. To try an accused European with such a jury before a Native Judge is simply to vex the latter. The concordat is nothing but a compromise which has destroyed the original Bill and interfered with its principles. It was never expected that after showing so much firmness Lord Ripon would submit to the compromise. The declarations made latterly on the part of Government have been disappointing. The suggestions made by Lord Northbrook, Lord Ripon's statement, and the present concordat are one and all of the same stamp. The new form given to the Bill by the concordat is more injurious to the interests of Natives than the withdrawal of the Bill itself. It would be better to withdraw the measure than to concede to accused Europeans a jury composed of their own countrymen. The Natives did not struggle hard and make noise for the purpose of obtaining the new right proposed to be granted by the Ilbert Bill, but simply presented petitions and patiently waited to see the result, and this is the reward they have obtained for their peaceful conduct! All this proves that seditious persons succeed in the end, and that those who threatened to raise a rebellion and insulted the constituted authorities have gained a victory. In alluding to the concordat the Goftár observes in another place that the weakness shown by the Government of India in this matter appears to have proceeded from a fear caused by the defection among Europeans, and it behoves Natives to convene public meetings at the earliest opportunity for the purpose of making a protest against the conduct of Government. The protest ought to show that the changes proposed in the alleged concordat will, instead of giving additional rights to Natives, only make to the Europeans a concession that would crush the former. Natives ought to raise a loud cry and ask the authorities not to pass the Ilbert Bill with the proposed alterations but enact it in its original form. It should also be mentioned that if this cannot be done, Natives like Europeans should be given the privilege of being tried by a jury the majority of which should be composed of their own countrymen. This protest ought to be made by the entire community. If this is not done, the proposed new concessions, which the Europeans of Bengal have been demanding, and threatening to create disaffection and disturbance in the event of their being not granted, will be conferred upon them.

Strongly condemns the concordat alleged to have been arrived at between Government and the Calcutta Defence Association in the matter of the Native Magistrates' Jurisdiction Bill.

In noticing the concordat arrived at between Government and the Calcutta Defence Association, the Jáme Jamshed (104) of the 25th December observes that the so-called compromise shows that after all the row created by the Jurisdiction Bill Lord Ripon has conferred new rights upon Europeans and has disappointed his friends. Considering His Lordship's past conduct it cannot be believed that he has done what the concordat attributes to him. It is better to wait before criticising the Bill in its altered form until a confirmation is received that the terms of the concordat are correctly stated. According to the concordat the opponents of the Bill have got more than they asked for. Even in remote parts of the mofussil an accused European will be tried by a jury mainly composed of European British subjects. Is this not deriding justice? Not only the Anglo-Indian newspapers but the Judges also have condemned the shameful conduct of European juries in declaring not guilty Europeans who were really guilty of the crime of which they were accused. Lord Ripon must be well aware of this, and therefore it cannot be believed that he has accepted the proposal of conceding to Europeans the privilege of being tried by a jury of their own countrymen. The change in the Bill regarding the constitution of the jury would only be an affront to Native Judges and Magistrates who would be invested with the extended jurisdiction. It cannot be believed that His Lordship has yielded in the manner reported. It must be said that with reference to India even high-minded English statesmen cannot be trusted to do justice. It is not easy to imagine that Lord Ripon has altered the Jurisdiction Bill as the concordat describes in order to please and satisfy the persons who threatened to raise a rebellion, insulted the representative of Her Imperial Majesty the Queen on a public road in broad daylight, threatened to eject from his seat the Native Magistrate who would dare to try an accused European British subject, and publicly asserted that they were prepared to drive away from the country the Viceroy and other officials and to assume the reins of Government. Unfortunately the alleged concordat appears to contain true statements and India's peace is in jeopardy. If a European murderer or perpetrator of some other heinous crime be tried and let off by a jury of his countrymen, there will be a probability of a disturbance arising on the occasion. For it has been shown by Europeans that it is allowable to raise a disturbance against a distasteful act, and to abuse the authorities and insult the Viceroy in order to get that law repealed. Considering Lord Ripon's past career it was not expected that His Lordship would condescend to enter into a capitulation with the Defence Association. If he has capitulated as stated in the concordat, His Lordship must have been compelled to yield for some strong reasons against which he was powerless to contend. For the sake of His Lordship's reputation and for the benefit of the natives of the country these reasons should be made public. It must, however, be observed that no reasons which can be advanced will prove that the terms of the concordat are just and sound.

A strong condemnation of the concordat said to have been arrived at between Government and the Calcutta Defence Association in connection with the Native Magistrates' Jurisdiction Bill.

With reference to the concordat arrived at between the Government and the Defence Association of Calcutta in the matter of the Native Magistrates' Jurisdiction Bill, the Akhbáre Sodágar (85) of the 24th December observes that the people of India are exceedingly sorry to see such a result as this follow the great row which the Bill created. The Europeans of Calcutta have after all the great trouble and expenditure undergone by them obtained what should not have been conceded to them and have thus won the day. The Viceroy has pleased them, but has not weighed the consequences which his policy will produce upon the minds of the Natives. The feelings of the latter are much hurt. The concession of trial by jury as proposed by the concordat will make it easy for accused Europeans to escape the punishment which they deserve. The Natives however are not to be granted a similar privilege. Thus in trying to give the Natives a new right the Europeans have only benefited. How absurd would it appear that an accused Native should be tried by a Magistrate without the intervention of a jury and the same Magistrate should be given the assistance of a jury in trying a European culprit? It was not expected that a strong and impartial Viceroy like Lord Ripon would yield in the manner reported. His Lordship will retire from the Viceroyalty after the completion of his term of office, but the injustice that has been done under his administration will be long remembered and the bad feelings between Europeans and Natives will long continue. It would have been better if the Jurisdiction Bill had been dropped altogether. [The Káside Mumbai (108) of the 26th December also expresses disapproval of the agreement said to have been arrived at between the Viceroy and the Defence Association in the matter of the Ilbert Bill.]

Makes further remarks upon the concordat about the Native Magistrates' Jurisdiction Bill.

The Bombay Samáchár (90) of the 25th December observes that the alleged concordat about the Native Magistrates' Jurisdiction Bill telegraphed by the Calcutta Defence Association appears to be true, since it has not been contradicted by Government. However, it is but right that severe remarks should not be made upon it until it is authoritatively confirmed. It is likely that a compromise has been arrived at between Government and the association. The European British subjects have given up the objection they raised to their being tried by Native District Magistrates and Session Judges, but the new right of trial by jury which they have obtained is more than they expected to get. The jury will, it seems, be constituted on the old system. If this be so, it will possess nearly all the authority now exercised by Native Magistrates and Judges. Of course the authority exercised by the European Magistrates and Judges will also pass to the jury, but they will not be sorry for the transfer, because they desire heartily that their countrymen should get as many rights as can be secured. The distinction made between European British subjects and Natives will cause the latter to make severe comments upon it. Lord Ripon would seem to have made a great sacrifice in the matter of the concordat. However, it is right that severe comments should not be made until the concordat is authoritatively confirmed.

Makes further remarks in connection with the concordat arrived at in the matter of the Native Magistrates' Jurisdiction Bill.

The same of the 26th December observes that since Government have not said anything in connection with the alleged concordat in the matter of the Native Magistrates' Jurisdiction Bill, there cannot be any doubt as to such a compromise having been arrived at. If the arrangements about the jury mentioned in the concordat be made on the principle now existing, the new right proposed to be granted to Natives will be useless and the dispensation of justice in the case of accused European British subjects will be difficult in the mofussil. It is feared that under such circumstances the trial by jury will be a farce. The Anglo-Indian newspapers express satisfaction with the concordat. But the fact is that very few Europeans are satisfied with it. The Anglo-Indian newspapers appear to believe that India is ruled for the benefit of the few Europeans who reside in it.

Advises Natives to make a protest against the concordat.

A correspondent of the same newspaper of the 26th December observes that the alleged concordat has not destroyed the principle of the Native Magistrates' Jurisdiction Bill. It was quite politic to arrive at some reasonable compromise when European British subjects raised so strong an opposition to the Bill. The proposed concession to the European British subjects of a trial by a jury of their own countrymen is inappropriate and will not work well. The correspondent advises Natives to make a reasonable and constitutional protest against the alleged concordat when full and complete information about it is authoritatively published, and advises them not to find fault with Lord Ripon for accepting the compromise, which he may have been obliged to consent to by unforeseen adverse circumstances. [The Bombay Samáchár (90) and the Dátardun (74) of the 27th December express similar sentiments.]

Says that the concession of the jury under the concordat is not valuable.

The Jáme Jamshed (104) of the 27th December observes that it will be difficult to convene a jury of European British subjects in the far mofussil in order to convict a European British subject accused of a petty crime under the proposal made by the concordat in connection with the Native Magistrates' Jurisdiction Bill. The European British subjects themselves will suffer great inconveniences from trial by juries, and will ultimately desire the withdrawal of the concession. As remarked by Professor Wordsworth, the authorities will find within the next two or three years that the jury system should be abolished. Lord Ripon therefore deserves the highest praise for finding out a means that preserves the principle of the Bill and makes the concession to European British subjects quite worthless. Besides Lord Ripon, Mr. Grant Duff, Major Baring and numerous other Europeans who lent their impartial support to the Bill deserve the thanks of all Natives.

Thinks that the alleged concordat in the matter of the Ilbert Bill cannot be true.

In noticing the concordat alleged to have been arranged between the Government and the Calcutta Defence Association in the matter of the Native Magistrates' Jurisdiction Bill, the Gujaráti (100) of the 23rd December observes that the news about the concordat cannot be correct. The unreasonable Europeans will consider it a degradation to sit upon a jury in the court of a Native District Judge or Magistrate, and will think that they have lost their birthright. The Jurisdiction Bill ought to be passed as sketched out by the Viceroy in the statement he made the other day in the Legislative Council.

The Subodh Patrika (11) of the 23rd December alludes to the remarks made by Mr. F. Forbes Adam, the new Chairman of the Bombay Chamber of Commerce, on the Ilbert Bill, and says:—The Native public thoroughly appreciate the good sense and good feeling of these very pertinent remarks. None of us is anxious to proceed hastily in the policy laid down in the Proclamation of 1858, and all that we demand is that no attempt shall be made to treat the promises and pledges of that charter of Indian liberties with the contempt and indifference which men like Sir James Stephen, with their exalted sense of morality and hatred of perjury, are not ashamed to plead for them. Mr. Adam has very correctly measured the situation to which the British Government have long since pledged themselves, and it is gentlemen of his moderate views and conciliatory disposition, not disposed to go into hysterics over every act of Government that self-interest may suggest as prejudicial to their community and always accustomed to look at things in all their aspects, that contribute most to the safety and good name of the British administration in India. Will it be too much for the public to expect the Bengal opponents of the Ilbert Bill to profit by the advice given them by the new Chairman of the Bombay Chamber of Commerce? Whether they do or not, there is very great satisfaction in the thought that the sentiments of the Defence Association of Calcutta are not shared in their entirety on this side of the country, and that the opinions in favour of the Bill in its modified shape are daily growing in weight and importance.

Approves of Mr. Adam's sentiments on the Native Magistrate's Jurisdiction Bill delivered at a recent meeting of the Bombay Chamber of Commerce.

The Mahrátta (2) of the 23rd December, in noticing the article in the London Times condemning the favourable attitude of Lord Northbrook towards the Ilbert Bill and Lord Ripon in a speech which he delivered at Bristol on the 13th November last, remarks:—What a queer way of arguing? What earthly connection is there between one's changing one's religious views in middle life and one's fitness or otherwise to govern an empire? If a man should become incapable of ruling over a country simply by reason of his renouncing one religion and taking up another, may he not as well become so by eating too much at a dinner party or by taking a wife in legal wedlock? This is no argument at all. Our contemporary, we think, was simply out of his senses when the article was written, for it is no better than the raving of a madman. Moreover the article in question manifests an ardent desire on the part of the writer to pose in bright colours before the public by falling foul on Lord Ripon in the vilest and most spiteful terms possible. The writer attempts to establish Lord Ripon's unfitness to govern and to depreciate his abilities in general, but the whole of India, which has had experience of many foreign rulers, pronounces him to be the best of them all, admirably fit to govern and possessing all the abilities of a true statesman. Lord Northbrook has in his address properly answered Mr. Justice Stephen, who said regarding Her Majesty's gracious Proclamation to the princes and people of India that it has no legal force whatever and that it is a mere expression of sentiment and opinion. But our contemporary, exasperated as he is, does not relish it well and says that those who drew up the Proclamation may be supposed to have known what it meant, probably meaning thereby that the Proclamation had not been issued to be followed to the letter but only to appease the people whose minds had then been tremendously ruffled. This may be maintained by persons of mean ideas and low descent, but certainly nobleminded men or persons of high birth would never entertain such an abject view. The assurances of our Queen-Empress could never have been intended for the purpose of deceiving her Indian subjects. So far as we can interpret them correctly, they were spontaneous outpourings of her heart intended from the first to be literally adhered to by Indian administrators. The Times has in more places than one in the same leader attributed selfish motives to the present popular ruler of India. No person with common sense in him would ever grow so wild and indignant as to indulge freely in fanciful accusations, however grave in his opinion the cause might be. It is only perverse minds that indulge in false imputations, from which the wise and sensible always stand aloof. In one place our contemporary has displayed that false spirit and weakness of heart which is so often manifested by the weak and illiterate in their arguments. When the question of the Ilbert Bill is now definitely settled to be dependent not upon suppositions but on facts, it is obviously folly or rather false pride to say that if the Ilbert Bill had been sent before publication, as the original proposals were, it would not have had a single European voice in its favour, nor even many Native ones.

Condemns the attitude of the London Times towards the Ilbert Bill and Lord Ripon.

Education.

Remarks in connection with the recommendations made by the Education Commission on the subject of collegiate education.

The Mahrátta (2) of the 23rd December says:—The chapter on collegiate education in the report of the Education Commission is neither very important nor very interesting. The recommendation that the rate of aid to each college be determined by the strength of the staff and the efficiency of the institution is not very hard, though it may seem so at first sight. It appears that the Commission meant to touch the question of a more extensive employment of Natives under the State when they recommend that Indian graduates be more largely employed than they have hitherto been in colleges maintained by Government. We have on several occasions shown that unless the substitution of Native for European professors in all subjects except English in colleges be resorted to, there will be no saving on account of colleges. Another recommendation affirms the power that is left to the discretion of principals of colleges to admit to certain courses of lectures, in special cases, students who have not passed the examinations required by the universities. We are inclined to believe that this would be making a desirable convenience for those who may wish to avail themselves of the superior instruction that may be given in a particular subject by a particular professor. At present anybody who has not passed the entrance examination is not allowed to cross the threshold of the seminaries of knowledge, and many a man who has both will and money to attend certain courses of lectures in colleges is obliged to curb his desire, chiefly because principals are not allowed to make exceptions in such cases. We do not know what practical difficulties may come in the way of carrying out this proposal; but the suggestion itself is reasonable and we have hopes that Government will act upon it. As regards the recommendations for religious and moral instruction in colleges, we feel sure that the local Governments will see the absurdity of carrying them out and of departing from the hitherto prevalent religious neutrality in colleges. Having no tendency to do any good to any section of the parties for whose good the suggestion is made, it will on the contrary be a fruitful source of misunderstanding and mischief of no small magnitude. Again, the restriction placed on aided colleges as to not receiving more than a certain proportion of free students is not at all desirable. Remembering how miserably small is the percentage of free students allowed by Government, it is not proper that Government should place any uncalled for limitations over the capacities of aided colleges if they have the means of admitting say thrice the number of free students fixed by the Educational Department. These and the like recommendations, if carried out, will make aided institutions rue the day when they sought the aid of Government and got themselves bound hand and foot in matters which should, strictly speaking, be left solely to their discretion. It ought to be the one aim of Government to disseminate education among the poorer classes of the people as far as possible; but recommendations like the one under notice will prevent other bodies from doing this virtuous duty if Government itself cannot do or does not think of doing it.

Advises the Educational Department and Government to offer encouragement and pecuniary aid to private educational institutions like the New English School at Poona.

In alluding to the success of the New English School at Poona in the recent Matriculation Examination of the University of Bombay, the Dnyán Prakásh (8) of the 27th December says:—To make such institutions a source of strength and permanent utility, all that is wanted is sympathetic treatment by the Educational Department, which means that Government must increase its grant for education. The educational field is at present so wide that all that the departmental agency and private enterprise can do is essentially necessary, and until such time arrives, which is however at present very remote, when the direct connection of Government with the educational activity can be altogether safely dispensed with, Government must make up its mind to spend larger sums upon education. The aim and object to be kept in view is the eventual severance of all direct connection of Government with national education, but though the time for effecting such a severance is as yet remote, still the only way to effect it eventually is to sympathetically encourage all local efforts in that direction. It is a standing disgrace to the department that such an institution as the New English School at Poona, though it has been in existence for the last four years, should not have had a helping hand extended to it. With sympathetic treatment at the hands of the department the institution would have been rendered doubly more useful than it has been. Such aid ought to have been voluntarily offered instead of its being sought, for it is not every man that can afford to dance attendance upon influential authorities in order to bring pressure to bear upon the Educational Department. Time so spent is energy wasted and is also demoralizing in its tendencies. It must not be understood that we in any sense condemn the activity of those who have been compelled to resort to such degrading tactics by the attitude of the department towards all kinds of private enterprise. Far from it. We simply condemn the system which renders such tactics essentially necessary if one desires to succeed in obtaining the countenance of the department. The local Government and the head of the Educational Department are mainly responsible for this disgraceful state of things, and it is a relief to know that the days of such a state of things are numbered. We trust that the recommendations of the Education Commission will ere long bear fruit and lead to the expansion of private enterprise in other districts of this Presidency, and also to its development in higher branches. We have no doubt that if the attitude of the department towards such private enterprise had been different from what it has been, we should have had by this time an Arts college in this Presidency under local private management established in our midst. We know that at one time our friend, the late lamented Bába Gokhale, contemplated the establishment of such an institution, but that the idea had to be given up for want of proper encouragement. The time has, however, now come when we think our friends of the New English School should seriously consider the practicability of moving the University of Bombay to recognize their institution as an affiliated institution teaching up to the Previous Examination.

Regrets that a small amount should have been expended last year in giving encouragement to new works in the vernaculars of the country.

In noticing the expenditure on public instruction in the Bombay Presidency as given in the report for 1882-83, the Rást Goftár (114) of the 23rd December observes that Rs. 8,384 were expended in the year before last in giving encouragement to the publication of original works in the vernacular languages, while last year Rs. 3,520 only were spent for the same purpose. There must be some reason for reducing largely the grant devoted to the encouragement of vernacular literature, but the Director of Public Instruction has not given any explanation for his action. How is it that this year so few works deserving of encouragement from Government were published? It is a standing complaint that the Educational Department is very niggardly in giving encouragement to authors of new works. In former years Government used to devote annually about 15,000 rupees towards the same object.

Says that the University Registrar should be a full-time official.

The Subodh Patrika (11) of the 23rd December says:—Dr. Peterson has again been elected Registrar of our University, and personally we have nothing to say against the selection. The learned Doctor's ability and industry are acknowledged by all and it cannot be denied that he has been of use to the University. But we think the Senate ought to think of having a full-time Registrar. Dr. Peterson cannot devote the whole of his time to University work, which is necessarily left to the care and management of his subordinates. Besides, the work itself has increased, and the subordinates in the office cannot be expected to perform it satisfactorily. The annual examinations require better management and supervision than were shown this year. It seems to us that the suggestion is one which deserves the careful attention of the Senate.

Railways.

A prayer for the curtailment of the hours of work of the signallers employed on the B. B. & C. I. Railway.

The Deshi Mitrá (95) of the 27th December, in giving an account of the recent fatal accident which occurred by the collision of two goods trains between Kánkrákhádi and Sachin stations on the B. B. & C. I. Railway, remarks that such accidents sometimes occur on this railway, but their principal cause is the niggardliness of the railway authorities. How can the poor signallers perform their duty satisfactorily when they are required to work every day from 6 P.M. to 6 A.M. without getting any sleep? It is no wonder that such terrible accidents should happen by a slight dereliction of duty. What a number of lives would have been lost had the collision taken place between either mail, passenger or mixed trains? The Mitrá strongly recommends Mr. Duxbury, the traffic manager, not to exact more than six hours' work from the poorly-paid signallers.

Municipalities.

Constitution of the Bombay Municipality and remarks and suggestions in connection therewith.

In an article headed "The Municipal Constitution of Bombay" the Indu Prakásh (9) of the 24th December says:—It seems to us that the principle of allowing such bodies as the Chamber of Commerce, the Senate of the University, and the Port Trust, and others similarly situated is sound and ought to be recognized, but at the same time it would tend to confusion if each of these bodies were allowed to return a certain number of representatives to the Corporation on its own account. The confusion would consist in this that the right being conceded to a few bodies of this kind it would look unfair to deny it to others. In a city like Bombay, where activities of different kinds play their part in the element of public business and affairs, such bodies have a tendency to increase every year. It is desirable, therefore, that the principle of giving such bodies the right to send representatives to the Corporation should be limited by some rule. All bodies which represent in some shape or other the trade of the city ought to be classed under one head and should have the right of sending a certain number of representatives to the Corporation on their joint account. From these the Senate of the University would have necessarily to be excluded. But the Fellows of the University may be grouped, we think, with the Justices of the Peace. Both of them occupy the same position since their right to elect depends on the fact that they represent the intelligence and public spirit of the city. We must admit that we do not see why the Justices should have so many as twenty-four votes allotted to them, or why they should enjoy the right of election independently of others similarly situated, as, for instance, the Fellows of the University, barristers, pleaders of the High Court, and attorneys. These latter classes are of as much use, if not more, to the community as the Justices. The Justices have been conceded the right of election merely because of their intelligence and education; and it is time enough that other classes, equally educated and intelligent, should get the right likewise. They might be all placed under one head and elect on their joint account. This proposal might no doubt give rise to the objection that the honour of being a Justice of the Peace would lose all its value if it were shorn of this most important of its privileges. But the objection is irrelevant in a discussion of this kind, where the question at issue is how best to bring the forces of education, intelligence and public spirit to bear on the administration of the municipal business of the city by its citizens. The rate-payers have the best of rights to be represented in the Corporation; bodies like the Chamber of Commerce, the Mill-owners' Association and others, which contribute more or less to the municipal funds, stand next to the rate-payers; and the claim of others who have or may wish to have the elective franchise extended to them rests on no other ground than that their superior intelligence and education afford sufficient guarantee that competent men will be elected by them more than by the general and presumably less educated body of the rate-payers. The claim of the Justices of the Peace falls purely within this category; and it seems to us that the position of the Fellows of the University, barristers, pleaders, and attorneys stands on the same footing in reference to this question. Why should the Justices alone then enjoy the franchise? Before Government are asked to reduce their votes from sixteen to eight, the franchise should be, we think, extended as above indicated, instead of being confined to the Justices of the Peace. Mr. Javerilál Umiáshankar's view that, as the great object of local self-government is to bring about a separation of official interests from the interests of non-officials in the management of a municipality, Government ought to have their votes restricted is sound in principle, but only upon the assumption that under the head of non-official interests not only the Justices or Fellows of the University alone but other classes equally intelligent should be allowed to vote. This brings us to another question, on which intelligent opinion is divided perhaps more than on any other question, relating to elective municipalities. Mr. Javerilál's contention that the official should be separated from the non-official interests if the real object of the elective system is to leave the people to manage their own affairs was repudiated by the Municipal Commissioner, who urged that there was in his opinion no expression more objectionable or more misleading than that of official side with reference to questions of public interest. It is no doubt in every way desirable that the difference as such should cease to exist, and that questions affecting public interests should be decided solely with a view to those interests. That, however, is beside the question raised by Mr. Javerilál. His contention, so far as we can see, amounts to this that the Government having for nearly a decade exercised the right of voting at the elections and the elective system having worked during that period to the satisfaction of all, they might now recede from the position of voters and become purely the controlling and supervising authority of the municipality. In the mofussil the voting authority may be essential; but in Bombay there is no danger of public interests being placed in jeopardy if Government give it up to some extent. It cannot of course be said that the officials and others who have hitherto sat in the Corporation as Government nominees have done anything to prejudice the interests of the public. But as it has now become necessary to extend the elective franchise towards the popular side, and as the Government has held sixteen votes more as a guiding than as a purely voting power, there can be no serious objection to its giving up some of its votes in favour of the popular electors in view of the altered state of things.

Takes exception to the present municipal administration of Bombay and makes some suggestions.

The Indian Spectator (1) of the 23rd December, in an article headed "Municipal Expenditure," says:—It bodes no good to the administration of municipal finance that year after year the chief executive officer demands a larger slice of the revenues of the city for purposes of ensuring to the inhabitants so-called efficiency in public health and improved convenience by way of new works of public utility. Every year lákhs of rupees are voted away by a conscienceless Corporation without anything like a careful scrutiny as to the uses to which the sums voted at a previous budget have been applied. It is all very well for the Municipal Commissioner to talk bravely at meetings of the Town Council and the Corporation as to the herculean work to be performed in connection with the scavenging of the city, to magnify the duties entrusted to the establishment of the Health Officer and the Executive Engineer, to half-bully the strong, to frighten the weak and to carry all before him by a packed majority. Every Commissioner employs these tactics. The municipal autocrat for the time being has, it seems, no other occupation than to get increased estimates sanctioned by the noodles of the Corporation on some pretext or another. One year the Commissioner is bamboozled by the heads of departments into accepting estimates which would scarcely bear the light of day when closely examined by experts—"estimates" which have proved the work of municipal engineers in the matter of the Malabár Hill Reservoir and the trumpery police quarters. Another year another Commissioner with too much faith in himself and his subordinates asks the Corporation to give him absolute power to do this and do that knowing full well that once he is master of the purse not even the most powerful member of the Corporation or Councillor will ever think of scrutinising the manner in which the vast sums which are collected from the rate-payers for the doubtful return they obtain of sanitation, light, water and so forth have been disposed of. Last year the Commissioner set his heart on the reorganization of the assessment department, the mal-administration of which had created a public scandal and which we among others were the foremost to expose. We cordially approved of that reform. But we at the same time pointed out that the efficient working of the system would very much depend on the staff that was employed. We deprecated the employment of a favourite of the Commissioner brought down all the way from Surat at an annual expenditure of Rs. 7,000. We then wondered why Mr. Brunton was appointed to succeed the late Mr. Hutchinson. Fancy an officer who had passed 18 years in looking after the sanitation of the city pitchforked into the position of a municipal assessor and collector. We have every respect for Mr. Brunton's honesty and conscientiousness. We take him to be one of the very best officers of the municipality. But no sane person in Bombay would even to-day approve of the wisdom that converted him from an Assistant Health Officer into the full-blown Assessor. A knowledge of accounts is in the very nature of things essential in an assessor. We have a good deal to say on this and similar subjects. Meanwhile we cannot do better than put the Corporation on their guard against the fallacious statement made by the Commissioner at Wednesday's meeting of the Town Council. It was meant to put the members of the Corporation on a wrong scent and was so far misleading. Multiplicity of appointments requires immediate check. The work of one man is done by three at a cost which any merchant or banker would consider extravagant. Between the permanent jacks of office and the noodles of the Corporation the rate-payers scarcely get half the return for the moneys they pay into the municipal treasury. The evil of increased expenditure is growing enormously, and sooner or later another Hope's Committee will be an absolute necessity. For a systematic exposure of extravagance in administration one must write week after week for a year before the subject is exhausted. One has only to go about among the people to learn what things are said about this precious municipality of ours. But there is little hope of influencing the Corporation so long as its composition remains what it is. We require an entirely different set of men to administer and control the city's funds with economy, honesty and intelligence. The majority of those who at present get themselves elected or nominated are mere selfish opportunists, ready rather to say jo-hukum to the officials and realise their personal interests than watch the true interests of the city.

Says that the Bombay Municipality should contribute towards the support of a medical dispensary for women and children.

The Indu Prakásh (9) of the 24th December says :— It is very desirable that the movement to establish a medical dispensary for women and children in this city should not lack the support and the sympathy of the municipality. But the attitude of some of the Town Councillors does not augur well for the movement. At the special meeting of the Council held on Saturday last a letter from Messrs. Kittredge and Sorábji Shápurji Bengáli was read, requesting the Council to sanction a contribution of Rs. 18,000 from the municipal funds to meet the current expenses of the dispensary for three years. The Native members of the Council were inclined to sanction the grant, but Dr. Blanc was not. He thinks that the movement can well be let alone, as it has been started under what he calls "most favourable auspices." But he forgets that the dispensary will not be for the use of any particular class or rank of people. The movement has received the support of the well-to-do portion of the Native public in the shape of contributions from them. But the originators of it desire that all classes should be in a position to derive benefit from it. The funds that have been raised would probably suffice if the dispensary were limited to the use of those who have contributed to them, but it is the rate-paying public who will be considerably benefited by the proposed hospital. Dr. Blanc cannot mean that the richer people ought to raise a dispensary for the general public and keep it going. The question must be viewed in its proper light, and we hope the municipality will not grudge the support which is demanded from it. A medical gentleman of Dr. Blanc's reputation and sympathies ought to be one of the foremost in lending the weight of his influence in support of so good a movement.

Native States.

Remarks in connection with a suggestion of Mr. Candy about investing Native princes with power after subjecting them to some educational test.

The Indian Spectator (1) of the 23rd December says:—Mr. Candy, of the Kolhápur State College, seems to have suggested that no Native prince should be entrusted with full administrative powers before he has satisfied the Government of his fitness. The Times of India very sensibly objects to this suggestion. But when the paramount power is ready to put down high-handedness in a Native State, to dismiss and deport an unworthy ruler, we think it stands to reason that it should see that the person to be installed on the gádi is qualified, humanly speaking, to exercise powers of life and death over thousands of his fellow-creatures. The only question is, who is to testify to his fitness—the zenana, the local aristocracy or the Political Agency? We believe each of these tests has been tried and has failed. Perhaps the best plan would be to combine them and to get the young man to pass an educational test likewise. We do not of course share Sir Lepel Griffin's gloomy estimate of the character of Native princes generally. Sir Lepel is a rough-riding Báhádur, who has no regard for birth or inherited greatness. It would be unwise to follow such a guide in the determination of perhaps the most delicate political problem. But let the Native politician cast about his eyes and see how many of the princes, chiefs and zamindárs of India are simpletons, how many bad and how few of them are good men and at the same time capable rulers. Perhaps royalty cannot thrive better in a backward country like this. What is not a little curious is that with a few exceptions it is the class of "educated" princes who seem wanting most in the power to give happiness to the subjects! Whatever be the cause, if the present state of things continues for long, it will not only make the modern Rája a laughing-stock for the outside world, but for his own people. For we observe that while the ryots are making slow but steady progress, the Rája stands still. This anomaly may lead in the long run to republicanism in Native States if the paramount power will allow it. The Rája must move with the times. He must have a liberal education for himself and a constitutional government for his people. But the Political Agent is hard to move. He will poke his nose into petty details of the Darbár and the zenana, but will hold back where the assertion of authority may do good to prince and people alike. The Foreign Office pretends to be a mother to the Native Ráj, but in reality it acts more like a mother-in-law.

Does not consider the suggestion of Mr. Candy about subjecting Native princes to an educational test before investing them with power practicable.

The Indu Prakásh (9) of the 24th December remarks:—We wish it were practicable to carry out the suggestion of Mr. Candy, the Principal of the Rájárám College at Kolhápur, that no Native prince should be entrusted with the administration of his State until he satisfies the Government of his fitness. But Native princes are not likely to view the suggestion in a favourable light. It may seem to them an indirect attempt to make their tenure of sovereignty dependent on the good graces of the Governor for the time being, and in the hands of a despotic Political Agent it might serve as an instrument of petty tyranny. The desire to see improved modes of administration prevail in the Native States requires like all great and good desires time for its fulfilment. The princes of Native States are not now what they were ten years ago. There are, it is true, still many who lag behind, but of one thing we may be perfectly sure that even these are beginning to find that the times have changed and are still changing. In the meantime the British Government has only to go on quietly with its policy of introducing schools and encouraging education in Native States. Hasty measures, however well-intentioned, may retard the slow though silent progress which several, if not all, of the Native States are making at present.

Expresses satisfaction with the administration of Colonel West as Political Agent of Káthiáwár.

The Gujaráti (100) of the 23rd December is rejoiced to learn that the people of Káthiáwár are much pleased with the administration of Colonel West. The new Political Agent has abolished, observes the Gujaráti, the long-standing but most detestable custom of forced labour and the immoral practice of receiving favours from the Native States by the establishments of Political officers while moving on circuit. Colonel West makes enquiries wherever he goes whether any individuals are subjected to ill-treatment by the officials of Native States, and adopts expeditious means for redressing their grievances.

Prefers certain complaints against the Navánagar and the Junágad States.

A correspondent of the Jáme Jamshed (104) of the 24th December states that the Political Agent of Káthiáwár deserves praise for disposing of the complaints of petitioners within a week of the date of their receipt by him. But as regards the complaints against the States of Junágad, Navánagar and Bhávnagar, the petitioners are told at once to apply to the respective States, and this gives an opportunity to those States to ruin the complainants. Recently the Girásia of Bára in the Navánagar State preferred a complaint to the Assistant Political Agent in charge of the Hálár Pránt, but he was told to apply to the Navánagar State, the authorities of which have since then been harassing him. The Girásia can command one thousand persons, but he does not wish to get himself entangled in difficulties with the State. The residents of the villages round about Bára have migrated, some to Dwárka, others to Khambália, and the rest to Porbandar. The Revenue officer of Navánagar, the Political officer in charge of the Hálár Pránt, the Assistant to the Governor General's Agent, and some other officers have gone to enquire into the dispute that has arisen between the Navánagar State and the Gáikwád's Government in regard to the boundary of their respective possessions in Okhámandal, and to them the Girásia of Bára complained of the oppression to which he was subjected. But as these officers were supplied with provisions by the Navánagar State they did not attend to the complaints of the Girásia. It is said that the Jám wishes to ruin the Girásia by considering him a "Jiwáidár." If the Girásia resolves to oppose the oppression by armed resistance several human lives will be lost. In the matter of the massacre of the Maiyás the Government of India ordered that Police Superintendent Sulemán, Diwán Sále Hindi, and Bápálál should be dismissed from the Junágad service and should not be permitted to live within the boundaries of the State. In spite of this order these persons are allowed to carry on the administration. The control over the police of the State is said to be entrusted to one Ambárám, but really Sulemán exercises the authority.

Affairs at Junágad.

The Samsher Báhádur (115) of the 21st December says that it is surprising that though Mr. Bápálál was ordered by the Supreme Government to be removed from his post of Deputy Diwán of Junágad, he still continues to hold that office. If this be a fact, he ought certainly to be removed from his post. The Samsher has heard from a reliable source that the Diwán, Haridás Viháridás, and Mr. Bápálál live together in one building, that they often go together to the court, and that Mr. Haridás acts according to the advice of Mr. Bápálál. As long as Messrs. Bápálál and Bávdin are not removed from Junágad, the State will not improve. It is satisfactory that Mr. Sále Hindi has retired from the service, but Messrs. Bávdin and Bápálál linger on. It is said that the Diwán Haridás has requested the Viceroy not to remove Mr. Bápálál, but it is to be hoped that the Government of India will not be deceived by this representation. It is for this reason that Mr. Bápálál likes Mr. Haridás. It is improbable that the result of the Maiya Commission will prove very successful. The people will not be benefited as long as Junágad is not cleared of this rubbish.

The Gujarát Mitrá (79) of the 23rd December observes that it is not right to levy a tax on every shop in the city of Baroda and to exact another duty from every shopkeeper for stamping weights. It is true that these taxes are levied from olden times, but they are unsuitable at the present day and ought to be abolished at once. His Highness the Gáikwád is exhorted to discontinue the taxes in accordance with the rest of the improved administration of his State.

Desires the abolition of some taxes levied on the shopkeepers in the city of Baroda.

The Gujaráti (108) of the 23rd December severely censures the Cutch Darbár for levying a new tax on the people of that province and cutting one month's pay of the servants of the State for the purpose of collecting funds for celebrating the approaching marriage of the Ráo.

Disapproves of the imposition of a new tax on the people of Cutch.
